If this be the Christ, what is it to be a Christian? For a description of the perfect Christian she falls back upon the poem of the late Dr. Charles Mackay:—

If thou'rt a Christian in deed and thought, Loving thy neighbour as Jesus taught,— Living all days in the sight of Heaven,
And not one only out of seven,— Sharing thy wealth with the suffering poor, Helping all sorrow that Hope can cure,— Making religion a truth in the heart,
And not a cloak to be worn in the mart,
Or in high cathedrals and chapels and fanes,
Where priests are traders and count the gains,—
All God's angels will say, "Well done!"
Whenever thy mortal race is run.
White and forgiven,

Thou'lt enter heaven,
And pass, unchallenged, the Golden Gate,
Where welcoming spirits watch and wait
To hail thy coming with sweet accord
To the Holy City of God the Lord!

If Peace is thy prompter, and Love is thy guide, And white-robed Charity walks by thy side,—
If thou tellest the truth without oath to bind, Doing thy duty to all mankind,— Raising the lowly, cheering the sad,
Finding some goodness e'en in the bad,
And owning with sadness if badness there be,
There might have been badness in thine and in thee,
If Conscience the warder that keeps thee whole
Had uttered no voice to thy slumbering soul,—
All God's angels will say, "Well done!"

Whenever thy mortal race is run.
White and forgiven,
Thou'lt enter heaven,
And pass, unchallenged, the Golden Gate,
Where welcoming spirits watch and wait
To hail thy coming with sweet accord
To the Holy City of God the Lord?

If thou art humble, and wilt not scorn,
However wretched, a brother forlorn,—
If thy purse is open to misery's call,
And the God thou lovest is God of all,
Whatever their colour, clime or creed,
Blood of thy blood, in their sorest need,—
If every cause that is good and true,
And needs assistance to dare and do,
Thou helpest on through good and ill,
With trust in Heaven, and God's good "ill,—

All God's angels will say, "Well done 1"
Whenever thy mortal race is run.
White and forgiven,
Thou'lt enter heaven,
And pass, unchallenged, the Golden Gate,
Where welcoming spirits watch and wait
To hail thy coming with sweet accord
To the Holy City of God the Lord!

THE CRUCIAL QUESTION.

But the question as to how the mass of brutish humanity is to be brought up to this high ideal is not answered by Marie Corelli with any degree of explicit-ness. She would have a purified Church, she tells us, "a House of Praise to God, without any superstition or dogma"; but the only pages in which she does anything like justice to the conception of the Roman Church occur in the conversation between Aubrey Leigh the Socialist and Monsignor Gherardi. Aubrey declares that if the Roman Catholic faith were "purified from the accumulated superstition of ages and freed from intolerance and bigotry, it would perhaps be the grandest form of Christianity in the world"; to which Monsignor Gherardi replies that it is not the Church against which he should arm himself—it is the human race:—

It is not one or many religious systems with which you should set yourself to contend. It is the blind brutishness of man. The Church tries to supply the spiritual needs of the human being, such as his spiritual needs at present are. When he demands more, it will give him more. At present his needs are purely personal and, therefore, low and tainted with sensuality. Yet we drag him along through these emotions as near to the blameless Christ as we can. "You wish," said Gherardi, "to help and serve humanity. Enthusiast! You would do far better to help and serve the Church, for the Church rewards. Humanity has cursed and killed every great benefactor it ever had, including Christ."

It is, however, perhaps asking too much from Marie Corelli to explain how she would found her new Church. Mrs. Humphry Ward ventured upon this arduous undertaking, not with much success, in "Robert Elsmere"; but that is the root and difficulty of the whole question, and in this book it is shirked rather than faced. Now, having thus set forth Marie Corelli's own account of the Christ which she would preach and the Christianity which she would introduce, and noted her evasion of the real question as to how a human organisation can co-operate in realising this divine ideal, let us turn to the story which, in order to leaven her somewhat destructive and ill-defined theology, she has crammed full of the familiar resources of the transpontine melodrama.

THE STORY.

The motif of the tale is very simple, but her attempt at realising her idea is very daring. A good Cardinal, who might have been modelled in many respects upon Cardinal Manning—Felix Bonpré—determines to leave his cathedral town, and go on a tour of several months, during which time he would try to probe for himself the truth of how the world was going, "whether on the downward road to destruction and death, or up the high ascents of progress and life." He very soon found that the confusion and trouble of the world were not mere hearsay, but in very truth existed. Everywhere he found the general bewilderment of the world, and everywhere he traces it to the same root, the growing lack of faith in God and hereafter. How came faith to grow dim? The more he considered this subject, the more persistently the same answer asserted itself—that the blame rested principally with the Church itself, and its teachers and preachers, and not only in one but in all forms of creed.

HOW CHRIST CAME AGAIN.

The story opens with the Cardinal listening to miraculous music in the cathedral at Rouen, in the midst of which he hears the question "When the Son of Man cometh, think ye He shall find faith on earth?" That night the Cardinal has a vision, a dream of the end of the world. Agonised at the spectacle of the end of all things, he bursts into a prayer, crying out, "Have patience yet, thou outraged and blasphemed Creator! Break once again thy silence as of old, and speak to us! Pity us once again, ere thou slay us utterly! Come to us even as Thou camest in Judæa, and surely we will receive Thee and obey Thee, and reject Thy love no more." The Divine Voice sounds in his ears, saying "Thy prayer is heard, and once again the silence shall be broken. Nevertheless, remember that the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." He wakes and hears almost at once a plaintive walling as of some human creature in distress. a desolate yet gentle cry as of some sick and suffering child. He listens; the cry is repeated, and he goes out into the darkness to see from whom it proceeds. "A boy's desolate little figure, with uplifted hands clasped appealingly and laid against the shut cathedral door, and face hidden and pressed hard upon those hands, as though in mute and unconsolable despair." The Cardinal accosts him, and the boy looks up. "What a sad face he had!—worn and weary yet beautiful! What eyes! heavy with the dews of sorrow, yet tender even in pain!" Why are you weeping here alone?" he asks.

"Because I am left alone to weep," said the boy, answering in a soft voice of vibrating and musical melancholy. "For me the world is empty."

The Cardinal offers the boy shelter, asks his name; it is Manuel. In such wise came Christ again to earth.

HIS FIRST MIRACLE.

The Divine Child becomes inseparable from the Cardinal. He goes with him everywhere, and always talks as Marie Corelli thinks Christ would talk if He were a child living in the midst of the corrupt civilisation of the nineteenth century. This, it must be admitted, is a tolerably daring conception, even more daring than that which she embodied in "The Sorrows of Satan." Having re-incarnated the author of Evil, she does not shrink from endeavouring to give us a new incarnation of the Son of Man. He begins by working a miracle. There is in Rouen a boy of ten, who when a baby had fallen from a cart and injured himself, so that he grew up a poor little twisted mite of humanity, with a bent spine and one useless leg, which hung limply from his body. The Cardinal prays for the child's recovery, and Manuel tells him that in all the universe there is never a pure and unselfish prayer that the great good God does not answer. "Take courage, dear little brother; you will soon be well." The cripple limps home, and the Cardinal and the child Christ depart for Paris. But hardly have they left Rouen when the miracle is complete. In place of the helpless creature who had hobbled painfully on his crutches from the divine presence there came a "light, strong figure of a straight-limbed boy," who runs with the graceful and easy movement of a creature who had never known a day's pain. This, however, is the only miracle wrought by Manuel, unless his preservation of Abbé Vergniaud, in the church of Notre Dame de Lorette, may be called such.

AN ATHEIST ABBÉ.

The Cardinal goes to Paris, where he meets his niece, Angela Sovrani, an artist, a description of whose masterpiece I have quoted. She was in love with a fellowartist, one Florian Varillo, whom she hopes to marry and whom she has idealised, after the fashion of a lover, out of all semblance to his real self. In reality, he is a miserable little creature, far inferior to her in genius, and who, at the very moment she believed him to be absolutely devoted to her, was living with one of his models in Rome. In Angela's studio they meet a French Abbé, Abbé Vergniaud, one of the tribe known as atheist priests, eloquent, witty, and absolutely without faith in the creed which he preaches. Vergniaud, feeling the approach of death, confesses to the Cardinal that when a young priest he had ruined one of his penitents. He left her in her shame, and she brought up her son to hate the author of his mother's disgrace. She died when he was twenty, and by her death-bed the lad swore that he would never rest till he had killed the man who had dishonoured his mother, broken her heart and brought him into the world with a stigma on his name. Under the combined influence of the Cardinal and of Manuel, the Abbé decides to make public confession of his guilt, and in the church of Notre Dame de Lorette he preaches to a congregation of "tout Paris," a sermon in which he denounces the Vatican and declares that the Church is setting itself as a drag on the wheel of progress. He then announces to his astonished hearers the sin which he had committed five-and-twenty years ago, and at that moment his son fires at him from the congregation. The bullet whizzed straight at the head of the preacher, but the boy Manuel, with arms outstretched, sprang in front of the Abbé, and diverted the bullet, which split the pulpit immediately above him. The would-be assassin was seized and brought to the Abbé. "Let him go," said the preacher, as he looked upon the young, black-browed, black-eyed peasant, whose defiant manner implied that he was disdainfully resigned to the inevitable. "Set him free, messieurs, if you please. I decline to prosecute my own flesh and blood. I will be answerable for his future conduct. I am entirely answerable for his past. He is conduct. I am entirely answerable for his past. He is my son." Father and son were reconciled, but, of course, the Abbé fell under the stern condemnation of the Vatican.

THE CHILD CHRIST IN ST. PETER'S.

At Paris we are introduced to Mr. Aubrey Leigh, a Socialist of genius, who has written a book which has made his name famous throughout the world, and who probably represents Marie Corelli's ideal of a man. After a good deal of discussion between the emissary of the Pope, the Cardinal and the son of Abbé Vergniaud, Cardinal Bonpré and the boy Manuel depart for Rome, where the Cardinal learns for the first time of the miracle that had been wrought at Rouen. It was a bold conception that of taking the boy Christ to St. Peter's and the Vatican, but Marie Corelli having put her hand to the plough does not turn back. Of course, Manuel is revolted at everything that he sees at every turn in the Holy City. St. Peter's he describes as the "strangest p'a e in all the world, and surely one of the most wicked." It is "a huge theatre misnamed a Church. . . . There is nothing of the loving God in that vast cruelty of a place, where wealth and ostentation vie with intolerant officialism, bigotry, and superstition ! . . . What has the Man of Sorrows to do with all the evil splendour of St. Peter's?...Oh, what a loneliness is that of Christ in this world! What a second agony in Gethsemane!"

Abou story w logical interest both p was n a chap a pries whom his de Corell Cazea fasten breatl hide : will n and h him d she fl Aft > ness conv scher faith Pope pale Leig foun Her who crimi

and in v and que dis one spi tra are sa: th:

nati

sav

Ar ch an th Sy in w fo

i s

MELODRAMA-

About this time Marie Corelli evidently felt that her story was getting too heavy, and overcharged with theological discussions, so by way of keeping up the flagging interest of the novel-reader she introduces a duel in which both parties are shot dead, and then, fearing that this was not sufficient element of melodrama, she gives us a chapter in which the Archbishop of Rouen's secretary, a priest of the name of Cazeau, is stabbed by a woman whom he had ruined, and who had been driven mad by his desertion. Even the stabbing did not satisfy Marie Corelli, and the poor mad creature, after having stabbed Cazeau thrice, "pounced upon him like a tigress, fastened her fingers on his throat, clutched his flesh, and breathlessly murmured, 'Never, never, never can you hide away from me any more! Together, together, I will never let you go!"—till, as his eyes rolled up in agony and his jaw relaxed, she uttered a shout of ecstasy to see him die!" Then, "fast grappling her betrayer's corpse," she flung herself into the river.

After having thus served up her double spoonful of criminal sauce, she resumes her exposition of the wickedness of the Vatican. Aubrey Leigh leaves Rome, convinced that the Holy See was an "unscrupulous scheme for drawing money out of the pockets of the faithful." She does not spare even the person of the Pope. He is a "poor, feeble, scraggy old man, with a pale withered face and dark eyes." Although Aubrey Leigh failed to find what he sought in the Vatican, he found what he did not expect, in the beautiful Sylvie Hermenstein, with whom he falls in love on the spot, and whom he ultimately marries.

-AND OTHER INGREDIENTS.

It is hard for a semi-didactic novel to be thoroughly natural. It is only Zola's intense earnestness which saves "Fécondité" from being sometimes ridiculous; and even his great and strong book suffers from the way in which he contrives that all his characters shall discuss and present some marked phase of the eternal sex question. In "Fécondité" almost every one is morally diseased, and in "The Master Christian," almost everyone, except the few who are too obviously patterns, is spiritually at war and morally upset. The contrast between the good and bad is too great. The bad are too utterly bad, the good too angelic, and (shall it be said?) verging sometimes on the priggish. Let no one say that Cardinal Bonpré, a really beautiful character, or Angela, or Sylvie, or Aubrey Leigh, or any of the good characters in the book are unnaturally good; but Varelli and several other minor personages, to say nothing of all the Monsignori of the Vatican, are most unnaturally wicked. Sylvie is really rather a charming little "piece of femininity," all fluffs and frills and furbelows, underneath which lay a profound soul, and one knows not how great force of character. We get a little tired of hearing about this sylph-like form clad in lovely dresses made of all sorts of shimmering, silky, gauzy fabrics; and we can quite condone her lover Aubrey Leigh for not immediately seeing that she would really be the most suitable wife in the world to live with him amongst the poor slumfolk and teach the old-new gospel of humanity and self-renunciation.

THE SYLPH-LIKE SYLVIE.

Sylvie runs away from Paris to escape her light-of-love lover, the Marquis de Fontenelle, and settles in a pretty Roman house with her duenna, an Arab page and an Italian toy-dog. There she inflames the passions of Monsignor Gherardi (who has of course a leading danseuse concealed near as his mistress, and possibly a few unlawfully-born children about somewhere). There, also, she introduces herself to her future husband, Aubrey Leigh, by playfully throwing a rose at him from a balcony. Whereupon he sends her back a cluster of roses with a message which Romeo might have sent to Juliet, but hardly a man of the Aubrey Leigh type to a fairy of the class which Socialists usually most abhor, who had thrown him a stray blossom from a balcony at midnight. Still, Sylvie is perhaps the most charming and really human figure in the book : the rest are stagey, and hardly one is perfectly natural. Sylvie, of course, marries Aubrey Leigh, though to do so she breaks with the Romish Church, to the intense chagrin of the holy Monsignori, she having "great possessions."

When she settles down with her husband, it is to found a living church and work among the poor in a miserable East End district of London, a church of the future, without creeds and dogmas, which should reach the people, and to which the people would turn in their need, a church which went back nineteen hundred years and tried to bring to earth again the Christianity of Christ instead of the Christianity of Creeds.

MISS CORELLI AT HER BEST.

It is when Miss Corelli gets among simple folk and tells their simple story, that Marie Corelli is at her best. The passages which describe the French peasant Patoux and his wife and mischief-loving children are some of the pleasantest in a book which has many unpleasant passages. The best part, although it was never meant to be such, is the description of Aubrey Leigh's life among the Cornish fisher-folk, although even here there is an unkindly curate who is too unkindly. For almost all Miss Corelli's Church of England clergy are "churlish priests," and almost all her Catholic clergy are dissolute liars. There had been a storm on the rough Cornish coast, and a "herring-smack had gone down within sight of land, sinking eight strong men with it, husbands and fathers."

When the funeral day came, and the bodies of the eight unfortunate victims were committed to the earth, it happened, as fate would have it, that the rector of the parish, a kindly, sympathetic, very simple old man, who really did his best for his parishioners according to the faint perceptions of holy things that indistinctly illumined his brain, happened to be away, and his place was taken by the assistant curate, a man of irritable and hasty temper, who had a horror of "scenes," and who always put away all suggestions of death from him whenever it was possible. It was very disagreeable to him to have to look at eight coffins—and still more disagreeable to see eight weeping widows, surrounded by forlorn and fatherless children—and he gabbled over the funeral service as quickly as he could, keeping his eyes well on the book lest he should see some sobbing child looking at him, or some woman dropping in a dead faint before he had time to finish. He was afraid of unpleasant incidents, and yet with all his brusque and nervous hurry to avoid anything of the kind, an unpleasant incident insisted on manifesting itself.

All this is characteristic enough of the writer's mood, a typical passage showing all the faults and all the good qualities of her style. But—

Just as the fourth coffin was being lowered into the ground, a wild-haired girl rushed forward and threw herself upon it.

"Oh, my man, my man!" she wailed. "My own sweet-

There was a moment's silence. Then one of the widows stepped out, and approaching the girl, laid her hand on her arm.
"Are ye making a mock of me, Mary Bell?" she said, "or is it God's truth ye're speaking to my husband lying there?"

his niece.

e master-

a fellow-narry and lover, out

he is a nius, and bsolutely

in Rome.

é, Abbé priests, in the

ing the al that of his

She

the lad

ne man art and name.

and of sion of

orette

ermon

at the earers

years

raight

, with

and iately

and cher, eved

dis-

free.

own

iture

le is irse.

the

1, a has vho

fter

the ud,

ne,

the old r's nd

is

he est

1."

is nt

The distraught creature called Mary Bell looked up with a sudden passion glowing in her tear-wet eyes.

"It's God's truth 1" she cried, "and ye needn't look scorn on me! for both our hearts are broken, and no one can ever mend them. Yes! It's God's truth! He was your husband, but my sweetheart! And we'll neither of us see a finer man again!"

.... "I'm sorry for ye," she said, lifting herself from the coffin to which she clung, and turning upon the widow of the drowned man, "and ye can be just as sorry for me! He loved us both, and why should we quarrel? A man is ever like that just chancy and changeful, but he tried his honest hardest not to love me-yes, he tried hard! it was my fault! for I never tried! I loved him !- and I'll love him, till I go where he has gone! And we'll see who God'll give his soul to!"

. . . But now the widow of the dead man suddenly took up the argument in a shrill voice which almost tore the air to shreds.

"... Mary Bell, come here! If so be as my husband was your sweetheart, God forgive him, ye shall come home wi' me! and we'll never have a word agin the man who is lying dead there. Come wi' me, Mary!"

THE CHILD CHRIST AT THE VATICAN.

Cardinal Bonpré takes Manuel with him to the Vatican, where they have an interview first with Monsignor Gherardi, who tells the Cardinal that the Pope can never excuse or condone the grave offence of Abbé Vergniaud, whose excommunication has been decided upon. fear your Eminence," said Monsignor Moretti, "will be severely censured for having pardoned the Abbé's sins." "Is it wrong to forgive sinners?" asked Manuel, and then ensues a sharp conflict of words between the boy Christ and the two Monsignori. Manuel sums up the discussion by declaring that Christ did not found a Church :-

He tried to make a human brotherhood. They all forsook Him in His hour of need, and one betrayed Him. When He died and rose again from the dead, they sought to give them-selves a divine standing on His divinity. They preached His word to the world-true !-but they preached their own as well !

Hence the Church!

"Surely some evil spirit possesses this boy," exclaimed Monsignor Moretti. "Retro me Sathanas! He is a rank heretic heathen! And yet he lives in the companionship of Cardinal Felix Bonpré!"

This was a promising overture to the interview with the Pope. Manuel refuses to kneel to the Pope. A sense of dumb stupefaction seizes the Monsignori, and like a shrunken white mummy set in a gilded sarcophagus the representative of St. Peter huddled himself together, reflections of the daylight on the crimson hangings around him casting occasional gleams of crimson athwart his bony hands and cadaverous features; while on the first step of his throne the aërial form of the beautiful boy with his fair face, full, flashing eyes and radiant hair, stood like an angel suddenly descended at the portals of the mummy's tomb. Manuel, finding the others smitten dumb by his presence, appeals to the Pope. He discourses to him for several pages, while all the time "the dreadful dumb spell remained unbroken!" Only Manuel seemed truly alive, while "the Pope's figure seemed to grow more and more attenuated; his worn white hands, grasping the gilt arms of his chair, looked like the claws of a dead bird, and his face, shrunken and withered, like the Chinese ivory carving of some forgotten idol."

HIS INTERVIEW WITH THE POPE.

What Manuel said to the Pope and what the Pope replied will be seen from the following extracts. I have not space to quote in full :-

"Why do you stay here alone?" he asks the Sovereign Pope. "You must be very unhappy! . . . . To be here all alone!

And a whole world outside waiting to be comforted! To have vast wealth lying about you unused, with millions and millions of poor, starving, struggling, dying creatures near at hand, cursing the God whom they have never been taught to know or to bless! To be safely sheltered while others are in danger! . . Come out and see the poor lying at the great gates at St. Peter's-the lame, the halt, the blind -come and heal them by a touch, a prayer! You can, you must, you shall heal them! if you will! Pour money into the thin hands of the starving! come with me into the miserable places of the world, come and give comfort! . . . . Your mission is to comfort, not to condemn! You need no throne! You want no kingdom, no settled place, no temporal power! Enough for you to work and live as the poorest of all Christ's ministers, without pomp, without ostentation or public ceremonial, but simply clothed in pure holiness! . . . . Live as Christ lived, teaching the people personally and openly; loving them, pitying them, sharing their joys and sorrows, blessing their little children! Deny yourself to no man; and make of this cold temple in which you now dwell self-imprisoned, a home and refuge for the friendless and the poor! Come out with me!"

This, then, is the answer to the question, What would Jesus do if He were Pope? For by the strange and wonderful Foundling Child, unlike all other children, a Child and yet not a Child, none other than the Saviour of Mankind is meant :-

"God," continues the Child, "who manifests His power and tenderness in the making of the simplest leaf, the smallest bird, is lost to the understanding and affection of humanity in the multitude of Creeds!...Come and lift up the world by your very coming! Stretch out your hands in benediction over kings and beggars alike !—there are other roses to give than golden ones to Queens! There are poor women who share half they earn with those still poorer; there are obscure lives which in their very obscurity are forming the angel-nature and weaving the angel's crown,-look for these in the world, give them your Golden Roses! Leave rulers and governments alone, for you should be above and beyond all rulers and governments! You should be the herald of peace, the pardoner of sin, the rescuer of the fallen and the refuge of the distressed! Come out with me and be all this to the world, so that when the Master comes He may truly find you working in His vineyard!....Rome, like Babylon, shall fall! and the Powers of the Church shall be judged as the Powers of Darkness rather than of Light, because they have rejected the Word of their Master, and 'teach for doctrine the commandments of men!' Disaster shall follow swift upon disaster, and the cup of trembling shall be drained again to its last dregs, as in the olden days, unlessunless perchance-you will come out with Me!"

With the last words a sort of galvanic shock seemed to be imparted to the rigid figure in the chair. Springing upright, suddenly, his voice rang out like a clarion, discordantly yet

"In the name of God," he cried, "who and what is this boy? . . Do you stand by and permit this affront to me!—living head of the Church! From a child! a tramp of the streets! who dares to speak to me-who dares to reproach, to prophesy ay to blaspheme and teach me!"

"As One having authority, and not as the scribes!" said Manuel, with a swift, flashing glance which like a shaft of lightning seemed to pierce through flesh and bone-for, as he met that radiant and commanding look, the jewel-like eyes of the Pope lost their lustre and became fixed and glassy....and, like a dead body which had only been kept in place by some secret mechanical action, he fell back in his chair senseless, his limbs stretching themselves out with a convulsive shudder into stark immovability.

Moretti swears, Gherardi rings for the valet, and the Cardinal and Manuel depart. "He would not come with me," said

Manuel, "and he never will come-but you will!"

SAUCE CORELLIANA.

This is the great scene of the book, and with it the theological interest culminates. The story then turns to Ang disc

jealo

so fa

pror

her nate afte piec

the

the nia

den

gra

pro

cra

W

ma

tre

Au

int

roi

pe

an ha

Al

in

M

le: pl M

To have d millions at hand, know or n danger! ates at St. them by a them ! if starving! come and t to congdom, no work and np, withd in pure ople pering their yourself you now less and t would ge and ldren, a Saviour wer and est bird, y in the

by your er kings golden alf they hich in veaving m your for you ! You rescuer t with comes Rome, shall Light, r, and g shall ilessto be right, ly yet boy? living reets!

phesy said ft of as he es of and, some s, his into said the s to

linal

Angela, who in triumph unveils her great picture, only to discover that her worthless, faithless lover is filled with jealous envy at the discovery that a woman's work could so far eclipse his own. Having made this discovery, he promptly determines to stab her, and claim the credit of her work. He plunges a dagger into her back, but fortu-nately fails to take her life. He then flees, and shortly afterwards is burned alive in a Trappist monastery, a piece of poetic justice which will no doubt command the applause of the gods in the gallery when, if ever, the piece is represented on the stage.

The scene then changes to Paris, where Abbé Vergniaud, excommunicated even in death by the Pope, and denied the right of Christian burial, is committed to the grave in the Cimetière de Père-la-Chaise, while his son pronounces over his tomb an oration in which he embodies the leading doctrines of the Christian Democratic Party of which he was the leader.

THE EXODUS FROM ROME.

About the rest of the story there is not much to say. We have the familiar scene in which Monsignor Gherardi makes love to Sylvie Hermenstein in order to secure her treasures for the Church and her body for himself. Aubrey Leigh, concealed behind a convenient curtain, intervenes at the moment when the Monsignor's arm is round the waist of his beloved; and the villain is compelled by Abbé Vergniaud's son to own himself baffled, and to desist from his evil machinations against the happiness of the newly-wedded lovers. Cyrillon, the Abbé's son, makes love to Angela, and the whole party, including Cardinal Bonpré and the Child Christ, Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey Leigh, and Angela and the Abbé's son, leave Rome, the Child Manuel declaring that it is no place for him, and that he will leave it for ever. Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey Leigh, when they come to London, have a great marriage service, in which the bridegroom performs the ceremony himself, and besides preaches a sermon to the assembled multitude, in which he embodies Marie Corelli's favourite dissertations concerning the sin of marriages for money.

"CHRIST OR THE POPE?"

The story ends with the attempt of the Pope to punish the Cardinal for his many sins and misdemeanours against the authority of the Vatican. He is ordered to repudiate his niece, break off all connection with Mr. and Mrs. Leigh, and sever himself at once and for ever from the boy Manuel. Failing compliance with these commands, he is to be deprived of his Cardinal's hat, and of his diocese. "It seems that you must choose between the Church and me. To keep melyou must forego the Church. To keep the Church you must say farewell to me," says Manuel. Cardinal Bonpré writes a long letter to the Pope, in which he declares that between the Church doctrine and Christ's own Gospel he chooses the Gospel; between Rome's discipline and Christ's command he chooses Christ's command. Having made the great renunciation, the boy Manuel takes him out into the streets, into the darkness and the rain. They hardly meet a soul :-

One or two forlorn wayfarers crossed their path-a girl in rags, then a man half-drunk and reeling foolishly from side to side. Manuel paused, looking at them.

" Poor, sad souls!" he said. " If we could see all the history of their lives we should pity them, and not condemn!'

"Who is it that condemns?" murmured Bonpré gently.
"No one save man," responded Manuel. "God condemns nothing-because in everything there is a portion of Himself. And when man presumes to condemn and persecute his fellowmen, he is guilty of likewise condemning and persecuting his Maker, and outraging that Maker in his own perverted soul!

APOTHEOSIS.

They go into a wooden church in which Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey Leigh had been married that morning, and the Cardinal hears again the strange and mystic music which he had heard in the Cathedral of Rouen, and as he listened he saw another vision, a vision of the angels.

Slowly, as though a wind should bend straight trees into an arching round, the plain walls took on themselves the form of perfect architectural beauty, like swaying stems of flowers or intertwisted branches, the lines formed symmetrically, and through the shadowy sculptured semblance came the gleam of "a light that never was on sea or land," the dazzling light of thousands of shining wings! of thousands of lustrous watchful eyes! of thousands of dazzling faces, that shone like stars or were fair as flowers! The Vision grew more and more beautiful, more and more full of light, and through veils of golden vapour, great branching lilies seemed to grow and blossom out, filling the air with perfume; and in their flowering beauty perfected the airy semblance of the wondrous Place of Prayer built by spiritual hands, and like a far-off echo of sweetness falling from unseen heights there came a musical whisper of the chorus sung by the poor.

A convulsive trembling seized the Cardinal's mortal frame, but the soul within him was strong and invincible. With hands outstretched he turned to Manuel, and lo! the boy was moving away from him—moving slowly but resolutely up towards the Cross. Breathless, speechless, the aged Felix watched him with straining, uplifted eyes; and as he watched, saw his garments grow white and glistening, and a great light began to shine about him, till, reaching the foot of the Cross, he turned, and then—he was no more a child! All the glory of the "Vision Beautiful" shone full upon the dying body and escaping soul of Christ's faithful servant—the Divine head crowned with thorns, the Divine arms stretched out against the beams of the great Cross, the Divine look of love and welcome !- and with a loud cry of ecstasy Felix Bonpré extended his trembling hands. "Master! Master!" he murmured, "Did not my heart burn within me when Thou didst talk with me by the way?"

Yearning towards that mystic glory, he clasped his hands, and in the splendour of the dream, and through the pulsations of the solemn music, he heard a voice—the voice of his child-companion Manuel, but a voice grown full of Divine authority, while yet possessing all human tenderness.

That is the story. As for the child Manuel, he disappears. "Many wondered and sought to trace Him, but no one ever heard where He had gone." The last words of the book are as follows :-

And the days grow dark and threatening-and life is more and more beset with difficulty and disaster-and the world is moving more and more swiftly on to its predestined end, and the Churches are as stagnant pools, from whence Death is far more often born than Life.

And may we not ask ourselves often in these days the

"When the Son of Man cometh, think ye He shall find faith on earth?"

Not much, if Marie Corelli be correct.

---------------

Some Notable Books of the Month.

JOHN CHINAMAN.

THE PROBLEM OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

FOR a description of the externals of Chinese life Miss E. R. Scidmore's "China: The Long-Lived Empire" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net) is an admirable book, a great deal better written than the average travel-book on China. Miss Scidmore does not like John Chinaman, and frankly confesses that she does not understand him, in spite of her seven visits to the Celestial Kingdom. She quotes with approval the opinion of a Chinese resident that "the longer we stay here the less we see, the less we are fitted to judge." She admits that she does not understand the workings of the yellow brain, nor does she believe any one ever has or ever will :-

No one has ever penetrated or uncovered or satisfactorily analysed the Chinese brain, or whatever lies behind these blank, stolid, immovable yellow countenances; no one has comprehended the temperament so opposite, so unsympathetic, so antipathetic, nor unravelled the threads of a character too complex and tangled, too contradictory and inconsistent, too baffling and evasive, for us ever to have insight there. There is no startingpoint from which to arrive at an understanding; always the eternal impassable gulf yawns between the minds and temperaments of Occident and Orient.

AN INSCRUTABLE PEOPLE.

The young nations of the West, having appropriated practically all the vacant lands of the earth, are now confronted by the most ancient of all civilisations. Europe has begun to discover Asia. With the confidence of ignorance it is insisting upon the regeneration of an Empire which does not wish to be regenerated, and whose only desire is peace. The most lasting impression left upon the mind on closing Miss Scidmore's book is the sense of bewilderment produced by the incomprehensi-bility of the Chinese character. There is no connecting link between east and west; there is no key which will turn the Chinese lock; China is China to the last word, triumphant over all agents of progress and regeneration. Those are the conclusions at which Miss Scidmore has arrived. This note of impatient despair of unravelling the Gordian knot is in every chapter of her book.

No one knows or ever will really know the Chinese-the heart and soul and springs of thought of the most incompre-hensible, unfathomable, inscrutable, contradictory, logical and illogical people on earth. Of all Orientals, no race is so alien. Not a memory nor a custom, not a tradition nor an idea, not a root-word or a symbol of any kind associates our past with their past. There is little sympathy, no kinship nor common feeling, and never affection possible between the Anglo-Saxon and the Chinese. Nothing in Chinese character or traits appeals warmly to our hearts or imagination, nothing touches; and of all the people of the earth they most entirely lack "soul," charm, magnetism, attractiveness. We may yield them an intellectual admiration on some grounds, but no warmer pulse beats for them. These are chiefly points of contradiction between them and ourselves.

AN APPALLING SAMENESS.

The very number and sameness of the Chinese, she says, appal me :-

Everywhere, from end to end of the vast empire, one finds them cast in the same unvarying physical and mental mouldthe same yellow skin, hard features and harsh mechanical voice; the same houses, graves and clothes; the same prejudices, superstitions and customs; the same selfish conservatism, blind worship of precedent and antiquity; a monotony, unanimity, and repetition of life, character and incident, that offends me almost to resentment. Everywhere on their tenth of the globe, from the edge of Siberia to the end of Cochin China, the same ignoble queue and the senseless cotton shoe are worn; everywhere this fifth of the human race is sunk in dirt and disorder. decadent, degenerate, indifferent to a fallen estate, consumed with conceit, selfish, vain, cowardly and superstitious, without imagination, sentiment, chivalry, or sense of humour, combating with most zeal anything that would alter conditions even for the better, indifferent as to who rules or usurps the throne.

GOOD, HARD EUROPEAN TYRANNY.

The natural result of this sense of baffled irritation is a desire to cut the Gordian knot with the sword. Hence it is not surprising to find Miss Scidmore declaring "that any government, any other despotism, any usurp'ation would be better for China than the one from which it now suffers." A century of good, hard European tyranny might, she thinks, make a man of a Chinaman. It is possible for Miss Scidmore, with a despairing shrug of her shoulders, to give up the conundrum of "that oilskin mystery," the Chinaman. That course, however, is not open to the concert of European powers, and for them she predicts that China will be the problem of the coming century. Man, woman and Chinaman are the keywords which will explain the eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries respectively. If we are to believe Miss Scidmore, John Chinaman will prove a more formidable problem than either of his predecessors.

Miss Scidmore's extremely interesting and detailed account of life as it is lived in Imperial purple Pekin is well worth reading. She gives a more vivid and realistic description of the Chinese capital as it exists to-day than any other modern writer. She has described what she saw in such a way that her reader sees it with her. She visited and describes the Yangtse region and South-ern China, as well as the Northern provinces. The illustrations have been carefully selected.

A New Life of Luther.

THE monograph on "Luther and the German Reformation" (T. and T. Clark. 3s.), which Professor Lindsay has written for "The World's Epoch-Makers Series," will be welcomed by all admirers of the great German reformer. Many lives of Luther have, of course, been written. Professor Lindsay has not merely added another, for he has elected to describe Luther from a new standpoint. Instead of isolating him from the century in which he lived Professor Lindsay has been careful to set the great German in the environment of the common serial life of his time. Other biographers have treated Luther as one of the great men of all time. Professor Lindsay, although he does not object to this method, believes that Luther will be brought nearer to us if his life is regarded as part and parcel of the sixteenth century in which he lived. It is often forgotten, as Professor Lindsay truly remarks, that the sixteenth century, in which he was the most outstanding figure, saw the beginnings of our present social life in almost everything, from our way of looking at politics and our mode of trade to our underclothing. Although the limits of space have prevented the carrying out of this idea in its entirety Professor Lindsay has certainly justified his theory. It is to be hoped that some day he may find time to carry it out on a larger scale.

M

info

inve

solu

Mei

dep

tras SOIT tho

a W

Dif

con

50 gat

apt

pre po tra

ca

of

in

TH.

unanimity, offends me the globe, the same rn; everyd disorder, consumed s, without combating en for the itation is Hence ng "that urp'ation h it now tyranny . It is hrug of toilskin , is not or them of the are the eteenth believe re for-etailed ekin is ealistic y than what h her. South-The ormandsay eries," rman been other, tandy in o set umon eated essoor chod, his book.

tury indhich ings our our our pre-

s to

out

GOSSIP ABOUT CHINA.

By AN M.P.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON is not one of those Members of Parliament who legislates for an Empire on second-hand He has taken the trouble personally to investigate more than one of the problems which await solution in distant portions of the Empire. So few Members of Parliament have visited our colonies and dependencies, that it is with reluctance that I criticise one who has set a good example in this respect. But travel does not appear to be wholly advantageous to some M.P.'s. The mere fact of having travelled a few thousand of miles on the outskirts of the Empire effects a wonderful transformation in many travelled politicians. Diffidence is replaced by dogmatism and that irritating conviction of omniscience which Lord Curzon, for instance, so consistently displays. The travelled M.P., if he gathers much useful information, appears to be peculiarly apt to pick up a varied assortment of prejudices and preferences. These are formed not from the broad viewpoint of a statesman, but from the petty experiences of a traveller. As long as he holds these views in his personal capacity no one has, of course, the right even to murmur a word of protest.

But this too frequently the travelled
M.P. does not do.

He leaves England the representative of a few thousand constituents, but he returns the self-constituted spokesman of the whole Empire plus the infallibility of the "expert." From these vices, it must be admitted, Mr. Walton is not wholly free.

The legitimate outcome of an M.P.'s travels is a book in which he describes the impressions picked up in a few months' wandering, and records the scraps of conversations which he has held with all and sundry. There is almost invariably a concluding chapter in which he solves, to his own satisfaction, the most complicated problems of government and administration which for decades have baffled men of the most varied abilities. Mr. Walton has dutifully conformed to this unwritten law by publishing his book on "China and the Present Crisis" (Low). But events have been unkind to him. They have compelled him to issue his volume to the public in an undigested state. Mr. Walton has collected the information, his readers must do the shifting and arranging of it. His book is a volume of miscellaneous paragraphed gossip on China and the Chinese. The reader will readily agree with Mr. Walton that it has no literary pretensions. There is, however, much in it that is interesting; there is a good deal that is not. A judicious use of a blue pencil would have been productive of good results. There is too much of the tourist's small talk in Mr. Walton's

POLITE AGREEMENT.

Mr. Walton spent some eight months in travelling through China, Japan, and Korea with "the special object of ascertaining from the best informed men on the spot what the political and commercial situation really was." Mr. Walton may have succeeded in unravelling this mystery, but he does not allow his reader to participate in his discovery. He has a tantalising habit of jotting down a paragraph in which he records the fact that he had a most interesting and instructive interview of several hours duration with a high Chinese official, a foreign minister or a British merchant. This naturally whets the reader's curiosity, but he is compelled to be satisfied with a gossipy detail about the personage and his surroundings. His conversations with Chinese officials seem to have consisted of discourses in which Mr. Walton set forth his views of the Chinese situation and his host intimated his agreement. But Mr. Walton somewhat naively confesses "it is usual for Chinamen to be polite enough to profess to agree with whatever those who interview them say. It was therefore impossible to know whether these distinguished men really agreed with what I urged upon them or not." If the sentiments which he puts into his viceroys' mouths are unreliable the little word-pictures he paints of the notabilities of China are often interesting. For instance, in describing Chang Chin Tung, Viceroy of the Provinces of Hunan and Hupeh, he says:—

He is an intelligent-looking man, with bright alert eyes, a grey beard, and finger-nails more than an inch long. Many Chinese of high rank grow them even longer. He wore a conical hat made of reeds, lined with scarlet. It had also a long scarlet fringe suspended from a scarlet button on the top of the hat. His flowing garment was of violet silk, lined with blue, and from his neck were suspended various strings of round buttons of various colours denoting his rank and official status.

ONE MORE SOLUTION.

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Walton and some of the European Powers do not agree in regard to what should be done with China. He says :- "I do not approve of depriving the Chinese of their country, as some of the European Powers have done, but if possible, wish to give them such help as will make them a strong and self-governing nation." This, oddly enough, he gives as the reason why he pressed upon Chinese officials "the importance of endeavouring to secure the assistance of English, Japanese and American military officers in the re-organisation of their military force." Seeing that within the last few years both Japan and England have deprived China of several pieces of territory, Mr. Walton's "reason" could hardly have appealed very forcibly to the Chinese mind as reasonable. Mr. Walton wants to see the British Government pursuing a firm and definite policy with resolution and vigour. The Government, he declares, should in the commercial interests of the Empire, insist in concert with other Powers on the setting up of a stable and enlightened Government, so that China may be preserved for the Chinese, and the whole Empire remain open equally to the trade of all nations. As to how this very desirable result is to be obtained and how maintained when obtained, Mr. Walton has very little to say. He explained his programme to Prince Ching among others :-

I urged upon his Highness that the only hope of averting the partition of China lay in: First, the prompt settlement of all outstanding differences with England and other Powers. Second, a resolute refusal of concessions violating the treaty rights of other nations. Third, the seeking the assistance of English, Japanese and American officers in the immediate reorganisation of her military and naval forces.

LORD SALISBURY A SCAPEGOAT.

On the question of who is to blame for the blunders of the past, Mr. Walton has a delightfully simple explanation to offer. After his conversations with British officials in Peking he says: "I came away convinced that our representatives out here do all in their power, and that their failure to maintain British rights and interests has been and is largely due to the want of proper support and backing on the part of Lord Salisbury, by whose direction every surrender has been made." But an assertion in a later portion of the book that "It is clear that a lamentable and fatal ignorance as to what was transpiring in China prevailed both at the Foreign Office and at the British Legation in Peking," destroys the hope that with the disappearance of Lord Salisbury all would be well in China.

THE NEMESIS OF JINGOISM.*

THESE books are cries of alarm—not by any means without justification. With Mr. Chamberlain in power conscription is a necessity. We may choose between different forms of conscription, but in some shape it must be adopted if we keep Mr. Chamberlain. Chamberlain and conscription is the real battle-cry of the coming election. If we live soberly, peaceably, and in charity with our neighbours we may avoid conscription. But if we persist in keeping in power a Minister who never opens his mouth without flinging insults and gibes first at one Power and then at another, and whose policy is one of annexation and conquest, we must face the music and go in for universal compulsory military service with the least possible delay. These two pamphlets discuss how best we can arm our whole population. Mr. Coulton argues strongly in favour of the Swiss system. He says the Swiss army in 1898 cost barely over a million pounds. Our own volunteers will cost a million and a quarter this year. Yet the Swiss have for their money at least 20,000 or 30,000 men more than we can have this year, beyond comparison better drilled and organised, and with the highest daily pay and best food of any continental army. On the Swiss scale we should have an army of three millions at a cost of £15,000,000. Captain Murray is more moderate. He only asks for 800,000 trained soldiers at an additional expense of £8,000,000. Whether we say £8,000,000 or £15,000,000 a year, whichever sum we chose represents the cost of Jingoism to the nation. The question for the electors at the General Election is whether the article is worth the

"A COUNTRY WITHOUT STRIKES." †

BY HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD.

THE country without strikes is New Zealand, and the reason why it is without strikes is mainly the passing in 1894 by the New Zealand Parliament of the Compulsory Arbitration Act drafted by the present Agent-General, Mr. W. P. Reeves, who has honoured Mr. Lloyd's work by writing a brief introduction to it. Mr. Lloyd made a special visit to New Zealand for the purpose of observing the experiments in that interesting social laboratory, and in particular of studying the working of an Act proved by so many patterns of wisdom to be completely unworkable. The Act is not perfect, and has been twice amended; but its constant and vigorous application and the flourishing state of trade in New Zealand have conclusively answered the arguments both of those who said it could not be enforced and those who said it would kill enterprise. The decisions having been given on a rising market, have, as a rule, been in favour of the employed, though this has by no means invariably been the case. As far as possible, also, the decisions are made to apply to the whole colony, and not to one particular district. No strike has occurred since the Act was passed, and both employers and employed continually resort to the Court. In many instances an award, made binding for a definite period, has been renewed at the end of that period by a mutual arrangement between masters and men. Mr. Lloyd's book is written in a style both lucid and entertaining, and is well worthy of the attention of all who are interested in the increasingly complex labour problems of the day.

A Prophecy Unfulfilled.

"THE New Battle of Dorking" is the title of an anonymous booklet published at a shilling by Mr. Grant It tells the story of how the French on August 11th, 1900, landed a force of 115,000 men at Worthing, and attempted to rush London. In six days the whole affair was over. In that time the French had fought an undecisive battle on Chaldon Downs, and, pushing on, had seized Bromley and Shooter's Hill. They were driven out of Bromley, but they continued for some time to shell the East End of London from Shooter's Hill. Then they were compelled to retreat, and at Dorking, after a hard fight, to surrender. They lost 15,000 killed. All the rest were either wounded or taken prisoners. As the prisoners were all sent home at once, the risk of the Raid was not very great. The anonymous writer ignores difficulties of transport and the lack of munitions of war. He is all in the air as to the theories of M. Bloch, which he sneers at without comprehending; he clamours for the use of the Dum-Dum bullet, and he appears to imagine that "Ladysmith and Mafeking" will suffice as rallying cries for the English when their capital is in danger. The chief fault of the book is its lack of the homely simplicity of description which impresses us with the reality of the narrative. The author means well, but he preaches too much.

The Wallace Collection.

IN 1897 Lady Wallace died, and the nature of the bequest to the nation, now called the Wallace Collection at Hertford House, was made known to the world. A reference to the "Annual Index to Periodicals" to discover the articles dealing with the bequest reveals us a valuable series contributed by Mr. M. H. Spielmann to the Magazine of Art in April, May, June, and August, 1897. These describe the pictures and the objects of art somewhat exhaustively. Another article in the Contemporary Review of July, 1897, also by Mr. Spielmann, deals with the important question of housing the Collection. In the present month, we have two additional articles on the New Gallery, one by Mr. Charles Yriarte in the Pall Mall Magazine, noticed elsewhere in these pages, the other by Mr. Frank Rinder in the Art Journal. All interested in our new national treasure-house should not miss the important and interesting articles of 1897; they are also counselled to read the more recent ones written since the Collection was finally arranged.

"The Influence of Mars." *

THIS volume contains the admirable series of short stories which appeared in the Westminster Gazette, illustrating the effect of the war upon the life of individuals at home. Mrs. Anstruther is the wife of the Conservative Whip. She writes well with a real human touch. It is difficult to read her stories without feeling anew the sickening sense of shame and horror with which we hear men talking of war, and of the zeal of young fellows to go out to "see the fun" of slaying our brother Boer. Mrs. Anstruther promises to be a distinct acquisition to a very rare and most useful class of writers—those who can, in the form of fictitious narrative, bring home the inner meaning, the real significance of the material that furnishes copy for the papers.

Chauce 171 Ouida.

Lindsay cr. 80 William

Wingat

Davis
Doyle,
Farjeo
Hely I Henric
Whart

Butler Canno Scidm Do The M

> Thom cr. Walto Wit

Daws Kaise oble Rafte 268 Robe Schm sta illu edi

> Farri Hazl ca Lorr F.

Mile Tull Yor

Sidr

B'y Ch

Pas Per

<sup>* &</sup>quot;A Strong Army in a Free State; a Study of the Old English and Modern Swiss Militias," by G. G. Coulton. Simpkin Marshall and Co. 1s. "The Electors of Great Britain and the Defence of the Country," by Captain S. L. Murray. Gale and Polden, Limited. † Doubleday, Page and Co., New York.

<sup>* &</sup>quot;The Influence of Mars." By Mrs. Anstruther. Grant Richards.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

BIOGRAPHY.

| Lindsay, Thomas M. Luther and the German Reformation. 300 cr. 8vo         | pp.       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|
| Williams, T. Life of Sir James Nicholas Douglass. 195 pp. cr. 8(Longm | vo.       |
| Wingate, C. H. "Oom Paul" Kruger. Paper. 40 pp. (New Yo                   | rk) 10 C. |

ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.

| Chancer Memorial Lectures, 1900. | Edited by P. W. Ames, med. 8vo. |     |
|----------------------------------|---------------------------------|-----|
| 171 pp                           | (Asher and Co.)                 | 6/0 |
| Ouida. Critical Essays. med. 8vo | o. 314 pp(Unwin)                | 7/6 |

FICTION.

| 7. 20. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 1                      |     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Davis W. Stearns. A Friend of Cæsar. 501 pp. cr. 8vo.             |     |
| (Macmillan)                                                       | 6/0 |
| Doyle, C. W. The Shadow of Quong-Lung. 250 pp. cr. 8vo.           |     |
| Constable                                                         | 3/6 |
| Do zle, Mina. On Parole. 248 pp. cr. 8vo(J. Long)                 | 3/6 |
| Farjeon, B. L. The Mesmerists. 400 pp. cr. 8vo(Hutchinson)        | 6/0 |
| Hely Hutchinson, Lady. Monica Grey. 176 pp. cr. 8vo. (Murray) net | 2/6 |
| Henrich R. The Web of Life, 356 pp. cr. 8vo(Macmillan)            | 6/0 |
| Wharton, Edith. A Gift from the Grave. 184 pp. cr. 8vo.           |     |
| (Murray) net                                                      | 2/6 |

GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL.

| Butler, Josephine E. Native Races and the War. 153 pp. cr. 8vo.                                                                                                         |    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----|
| Cannon, John P. A Review of Irish History, 282 pp. cr. 8vo. (Unwin)                                                                                                     |    |
| Scidmore, Miss F. R. China: The Long Lived Empire. 466 pp. post 8vo. (Macmillan) net The Making of the British Colonies. 167 pp. cr. 8vo.                               | 8/ |
| (Abel Heywood' net                                                                                                                                                      | 8/ |
| Thomas, C. H. Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed. 215 pp. cr. 8vo. (Hodder and Stoughton) Walton, Joseph. China and The Present Crisis. 319 pp. cr. 8vo. Sampson Low | 3/ |

MISCELLANEOUS.

| Dawson, Chas. E. First Steps in Painting. (Dawbarn and Ward) net      | 0/1 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Kaiser, C., and Thouaille, P. German Prepositions at a Glance. 12 pp. |     |
| oblong 8vo                                                            | 3/  |
| Rafter, Chas. Haughton. Drill Book for the Royal Irish Constabulary   |     |
| 268 pp. cr. 8vo                                                       | 2/  |
| Roberton, W. The Novel Reader's Handbook. 186 pp. cr. 8:0.            |     |
| Midland Counties Herald                                               | 5/4 |
| Schmeil, Dr. Otto. Text Book of Zoology (treated from a biological    |     | | standpoint). Part II Birds, Reptiles, Fishes. With numerous           |     | | illustrations. Translated from the German by R. Rosenstock, and       |     |
| edited by J. T. Cunningham. 305 pp. med. 8vo. (A. and C. Black)       | 3/  |
| edited by J. T. Cunningham. 305 pp. med. 8vo. (A. and C. Black)       | 3/6 |

NEW EDITIONS.

|   | Emerson, R. W. Complete Prose Works, 656 pp. cr. 8vo                                                                            | - 1 |
|---|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
|   | Ward Lock                                                                                                                       |     |
|   | Farrar, F. W. St. Winifred's. 178 pp. paper A. and C. Black                                                                     | 0/0 |
|   | Farrar, F. W. St. Winifred's. 178 pp. paper A. and C. BlackHazlitt, William. Lectures on the English Comic Writers. 304 pp. |     |
|   | cap, 8vo(Dent) net                                                                                                              | 1/6 |
|   | Lorris, W., and J. Clopinel. The Romance of the Rose, Englished by                                                              |     |
|   | Lorris, W., and J. Clopinel. The Romance of the Rose, Englished by F. S Ellis. 264 pp. cap. 8vo                                 | 1/6 |
|   | Macaulay, Lord. Critical and Historical Essays. Vol. I. in five                                                                 |     |
|   | volumes). 399 pp. cap. 8vo (Dent) net                                                                                           | 1/6 |
| 1 | Milton, John. Areopagitica, 155 pp. cap. 8vo Dent net                                                                           | 1/6 |
|   | Tully's Offices. Translated by Roger l'Estrange. 195 pp. cap. 8vo.                                                              | -/- |
|   | Dent) net                                                                                                                       | 1/6 |
| 1 | Yorke-Davies, Dr. Health and Condition in the Active and the                                                                    | ,   |
|   | Sedentary. 215 pp. cr. 8vo                                                                                                      | 2/6 |

POETRY.

| Sidney, | Philip. | Sonnets | and   | Songs    | of   | Sir | Philip         | Sidney. | 156 p    | p.    |    |
|---------|---------|---------|-------|----------|------|-----|----------------|---------|----------|-------|----|
| cr. 8v  | D       |         |  |  | * |     |     | Burl:   | igh) (ne | et) 7 | 7/ |

RELIGIOUS.

| B.ker, Maj-Gen. W. A. Biblical Chronology. 72 pp                                                                                                                  |    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----|
| Byth, Katherine. Selections from "The Christian in CompleteArmour." 125 pp. (Marshall Bros.)Chambers, Arthur, Man and the Spiritual World. 23 pp. cr.8vo. | 1/ |
| (Chas. Taylor) net                                                                                                                                                | 3/ |
| Drury, B. S. Neo-Ch istian Epistles. 164 pp. cr. 8vo. (Sonnenschein)Fox, Rev. Chas. A. Green Pastures and Golden Gates. 63 pp.(Marshall Bros.)            | 2/ |
| Moore, Edw. W. The Pattern Prayer Book. 105 pp.                                                                                                                   |    |
| Moore, Edw. W. The Pattern Prayer Book. 105 pp. (Marshall Bros.) net Passmore, T. H. The Things beyond the Tomb. 136 pp. cr. 8vo. [Longmans] net                  |    |
| Penn-Lewis, J. Face to Face. 96 pp (Marshall Bros.)                                                                                                               |    |

REFERENCE.

| Robinson Ptg. Co. 3/                                                | 10 |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------|----|
| Fox. Wilson. Report on Wages and Earnings of Agricultural Labourers |    |
| in the United Kingdom Board of Trade Labour Dept.) 206 pp.          |    |
| (Eyre and Spottiswoods) 3/                                          | 14 |
| Raffalovich, Arthur. Le Marché Financier en 1839-190c. 824 pp.      |    |
| med. 8vo Guillaumin, Paris) 10 fr                                   | S. |
| Report on Standard Piece Rates of Wages and Sliding Scales in the   |    | | United Kingdom (1300). 308 pp Eyre and Spottiswoods) 1/             | 14 |

"CHEIRO" AND THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

To his long list of triumphs "Cheiro" has added yet another. This time it was no less a person than his Imperial Majesty Mozaffer-ed-din, the Shah in Shah, during his visit to Paris. Those best acquainted with his Majesty and the conditions under which he lives were quite astounded to learn that "Cheiro" had succeeded in his object. After this it may be expected that he will have similar success with the Sultan of Turkey, the Tsar of Russia and other monarchs. Difficulties exist, for "Cheiro," only to be overcome.

Fortunately the Grand Vizier of Persia became interested in Cheiro's art and allowed him to read his palm. The result was so surprisingly accurate and one of the events predicted in his life was so wonderfully fulfilled at the time, that the Grand Vizier was convinced of the value and importance of Cheiro's skill. Another Persian prince could talk of nothing else for days after his interview; he however was almost frightened of Cheiro's powers, because, as he said, "He knows too much!"

One afternoon "Cheiro" was introduced by the Grand Vizier to the Shah and was able to examine his hands. Nothing would induce Mozaffer-ed-din to allow an impression of his hand to be taken—in common with many Orientals he believes that it would be possible for the possessor of the impression to exert a malign influence in the future.

The Shah expressed himself as very delighted with the success of Cheiro's reading, but imposed the strictest injunctions that nothing was to be made public. The day after the interview his Majesty did "Cheiro" the honour of decorating him with the Order of the Lion and the Sun of Persia.

It is of interest to note that, according to "Cheiro," the most unfortunate periods of the year for the Shah almost coincide with those of the late King of Italy. In fact, "Cheiro" was nearly regarded with suspicion owing to a remark, made after the death of King Humbert, to the effect that the Shah might expect danger within the next few days. Soon after came the news of the attempted assassination of the Persian monarch!

Classies for Everybody.

THE new series of the Minerva Library which Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. have commenced publishing, places many of the classics within the reach of the poorest. The price of the volumes is only 2s. They are illustrated, attractively bound, and well printed. The volumes already issued include Dr. Livingstone's "Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa," Darwin's "Voyage of the Beagle," Stanley's "Life of Dr. Arnold," Dr. Russel Wallace's "Travels on the Amazon," Macaulay's "Historical and Literary Essays" (excellently annotated with side headings), George Barrow's "Lavengro," and Emerson's complete prose works.

le of an

rench on o men at six days ench had vns, and, ll. They for some er's Hill.

g, after a

I the rest orisoners was not ulties of

is all in neers at e of the ne that ng cries r. The nplicity

ality of reaches

of the llection world.

ils" to eals us

ann to lugust, ects of

e Con-

mann,

Collec-itional

riarte

these urnal.

hould

1897;

ones

short zette, duals

ative

It is hear llows

ther

tinct s of cious real the

LEARNING LANGUAGES, BY LETTER-WRITING.

T is an open secret that one of the great uses of the International Correspondence is, that it tends to remove unfounded prejudices and to discover to people of one nation that natives of another country may have like aims, ideals, and wishes. Our readers scarcely need the two following letters to exemplify this:—

Dear Sir,—Can you tell me whether the Edinburgh Summer Meeting takes place this year as usual. I had intended to go to France for the holidays, but that is now impossible, as I hear that everywhere English people meet with such great incivility and bad treatment that it is unpleasant to go about.—Yours truly.

M. B.

Dear Mr. Stead,—You told me you would be glad to know whether my visit to Paris had been a pleasure or the reverse. In the first place, I must thank you for the address you gave me. I am most comfortable here; as for the incivility to English people which my friends feared, I cannot understand how such a mistake could have arisen. From the first the obliging politeness received everywhere has charmed me. My French, my dress—or is it my face?—betrays me everywhere. If I ask my way the answer I get is frequently accompanied by a few English words of explanation. A fellow-traveller in the omnibus will say: "Madame is English of course; I can understand ze English." The same in shops. But the climax of kindness occurred when trying to board the omnibus. You know how different is the French system from ours, the price being a fixed one for all distances, and your ticket being given at the office in the street. There are advantages and disadvantages. You are sure to get a place, but if you are in a hurry, and your number is 185, it is a bad look-out if 100 has not yet got a seat. Well, yesterday I was so tired that I pleaded with the conductor that I was étrangère, and I could not find the bureau, and he actually smuggled me in without my number. After that I am sure I need say no more than that I am,—Yours faithfully,

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE AT THE SORBONNE.

Friday, August 3rd, was the day appointed by the Congress of Secondary Education for the discussion of the scholars' correspondence. The sitting was opened by the reading of Miss Scott's report, which was most interesting, giving an account of our work from its beginnings, and which was markedly clear, full, and concise. M. Mieille was there, of course; Professor Hartmann also. The meeting was so thoroughly representative otherwise, that one was sorry to notice that England had but a solitary deputy, and that one not a teacher. Germany, Russia, Switzerland, Norway, and America had sent theirs. French teachers were present in numbers, the Frères Chretiennes in their sombre robes contrasting with the brighter colours of the ladies. Testimony after testimony was given as to the value of the scholars' international correspondence as an educational factor. One spoke of the interest excited, another of the geographical value. M. Mieille pleaded for the exchange of letters between girls and boys, but it was admitted that French public opinion will not yet allow French girls to write to boys; there are exceptional parents, of course, who permit this. fessor Hartmann urged that, in order that the correspondence should be a lasting and not an ephemeral thing, teachers should be careful to give the social position of parents, as well as the scholar's age and position in school; the positions being the same, children would naturally have much more in common. professor lamented the lack of interest in the teaching of German in England. M. Berenger spoke of the social interest of the scheme. A Russian schoolmaster and an American teacher added some words of interest, and the resolution-to the effect that the Congress of Secondary Education is of opinion that the value of international correspondence is incontestable, and that teachers of foreign languages should every-where be invited to introduce it to their classes was voted unanimously at the close of the sitting. The president was M. Alfred Croiset, and several men noted in the literary and scholastic world were on the platform. The subject of exchange of homes had been mentioned and warmly recommended-but the difficulties of arrangement being great no vote was taken-it being generally allowed that the correspondence in itself helps towards this exchange of homes as well as letters. The discussion in the Sorbonne, as well as the several private meetings, leads us to the conclusion that the time is now ripe for the introduction of some means of binding more firmly the tie between the different correspondents, and next month we shall be enabled to announce definitely the conclusion arrived at between the different teachers and editors interested in the scheme. In connection with the work of the Congress one amusing incident may be given. One lady was evidently intensely amused at some remark. It was a little time before she could say what had seemed to her so comical. It was the announcement that "The heads of secondary schools in England can have their schools inspected if they desire it." It is as difficult for a Frenchman or a German to realise that the State permits any to teach, without finding out what or how they teach, as for an Englishman to realise the amount of real freedom enjoyed by the foreign master or mistress who is earnest in seeking the best means of conveying information to his charge, in spite of State control. If for no other reason, one regrets the absence of English teachers at the congresses because they have lost an opportunity of realising the noble enthusiasm and spirit of camaraderie displayed by the teachers gathered there.

Fresco

Frontis The W

" If L

t does,

Art in Arts ai

Dunke Etretat

The P

Conrac The Pa A. H.

English

Interio

Design

A. A

Literar

Litera

Londo

Portra:

Repres

Paintii M

The I

Bellar

"The and spe lip or s flowing more de This

This Robert notorion the Lo sequent This his probable became present

The F

A

NOTICES.

The friendship between an English and a German girl who have corresponded since 1897 has led to the English girl going to Cologne to give lessons; her German friend there would like to find a post in England for a year. Can any of our friends help?

The Practical Teacher for September has a most interesting paper by our friend M. Mieille on the First International Meeting of Foreign Languages Teachers. It is impossible to quote without spoiling, but I hope many will read for themselves. Another most interesting article, on Languages and Commercial Education, is to be found in the August School World.

The Revue Universitaire is not published during August and September; so lists of scholars' names cannot be sent to France (or to Germany) until the end of September, and girls must wait still longer. For much the same reason (the holidays) it is difficult for us to introduce adults; will our friends therefore kindly excuse the delay? The sum of one shilling which we ask adults to enclose with name, age and occupation, is necessary because for them we have to make individual search, and this takes time and stamps. Letters should be endorsed, Secretary for Languages.

302

the social aster and f interest, Congress the value able, and d everyclassesing. The nen noted platform. nentioned farrangegenerally

s towards

discussion meetings, w ripe for re firmly and next itely the hers and ion with incident intensely tle time comical. econdary pected if an or a to teach, s for an enjoyed in seekto his reason, the conrealising isplayed nan girl English n friend a year.

a most he First ners. It e many eresting n, is to during es canend of much us to excuse adults essary h, and lorsed,

ING.

Antiquary.-September.

Frescoes in Little Kimble Church, Bucks, Illustrated.

Art Journal,-H. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. September.

Frontispiece :- "Lady Clarges" after Gainsborough. The Wallace Collection, Illustrated, F. Rinder.

"If Lady Wallace had bequeathed to the nation nothing but her pictures, this collection in itself would have been of priceless worth, supplementing as it does, and filling in gaps in other of our public galleries."

Art in the Nursery. Continued, Illustrated. R. Davis Benn. Arts and Crafts at Wilton, Illustrated. Gideon Fidler. Dunkeld, Illustrated. Rev. H. Macmillan. Etretat and Its Environs. Illustrated. A. Toucey Gibert.

The Paris Club of International Women Artists. Illustrated. C. G. Hartley.

Artist .- 9, RED LION COURT. 15. August. Conrad Dressler, Sculptor-Potter. Illustrated. F. Miller. The Paris Salon of 1900. Illustrated.

A. H. Baxter's Wall-Paper Designs. Illustrated.

English Embroidery in the 16th and 17th Centuries. Illustrated. Anna M. Brackett.

Interiors and Furniture at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.

W. Fred.

Design for Stencil-Work. Illustrated. Continued. G. R. Rigby.
A. A. Turbayne's Bookbindings at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. J. S. R.

Bookman.-August.

Literary Pictures of the Year. Illustrated. Continued. G. R. Chesterton and J. E. Hodder-Williams.

Bookman.-(AMERICA.) August.

Literary Pictures of the Year. Illustrated. Continued. G. R. Chesterton and J. E. Hodder-Williams.

London Funch as a Literary Chronicler. Illustrated.

Cornhill Magazine. - September.

Portraits by Goya. Mrs. Margaret L. Woods.

Representative American Women Illustrators Illustrated. Continued. Miss Regina Armstrong.

Girl's Own Paper.-August.

Painting Wild Flowers in the Fields. Illustrated. Fred Miller.

House.-" QUEEN" OFFICE. 6d. September.

The House at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. M. D. N.

Bellarmines. Illustrated. W. B. R.

"The vessel was of hard stoneware, bottle-shaped, with a narrow neck and spreading belly tapering off below to a smaller base or foot; under the lip or spout in front was the face of a man with a moustache and a long flowing beard; at the back was a handle; on the belly was impressed one or more devices.

more devices.

This sotte, or beer jug, derived its name from the celebrated Cardinal Robert Bellarmine [1542-1621], who, in the 16th century, made himself notorious by his zeal in opposing the reformed religion. He was sent into the Low Countries, to oppose the progress of the Reformers, and, consequently, incurred his share of hatred and derision from the Protestants. This hatred manifested itself in different ways, the most lasting one being probably the satirical portrait of the Cardinal stamped on the ale jug, which became known by his name, and which has been retained by it up to the present time."

The Palace of Fontainebleau. Illustrated. Connoisseur.

Lady's Realm.-September.

Paris Ateliers. Illustrated. Edith W. Leverton.

Ludgate. - Saptember.

Spanish Arts and Crafts. Illustrated. G. S. Ferdinando.

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 18. 4d. September.

Frontispiece: "The Passing of Autumn." After G. P. Jacomb-Hood.

James Maris. Illustrated. R. A. M. Stevenson.

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Inlaid Furniture at Buckingham Palace. Illustrated. F. S. Robinson.

The Portraits of Geoffrey Chaucer. Continued. Illustrated. M. H. Spielmann.

Mr. Spielmann deals with ten portraits of Chaucer, and in conclusion, writes:—"There is no need to offer explanation for the interest which consideration of the features and the person of the poet must arouse in the mind of every one of his readers, or excuses for the enthusiasm with which an inquirer into the subject must prosecute his researches. It is only the conviction that the Occleve portrait (Harleian 4866) is the sole authentic picture that has prevented Dr. Furnivall and Professor Skeat—the leaders of modern Chaucerian students—from deal ng with the whole subject at length; but a humbler inquirer may well feel justified in going over the whole ground, seeking whether anything new may not be discovered by the re-turning of old stones, more particularly when he approaches the subject less from the literary and historical side than from that of art and physiognomy."

The Children of Volendam, Illustrated. Phil May.

Michel Cazin and Henri Dubois, French Medallists. Illustrated. E. F. Strange.

Medals of Honour for Sculpture at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Frantz.

Recent Acquisitions at Our National Museums and Galleries. Illustrated.

Act-Drops by Mr. A. J. Black at the New Metropolitan Theatres. Illustrated.

Miss Bessie Potter. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern.

Nineteenth Century.-September.

The Maiolica of Siena. Langton Douglas.

Pall Mall Magazine .- September.

"Cupid's Holiday" after W. Bouguereau. The Hertford House Collections. Illustrated. Charles Yriarte.

Pearson's Magazine. - August, September.

The Art of the Age. Illustrated. Continued.

Poster .- I, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND. 6d. July. The Poster as a Mirror of Life. Illustrated. C. Hiatt. Book Covers. Illustrated. Maurice Biais, Illustrated. C. Hiatt. Holiday Posters. Illustrated. Stanley Cock. Illustrated. Stickfast.

Scribner's Magazine.-September.

A Study in Japanese Perspective. Illustrated. W. B. Van

Studio.-5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. August.

James Aumonier. Illustrated. Mrs. Arthur Bell.

Decorations of the Peninsular and Oriental Pavilion at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.

Emil Orlik. Illustrated. R. Muther. The House of the "Art Nouveau Bing" at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. G. Mourey.

Supplements after Tony Grubhofer, Emil Orlik, and Ethel K. Burgess.

Sunday Magazine.-September.

Russian Sacred Pictures. Illustrated. E. W. Lowry.

Sunday Strand.-September.

Mr. Frederick Goodall, R.A. Illustrated. Rudolph de Cordova.

Young Man.-September.

Life through an Artist's Spectacles; a Talk with Mr. Marcus Stone. Illustrated. Arthur Mee.

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Ainslee's Magazine. -International News Co. 20 cents. August. A Talk with President Kruger, Illustrated, A. Sangree, Missionary Work in China. J. Fryer. Mark Twain on the Lecture Platform. W. M. Clemens. The Plague of Flies. H. Sutherland. Gillatte, Actor and Playwriter. Illustrated. R. Duffy. The Defence of Plagiarism. Illustrated.

American Journal of Psychology.—Kegan Paul. 1 dol. 50 cents, July.

The Psychology of Conjuring Deceptions. Norman Triplett.
The Fallacy of Extreme Idealism. S. S. Colvin.
Visual and Tactuo-Muscular Estimation of Length. E. J. Swift. Pity. F. H. Saunders and G. Stanley Hall.

Anglo-American Magazine. - International News Company. 1s. August.

The New Patriotism. A. E. Daviss.
Modern Fiction. Continued. E. Ridley.
England and America in the Orient. H. Robbins.
The Indian Famine Problem. R. W. Grant.
Britons and Blacks in South Africa. Dr. A. R. Abbott.
Modern Japan. David Glass.
Some Scenic Beauties of Central New York. W. R. Bradshaw.

Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.—P. S. KING. 1 dol. July.

The Doctrine and Practice of Intervention in Europe. W. E. Lingelbach. Las Docrine and Practice of Intervention in Europe. W. E. Lingelbach. The Currency Law of 1900. R. P. Falkner. The American Newspaper. D. F. Wilcox. Representation in the Southern States. George H. Haynes. Supplement:—Selected Official Documents of the South African Republic and Great Britain.

Antiquary.-Elliot Stock. 6d. Sept.

On Some Characteristics of Icelandic Poetry. Rev. W. C. Green. Sweet Hampstad. Illustrated.

The Ordinances of the Guild of Barber-Surgeons of Norwich. C. Williams.

Architectural Record.—14, VESEV STREET, NEW YORK. 25 cents. July.

The Architectural School at Columbia University. Illustrated. Percy The Architectural School at Columbia University.
C. Stuart.
How the Rich are buried; Illustrations.
The Natural History Museum at Paris. Illustrated.
G. B. Post's Workshop; Illustrations.
Cleeve Prior; Illustrations.
The Art Gallery of the New York Streets. Illustrated. R, Sturgis.

Arena.-GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. August.

APOBA.—GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. August.
Cromwell and Chamberlain. Rev. George Walters.
Failures in English Temperance Reform. James Dowman.
Natural Selection, Competition, and Socialism. Herman Whitaker.
Early Retirement from Business. Townsend Cushman.
The Fallible Physician. Willium Trowbidge Larned.
The American Psychic Atmosphere. Charles Johnston.
Some Antiquity in America. Frances Hart.
The Expansion of Farm Life. Kenyon L. Butterfield.
The Inner Life of the Settlement. May Brown Loomis.
Women as School Officers. Duane Mowry.
Sex in Education. A. L. Mearkle.
New England Girl Graduates. M. E. Blood.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. August." Political Education. A. T. Hadley.
The Wild Gardens of the Yosemite Park. J. Muir.
The Price of Order. T. Will-ams.
Content in a Garden. Continued. C. Wheeler.
Submarine Signalling and Maritime Safety. S. Baxter.
Our Rights in China. M. B. Dunnell.
Chase. Sumper. Adams. and Stevens as Statesmen. F.

Chase, Sumner, Adams, and Stevens as Statesmen. F. Bancroft. Badminton Magazine.-Heinemann, is. Sept.

Sport in Portuguese East Africa. Illustrated. A. H. Sharp. Rabbiting. Illustrated. L. H. De Visme Shaw. Hunting Changes—Old Masters and New. A. W. Coaten. Some Types of Continental Sportsmen. Illustrated. D. B. The Partridge. Illustrated. Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy.

Bankers' Magazine.-WATERLOW. 15. 6d. Sept. Some Aspects of Bank Amalgamations Variations in the Rate charged by the Imperial Bank of Germany, 1844-1839. Blackwood's Magazine.-BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. Sept.

Amu Trog The A Su Père Olive The Mem The The

Witt Mod Miss Pasti

Kana Quai W

Ch

Fam. Phili The Wha

Chui By F

Chu

The

Miss

Wha Cour

The The Mau Russ

The The Old

The

Sir 7 Elep

Feas Und Fish

Conf

Som

With

AY

How We escaped from Pretoria, Concluded, Capt. Haldane, Romsdal; the Valley of Enchantment. Sir H. Maxwell. After Wild Geese in Manitoba, C. Hanbury-Williams. The Old Golf and the New. Musings without Method.

The War Operations in South Africa. Continued. Military Contributor. Some Needs of the Navy.

Bookman,-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Augu t. John Oli er Hobbes. Illustrated. A Generation of Scottish Literature and Journalism. Continued. Delta. Sept. r. With Portrait. Miss Ellen Glasgow; a New Writer. With Portrait.
Mark Twain. Illustrated. J. E. Hodder Willi ms.
The Author of "The Seasons," Illustrated. Sir George Douglas.
A Generation of Scottish Literature and Journalism. Continued.

Bookman.—(AMERICA.) Dodd, MEAD AND Co., NEW YORK. 25 cents. August. The Modern School of Canadian Writers. Winifred L. Wendell. The Italian Theatre in New York. Illustrated. H. Hapgood.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO. 25 cents. Aug. Three Sieges and Three Heroes in the South African War. Illustrated. E.

H. Cooper.
The British and Canadian Army Medical Services, Illustrated. C. A.

The British and Canadian Army Medical Services, Illustrated. C. A. Matthews.

The Battle of Paardeberg. A Canadian Eye-Witness.
Canada and Bisley. Illustrated. Lieut, H. C. Blair.

Br tish Columbia Politics. Illustrated. T. L. Grahame.

The Maple Leaf in South Africa; Canadian Contingents. Illustrated.

Canadian Officer.

A Short H story of the Boer War. With Illustrations and Map. N. Patterson.

Twenty Years on the War Path. Concluded. F. Villiers.

Captain,-George Newnes. 6d. Sept.

Dr. Gordon Stables; His Life and Work. Illustrated. W. W. Mayland. The Cost of the County Crick: Season. Illustrated. H. Macfarlane. The Story of Our Steamships. Illustrated. Walter Dexter.

Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. 6d. Sept. Shall Britain be "Ladysmithed"? Illustrated. A. White.
Seven Popular Crick sters. Illustrated. M. R. Roberts.
On the Matterhorn. Illustrated. E. H. Cooper.
Records in Locomotive Building. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
A Chat about the Partridge. Illustrated. R. Kearton.
Their Majestis the Babies. Illustrated. Mrs. Leily Bingen.
The City of Pines; a Chat about Bournemouth. Illustrated. A. Sieve-

king.
The Work and Play of a Volunteer Camp. Illustrated. A Sergeant of Volunteers.

Cassier's Magazine .- 33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. August. Electric Cranes at Hamburg and Bremerhafen Harbours. Illustrated. Louis J. Magee. The Sloop-of-War Wampanoag. Illustrated. Com. B. F. Isherwood. Openings for Mechanical Engineers in China. Illustrated. Lord Charles Beresford.

Hot Water Heating in Industrial Works. Alton D. Adams. The Imperial Japanese Navy. Illustrated. Rear-Adm. C. C. P. Fitz-Gerald.

A Word on Boiler-Making. Illustrated. H. R. Barnhurst. Some British Milling Machines. Illustrated. Alfred Herbe The Manufacture of Light. John Henderson. Illustrated. Alfred Herbert.

Catholic World .- 22, PATERNOSTER Row. 18. August.

The Sanctity of Ignatius Loyola.
The Story of Whittier's "Captain's Well." Illustrated. Mary E. Desmond.

Desmond.
The Place of the Bible in the Catholic Church. Dr. B. F. De Costa.
Salonica; a New Jerusalem. Illustrated. Miss Lucy Garnett.
Teaching Modern Languages in College. Dr. J. P. Carroll.
Indian Contract Schools. M. P. Cassy.
Peasant Life in the Harz. Illustrated. Carina C. Eaglesfield.
Recent Progress of Catholicity in Northern Europe. Charles W. Dowd.
The Hoboken Catastrophe. Illustrated. Mrs. A. Sullivan.
St. John Baptist de la Salle and the Founding of the Christian Brothers.
C. M. Graham.

The Poetry of Leo the Thirteenth. Anna Blanche McGill.

OF

Sept.

Contributor.

ed. Delta.

iglas. ed. Delta. v York.

ustrated. E.

DRONTO.

Illustrated.
Map. N.

. Mayland.

e. I. A. Sieve-

Sergeant of s. August. Il!ustrated.

ord Charles
C. P. Fitz-gust.

Mary E.

Dowd.

Century Magazine,—Macmillan. Is. 4d. Sept.

Amusements of the Pais Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. J. Schopfer. Troglody: Dwellings in Cappadocia. Illustrated. J. R. S. Sterrett.

The Detroit Bicentennial Memorial. Illustrated. J. R. Sterrett.

A Summer Holiday in Bering Sea. Illustrated. J. Burroughs.

Pere Didon. With Portrait. T. Bentzon.

Oliver Cromwell. Illustrated. Continued. John Morlsy.

The Thames from Wapping to Blackwall. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.

Memories of a Musical Life. Illustrated. Continued. W. Mason.

The Influence of the Western World on China. Dr. D. Z. Sheffield.

The Revolution in China and its Causes. R. van Bergen.

Chambers's Journal.—47, PATERNOSTER ROW. 7d. Sept.
Witty Sayings I have heard. Justin McCarthy.
Modern Problems in Ancient China. Rev. T. G. Selby.
Miss Mary Kingsley.
Pastimus in Moderation. F. G. Aßalo.
Romantie Edinburgh.

Charing Cross Magazine,—434, Strand. 3d. August.

Kandy, Ceylon. Illustrated. A. de Burgh.
Quaint Village Gaols. Illustrated. J. Hingeley.

"White Wings" and Their Cost; All about Yachts and Yachting. Illustrated. Clive Holland.

Chautauquan.—Chautauqua Press, Cleveland, Ohio. 20 cents.
August.
Famous Lighthouses of the World. Illustrated. G. Kobbé.
Philip Freneau. With Portrait. F. L. Pattee.
The Present Status of University Degrees. C. D. Wilson.
What is bing done in Textile Education. Jane A. Stewart.
Churches and Student Aid. E. M. Camp.
By Rail to Peking. Illustrated. Mary H. Krout.
Our Nation and the Trade of the World. With Illustrations and Map.
G. B. Waldron.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society.

The Native Christian Community in India; Its Position and Prospects. Prof. S. Satthianadhan.
Missionaries in Egypt. E. S.

Contemporary Review.—Columbus Co. as. 6d. Sept.
What to do with China. An Old China Resident.
"Intimate Boxers." E. H. Parker.
Count Mouravieff and His Successor, W. T. Stead.
Italian Anarchism. Prof. G. M. Filmingo.
The Evidence of Design in History. William Larminie.
The Colonial Office Myth. C. de Thierry.
Maurice Barrès; a Political Waiter of France. Hannah Lynch.
Russian Trade in China. G. Calderon.
The Causes of the Cape Rebellion and Its Cure. Frederic Mackarness.
The Old Music and the New. Ernest Newman.
Old Age Pensions in Denmark. Miss Edith Sellers.
What I saw at Kansas City. Poultney Bigelow.

Cornhill Magazine.—Smith, Elder. 1s. Sept.

Cornhill Magazine, —SMITH, ELDER. 28. Sept.
The Journal of a Tour in the North of Europe, 1825-26. Edited by Mrs. C. W. Earle.
Sir Thomas Troubridge. W. J. Fletcher.
Elephant-Hunting in Siam. C. Dimond H. Braine.
The Story of an Irish Political Duel in 1815. Michael MacDonagh.
Feasts in F. Ction. W. E. Garrett Fisher, Under Golden Stars in Scotland. Hesketh Prichard.
Fishes and Their Meals. F. G. Aflalo, Conferences on Books and Men. Continued. Urbanus Sylvan.

Cosmopolitan, —INTERNATIONAL NEWS CO. 6d. August.
The Paris Exposition. Illustrated. William T. Stead.
The Breakers; a Newport Palace. Illustrated. M. Schuyler.
Some Notable Murder Cases. W. F. Howe.
Republic of the United States of Great Britain. Illustrated. J. B.
Walker.
With Boer and Briton. Illustrated. F. R. Roberson.
Some Gossip about Writers. Illustrated. Caroline A. Creevey.
The Choice of a Profession. T. R. Slicer.
The Evolution of the Top Hat. Illustrated. C. Johnston.

Critic.—G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. 20 cents. August. English Dramatists of To-day. With Portraits. W. K. Tarpey. Alfred Austin; Quosque Tandem? William Archer.

Critical Review.—Williams and Norgate, is. 6d. July.
Royce's "The World and the Individual.") Prof. W. R. Sorley.
D'Arcy's "Ide.lism and Theology." J. Burns-Gibson.
Andrew Lang's "History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation."
Principal Salmond.

Dial.—315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. August. A Year of Continental Literature.

Educational Times.—83 FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. August. The Greek Play at Bradfield. E. C. Marchant. John Webster. Prof. Foster Watson.
The Latter End of Assistant Mastering.

Engineering Magazine.—222, Strand. 28. August. Industrial Depressions and the Pig-Iron Reserve. G. H. Hull. China in Regeneration. John Foord.

The Shipbuilding Yards of the United States. Illustrated. W. Fawcett.
The Material Devel pment of the Island of Porto Rico, Illustrated. A.
W. Buel.
Local Transportation at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. H. H. Suplee.
Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. H. Diemer.
Electric Mining Machinery in the British Colliertss. Illustrated. S. F.
Walker.
The Future of Power Development. W. D. Ennis.
Heavy Motor Vehicles for Road Service. F. M. Maynard.

Engineering Times.—P. S. King. 2s. 6d. August.
Railway Plant. Illustrated.
Wood-Working Machinery. Illustrated.
Use of Machinery. Illustrated.
Electrical Machinery. Illustrated.
Oil Engines. Illustrated.
Gas Engines. Illustrated.
Gas Engines. Illustrated.
Gas Engines. Illustrated.
Machinery. Illustrated.
Machinery. Illustrated.
Machinery. Illustrated.
Machinery for Mining and Quarrying Purposes. Illustrated.
Machinery for Mining and Quarrying Purposes. Illustrated.
Miscellaneous Machinery. Illustrated.
Miscellaneous Machinery and Appliances. Illustrated.
Miscellaneous Machinery and Appliances. Illustrated.
Mining and Quarrying Apparatus. J. J. Swann.
Blast Furnace Power Machinery. Illustrated.
Notes on the Wood-Working Machinery Exhibits. G. Ransome.
Westinghouse Electrical Plant. Illustrated. E. D. Phillips.
Progress made in Mineral Water Machinery. W. Bruce.
Gas Exhibits and Lighting. C. E. Brackenbury.
Engineering Features of the Section devoted to Hygiene. Illustrated.
W. C. Easdale:
The Paris Sewers. Illustrated. S. H. Adams.
Batcheller Pneumatic Tube System for the Transmission of Mail and Merchandise. Illustrated. B. C. Batcheller.
"Little Giant "Pneumatic Tools. Illustrated. E. C. Amos.

Etude.—T. Presser, Philadelphia. 15 cents. August.

Etude.—T. Presser, Philadelphia. 15 cents. August.
The Relation of Master and Pupil in Musical History. W. J. Baltzell.
Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite. B. Perry.
The Great Composers and Their Love of Nature. C. Sanford.

Expositor.—Hodder and Stoughton. 1s. Sept.
The Influence of Modern Science upon Religious Thought. Rev. J. Y.
Simpson.
The Sacraments. Dr. John Watson.
Memorials of the Preaching of St. Jerome. Rev. A. E. Barn.
The Gospel according to St. Paul. Rev. C. A. Scott.
A Day's Journey. Rev. W. W. Crump.
Joseph as the Prisoner in the Palace. Rev. Armstrong Black.
The Bible of the Jews. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth.

Expository Times,—Simpkin, Marshall. 6d. Sept.
St. Luke and Josephus. Rev. J. A. Cross.
The Missionary Methods of the Apostles. Continued. Rev. J. Reid.
Feilden's Magazine,—Temple Chambers. 15. August.

Fellden's Magazine, —TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 23. August.
Modern Stone-Working Machinery. Illustrated. M. Powis Bale.
Railway Rolling-Stock of High Capacity. Illustrated. J. D. Twinberrow.
The Simplon Tunnel. Illustrated. G. G.
Some Notable Exhibitis at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.
The International Tramways and Light Railways Exhibition
Illustrated.

Fireside.—7, Paternoster Square. 6d. Sept.
Wasps. Illustrated. J. W. Cole.
The History of the Fire-Engine. Illustrated. G. L. Apperson.
Arctic Ice. Illustrated. Anna F. Fulcher.
An Ascent of Yari-ga-take; the Matterhorn of Japan. Illustrated. Rev.
W. Weston.
Fashion. A. M.

Fortnightly Review.—Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. Sept.
The Out-Going Government. H. Whates.
Gordon's Campaign in China. By Himself. With Introduction by Col. R.
H. Vetch.
The Dramas of Gabriele d'Annunzio. William Sharp.
The Delagoa Bay Arbitration. Malcolm McIlwraith.
We Always are Ready. Rollo Appleyard.
Irish Witch Doctors. W. B. Yeats.
A Lead for Liberalism.
Some Writers on War. Frederic Lees.
Spildo and Bernard—1858 and 1500. John F. Taylor.
The Care of the Sick and Wounded in War. Francis H. Welch.
The Staging of Shakespeare. Col. W. Hughes Hallett.
The Coming Settlement in China. D plomaticus.

Forum.—GAY AND BIRD. 12. 6d. August.

The Present Status of Afghanistan. Sultan Mohammad Khan.

Some Italian Problems. H. Remsen Whitehouse.

Canada and Imperialism. John Charlton.

The United States as a World Power. Continued. C. A. Conant

Child-Study and Its Relation to Education. G. Stanley Hall,

The Present and the Future of the Philippines. F. F. Hilder.

How Peace was made between China and Japan. C. Denby.

The Negro Problem in the United States South. Gen. C. H. Grosvenor.

Labur and Politics in Great Britain. J. Keir Hardi:.

Texas, Past and Present. R. T. Hill.

Telstoy's Russia. G. H. Perris.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.-141, FIFTH AVENUE, New YORK. 10 cents. August.

Girls of Two Republics—The United States and France. With Portraits. Infanta Eulalie of Spain.

Recollections of General Robert E. Lee. With Portraits. R. E. Lee, Jun.

Genealogical Magazine, -ELLIOT STOCK. 18. Sept. Concerning Heirs and Heirship; Some Instruction for Novelists, The Stafford Attainders. A. C. Fox-Davis. Aitken of Thoraton. Continued. Marquis de Ru:igny and Raineval. The Armorial Bearings of a Lady. Illustrated.

Gentleman's Magazine.-Chatto and Windus. 15. S.pt. Gentleman's magazine.—Chatto and Windus.
Dr. John Hawkesworth. E. E. Morris.
Arctic Co-operation. E. W. Lowry.
The False Dauphins of the Temple. Albert M. Hyamson.
Medizeval West-Pyrenean Women. A. R. Whiteway.
The Song Schools of Scotland. J. Taylor Fyfe.
In the Country. J. W. Cole.
The 1900 Total Eclipse of the Sun. Edmund Verney.

Geographical Journal,-Edward Stanford. 25. August. Journeys in Central Asia, Illustrated. Capt. H. H. P. Deasy. Through Africa from the Cape to Cairo. With Maps and Illustrations. E. S. Grogan.

The Patagonian Cordillera and Its Main Rivers. Illustrated. Dr. H. Steffen.

Ancient Trading Centres of the Persian Gulf. Continued. Capt. A. W. Stiffe

Dr. Jovan Cvijic's Researches in Macedonia and Southern Albania.

Geological Magazine.-Dulau. 18. 6d. August. On the Fauna of the Upper Cassian Zone in Falzarego Valley, South Tyrol. M. M. O. Gordon.

The Geology of Bad Nauheim and Its Thermal Salt-Springs. Illustrated.

A. Vaughan Jennings.

Foraminiferal Limestones from Sinai. Illustrated. Continued. F. Chap-

Girl's Own Paper.—56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept.
My Museum of Eastern Curios. Illustrated. Continued. Mrs. E.

Music Students and Th.ir Work. Miss Florence Sophie Davson. Marks on Dresden Porcelain. Illustrated. Isabel Marks.

Marks on Dresden Porcelain. Illustrated.

How to grow Apples and Other Fruit. Concluded. B. Wells.

Girl's Realm .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 6d. Sept. How to sit for One's Photograph. Illustrated.
Some Memorials of Famous Women. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Roedean School. Illustrated. Christian G. Whyte.
The Girls of China. Illustrated. A. Lennoys.
Music as a Career for Girls. Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
An Hour in a Drang. Illustrated. Edward Step.

Good Words,-Isbister. 6d. Sept. Pins and Needles. Illustrated. C. J. Praetorius.

Memories of George Square, Edinburgh. Concluded.

Prof. Leschetizky; the Greatest Music Master in Europe. With Portrait. J. F. Rowbotham.

J. F. Rowbotham.
A German Choir Festival.
A Visit to Peking in 1899.
Illustrated. Duthine.
The Making of Cane-Seated Chairs; a Sylvan Industry.
Sherrington Mills.
How "Bobs" and "B. P." kept Mafeking Day. M. J. Farrah.
Some Curious Fen Flowers. Illustrated. W. A. Dutt.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. August.

A Talk with the Rev. William Rader. With Portrait. Raymond Blath-

George Herbert. Illustrated. Dean Farrar.
Poetry of To-Day; a Talk with Sir Lewis Morris. With Portrait.
Raymond Blathwayt.
Rear-Admiral Lord Charles Beresford. Illustrated. J. H. Young.

The True Remedy against Famine; a Talk with Sir M. M. Bhownaggree.
Illustrated. Raymond Blathwayt.
Jonathan Edwards. With Portrait. Rev. R. P. Downes.
Dr. J. B. Paton. With Portrait. P. Grenville.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 34d. August.

Harmsworth Magazine.—Harmsworth. 34d. August. Sand Castles. Illustrated. A. Birnage.
To Cure the Horse; a Remarkable Surgical Operating Table. Illustrated. W. J. Wintls.
The Queen's Kaffirs. Illustrated. N. Edwards.
London to Brighton in Fifteen Minutes. Illustrated. E. Staley.
London to Brighton in Festival. Illustrated. E. Staley.
The Church Army; a Surpliced Army, Illustrated. P. Astor.
Wonderful Bird Actors. Illustrated. O. Marvin.
Women Who Work. With Portraits. B. Owen.
Crack Shots at Bisley. Illustrated. T. S. Johnston.

Harper's Monthly Magazine. -45, Albemarle Street. is. Sept.

Paris in 1900 and the Exposition. Illustrated. E. Insley. Four Days in a Medicine Lodge. Illustrated. W. McClintock. Submarine Torpedo-Boats. Illustrated. W. W. Kimball. The Teuron Tug of War. Julian Ralph.

Home Magazine. -- NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK CITY. 10 cents. August.

The Yellow Danger. Illustrated.
The Chinese Soldier. Illustrated. Dr. H. Liddel.
Li Hung Chang; the One Man Who can save China. With Portrait.
W. P. Curtus.

Remarkable Trial Trip of the Kentucky, Illustrated. McGovern. The Building of a Battleship. Illustrated, D. Allen Willey. The Terrible Mosquito. Illustrated, W. A. Page. The Wonderful Eclipse of 1900. Illustrated. Waldon Fawcett.

Humanitarian-Duckworth. 6d. Sept.

NumanitaPian—DUCKWORTH. od. Sept.

Some Recent Astronomical Discoveries. Miss Agnes Giberne.
Democracy and the Commonwealth of Australia. Stafford Bird.
Woman's Capabilities and Limitations; Interview with Miss Beatrice Harradan.

Our Present Pedantic Penology. A. R. Whiteway.
Dramatists and Actor Managers. Hon. S. R. Erskine.
The Woman Suffrage Movement. Helen Reinberz.
Immortality. Luther R. Marsh.
The Psychic Atmosphere of Homes. Ellen Burns Sherman. Immortality. Luther R. Marsh.
The Psychic Atmosphere of Homes. Ellen Burns Sherman.

Ideal Review .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. 3d. August.

The Romanoffs as Reformers, C. Johnston.

Pyschiatry and Psychal Force. Dr. A. Wilder.

Forgiveness, Aaron M. Crane.

The Making and Decaying of the Creed. Continued. Rev. H. Frank.

The Occult psychologically considered. C. H. A. Bjerregaard.

International.-A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. August. The Yale-Harvard Boat Race as a Spectacle. Illustrated. Lillian D.

Kelszy.
In the Bukowina. S. Lederer.
Boston's Pleasure Grounds. Illustrated. Ellye H. Glover.
Imperial Régimes in Mexico. Illustrated. H. M. Skinner.

International Monthly.-MACMILLAN. 18. August. The Trend of Modern Agriculture in the United States. G. W. Hill.

American Literary Criticism and the Doctrine of Evolution. Continued.

W. M. Payne.

W. M. Fayne.
Recent Advance in Psychology. B. B. Titchener.
Man and the Environment; a Study from the Paris Exposition. Prof.
Patrick Geddes. Modern Political Germany. Theodor Barth.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIN. IS.
Requiem Masser. Rev. M. O'Callaghan.
The Anglican Archbishops on the Reservation of the Blessed Sacrament Rev. R. A. O'Gorman.
Faith and Modern Miracles, Rev. T. F. Macken.
The Special Charm of Irish Melodies sung "traditionally." Rev. H.

Bewerunge.
Charles Waterton; a Remarkable Catholic. Charles F, Shaw.
Notes on the Canonical Aspects of a Plenary or National Synod, Rev. D Mannix.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. GILL, DUBLIN. 6d. August. A Plea for Papal Rome. Judge O'Hagan. A Dash across Europe. Continued. C. T. Waters.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. August. Dr. Warr, the War, and National Education. H. Macan. Rev. A. R. Va. dy.

An Experiment in Rural Education. A. D. Hall.
The Irish Language in Irish Schools. Maud Joynt.
Woburn Park School: Personal Reminiscences of a Catholic Eton. X.
Literature as a Central Subject. Miss Alice Zinnern.
Cosmopolitanism; or, the Lessons of Travel. Prof. D'Arcy W. Thompson.

Journal of the Manchester Geographical Society. — 16, ST-MARY'S PARSONAGE, MANCHESTER. 58. August.

A Journey through Somaliland and Southern Abyssinia to the Shangalla or Berta Country and the Blue Nile and through the Sudan to Egypt.

Dr. R. Koettlitz.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.- J. J. Keliher. 25. August.

What are the Best Types of War-Vessels for the British Navy? Major C.

Shield Protection for Troops in the Field. Capt. A. D. Furse.

Knowledge,-326, High Holborn. 6d. August. The Great Indian Earthquake of 1897. Illustrated. Charles Davison. The Evolution of Simple Societies. Prof. A. C. Haddon. Astronomy without a Telescope. Continued. E. Walter Maunder. The Total Solar Eclipse of 1900, May 28. Illustrated. E. Walter Maunder. Some Early Theories on Fermentation. Continued. W. Stanley Smith. Mechanical Representations of Electric Actions. Illustrated. G. W. de-Turcel Control of the Control of t Tunzelmann.

High-speed Telegraphy. Illustrated. C. H. Garland.
The Pygmies of Asia. Illustrated. R. Lydekker.
Four Variable Stars. Illustrated. E. Walter Maunder.
Jupiter and His Markings. With Plate. W. F. Denning.
The Hundred Brightest Stars. J. E. Gore.
The Karkinokosm, or World of Crustacea. Illustrated. Continued. Rev.
T. R. R. Stebbing.

One Hun Romance

La

The Que The Cul Major-G The Pri Ladies

> Natural Stacking The Va The Ag The De L Solicitor Notes o Privileg Suzerau

Crimina

Assum

Cultiva'

Dublin In the S Land's Hats at tra Natura Libr Observ

The D

Classifi

Grieva

Sequel Kingsl A Seco

In the

Henry The S

Mo A Pris Pointe The L

A Stu Impre The T A Gir The C Mada A Ne M

Plagu The Reth

The Socia The The The The The Stud Arch Lette . so cents.

ith Portrait. ed. C. M. iss Beatrice

Frank. August. Lillian D.

st. Hill. Continued. ion. Prof.

LIN. IS.

Sacrament Rev. H.

Rev. D

August.

X. nompson, - 16, ST.

ingalla or o Egypt. ELIHER. Major C.

on. faunder. mith. W. de

. Rev.

Ladies' Home Journal.—Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. September.

One Hundred Years in the White House. Illustrated. René Bache. The Anecdotal Side of Phillips Brooks. Illustrated. Romances of Some Southern Homes. IHustrated. Mrs. Thaddeus Horton.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 6d. Sept. The Queen's Gardens. Illustrated. Continued.
The Cult of the Cat. Illustrated. W. M. Elkington.
Major-Gen. Ian Hamilton. Illustrated.
The Princess Ludwig of Bavaria. Illustrated.
Som: Famous Lady Pianists of To-day. With Portraits. L. Ronald.
Ladies' Papers a Hundred Years Ago. Illustrated. R. Bell.

Land Magazine.-149, STRAND. 18. August.

Cultiva'ion of the Oak in France. W. R. Fisher.
Natural Fertility v. Acquired Fertility. A. Murray.
Stacking Corn. Illustrated. J. P. F. Bell.
The Vausa'on of Woods for Transfer. D. F.
The Agricultural Holdings Bill of 1900. By a Small Scottish Landlord.
The Designing and Erection of Farm Homesteads. Gilbert Murray.

Law Magazine and Review .- 161, STRAND. 58. August. Law magazine and Review.—101, STRAND. 5s. August. Solicitors and Reform. A. H. Hastie. Notes on the Early History of Legal Studies in England. J. Walton. Privilegad Communications; Husband and Wife. J. K. F. Cleave. Suzeranty; Mediæval and Modern. C. Stubbs. Criminal Statistics, 1898.
The "Limi ed Liability" of Landlords. Walter R. Warren. Assumpsit for Use and Occupation. Prof. J. Barr Ames.

Leisura Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. Dublin Castle. Illustrated.
In the Serra da Estrella. Illustrated. Charles Edwardes.
Land's End to John o' Gooats. Illustrated. A. R. Quinton.
Hats and Their Making. Illustrated. W. J. Go-don.
W. A. Watt; the Youngest Cabinet Minister in the British Empire. Illustrated. A. J. Wade.
Natural Di.iog; Useful and Ornamental. Illustrated. W. B. Northrop.

Library Association Record.—Horace Marshall. is. August. Observations on Shelf-Classification. T. W. Lyster. The De Quincey Collection at Moss Side. William E. A. Axon.

Library World .-- 4, AVE MARIA LANE. 6d. August. Classified and Annotated Cataloguing. Continued. L. Stanley Jast. Grievances of a Free Library Reader. H. J. O'Brian. Book Selection and Annotation. Sequel Stories. Continued. T. Aldred.

Longman's Magazine,—Longmans. 6d. Sept. Mademoiselle de Lespinasse. S. G. Tallentyre. Kingship in the Ninete-nth Century. C. B. Roylance Kent. A Second Essay in Dreams. H. G. Hutchinson.

Ludgate.-123, FLEET STREET. 6d. Sept. Sir C. Dilke: the Evolution of an Imperialist. Illustrated. W. C. Purcell. In the Steps of Dickens. Hustrated. D. Stafford. Henryk Sienkiewicz. With Portrait. T. W. Wilby. The Story of Polo. Illustrated. A. Fryers.

McClure's Magazine,-10, Norfolk Street, Strand. 10 cents. August.

A Prisoner among Filipinos. Illustrated. J. C. Gillmore.
Pointers from a Forcupine Quill. Illustrated. W. D. Hulbert.
An International Wheat Corner. J. D. Whelplay.
The Life of the Master. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. John Watson.

Macmillan's Magazine, —Macmillan. 15, Sept. A Study in the Persian Apparatus. Wilf. if Sparroy, Impressions of Klondike. C. C. Osborne, Impressions of Klondike. The Tale of a Tusker. The Tale of a Tusker.

Girl-Graduate of Spain.

The Corsican at Home. Charles Edwardes.

Madame Grand. J. J. Cotton.

A New Political Era. C. B. Roylance Kent.

Medical Magazine .- 62, King William Street. 18. August. Modical Magazine, — 22, AING WILLIAM STREET. 25, 25.
The British Medical Association. By a Member.
The New University of London. Continued. Dr. W. H. Allchin.
Plague in Bombay. Lieut, Col. G. Waters.
The Inconsistencies of Diet. Dr. E. Pritchard.
Re the State versus the Criminal. Concluded. A. R. Whiteway.

Month.-Longmans. 15. August. The Declaration of the English Church Union. Rev. R. F. Clarke.
The Mind of the Church. Rev. G. Tyrrell.
Social Work among the Paris Poor. Mrs. Virginia M. Crawford.
The Stations of the Cross. Continued. Rev. H. Thurston.
The Mission of Father Nicholas de Gouda. Rev. J. H. Pollen.
The Future Prospects of the Cape Colony. Rev. R. Sykes.

Sept.
The White-Robed Army. M. D. Petre. Sept.
The White-Robed Army. M. D. Petre.
The Mind of the Church. Rev. G. Tyrrell.
Studies on the History of Queen Mary Stuart. Rev. J. H. Pollen.
Vocations. Rev. H. Lucas.
Archbishop Laud on Apostolical Succession. T. L.
Letter-Writing and a Modern Writer (R. L. Stevenson). R. H. J. Steuart.
The Stations of the Cross. Continued, Rev. H. Thurston.

Municipal Affairs .- P. S. King. 25 cents. June. Advertising Run Mad. John D. Witt Warner.
Municipal Employment and Progress. John R. Commons.
Shall San Francisco Municipalise its Water Supply? A. S. Baldwin.
Is a Third Party Necessary in Municipal Reform Work? John Jay Chapman.

Chapman.
Independent Politics. A. S. Haight.
Municipal Reformers in Party Politics. John.W. Keller.
Council Reform in Chicago. Edwin Bur: itt Smith.
Non-Partisan Municipal Elections. George G. W. ight.
Political Clubs in Prussian Cities. Robert C. Brooks.
Relation of the Church to Municipal Politics.
Settlement Houses and City Politics. Robert A. Woods.
The Saloon in Politics. Bolton Hall and Ernest H. Crosby.

Musical Times.—Novello. 4d. Sept. Dr. William Croft. Illustrated. F. G. Edwards. Violin-Playing. Alfred Gibson.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 25. 6d. Sept. National Review.—EDWARD ARNOLD. 2s. 6d. Sept. Japan and the New Far East. Ignotus,
The Foreign Policy of the German Empire. Sir Rowland Blennerhassett.
Will the United States wichdraw from the Philippines? John Foreman.
Church Parade in the Army. Röyal Artillery.
The Schoolboy's View of Schoolmasters. Raiph George Hawtrey.
American Affirs. A. Maurice Low.
The Coal Problem. A. D. Provand.
Drawn Matches at Cricket. W. J. Ford.
Expression in Poetry. Rev. H. C. Beeching.
The House of Commons from the Ladies' Gallery.
An Africander's Reflections on the Future of South Africa. Adrian Hofmeyr. Hofmeyr.

New England Magazine.—5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. August. August.
Whittier's New Hampshire. Illustrated. David Lee Maulsby.
Old Home Week in New Hampshire. W. H. Burnham.
Are the Massachusetts Country Towns degenerating? A. E. Winship.
A Connecticut River Ferry. Illustrated. Max Bennett Thrasher.
The Old Farm Revisited. Illustrated. H. W. Gleason.
The Old Wholesale Peddler and His Teams. Illustrated. Arthur N. Hall.
The Rise of the Tide of Life to New England Hilltops. Illustrated. E. P.

Pressey.
Maine in Literature. Illustrated. W. I. Cole.

New Ireland Review .- Burns and Oates. 6d. Sept. ROW IPPOLITA REVIEW.—BURNS AND OATES. 6d. Sept. Foxford, Then and Now. T. A. Finlay. Did Piracy pay? W. J. Johnston. The Workhouse Problem. J. Dolan. A Shakespearian Curiosity in "Love's Labour Lost." W. A. Sutton. The Railways in the South of Ireland. C. A. Stannwell. Grace O'Malley; a Forgotten Great Irishwoman. L. M. McCraith.

Newfoundland Magazine,—Newfoundland Publishing Co., St. John's, Newfoundland, 20 cents. August. With the Ice-Hunters. Illustrated. J. Harvey. Newfoundland Plant Life. R. E. Holloway.

Nineteenth Century.—Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. Sept.

Business Principles in the Public Service. E. Robertson.
The Staff Work in the War. Col. Lonsdale Hale.
Confucianism. Prof. Max Müller.
The Situation in Italy. Giovanni Dalla Vecchia.
American Imperialism. Bradley Martin.
Our Allies at Waterloo. Sir H. Maxwell.
The Traditional British Sailor. W. J. Fletcher.
The Midright Sky; the Oldest Picture-Book of all. E. Walter Maunder.
Statistics of Suicide. R. A. Skelton.
The Burden of Coal. B. Taylor.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Reid.
The South African War Hospitals. Murray Guth: iz. North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 28. 6d. August.

North American Review,—Wm. Heinemann. 2s. 6d. August.
The Crisis in China:
The Duty of America. John Barrett.
The Buty of America. John Barrett.
The Responsibility of the Kulers. Lieut. Carlyon Bellairs.
America's Share in the Event of Partition. W. C. Boulger.
Causes of Anti-Foreign Feeling. G. B. Smyth.
The Japanese View of the Situat on. A Japanese Diplomat.
The Gathering of the Storm. R. E. Lewis.
America's Treatment of the Chinese. C. F. Holder.
Education will solve the Raco Question in America. Book:r T. Washington.
Stephen Crane. H. G. Wills.
Why General Sherman declined the American Presidency in 1884; Letter.
Imperialism America's Historic Policy. W. A. Peffer.
British Strategy in South Africa. Gen. O. O. Howard.
Some Absurdities of the House of Commons. T. P. O'Connor.
The Part of the People and of the States in choosing the American President.
W. L. Hawley.
Presidential Election by Direct Popular Vote in America. J. Handiboe.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 6d. August. The Struggle regarding the Position of the Earth. Illustrated. Dr. E. Krause.

The Democratic Christians and the Vatican. Prof. G. M. Fiamingo, The Evolution of Angels and Demons in Christian Theology. R. Bruce. Mind-Reading in the Nursery. With Diag ams. Dr. P. Carus.

Our Day .- 112, LA SALLE AVENUE, CHICAGO. August. Li Hung Chang; the Statesman. E. C. Cleveland. Profit-Sharing at Leclaire. N. O. Nelson. Penal Celonies of the Nations. E. H. Crawford. Care of Women Inebj.i.tes. Lady Henry Somerset Paidologist.-Cambray House, Cheltenham. 6d. July. On the Observation of Some Moral Aspects of Children. British Child-Study. C. Lloyd Morgan. Health Inspection in the Schools.

Pall Mail Magazine. -18, Charing Cross Road. 18. Sept. Inverary. Illustrated. Rev. A. H. Malan. Justice to England. J. Holt Schooling. London Woods. Illustrated. J. B. Carlile. Yachting. Capt. A. G. Bagot.

Pearson's Magazine.—C. A. Pearson. 6d. August. Giant Wheat Farms. Illustrated. W. B. Holland. How Animals swim. Illustrated. J. G. Millais. Icebergs. Illustrated. Gertrude E. Donaldson. Cycling on Railway Lines. Illustrated. Marcus Tindal. Minature Trees. Illustrated. A. Maude.

Miniature Trees. Illustrated. A. Maude. Hypnotism—a Science. Illustrated. Kathleen Schlesinger and C. Geniaux. Sept. Sept. D. T. Timins. The Ship That flies. Illustrated. G. Levering. Breaking Dogs for the Gun. Illustrated. H. Pratt. Addis Ababa, Abyssinia; a C. pital That moves. Illustrated. Herbert Vivian.
Observing Three Eclipses. Illustrated. Rev. J. M. Bacon.
When St. George has fought the Dragon in China. Illustrated. Marcus Talking along a Beam of Light. Illustrated. C. E. M. M'Govern.

Physical Review.—MacMillan. 50 cents. August.
The Attenuation of Sound. A, W. Duff.
Some Lecture Room Methods in the Elementary Theory of Elasticity. W. S. Franklin. Spark-Length as Modified by Solid Dielectries. W. J. Humphreys, Electrical Resistance of Thin Films deposited by Kathode Discharge. Con-etinued. A. C. Longden.

Effect of Magnetization upon the Modules of Elasticity. J. S. Stephens.
Spectra of Mixtures. C. J. Rollefson.

Practical Teacher. -33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. September. The Congrès International des Langues Vivantes. P. Mi-ille.
Mrs. R. A. Cashmore. Illustrated.
Influence of School Life on Eyesight. Continued. Dr. A. Newsholme.

Puritan .- 16, PILGRIM STREET. 6d. August. Philip James Bailey: Illustrated, J. A. Hammerton.

After the War. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers.
Mission Work amongst London Flower Girls. J. Alexander.
Rev. S. Gamble Walker; Interview. With Portrait. F. Parker.

A Great Mission for All England; Interview with Rev. Thomas Law. With Portraits

Church Membership. R. Rambleton. Reminiscences of Spurgeon. With Portrait. By a Friand. Impressions of Egypt. Rev. J. W. Ewing. Dr. Johnson as a Writer of Prayers. Rev. J. Burns. An Editor of Hieroglyphics. Rev. W. A. Cornaby.

An Editor of Hieroglyphics. Rev. W. A. Cornaby.

Sept.

"John Inglesant" and Its Author. With Portrait. J. A. Hammerton.
What Women have done for Christianity. Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes.
Jerusalem in 1900. Rev. J. W. Ewing.
The Bluejacket's "Mother"; a Talk with Miss Agnes Weston. Illustrated.
J. F. Ch pter.
Samuel Rutherford. K. Spalding.
Primitive Methodist Hymn-Books. Rev. J. P. Gledstone.
What Clasgow owes to Mr. Moody. Illustrated. A. Mee.
The Making of a Jesuih. Rev. J. Burns.

Quarterly Journal of Economies. - MACMILLAN. 2 dols. per annum. August.

A Difficulty with American Census-Taking. W. F. Wilcox. The Iron Industry in the United States. F. W. Taussig. The Gas Commission of Massachusetts. J. H. Gray. Competition, Actual and Theoretical: J. Bascom.

Quiver .- CASSELL. 6d. Sept. Native Pastors. Illustrated. F. M. Holmes.
The Problem of Preservation in the Bird-World. Illustrated. R. Kearton.
The Life and Work of the Redgemer, Illustrated. Continued. Rev. F.
B. Meyer.
Horses at Home; a Visit to an Equine Health Resort. Illustrated. Linda Gardiner.
Poverty's Castles: My Visit to Guinness's Buildings. Illustrated. Miss
C. S. Bremner.
Ulustrated. Rev. W. Garrett Horder.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. 25 cents. Sept.

Does Jamaica contain a Lesson in Colonial Government. Illustrated. J. Moritzen.

T. Moritzen.

T. Marienal Prehibition Party and Its Candidates. E. J. Wheeler. Japan's Present Attitude towards China. J. K. Goodrich.

Missions in China; a Defence and an Appreciation. Dr. J. S. Dennis.

Can China be saved? Talcott Williams.
Pressing Needs of the Philippines. Major J. H. Parker.
America and the Reconstruction of China. Rev. W. N. Brewste
King Humbert, of Italy; Character Sketch.
Collis P. Huntington. With Portraits.

Review of Reviews.—(Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne, 9d. July. Imperilled Australian Missionaries in China: Portraits. With the Men in Khaki, Illustrated, Baden-Powell, Illustrated,
Baden-Powell, Illustrated,
The Great Blockades, With Chart, Dr. W. H. Fitchett, Mr. Cyril Arthur Pearson; Character Sketch,

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 4d. Sept. ROyal magazine,—C. A. Pearson. 4d. Sept.
The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Continued. R, Grey.
The Dowager Empress of China: the Slave Girl Who mounted a Throne.
Illustrated. R. Maingay.
The War in Toyland. Illustrated. A. C. Banfield.
A Beauty Factory. Illustrated. C. M. McGovern.
The King of Handcuffs. Illustrated. H. J, Holmes, Feeding a Battleship. Illustrated. A. S. Hurd.
The War on Pictorial Postcards. Illustrated. Clive Holland.

St. Nicholas.-MACMILLAN. 15. Sept. About Clothes. Illustrated. G. MacAdam.
Play Hours at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Grace W. Curran.

School Board Gazette.-Bemrose. 18. August. The Work of the London School Board. Training Colleges in 1899.

School World .- MACMILLAN: 6d. Sept. Spelling; Procedure and Process. P. A. Barnett. Difficulties of a Day-School Headmaster. E. Sharwood Smith.

Science Gossip. - 110, STRAND. 6d. Sept. On Colouring of Molluses' Shells. Illustrated. R. J. Hughes.
Mosses of Lynmouth District. C. A. Briggs.
Geological Notes in the Orange Colony. Illustrated. Continued. Major
B. M. Skinner. Spiders from Hastings. F. P. Smith.
The Photography of Colour. Illustrated. Continued. E. Sanger Shep-

Scottish Geographical Magazine. - EDWARD STANFORD. 18, 6d. August.

Botanical Survey of North Perthshire. With Map and Illustrations. Robert Smith. Robert Smith.

A Journey through Somaliland and Southern Abyssinia to the Shangallo or Barta Country and the Blue Nile, and through the Soudan to Egypt. Illustrated. R. Koettlitz.

Temperature Observations in Somaliland and Abyssinia. R. T. Omond.

Scribner's Magazine, -Sampson Low. 18. Sept. In the Gameland Our Fathers lost. Illustrated. F. Irland.
With Arctic Highlanders. Illustrated. W. A. Wyckoff.
The Slave Trade in America. Continued. Illustrated. J. R. Spears.
The Chickamayag Crisis. J. D. Cox.
A Personal Retrospect of James Russell Lowell. W. D. Howells.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes. 6d. Sept. Mr. C. E. Borchgrevink; Interview. Illustrated. W. G. Fitzgerald.
Ambulance Dogs in the German Army. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot.
The Baking Cure. Illustrated. W. B. Northrop.
The Prince of Wales's Jockeys. Illustrated. A. F. Meyrick,
The Zeppelin Air-Ship. Illustrated. T. E. Curtis.
Doctors' Diversions. Illustrated. T. F. Dolman.
A Glimpse of the Army. Illustrated. Dr. A. Conan Doyle.

Sunday at Home .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Sept. The Scots in London. Illustrated. Emma Brewer.
The Story of Squanto: a Chapter in the Early History of New England.
Illustrated. Rev. G. C. Blaxland.
Leadenhall Street and Cheapside. Illustrated. Mrs. Isabella Fyvic Mayo. Some Neighbours on the Veldt. J. H. Spettigue.

Sunday Magazine.-ISBISTER. 6d. Sept. Some Recent Confirmations of the Scriptures, Rev. John Urquhart, Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage. With Portrait. L. W. Lillingston. Crabs That swim. Illustrated. Edward Step. British Bugle-Calls. Illustrated. F. J. Crowest.

Sunday Strand,-George Newnes. 6d. Sept. Hospitals on the Veldt. Hlustrated. H. C. Shelley.
The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Continued. Ian Maclaren.
The Christian Endeavour Convention. Hustrated. W. L. Williams.
The Trail of the War. Illustrated. Continued. May Bateman.
The Dyaks of Borneo. Illustrated. James Cassidy.

Temple Bar,-Macmillan. 18. Sept. Milton as seen in His Sonnets. G. Serrell. A Batch of Famous Love Letters. A. Turner, La Mer Douce. E. S. Roscoe and Helen Clergue. Mary Villiers; a Court Beauty.

A Vi Vlad Thro

Musc Home Rescu The ! Caval

Propl

Spirit Apol Some The I

Note Oblig The The The Our Fred Cana The

Alt

Sou Ro

Mi

Th Ki To De Pr Bo

ewste

T, MELBOURNE.

ted a Throne.

Curran. st.

1.

nued. Major

Sanger Shep-D. 1s. 6d.

Illustrations. Shangallo or an to Egypt.

Omond. ot.

Spears. ls.

erald. ot.

ept. England. ella Fyvie

ırt.

Temple Magazine.—Horace Marshall. 6d. Sept.

Muscular Christianity. Illustrated. F. W. Ward.

Home-Made Places of Worship. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Rescue Efforts at Races and Fairs. Illustrated. George Hatton.

The Music of the Churches. Illustrated. Thekla Bowser.

Cavalier and Roundhead at Basing Castle; a Famous Sirge. Illustrated.

H. H. Bates.

Prophet Wroe and his Mansion. Illustrated. C. F. Shaw.

Working Girls' Clubs in London. Illustrated. Mrs. H. Alexander.

Theosophical Review.—3, Langham Place. 18. August.
Spirituality and Psychism. G. Chakravarti.
Apollonius of Tyana. Concluded. G. R. S. Mead.
Some Misconceptions about Death. Continued. C. W. Leadbeater.
The Intermediate Passage. Dr. A. A. Wells.
The Inner Purpose of the Theosophical Society. Mrs. Annie Besant.
The "Wisdom" Tradition in the Italian Renaissance. Mrs. Cooper-

Travel.—Horace Marshall, 3d, August.

A Visit to Bafchiserai; the Capital of the Crimean Khans, Illustrated.

Dr. H. Lansdell.

Istria and Dalmatia, Illustrated. W. J. Giddens.

Vladivostock. I. C. Hannah.

Through India on Cycles; Talk with Mrs. Fanny Bullock Workman.

Illustrated.

United Service Magazine,—William Clowes. 28. Sept. Notes on the Evolution of Cavalry. Continued. Lieut.-Col. F. N. Maude. Obligatory Military Service. Continued. T. Miller Maguire. The War; the Future of Our Artillery. Capt. C. Holmes Wilson. The War; Some of Our Blunders. An Outsider. The Muddles of Ancient Rome. J. B. Hodge. The Muddles of Ancient Rome. J. B. Houge.
Our Army. Continued. Rex.
Frederick the Great. William O'Connor Morris.
Canada and the Anarican War of 1812. J. Castell Hopkins.
The Dhooly. Lieut. Rowland R. Gibson.
The Chinese Army. E. H. Parker.

Werner's Magazine.—43, EAST 19TH STREET, NEW YORK.
25 cents. August.
The Catholic College Play. Illustrated. Ruth Everett.
St. Louis Convention of Elocutionists. Illustrated.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 25. 6d. S.pt. The Coming Dissolution. F. A. White. Is War a Blessing? W. J. Baylis. The Clergy and the War. Nora Twycross.

The Case against Conscription. A. W. Livesey.
Old-Age Pensions. W. D. Macgregor.
An Interesting Industrial Experiment. William H. Hunt.
The Murder of Sleep. G. Trobridge.
Cornelius Agrippa: His Appreciation of Women. Harriet McIlquham.
The Three Laws of Social Activity. L. M. Burrell.
Microbes. Maurice I., Johnson.
Similitudes: Their Use by the Early Poets of the Nineteenth Century. L.

Wide World Magazine.—George Newnes. 6d. Sept.
My Housekeeping Troubles in Fast Af.ica. Illustrated. Mrs. F. Snowden.
The Wedding Fetes of Grez-Doiceau. Illustrated. J. E. Whitby.
The Muharm Festival in Hyderabad. Illustrated. D. Burrows.
My Experience of a South American Revolution. Illustrated. Capt. R. K.
Hattersley.

Hattersley.

In the City of Tripoli. Illustrated. M. de Filck.
Our Klondike Failure. Illustrated. J. Hudson.
A Cycle Tour in Kashmir. Illustrated. R. H. Morton.
From Mogador to Morocco City. Illustrated. T. Robertson. Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 6d. Sept.

Willustor magazine.—Ward, Lock. od. Sept.

Distinguished Devotees of the Camera. Illustrated. A. Wallis Myers.

The Ice-Breaker Ermack. Illustrated. Earl Mayo.

The Yeoman of the Guard. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

How Landowners are made. Illustrated. A. Goodrich.

The L. S. D. of Literary Shrines. Illustrated. Harry Golding.

Fireworks; Pictures in Fire. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot.

Woman at Home.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Sept. M. Felix; the Great Parisian Dress Artist; Interview, Illustrated, Marie Lord Rosebery; Personal Characteristics. Illustrated.

Womanhood .- 5, AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. Sept. Japanese Life behind Scenes. Illustrated. Yei Theodora Ozaki Inebriety and Suicide in Relation to Womanhood. Dr. W. Wynn-Westcott. On the War Path near Ladysmith. Mrs. A. M. Johnson.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. Sept. The Life Story of Rudyard Kipling. Illustrated.
The Yerkes Telescope; the Latest and Greatest Astronomical Observatory.
F. Ballard.

Young Woman.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Sept. At Home in Japan; Interview with Mrs. Hugh Fraser. Illustrated. A. Clifton Bingham; the Author of Two Thousand Songs: Interview. With

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt.-Benziger and Co., Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. August. South Africa. Illustrated. Prof. R. von Lendenfeld.
The Passion Play at Oberammergau, Illustrated. Dr. J. Kanftl.
Fri:drich Wilhelm Weber. With Portrait. H. Kerner.
Rome in the Jubilee Year. Continued. Eremos.

Archiv für Soziale Gesetzgebung und Statistik.— Carl Heymann, Berlin. 2 Mk. 50 Pf. Nos. 5-6. The Prussian Law relating to the Taxation of Warehouses. Dr. H. Cohn. Agriculture in Germany. Prof. H. Rauchberg.
The Housing Question in England. E. Bernstein.

Daheim.-Velhagen and Klasing, Leipzig. 20 Pf. August 4.

Miltenberg, Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck.
August 11.
The German Regiment for the Orint. Lieut.-Gen. A. von Boguslawski.
The Destruction of the Summer Palace at Peking in 1860. Illustrated. Castor.

The Chinese Army. O. von Ostrich.
Kiel. Illustrated. F. Ernst.
Francis Joseph I. With Portrait. K. von Vincenti.
To China! K. von Rheden.

The Russian Forces in China, Maj.-Gen, von Zepelin. King Humbert. C. G. D. To China! Continued. K. von Rheden. Count Alfred von Waldersee. H. von Zobeltitz.

Deutscher Hausschatz.-F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 15. Princess Josephine von Hohenzollern, With Portrait.
Bonn, Illustrated, P. Freidank,
Heft 16.

Dessau, Illustrated, O. von Schaching,
Paris Exhibition. Concluded, Illustrated, T. H. Lange.
The Emperor Francis Joseph. With Portrait. F. von Essen.
The Zeppelin Air-Ship. Illustrated. C. H.
A New "Raphael" at Florence. Hlustrated. Dr. J. Senes.
Edmund Kretschmer. With Portrait. Dr. A. Kohut.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
6 Mks. per qr. August.
The Goethe-Bund and Its Future. T. Mommsen.
Scientific Aerial Navigation. Prof. R. Börnstein.
Papacy and Witchcraft. Graf von Hoensbroech.

Raphael's "Sistine Madonna." Max Lautner.
The New Measurement of the Earth. Prof. F. R. Helmert.
Attacks on the Old Testament. Prof. A. Kamphausen.
The State and Hygisne. Prof. G. Bizzozero.
What History may teach. M. von Brandt.
Everybody's Secret. W. Schupps.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Partel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.

Doutsone Rundsonau.—Gerrober Partel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.
August.
Art at the Paris Exhibition. W. Gensel.
Two Human Types. Erich Adickes.
Gräfin Hahn-Hahn.
World Literature. R. M. Meyer.
Charlotte Diede's Letters. H. Meisner.
Miss Mary Kingsley and Her Travels in West Africa. Lady Blennerhassett.

Gartenlaube, -ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 8.

The Plague. Dr. J. H. Baas. Aschaffenburg. Illustrated. J. Schober. The Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. J. C. Heer. China. Illustrated. Paul Lindenberg. Street Life in Peking. Illustrated. St. J.
The Red Cross at Sea. Dr. A. Ruge.
The Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. J. C. Heer.
German Song in America. Illustrated. R. Cronau.
The Berlin Zoological Gardens. Illustrated. Dr. L. Heyck.
Marie von Eboner-Eschenbach. F. von Saar.
Flower Decoration. Illustrated. G. Heick.

Gesellschaft .- E. Pierson, Dresden. 75 Pf. August 15 Socialism in Great Britain. A. Hamon. Poetry. L. Lier.

Grenzboten.-F. W. Grunow, Leipzig. August 2. Germany and Poland.
Eight Years of Politics in Saxony. Concluded. O. Kaemmel..
Italian National and Church Festivals. Concluded. H. Ehrenberg.

Illustrirte Zeitung.-J. J. Weber, Leipzig. 1 Mk. Aug. 23, The Grossglockner. Illustrated. Dr. F. Christomanos.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Aug. The German Smyrna Carpet Industry. Illustrated. L. Hagen.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Lehtzig.
r Mk. 25 Pf. August.

Meat Inspection and the American Meat Ring.
The Position of Russia and England in Asia at the Beginning of the 20th Century. E. von Kepelin.
School Conferences and School Reform. Dr. G. Frick.
Oberammergau. Pfarrer J. Lohmann.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau. - S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. August.

Change. Julius Hart. Liszt's Letters to Princess Wittgenstein. Continued. A. von Schoen.

Neue Zeit .- J. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 25 Pf. August 4. Clerical Life in Turkey and the Present Régime. Ischtiraki. Antonio Labriola and Ethics. S. Gunter. Marx on Tariff Reform. M. Grunwald.

August 11. Wilhelm Liebknecht. On the Eve of the Presidential Election. M. Beer.
Antohio Labriola. Concluded. S. Gunter.
The Teaching of Prof. Sombart. E. Belfort Bax.

August 18.

Modern French Authors and the Socialist Movement, C. Mauclair. A German Colonial Army. E. Däumig.
The Insurance of Workmen in Germany. H. Heimann.

Nord und Sud.-Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks. August.

Joseph Lauff. With Portrait. K. Pagenstecher. Travels in Spain. A. Rogalla von Bieberstein. Superstition and Magic. T. Achelis. Laughter and Its Causes. F. Rubinstein.

Stein der Weisen.-A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf. Heft 2. On Digestion.

On Digestion.

Photographs of Clouds. Illustrated. R.
The History of Civilisation. F.
The Great Telescope at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. R.

Heft 3.

The Newspaper as the Daily Bread of Authorship. W.
Micro-Photography and Natural Science. Illustrated. D. C. Schmidt. Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
1 Mk. Heft 1.

Naval Pictures. Continued. Illustrated. R. Schneider.

Modern Meissen (Dresden) China. Illustrated. A. Brunnemann. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. D. S. Epstein. Wellesley College. Illustrated. Margarete Maller. German National and Student Songs. L. Holthof.

Vom Fels zum Meer.—Union-Deutsche-Verlags-Gesellschaft, Stuttgart. 75 Pf. Heft 25.

The Louvre Picture Gallery. Illustrated, G. Gronau, Karlsbad, Illustrated, Die Zeit .- GÜNTHERGASSE I, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. August 4. Politics in China. Prof. R. K. Douglas. History of the Disorganisation of the State Railways. Prakitiker. Luccheni. Dr. A. Forel.

August 11. The Leaders of German Social Democracy. H. von The Prevention of Fire on Iron Ships. W. Berdrow. H. von Gerlach.

August 18. Agriculture in Russia. W. Studnicki-Gizbert. Women's Clubs in Paris. F. Loliée. Chinese Civilisation. Fierre Laffitte.

August 25. K. Our Political Education. Our Political Education. K.
Ritual Murder and Inquisition. Graf von Hoensbroech.
Agriculture in Russia. Concluded.
Chinese Civilisation. Continued. Pierre Laffitte.
Goethe as a Husband. Dr. W. Bode, Painting at the Paris Exhibition. R. Muther.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, BERLIN 26 Mks. per annum. August.

French Painting in 1900. Illustrated. W. Gensel. Hubert van Eyck. Illustrated. W. H. J. Weale. An Unknown 14th Century Portrait of Dante. Illustrated. J. Mesnil.

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft.—Breitkopp und Haertel, Leipzig. 10 Mks. per ann. August.

The Man's Alto in English Music. A. H. D. Prendergast. The Lortzing Festival at Pyrmont. G. R. Kruse.

Zukunft.-FRIEDRICHSTR. 10, BERLIN. 50 Pf. August 25. Native Art. Dr. F. Servaes. Karl von Hase. E. Franken.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales de Géographie. -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 5frs. Sept. 15. Mercure de France. -15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. 2 frs. August. Bibliography of Geography, 1899.

Association Catholique.—3, RUE DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. August 15.

The Essential Laws of Society. G. de Pascal. St. Paul and the Law of Authority. Ch. Calippe. Catholic Interests in Germany. H. Cetty.

Bibliothèque Universelle .- 18, King William Street, STRAND. 20s. per annum. August.

Col. de Villebois-Mareuil. A. Veuglaire.
The Paris Exposition. Continued. H. de Varigny.
"David Harum." Mary Bigot.
The Boers of South Africa. Continued. J. Villarais.

Correspondant .- 31, Rue Saint-Guillaume, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c.

The Assassination of the King of Italy, F. Carry.
Slavery in Africa. Mgr. A. Le Roy.
The French Military Museum at the Paris Exposition. G. Bapst.
France and China. A. A. Fauvel.
The Shah of Persia at Home. A. Perquer.

August 25.

The Anniversary of Sedan.

The Bollandist Fathers and the Penitence of Theodosius.

Duc de Broglie.

Russian Policy in China.

B. de 2 inzinoff.

The Republican Party in France and the Labour Question.

The Woman Question.

P. de Barneville.

Modern Medals at the Paris Exposition.

A. de Fo ille.

August 25.

Humanité Nouvelle.-15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 25 C. August.

The Electoral System and the Elections in Belgium. H. Dumont.
Curious Musical Instruments at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. E.
Bailly.
Tolstoy and His Traducers. E. Crosby.
The Socialist Party in France and the Ministry. G. Maillet.

Journal des Économistes .- 14, Rue Richelieu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. August 15.

European Interests in China. D. Bellet. The Monetary System in Persia. Combes de Lestrade. Municipal Socialism. H. Bouët.

Ménestrel.—2 bis, RUE VIVIENNE, PARIS. 30 C. August 5, 12, 19, 25. Marguerite in Goethe's "Faust." Continued. A. Boutarel.

The Situation in China. P. Nesles.
The Future of French Poetry. H. de Régnier.
The Ethics of Love. R. de Gourmont.
The Centennial Exhibition of French Art. Continued. Fontainas.

Monde Moderne. -5, Rue St. Benoît, Paris. i f. 60 c. August. Tashion. Illustrated. H. Frichet.
The National Polish Museum at Rapperschwyl. Illustrated. A. Berthier.
An Imperial Audience at Pekin. Illustrated. Dr. J. Matignon.
Hogarth and Cruikshank; Apostles of Temperance. Illustrated.
H. Thirion.

Abnormal Children. Illustrated. L. Grandvilliers,
The Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Cervisy.
The Gardens and Parks at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. L. de Caster.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand.

55 frs. per annum. August 1.

The South Af.ican War. Continued. Capt. Gilbert.

The Condition of French Literary Criticism. C. Mauclair Officialism. F. Martin.

The Quin-Centenary of the University of Cr.cow. G. Sarrazin.

Pails in 1800. G. de Dulor.

August 15. Musical Wanderings. C. Scint-Saëns. The New Ireland. P. Hamelle. The Military Skill of the Chinese. G. de Contenson. Italy. G. Bouniols.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, BOULEVARD POISSONIÈRE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50c. July 31.

The Death of King Humbert. N. D. L. R.
Victor Emmanuel III. of Italy. Mme. Marie L. Rattazzi.
Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mme. Rattazzi.
The Falls of Niggara. E. Richet.

Réforme Sociale. -54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. August. The Report of the Annual Meeting of the Society of Social Economy.

Revue de l'Art. -28, RUE DU MONT-THABOR, PARIS. 7 frs. 50 C. August 10.

The French School of Painting at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. L. de Fourcaud.

Silverwork at the Exposition. Illustrated. Concluded. H. Havard.
Pewter at the Exposition. Illustrated. H. Havard.
Porcelain at the Exposition. Illustrated. E. Garnier.
Sculpture at the Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. M. Demaison.

Revi The Lille Some Edu

The Milan Initiation Hungaria

> The Chin The Cath

The Evo Universa The Wh The Eur The Cor

The Dis History The Int Revue

Science The Fr Prof. S Rev

Is the The L Parlia The U Franc Roxer Dress Mala

The

Ligh The

Mo

B

nemann.

GESELLSCHAFT.

f. August 4. kitiker.

h.

. BERLIN

J. Mesnil. -BREITKOPF ust.

ust 25.

MAIN, PARIS.

August. . Berthier. Illustrated.

nas.

de Caster.

D.

DNIÈRE,

ust. y. 50 C.

i. Cond.

m.

Revue Blanche,-23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr. August 1.

The Lille Museum. C. Saunier. Some Educational Manuals. M. Dumoulin.

The Milan Riots in 1838. F. T. Marinetti. Initiation into the Secret Society of the Boxers. L. Charpen.ier. Hungarian Nationali.ies. R. Chélard.

Revue Bleue.-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. August 4.

The Chinese Imbroglio. A. Moireau.
Gustave Larroumet. L. Delaporte.
The Catholic Priest. Concluded. M. Stainville.

August 11

The Evolution of French Politics in the Nineteenth Century. Ch. Seignobos. French Society under the Consulate. G. Stenger. Universalism and Nationalism. J. Novicow. August 18.

The Wheat Question. E. Perrin.
The European Conference on Aff.irs in China. E. Barbé.
The Congress of Teachers and Students at Paris. L. Parsons.

August 25. The Distribution of Prizes at the Paris Exposition. H. Depasse, History in the Nineteenth Century. C. V. Langlois, The International Congress of Students at Paris. P. Tissier.

Revue Chrétienne.—11, Avenue de L'Observatoire, Paris. 6 frs. per ann. August.

Science and Faith. L. Luzzatti.
The French Protestant Translation of the New Testament. E. Stapfer.
Prof. Samuel Berger. A. Sabatier.

Revue des Deux Mondes.—18, King William Street, Strand. 62 frs. per annum. August 1.

fo frs. per annum. August 1.

Is the Moral Question a Social One? A. Fouillés.
The Last Confession. Hall Caine.
Parliaments and Parliamentarianism. C. Benoist.
The Upper Laos and the Mekong. I. Massieu.
François Rabelais. F. Brunetiere.
Antarctic Expeditions. A. Dastre.
Boxers and Secret Societies in China. Comte Castellane. August 15.

The Annexation of Thessaly. Comte de Moüy.
Dress and Boots; the Mechanism of Modern Life. Vicomte d'Avenel.
Malaria in Italy. E. Bertaux.
Sea Fishermen. Dr. Bonnafy.

Revue d'Economie Politique.—22, Rue Soufflot, Paris.
20 frs. per ann. July.

The International Union for Economic and Social Research. P. du Maroussem.

The Ineffectual Rising of the Nile in 1900. J. Brunhes.
The Place of London in Times of Crisis. A. E. Sayous.

Revue Encyclopédique.-18, King William Street, Strand. 7s. per qr.

Light Opera in Paris. Illustrated. P. Souday. The Paris Exposition. G. Geffroy. French Lawyers of the Century. Illustrated. G. Pellissier.

August 17.

The Ouled-Nail of Algeria. Illustrated, Dr. Huguet,
The Mahdist States. G. Dujarric.
The Bread Industry. Illustrated. G. Martin.

The Decennial Exhibition of French Art, Illustrated. A. Barthélemy. Modern Literature in India. Illustrated. D. Menant. Bossuet and Contemporary Criticism. G. Lanson.

Petroleum and Its Uses. Illustrated. J. Boyer. Insects; Nature's Workers. Illustrated. H. Coupin. Aerial Navigation. Illustrated. Y. Lejeal.

Revue Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies.—y2, RUE DE LA VICTOIRE, PARIS. 2 frs. August.

The Chinese Expedition of 1860 and Its Difficulties. G. Vasco. The Origin of the Boxer Crisis. Mgr. Favier. The War in South Africa, With Map. C. de Lasalle.

Revue Générale. -- 16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per Medical Aid and Hospitals in War. J. Buse.

Medical Aid and Hospitals in War. J. Buse.
The Lyric Poetry of the Boers. L. Van Keymeulen.
At Oberammergau. C. Van Lerberghe.
Old Age Pensions in Belgium. Ch. Dejace.
Belgium at the Paris Exposition. F. Bournand.
Foreign Diplomacy and Old French Society. Concluded. V. du Bl.d.
The Chinese Question. J. B. Steenackers.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 7f. 50 c. Aug.ist 5.
From Zurich to Chartreuse. H. Potez.
Jewellery at the Paris Exposition. Augusta Latouche.

August 20. The Best Days of Malmaison. Guy Chantepleure.
Three Months at Mahé, India. G. L. d'Hébécourt.
The Paris Conservatoire. Augusta Latouche.
The Centennial Exhibition of French Painting. G. Migeon.

Revue du Monde Catholique. - 76, RUE DES SAINTS-PÈRES, PARIS.

I fr. 50 c. August 1.

Victor Hugo versus Bossuet. Concluded. Canon Delmont.

Devotion to the Pope. Concluded. J. Fèvre.

Freedom of Education and the First Empire. Concluded. R. P. Laveille.

Catholicism in the United States. L. Darville.

Our Lady of Lourdes and M. Henri Lasserie. Abbé Maniquet.

Angust ze.

The Modernity of Bossuet. J. Févre. Lamennais, 1806-15. A. Roussel. Ancient Sculpturs. J. Daguerre. The Financieurs. J. Daguerre.

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 13, Bedford Street, Covent Garden. 60 frs. per annuin. August 1.

The Commercial Power of Germany. P. de Rousiers. From Canton to Yun-Nan-Sen. A. François. Mathematics in Secondary Education. J. Tannery. Venice in Danger. R. de Souza.

August 15. English Opinion and the War. A. Chewrillon. Science and Morals; the Town, M. Corday. Sport in Ancient France. Continued. J. J. Jusse and, Workmen's Insur. nce in Germany. R. Romme, Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.

3 frs. August 10.

The Question of a European F-deration. J. Novicow.
The Reform of the Financial Market and the Speculation in Wheat and Flour. A. E. Sayous,
The Elections in Belgium. H. Dumont.
England and the Military Question. J. Wilhelm.

Revue des Revues,-12, Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris. 1 fr. Aug. 1. The Prevention of Mortality among Infants. Continued. P. Strauss. Social Education in France. Anna Lampérière. Count Muravieff and His Successor. W. T. Stead. The Pretended Disappearance of the Maori Race. Illustrated. Miss C. A. Barnicoat.
The Future of the Song in France. C. Mauclair.
Epigraphs. J. Bainville.
Liquid Air. Illustrated. Concluded. Dr. L. Caze.

August 15. August 15.

Illusions about the Conquest of China. J. de Bloch.
Souvenirs of My Peace Propaganda. F. Passy.
Man-Eaters. H. de Varigny.
Curious Associations in China. Illustrated. F. Mury.
Moral Training at School and at Home. Mlle. Em. Lecamp.
The Reform of Orthography. A. Renard.
Russian Licerature. Mme. Véra Stakoff.
The French Navy. Masson Forestier.

Revue Scientifique.-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. August 4. Opening Address at the International Medical Congress at Paris. Prof. Lannelongue.

Lannelongue.

The Progress of Mechanical Industries. Gen. Sebert.

The French Society for the Advancement of Science, 1899-1900. M. Bergonić and E. Galante.

August 11. The International Geological Congress at Paris.
The Observatory on Mount Etna. Ilustrated. J. Janssen.
Travels in Africa. Illustrated. E. Foa.

August 18.

Human Federation. J. Novicow.
The Moral Condition of the Natives in the Colonies. J. de Saussure.
The Effect of Modern Projectiles. H. Nimier. August 25.

Cryoscopy and Tonometry. Raou I eath Customs in Tunis. A. Loir. Raoult.

Revue Socialiste. -8, GALERIE DU THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS, PARIS. z fr. 50 c. August.

The Anglo-Saxon Danger.
Unity and Federalism. P. Dramas.
The Philosophy of History and Evolution. Ch. Rappoport.
The Situation in China. P. Louis. Russian Women in History. Marie Stromberg.

Université Catholique.—Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per ann. August 15.

The Coronation of Sacred Images.
Cosmopolitism. Abbé Delfour.
The Commencement of Time. F. de Curley.
The Triple Alliance. Continued. Count J. Grabinski.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.-VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. August 4.

The Celestial Empire.
The Canonisation of Blessed de la Salle.
Christian Marriage and the Italian Senate. Contemporary Protestantism.

August 18. The Regicide of Monza.
The Inscriptions on the Stele in the Forum.
Determinism and Liberty.
Cardinal Consalvi in Paris.

Cosmos Catholicus.-VIA S. CHIARA 21, ROME. 24 frs. per aunum.

After the Regicide at Monza. Count E. Soderini. The Congress of Christian Archaeology. R. C. Mgr. Duchesne. With Portraits. P. M. Caltannissetta. Illustrated.

Flegrea.-PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. August 5. The Death of the King. Riccardo Forster. Tolstoi's "Resurrection." R. Garofolo. Letter from Paris. Remy de Gourmont.

Nuova Antologia.—Via S. Vitale 7, Rome. 46 frs. per annum. August 1.

August I.

Excavations in the Forum. Illustrated. G. Boni.
Italian Thought and the Science of War. Col. E. Rocchi.
A Materialist Conception of Happiness. Necra.
The Evolution of Imperialism in England. G. M. Fiamingo.
August 16.
July 20. With Portrai: of King Humbert. A. Fogazzaro.
The Work of Count Cavour. Prof. F. Bertolini.
An Ideal of Patriotism. E. Arbib,
Human Character. P. Mantegazza.
A Realistic Conception in the Ideal of Dante. Alfred Austin.
In the Caucasus. Illustrated. G. Passigli.

Rassegna Nazionale.-VIA DELLA PACE 2, FLORENCE. 30 frs. per ann. August 1.

Assisi Adèle Perriottet Assisi. Adeie Periotee.
Alpinism in 1830. F. Bosazza.
Religious Interests in Palestine. N. D.
A. Fogazzaro. A. Zardo. China according to a Chinese. A. V. Vecchi. The Death of the King. X.

August 16. August 16.
The Heart of Humbert I. A. Cont.
Cardinal Canossa. With Portrait. X.
The Postry of Victoria Aganoor. A. Zardo.
Mgr. Ireland's Address on Lafayette.
Concerning the Regicide. P. A. Ghignone.
The Funeral Sermon of the King. Rev. A. Monti.

Rivista Internazionale. - VIA TORRE ARGENTINA, 76, ROME.

Hivista Internazionale,—VIA TORRE ARGENTINA, 70
August.
Method in Social Science. G. Molteni.
The Sardinian Question. A. Apeddu.
Experience and Faith in the Closing Century. Dr. Biancinelli.

Rivista Musicale Italiana. - Fratelli Bocca, Turin. L4,50. No. 3. Thoughts on the History of Music. A. Costa.

The Origin of Music, B. Grassi-Landi.

The Master Music ans of the French Renaissance. O. Chilesotti.

The Finale of Besthoven's "Eroica" Symphony. D. Sincero.

Perosi's "Christ's Entry into Jerusalem." E. Schultz-Adalawsky.

Rivista Politica e Letteraria. -- VIA MARCO MINGHETTI 3, ROME.

August 15.
The Good King and the New R. ign. XXX.
The Reign of Humbert I. A. Monzilli.

Rivista Popolare.-Rome. August 15. After the Regicide. Editor. Honesty versus Opportunism. W. Liebknecht. With Portrait. Dr. N. Colajanni.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios.—REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MADRID.
20 pesetas per annum. August 5.
Catholic Nations and Protestant Nations. B. R. Gonzalez.
The Assassination of the King of Italy. J. Montes.
Distance lends Enchantment to the Mental View. E. de Ur.arte. August 20.

Catholic Nations and Protestant Nations. Continued. B. R. Gonzalez.

Scientific Observations.

Concerning an Excursion to the Shore of Alicante. T. Sancho. On Confession at Sea. P. Rodriguez.

España Moderna, —Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid.
40 pesetas per annum. August.
China and Europe. F. Peniche de Lugo.
Modern French Literature. Emilia Pardo Bazan.
The Reform of Primary Education. Prof. Adolfo Posada.
The Principe de la Paz and his Collection. J. Perez de Guzman. Spanish-American Poets.

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 15 frs. per annum. No. 34.

On the Administration of Our Colonies: E. de Vasconcellos. The Portuguese Naval League. E. de V. The Islands of the Atlantic. G. Pereira.

Revista Contemporanea. - Calle DE PIZARRO 17, MADRID. 2 pesetas. July 30.

The International Fleets in the Far East. Arturo Llopis. Higher Education in Artistic Industries in Valencia. Rafael Domenech. A Trip through Portugal. E. Corales y Sanchez. On the Way to Collect Fruit. Dr. E. Ribera.

August 15.

Physical Exercise in Education. E. Sanz y Escartin.
The Official Teaching of Ph.losophy in Spain. J. E. Lledo.
The Organisation of Labour. M. G. Maestre.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 1s. 8d. August.

P. Cornelis De Moor. Illustrated. Arie van Veen. Paris Exhibition Sketches. Illustrated. Eugene Bunge. Spizzbergen in 1899. Illustrated. L. J. van Voorthuijsen.

De Gids .- LUZAC AND Co. 3s. August. The Chinese Question. Henri Borel.

Machiavelli's Comedy "La Mandragola." Dr. A. S. Kok.
The Jeunesse Doréc—27th July, 1734, to 5th October, 1795. W. P. Kops.
The Dutch Indies and the Exhibition. Prof. Went.

Woord en Beeld .- ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum.

Napoleon I. and His Sisters. Illustrated. G. H. Betz.
The Work of F. van Eeden in Sociology. With Portrait. C. K. Elout.
Dutch Exhibits at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per annum. July 31. Summer. Richard Eriksen. Ernst Haeckel. P. Engelbrethsen.

August 15. The Dog-days, S. A. Ramsvig.
Imperialism and the Smaller Nations. Richard Eriksen. Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. August. Did Shakespeare re-write His Plays? Otto Jespersen. Caste. Oscar Hansen. Heinrich Abeken. Karl Gjellerup. Women-Workers and the Home. Nina Bang, née Ellinger. Robert Owen. Continued. Charles Warburg.

THE RUSSIAN MAGAZINES.

Isloritcheski Vyestnik.-St. Petersburg. A. S. Suvorin. August. Recollections of Zagosken. Continued. Censure of the Drama (1801-1896). Baron Driezen. Kasan Poets. B. N. Agafonof. Sketches of American Activity. Continued. E. Pravdin.

Mir Bozhi,-St. Petersburg. Ligovea, 25. August.

Seeking Fortuns in Siberia. A. Omeltchenko. George Sand and Her Times. E. Degen. Russia in Manchuria. P. F. Lobza. Anthropological Sketches. Continued. Prof. A. F. Brandt.

Russkoe Bogatstvo.-St. Petersburg. Spasskaya i Bakavaya. July. Literary Factors of the American Revolution. Continued. P. G. Miyhuef.

Types of Capitalist and Agrarian Evolution. Concluded. V. M. Tchernoff. Co-oprative Production in the West. I. K. The Provincial Courfs of France. V. Tanayefskaya. Literature and Life. N. K. Mikhailovsky.

Russki Vyestnik.-Moscow. Malaya Dnutrofka, 29. June. Russki Vyestnik.—Moscow. Malata Daglad.
A Traveller's Impressions of Japan. P. S. Alekseyef.
Savorof. Concluded. P. M. Maikof.
Girton College. L. V.
Past Invasions of India. Concluded. N. O.
Religion as a Social Phenomen

Religion as a Social Phenomenon. Continued. Prof. Voedensky. Girton College. Concluded. L. V. Autocracy and Parliamentarianism. Prince D. N. Tsertelef. Giacomo Leopardi. V. F. Savednik.

76, ROME.

CE. 30 frs.

li. L4,50. No. 3.

sotti.

wsky.

ON. 15 frs.

*(

IADRID.

P. Kops

er annum.

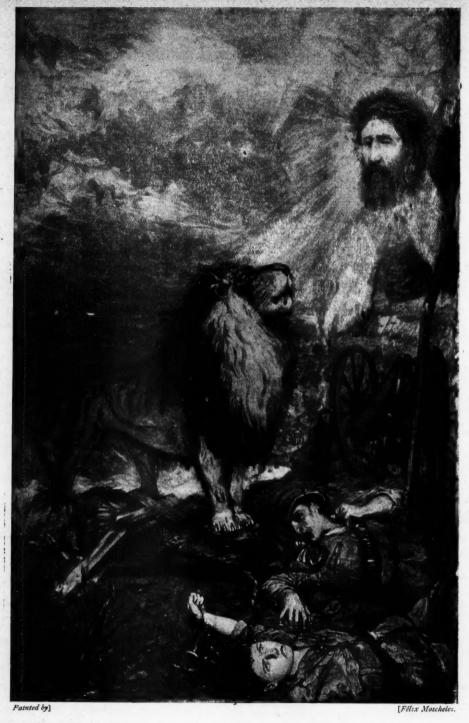

ım. August.

Tchernoff.

June.

BETHLEHEM STORMED AND CAPTURED IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD 1900.

In England the wild boar, by a play on words, has been adopted as the national symbol of the South African Republics. In these last months an abominable picture entitled "The National Cartoon" has been extensively placarded throughout England. It represents the British lion triumphing over the prostrate bodies of the boars who symbolise the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. Provoked by this insolent and vulgar exultation in the victory gained by an Empire of 400,000,000 over the tiny Republics of South Africa, Mr. Moscheles has painted a picture, which is reproduced in miniature on the other side of the page. He adopted the central group of the "National Cartoon," but filled in details which bring into prominence the real truth of the situation. Upon the corpses of the murdered Republics he flung the broken cross. In the foreground lies the body of a British soldier united with the slaughtered boar in the sad brotherhood of death. Near them a bugler-boy is writhing in agony. A cannon stands in the midst of the slain, half concealed in the smoke of battle. High aloft waves the Union Jack, the proud emblem of British glory and British pride. But from the centre of St. George's cross, which is blazoned on every English flag, the crowned head of the Man of Sorrows looks down with infinite pity and reproach upon the scene of carnage and of victory. It is a great sermon in colour, and a reproduction, also in colours, is being circulated by scores of thousands in England during the Election.

"BETHLEHEM STORMED AND CAPTURED" IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD 1900.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, October 3rd, 1900.

The Dissolution.

The Dissolution of Despair took place after all on the date fixed by the Whips before Parliament rose.

At the end of August, however, owing to the failure of the Army in Africa to compel the Boers to lay down their arms, it was understood that the Dissolution was postponed till a more convenient season. President Kruger's retreat into Portuguese territory seems, however, to have convinced Ministers that it was with them a case of Now or Never. So a Council was summoned at Balmoral, and Parliament was dissolved on September 25th. The first polls took place on October 1st, and the new House of Commons will be practically complete by the time these pages see the light.

The Party The Electoral Addresses of the leaders of parties have not particularly impressed the public mind. Mr. Morley, who is laid up, and being hors de combat could take no active part in the contest, contributed the only phrase which any one seems to remember. His reference to the Ministers as these beautiful "skippers with their precious cargoes of Dead Sea apples," is almost the only literary or picturesque phrase which the General Election has produced. Lord Salisbury, being a peer, could only address the electors indirectly through the medium of a letter addressed to a friend. It is a lachrymose performance, deprecating anticipated abstentions from the poll. Minister then proceeds to specify three questions, in handling which the Government requires that its Parliamentary support should be strengthened rather than weakened. The first is that of rebuilding upon durable foundations the Imperial power over the territories of the two South African In due time these territories will Republics. doubtless enjoy colonial freedom, but how long it will be before they attain the full position of a British Colony depends upon the "steady submission" of the Boers. To secure that "steady submission" the country must vote Tory in order to convince the Boers that they have no hope from persistent resistance or agitation. On the Chinese question Lord Salisbury said nothing beyond referring to its complexity, and declaring that "the fact that we are acting with other Powers forbids me from entering without reserve on questions of Chinese policy." On the third subject, that of Army Reform, I quote his remarks in another page.

Lord Rosebery's Hedworth Lambton, in which he answers the hypothetical question,

How should I vote at this juncture were I a voter?" replied, "I could not vote for the present Government," for while in the present situation of the world he would vote "for almost any strong administration, the present Government, while strong in votes, is in other respects the weakest that I can recollect." And then in one compact paragraph he charges the Government with various high crimes and misdemeanoursfrom its neglect of social legislation to the lack of forsesight and preparation exposing the country to humiliations unparalleled since the American War. He then proceeds to declare that there are three great national reforms which cannot wait: first, temperance legislation; secondly, the housing of the workingclasses; thirdly, fearless administrative reform, more especially at the War Office. About South Africa, he asserts, with somewhat undue emphasis, that the settlement must guarantee "that the results of our sacrifices should in no jot or tittle be prejudiced," but should have as its ultimate aim the establishment of confidence and loyal harmony in South Africa, All that can be said of this epistle is that it is better than nothing; that it is better than Lord Salisbury's, but it is so far below the standard of what Lord Rosebery himself has attained to in previous years that I read it with a feeling of melancholy regret. If our administration is to be placed on a business footing, the ex-foreman should put his back into the work of criticism and suggestion much more vigorously than he does in this letter to " My dear Hedworth."

Mr. Balfour's Address. Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain are unequally yoked together as a kind of Siamese twins of the Ministry in their appeal to the constituencies.

No other member of the Ministry has said anything to which the public paid the slightest attention. Mr. Balfour, as leader of the House of Commons, has the right of place, but Mr. Chamberlain with characteristic pushfulness has practically usurped the leading rôle in the election. Mr.

Westminster Gazette.]

The Cupboard was Bare.

Balfour, who has been re-elected by his Manchester constituents by a largely increased majority, which shows that neither Protestant irritation nor the principles of Cobden are influencing electoral results in the Lancashire capital, issued an address in which, greatly daring, he even outdid Mr. Chamberlain in fine audacity of assertion. He maintains that he does not believe that "in the history of this country any Parliament has more successfully carried out the policy or more adequately fulfilled the hopes of those who returned the majority into power."

Such a declaration is enough to take away the breath. It is constantly asserted that Mr. Balfour never reads the papers; and that he is capable of making in all innocent good faith such an astounding statement as the foregoing is a conclusive demonstration of the truth of the current report. We have only to turn to the columns of the most devoted Ministerial organs to discover how universal is the discontent, dissatisfaction and dismay with which the supporters of the Government regard the net result of Ministerial achievement.

Mr. Balfour would Conservative hardly deny that the Discontent. Maxses are faithful adherents of the Unionist Administration, or that Mr.

Strachey, of the Spectator, is loyal to Mr. Chamberlain; but it would be difficult to find anywhere more comprehensive and mournful expressions of disappointment and dissatisfaction than are to be found in these two journals. The National Review even goes so far as to suggest that the Ministry should be so entirely remodelled, stock, lock, and barrel, as to be hardly recognisable as the same Administration. The most pressing desiderata, says this friendly critic, are—first, to reduce the present members of the Cabinet from nineteen to fourteen; secondly, to lower their age, which at present averages sixty-one; thirdly, to free the Premiership from the burden of carrying a department; and fourthly, to bring in some new blood as well as some young blood.

to ba

de

tio

Sta

foo

len

the

be

the

tio

Mi

tio

inc

of

L

Mi

hin

pra

ing

Sta

me

be

we

Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain are in agreement in maintaining that the supreme issue before the electors at the present contest is to establish at the present contest is to establish the principle "that there shall be no break in the continuity of our national policy, and no diminution in the strength of the Parliamentary forces by which that policy can alone be successfully maintained." Mr. Chamberlain in like manner appeals to his countrymen "to disappoint the expectations of those who wish ill to Britain by justifying with no uncertain voice the efforts which we have made to maintain the supremacy of the Queen in South Africa, and to protect British subjects from intolerable insult and oppression." Of the future government of the Republics Mr. Chamberlain has only

Westminster Gazette.1

[Sept. 18.

Political Slimness: A Khaki Issue.

LORD S.: "Get under cover-don't expose yoursel.es!"

fficult to mournful to say that after a period of administration tion than backed by military force, "the length of which will National depend on the readiness with which the Boer popula-Ministry tion accept the British flag, the people of the two ock, and States will be received into the Empire on the he same footing of self-governing colonies," which is equivarata, says lent to saying that when the sky falls we shall be able present to pick up plenty of larks. After what has passed in fourteen; the last twelve months, the Boer population would averages he less than human if the present generation regarded from the the British flag with any feelings but those of detestarthly, to Therefore, in plain English, tion and abhorrence. ng blood. Mr. Chamberlain's programme amounts to a declaramberlain tion that the South African Republics will be ning that indefinitely governed by the sword-in the name electors of Liberty! establish Sir Henry Campbell - Bannerman's k in the Liberal Leaders ninution

y which

tained."

to his

of those ncertain

naintain

Africa,

olerable

ernment

s only

Liberal Leaders address was a somewhat lengthy document, but it said many things that are well worth saying. Like Mr. Morley, the Liberal leader regretfully reconciled himself to annexation. He said: "I can see no practical conclusion to the war we have been witnessing other than the absorption of the two belligerent States in the dominions of the Queen." If any measure of independence were conceded there would be no finality and no contentment. Of contentment we need not speak. There will be no contentment in Africa, so far as the Dutch are concerned, as long as they have no measure of independence; and as for finality, the Government does not propose anything, excepting the provisional administration of acquired territories by the sword. ar Henry Campbell-Bannerman goes on to dec' re that we must establish representative governm at as soon as possible, in order to extirpate an y feelings and suspicions. But he admits that for a considerable time to come military occupation by a large force will be necessary, and military rule must prevail. Mr. Morley's words are even more definite than Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's. He says: "War inevitably meant incorporation," to which Mr. Balfour replies with truth and justice that so far from annexation being irrevocable, it could easily be undone, and, what is more, if the war were as unjust as Mr. Morley contends, it is our plain duty to undo it at the earliest possible opportunity. Liberal leaders all along the line, however, have shirked facing the question on the broad principle of doing to others as you would have others do unto you. All the easy-going complacency with which the results of the war are accepted as unalterable would assume a very different aspect if we had been in the place of the Boers, and had been forcibly annexed by the French Republic and the German Empire on pleas as specious and as false as those which we are putting forward to justify this latest and most glaring act of international brigandage.

Photo by the]

[Stereoscopic Co.

In the absence of any clear issue The between the parties on the subject Reconstruct 'n of of the future of the South African the Army. Republics it may be thought that there would be something said of a definite nature on the question . Army Reform. Lord Salisbury admits without reserve the fact that the "war has disclosed imperfections in our own armour of defence," and he asserts that "it will be among the most urgent duties of the new Parliament to investigate and remove the defects of our military system in the light of scientific progress and the experience of other Powers." Mr. Balfour dismisses the question of Army organisation as one of the questions which must not be allowed to interfere with the broader issue raised as to the policy of the South African War. Mr. Chamberlain admits that "the war has disclosed faults in our military system which urgently call for review and reform"; but in what way these defects have to be met, or on what lines the Government would proceed in reforming the Army, is not said, for the very excellent reason that Ministers have not yet made up their minds. Mr. Wyndham has made a speech upon some details of Army administration, but there is not a hint to be found that a single member of the present Administration has realised the gravity of the problem with which they have to deal, and the impossibility of carrying on any further by merely tinkering up the old military system which they effectually destroyed when they sent the army to Africa.

Our Imperial Credit.

Our position can be very simply explained. The British Empire is like a great banking firm, which has branches in all parts of the world.

It has vast capital locked up in securities which are not immediately realisable, but for purposes of carrying on from day to day it has working capital immediately available in the shape of the British Army. Hitherto, more by good luck, it must be admitted, than by good management, it has contrived to meet its engagements in every part of the world. But last year there set in a run upon the bank in the South African branch, with the result that in order to avoid putting up the shutters we had practically to use the whole of our available working capital, and even then could only get through by undertaking permanent obligations which involve at the very least an increase of twenty-five per cent. on our liabilities. If a twopenny-halfpenny run on a small provincial branch of the Imperial bank could bring us within sight of the bottom of our resources, how can we dare to carry on, knowing that at any moment we may have to encounter demands as much greater than those which have confronted us in Africa, as a nation of 40,000,000 is greater than a rustic population of 250,000? There are clearly only two courses before us. Either we must draw in our horns, curtail our liabilities, and be exceedingly careful to avoid any panic which may cause a run on the bank; or, if we are going on as we have been going on in the past, we must immediately prepare to realise more of our locked-up capital and increase our available reserve. In other words, either we have got to abjure Chamberlainism and all its ways, and put down our foot upon all proposals for extending our possessions and multiplying our responsibilities, or we must, as the price of Chamberlainism, adopt Nothing but compulsory military conscription. service will suffice to create an adequate working capital to carry on the business on the present lines. All this is as plain as a pikestaff, and ought to be forced upon the attention of the man in the street; but there is very little sign of any determined action in this direction on the part of the leaders of either political party. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in his address comes nearer sounding the true note than any one else, for besides putting down his foot strongly upon the principle of unlimited expansion and aggression, he resolutely admits that "our existing military forces are certainly not equal to the duties which we have now to discharge, and therefore the increase of our military powers and the reform of the Army are demanded." But at the same time he avows himself in favour of free service, and declares himself "irreconcileably opposed to any alteration in our military system which would tend to make the British Empire a military empire rather than an empire of commerce and peace."

The Danger of Foreign Competition. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman also speaks with no uncertain sound upon another question of even graver moment which underlies the whole fabric of our Imperial greatness. That is the growing difficulty of holding our own in the markets of the world in face of the competition of better educated neighbours. He well says: "While we have been seeking fresh markets with the sword, we have been losing other and more profitable markets by our arrogant supineness and by our indifference to education. Our neighbours and rivals have forged ahead of us, and have ousted us from lucrative

ma

the

edu

gre

Bar

pet

we put esta

If .

is r Ev

He

que

ign

of

me

wo

We

of.

kn

R

me

the

exe

bu

his

Sec

Mi

int

Ev

as

Pre

un

Ad

Mi

Sa tin

th

sai

ch

the str

the

al bank of our ving that demands onted us er than a arly only w in our gly careon the n going pare to increase ther we ts ways, ibilities. , adopt military working present aff, and he man of any extend-of the mpbellling the g down limited its that t equal ge, and nd the e same ce, and to any d tend rather in also d upon graver whole s the arkets better le we rd, we arkets

rence orged rative markets because they give their sons" (query-why not their daughters also?) "a systematic and intelligent education from boyhood to manhood." Hence the greatest friend of the Empire, in Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's opinion, is not the man who is perpetually pegging out fresh claims to territories which we have neither the means to defend nor the resources to develop, but the man whoputting aside our little jealousies as to this or that class of schools, brushing away sectarian cobwebs, would establish and extend our educational system for all classes on a national, comprehensive, democratic basis. If we are to hold our own, this must be done, and there is no time to be lost.

Every word of this is as true as gospel, but Sir Henry is as a voice crying in the wilderness, and a question vital to the very existence of our nation is ignored in the midst of passionate outcries in favour of the sublime and imposing ideal of the establishment of a military despotism over 250,000 men, women and children in the heart of South Africa. Well has it been said that a fool's eyes are at the ends of the earth, and the people now, as in old time, know not what pertaineth to their good.

So far there is no hint from any Will quarter that a reconstruction of the the Cabinet Cabinet is to be undertaken. Mr. Reconstructed? Goschen is retiring both from Parliament and from the Admiralty. This will necessitate the appointment of a new First Lord; but with that exception the "old gang" are going on. Lord Salisbury has shown not the least intention of abandoning his dual functions as Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, and he will regard the return of a Ministerial majority as a proof that the country intends him to go on in the way he has been doing. Everything seems to show that Lord Salisbury is as indifferent as Mr. Balfour to the comments of the Press, and is not in the least disposed to abandon the unique position which he occupies in the British Administration. Mr. Chamberlain may be Prime Minister some day, but if he has to wait for Lord Salisbury's abdication he will have to wait a long time.

The polls, which opened on October 1st, would seem to indicate that the How will the Election go? position of parties in the new House of Commons will be very much the same as it was in the old. In London and in Manchester, while the Government have gained no seats, their supporters have polled with much greater strength than they did in 1895. But elsewhere, as the Daily Mail ruefully expresses it, "there is no indication of a khaki boom." It would be absurd to generalise from the results of the first two days' pollings as to the general result; but everything seems to point to the return of an impenitent majority which may be relied upon to exhibit the same defects and vices with which we have been so familiar for the last five years. Mr. Leonard Courtney will not be a member of the new House, nor is there any one to take his place. Mr. Winston Churchill is the most conspicuous new member, and although his election for Oldham was held as a great Conservative victory, he will probably be a much more dangerous thorn in the side of the Administration than the Liberal whom he defeated. In like manner Mr. Henry Norman, who has been elected for West Wolverhampton, although nominally a Liberal, will probably be a much more dangerous element in Parliament in the direction of pressing for a warlike policy in the Far East than the Conservative whose seat he won. Note that while Mr. Burns and Mr. Labouchere have both been returned, Mr. Havelock Wilson, the only Labour candidate who approved of the war, has been rejected for Middlesborough, his enormous majority having entirely disappeared. The Independent Labour candidates are responsible for the loss of Liberal seats in Rochdale and in Leicester, and I am delighted to see that Mr. Keir Hardie has been returned for Merthyr. That is one "stop-the-war" member safely elected at any rate.

The Presidential Election.

The absorbing interest of our own General Election renders it difficult for the ordinary reader to bestow much attention upon the contest which is raging on the other side of the Atlantic. It is therefore a satisfaction to me that I am able to quote from the American Reviews of Reviews of October, Dr. Shaw's careful summary of the progress of the fight between President McKinley and Mr. Dr. Shaw abstains from speculating as to the result of the voting, but he quotes the forecast published by the Republican National Committee, from which it would appear that McKinley's election was a foregone conclusion. The Republicans claim that, with the exception of the four Western States-Colorado, Idaho, Montana and Utah-Mr. Bryan can only carry the Southern States. Six States-Delaware, Maine, Maryland, Nebraska, West Virginia and Indiana-are regarded as doubtful, but all the others, including New York and Wisconsin, certain to go for Mr. McKinley. The Democrats warmly deny the claim of the Republicans to New York and Wisconsin.

If we add these two States to those that are doubtful, the result figures out as follows:—

The electoral College consists of 447 members. The candidate who obtains 224 will become President of the United States. McKinley, therefore, admittedly stands within 23 votes of re-election. Opinions differ as to how New York will go, but it is evident on those figures that the decision of New York will settle the business.

McKinley and Bryan on Trusts.

President McKinley issued his party manifesto on September 10th, and before the middle of October millions of copies of it will have been distributed throughout the States. After the usual complacent survey of the excellent results which have followed a Republican administration in improving the national credit, Mr. McKinley insists upon the importance of a merchant marine for America. At present 91 per cent. of American trade is carried in foreign ships. He predicts that next session will make provision for the sure accomplishment of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. The following is what Mr. McKinley has to say on the subject:—

"Honest co-operation of capital is necessary to meet new business conditions and extend our rapidly increasing foreign trade; but conspiracies and combinations, intended to restrict business, create monopolies, and control prices, should be effectively restrained." He points to publicity as a helpful influence, and suggests uniformity of legislation in the several States. "Combinations of capital which control the market in commodities necessary to the general use of the people, by suppressing natural and ordinary competition, thus enhancing prices to the general consumer," he considers "obnoxious to the common law and the public welfare"; calls them "dangerous conspiracies," and says they "ought to be subject to prohibitory or penal legislation."

It is interesting to compare this with what Mr. Bryan has to say upon the same subject:—

Our platform, after suggesting certain specific remedies, pledges the party to an unceasing warfare against private monopoly in nation, State and city. I heartily approve of this promise; if elected, it shall be my earnest and constant endeavour to fulfil the promise in letter and spirit. I shall select an Attorney-General who will, without fear or favour, enforce existing laws; I shall recommend such additional legislation as may be necessary to dissolve every private monopoly which does business outside of the State of its origin; and if, contrary to my belief and hope, a Constitutional amendment is found to be necessary, I shall recommend such an amendment as will, without impairing any of the existing rights of the States, empower Congress to protect the people of all the States from injury at the hands of individuals or corporations engaged in inter-State commerce.

The Future of Cuba.

Mr. McKinley claims that America has done excellent work in Cuba; her garrisons have been reduced from 43,000 to less than 6,000 soldiers, and a constitutional convention is to meet on the first Monday in November to frame a constitution upon which an independent government for the island will rest. "All this is a long step to the fulfilment of our sacred guarantees to the people of Cuba." The question of the future of Cuba appears to be pretty warmly discussed in the United States. Mr. Olney, President Cleveland's former Secretary of State, has rallied to the side of Mr. Bryan, chiefly on the ground of his opposition to the Philippine annexation, but in the declaration which he has published in support of Mr. Bryan's candidature he declares that "Cuba is the key to the Gulf of Mexico, and absolutely essential to our defence against foreign attack." Mr. Beveridge, of Indiana, goes a step further, and declares that "the United States needs Cuba for our protection, but Cuba needs the United States for Cuba's salvation." Dr. Shaw contests the assumption of Mr. Beveridge that Cuba is really to be given her independence in the fullest and most unqualified sense. "Mr. McKinley," he says, "was in no way responsible for the absurd and mischievous pledge made by Congress to the effect that we were not going to annex Cuba." Dr. Shaw's method of evading the fulfilment of that pledge is to give Cuba five years more of its present régime, "after which it ought to have perhaps ten years of territorial government like that of Oklahoma, New Mexico; and then it ought to be admitted as a sovereign state into the Union." This may be best for Cuba, but it would be somewhat difficult to reconcile it with the pledge to give Cuba the independence which even Senator Lodge thinks ought to be scrupulously fulfilled. Note that the American garrison of Porto Rico has been reduced.

The Philippines.

The question of the Philippines naturally occupies a leading place in President McKinley's manifesto. He declares "it is our purpose to establish in the Philippines a Government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants, and to prepare them for self-government and to give them self-government when they are ready for it, and as rapidly as they are ready for it." He maintains that the opposition of the Democrats to his policy is encouraging the hopes of the insurgents, and so protracting the war. "But for these false hopes," he says, "a considerable reduction could have been made which to so amb most the between Bryan these an i in or

tion

hand solid

esta Egy eve doc gov

by f

are

oth wit stic and to neg of be quilet Ch

pu the pu ca to mi

he or ha

Every

in our occupation of the Philippines, and the realisa-America. tion of a stable government would already be at Cuba: hand." This may be so, but it was something more reduced solid than the visionary hopes of a Democratic success 1 6,000 which enabled the Filipinos at the close of last month to meet to surprise a detachment of American troops in a constiambush, and inflict upon American arms one of the nent for most serious reverses that they have experienced in p to the the course of the present war. The issue, however, eople of between the annexationists and non-annexationists appears can hardly be said to be clearly joined, seeing that Mr. States. Bryan has committed himself to the doctrine that the etary of Americans must establish a stable government in iefly on these islands as a preliminary to their conversion into ilippine an independent Republic. Governments established he has by foreign armies are never stable when those armies idature are withdrawn. It is easy to understand Mr. Bryan's e Gulf dilemma, but if he had had the vast and varied ur deexperience which John Bull has had in attempting to lge, of establish stable governments in various countries, t "the Egypt included, he would have thought twice and n, but even thrice before he had committed himself to the ation." doctrine that Americans have to establish a stable eridge government before retiring from the Philippines. nce in cKin-

or the

ess to Cuba."

f that resent

s ten ioma,

l as a best econ-

lence

rupu-

on of oines

e in

He

stab-

the

to hem las that y is

SO he

ade

The situation in China continues very much in statu quo. The Chinese Puzzle. week has brought forth a fresh crop of stories as to what this, that or the other Power was going to do, but September closed with the announcement that the Russians intended to stick to their declared policy of evacuating Peking, and withdrawing both their legation and their garrison to Tientsin. Germany has taken the lead in the negotiations, but so far they have led to no result. The German Emperor proposes that the punishment of the criminals responsible for the massacre should be preliminary to any settlement of the Chinese question; and to-day the papers contain a curious letter addressed by the Kaiser to the Emperor of China, in which he maintains more emphatically than ever that those responsible for the massacres must be punished. The Empress and Prince Tuan remain in the interior; nor are these demands for condign punishment of all responsible for recent massacres calculated to lure them back to Peking. tolerably plain that, although the Dowager Empress may have vacillated from time to time in her support of the Boxers, the Boxer movement had her hearty sympathy, and that she would have been only too well pleased if all the foreigners in China had had but one neck between them, and she could have severed it at a blow. Prince Tuan is even more directly responsible for the massacres which the German Emperor declares must be expiated by the punishment of their authors. In other words, while the German Emperor with one hand extends an invitation to the Dowager Empress and Prince Tuan to return to Peking, with the other he tells them that the first thing they have got to do is to permit him to cut off their heads, "Ducky, ducky, come and be killed!" is not an invitation which either in the poultry-yard or in the Chinese Empire is likely to meet with a cordial response.

What Should

It is much to be deplored that in the General Election neither party appears Policy in China? to have any definite idea as to the true policy to be pursued in China.

Lord Salisbury has not yet replied to the German Emperor's Circular, and Lord Rosebery makes no allusion whatever to what ought to be done in China. Yet compared with the importance of deciding what course we should adopt in China, the South African problem is a mere affair of the parish pump. The Russians have officially contradicted the story that they have annexed Manchuria, yet there seems to be too much reason to believe that the punishment of the Chinese for the attack upon Russian territory has been carried out with a severity and a brutality against which there would have been stronger protests in this country if our hands had not been reeking with innocent blood unjustly shed in the Dutch Republics. One secret both of the strength and the weakness of Russia as a civilising Power in Asia is that she is much more Asiatic than European, and General Gribsky's proclamation that any shot fired against a Russian soldier would be followed by the immediate extermination of the entire population of the village from which the shot was fired, is even more barbarous than the order said to be issued by Lord Roberts that every Dutch homestead in the. Transvaal within a radius of ten miles should be reduced to ashes whenever any attack was made upon railway communications. Two blacks do not make one white, and there is not a word to be said in justification of a policy of massacre even in the Far East; but as for protesting against it in the name of humanity, that must be left to nations with a cleaner record than that of which we can boast.

Maintain

Whatever may be thought concerning our true policy in China, one thing is clear, and that is that if we are going to insist upon executing justice upon the guilty, we must remember that it involves-

Count Lamsdorff.

(New Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs.)

Dr. Mumm von Schwarzenheim.
(New German Minister to China.)

capi ever to as a co adoj case Of o has

Th

Lor sign ver day of

ing

Bo

and

SO1

Fr

thi

su

is

to-

in

if ar

bu

rnotograph by] [Elliott and

Sir Francis Plunkett.
(Recently appointed British Ambassador to Austria from Belgium.)

first, making war upon the de facto Chinese Government, and secondly, the assumption of the responsibility for governing the Chinese Empire. We are neither morally nor materially equal to the task. The only result of attempting to undertake it would be to render inevitable that partition of some of the Chinese provinces which will sooner or later bring about a general war. It is very grievous to have to admit that murderers should escape unwhipped of justice. But Europe decided a few years since that even the punishment of wholesale massacre should not be attempted if it entailed an imminent risk of a European war. To have punished Abdul Hamid would have been child's play compared with the task of avenging the massacre of missionaries and the German Ambassador in China. Our policy in China, as elsewhere in Asia, is to work together with Russia. Her interests are mainly political; ours are exclusively commercial. There ought to be no difficulty in arriving at an understanding with the Tsar for adopting a common Chinese policy, which would have as its chief aim the maintenance of the status quo and the avoidance of any action calculated to replace the Chinese Government by a European Administration.

McKinley's Policy In China.

Speaking of the policy of the United States in China, Dr. Shaw, in the American Review of Reviews, says:—

The programme of the United States has been clear from the beginning. Until the foreigners were rescued, we could not treat with the Chinese Government; but after their rescue,—no state of war existing between the people and Government of the United States and those of China,—it remained to plan for the withdrawal of our troops as soon as prudence and common sense might justify such a step, and then to negotiate with the Imperial Government of China for a reasonable indemnity and guarantees of future good behaviour. Our Government was ready enough, therefore, when a month ago Russia proposed the withdrawal of troops from Pekin, to express approval of that plan, provided it could be generally agreed to.

It is a notorious fact that the European Powers have been greedily planning to seize and cut up China at the very first opportunity. The thing that is necessary is to encourage and to require the firm establishment in authority of a liberal Chinese imperial government, such as the young Emperor himself could successfully carry on if the Dowager Empress and a dozen of her malign advisers could be deported for life.

England in a languid way prefers that China should not be partitioned; these things should not happen; but England meanwhile is making all her plans to console herself by seizing, as she has always done in the past, a good deal more than anybody else, if the game of grab once fairly sets in. France, also, is definitely prepared to advance from her existing bases. If China had been wise enough to maintain a liberal government for a considerable length of time, the country would have made such progress that it could have relied upon its own army to protect it efficiently against these unscrupulous European foes. It will be the duty of the United States to speak with the utmost plainness in condemnation of the European policy of Chinese spoliation, but it will not be possible for us to fight about it; and the only thing that can save China will be the Chinese themselves. If they show a readiness to permit the Europeans to partition and annex their country, the thing will inevitably come to pass.

There are intelligent Chinese Ministers in the principal capitals of the world. These ought to secure from whatever imperial authority may exist in China the permission to ask that the whole perplexing situation be submitted to a court of inquiry of the kind provided for in the treaty adopted at the Hague. And the United States, in any case, could hardly err in earnestly promoting that view. Of course, there can be no military withdrawal until order has been restored in China and a government capable of maintaining authority is in undisturbed control of the situation.

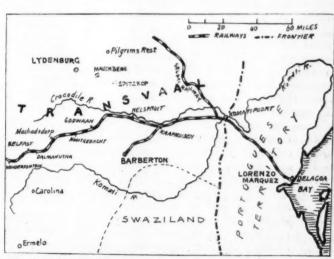

In South Africa the resistance of The War goes on the Boers collapsed more rapidly in the than was anticipated, and the de-Transvaal. parture of President Kruger to Lorenzo Marques has been generally accepted as a signal that the war was at an end. This is, however, very far from being the case. Although nearly every day brought a fresh bulletin of the victorious capture of the flocks and herds of the Boers, Lord Roberts has been unable to prevent them from destroying or removing the whole of their artillery. Generals De Wet and Botha, by far the ablest Boer generals, are still at large, and apparently can command the devoted allegiance of some 10,000 desperate men. The Transvaal, like the Free State, has been annexed by proclamation, but throughout the whole of the territory which we are supposed to have conquered the area of our authority is strictly terminated by the range of our guns. Even to-day brings news of the capture of a British convoy in the colony of Natal, and we shall indeed be lucky if before Christmas we are able to report the cessation of active hostilities at the seat of war. The C.I.V.s are being sent home, and some 35,000 militiamen, but we shall probably find that on New Year's Day it is necessary to maintain an army of 100,000 men in South Africa.

The Hospital Commission. The Commission sent to South Africa to report concerning the condition of the hospitals is pursuing its investigations on the spot. As might be expected, the evidence is very conflicting, and the men responsible and all those who are under their orders are doing their best to make out that everything was done that could be done for the sake of the sick and wounded soldiers. By way of diverting attention from the scandalous mismanagement of our own hospitals, a report has been published severely condemning the treatment of the sick British prisoners in the hands of the Boers. It would seem from the report that one Dr. Veale, who happens to be an Englishman and a graduate of Cambridge University, was chiefly responsible for the neglect complained of. The remembrance of the miserable breakdown which attended our own attempts to look after our own men should lead us to moderate the censure which we pronounce upon the little rustic commonwealth which was suddenly exposed to the strain and stress of foreign invasion. Mr. Hales, the admirable war correspondent of the Daily News, has drawn a terrible picture of the incompetence—and worse-of our own medical authorities, who appear to have neglected the most elementary provisions for securing the health of our own men. Mr. Hales maintains that at least half of those who have died in our camps would be living to-day if those in authority had taken ordinary care to provide for sanitation. Nothing can get over the salient and terrible fact that the percentage of deaths from disease in the British Army in South Africa is three times as high as the death-rate which prevailed in the German army when campaigning in the dead of winter in France in 1870-71. The Germans put 900,000 men into the field, and the total number of deaths from disease in the course of the whole campaign was only 11,000 men. We put 200,000 men into the field, and we have to lament 6,000 deaths, and this, too, in the healthiest climate in the world, and at a time when the undivided resources of the Empire were available for providing for the health and comfort of our troops.

The scene of hostilities during September.

nd Fry.

to Austria

it ; but een the d those awal of sense ith the emnity

overn-

h ago

Pekin.

ald be have

at the

is to nt in such ry on align nould

; but isole

st, a grab ared

een

con-

ade

my ous

ites

of

ing

ar-

oly

It is a pleasure to turn from the The contemplation of these fields of Ratification bloodshed and rapine to the Hague, of the Hague Convention. where on September 4th all the Powers represented at the Peace Conference, with the exception of China, duly deposited the formal ratification of the Conventions at the Foreign Office of the Dutch Government. Nations that are in a quarrelsome mood will no longer have the excuse for pleading that the Hague Convention has not been yet ratified. The work of constituting the permanent bureau at the Hague ought to be at once taken in hand; and each State will be requested to nominate those persons whom it deems most worthy of inscription on the international roll of arbitrators. President Cleveland is said to have declined the nomination offered to him, but ex-President Harrison, it is expected, will accept. Nothing has been done in England to nominate arbitrators. The post of Lord Chief Justice has not yet been filled up, nor has any indication been given as to those whom the Government will deem worthy of the post of British arbitrators on the international roster.

Two Conferences of a very different The Socialists nature were held in Paris last month. and Internationalism, the International Socialist Conference, and the Conference of Peace. Both Conferences were composed of men who are passionately opposed to militarism and to war, but while the Socialists condemned the Hague Conference root and branch, apparently because it was held on the initiative of the Tsar, the Peace Conference regards it as the great charter of future peace. Although the Socialist Conference was distracted by the bitter feud which rages between the two sections of the French Socialists—the uncompromising and intolerant section which follows Guesde, and the more practically minded section which followed Jaurès-it nevertheless showed astonishing energy and enthusi-The whole drift of the Conference was in the direction of internationalism. They appointed a committee, consisting of two delegates from each nation, to combat militarism, and at the same time decided to form an international committee of direction to sit at Brussels, on which Mr. Hyndman and Mr. Quelch are the English representatives, for the purpose of arranging simultaneous action throughout the world in favour of their own ideals. There is also to be an Inter-Parliamentary Socialist Conference, meeting every year for the purpose of joint action by all the Socialist groups in the various Parliaments of the world. The temper of the Socialists was that of uncompromising opposition to the vote of a sou or the despatch of a man for the war in China. It is probable that the International Socialist Conference will be a more effective instrument for international action than the Inter-Parliamentary Conference, which failed so lamentably in Paris this year to deal with any of the practical questions of the day.

The Conference of Peace Societies

The has at least succeeded in avoiding Peace Congress and the pitfall into which the Inter-Parthe War. liamentary Conference fell. latter shrank from formulating any explicit condemnation of the conduct of the British Government in appealing to the sword when the way of arbitration was open, because of the objection taken by the British Delegates, who feared to repeat before the foreigner the condemnation which they had so frequently expressed in their own country. British Delegation at the Peace Conference was hampered by no such scruples. Instead of vetoing a vote of censure, the British Delegation took the initiative in that direction, and when the Congress met it was confronted with the unanimous demand of the British group that they should launch an anathema against the British Government for its violation of the principle of seeking peace by arbitration. The original resolution of the British Delegation was debated for two days in committee and in the full Congress, but finally it was passed in the following terms. After emphatically affirming the unchangeable principles of international justice, the resolution read:-

(1) The responsibility for the war now devastating South Africa falls upon the one of the two parties which repeatedly refused arbitration-that is, upon the British Government.

(2) The British Government, in ignoring the principles of right and justice which have been the glory of the great British nation-that is to say, in refusing arbitration and in using menaces only too likely to bring about war in a dispute which might have been settled by juridical methods-has committed an outrage against the rights of nations calculated to retard the pacific evolution of

The Congress also passed a special resolution expressing their admiration for the courage of the British delegates in thus boldly arraigning the policy of their own Government, and further decided upon drawing up an address to the British people, appealing to them to return to the paths of justice and arbitration.

I am glad to be able to report that the formation of the new Inter-The New International. national Union, which has become a necessity of civilisation, proceeds apace. The Peace Societies have their own work,

XUM

h b whic it is that ever

the !

men to I ques

righ

The

who

Inte

of n

and for first exp

me

que

thi

int

Pr

of litt up his ve

by wl

pla

of

E

w

T

tin

th

P

a sou or hina. It ist Confor inter-Confers year to e day. Societies avoiding nter-Par-The cit conernment bitration by the fore the had so The ce was vetoing ook the tion of . The on was the full lowing geable ead:— stating which British eciples of the tration

ess met

of the

athema rights ion of lution

f the policy upon aling
and ut war

ridical

that intercome eeds vork,

which they will continue to do in their own way, but it is in the promotion and defence of internationalism that the chief hope of the future lies. There are in every country which it is hoped to bring into line the so-called intellectuals—the educated and reflecting men and women, who are capable of rising superior to national prejudices, and of judging international questions from the point of view of justice and right-who form the first of these three groups. The second are the Socialists, and the third are those who are already organised in Peace Societies. The International Union will seek to secure the formation of national groups of internationalists in each country, and each group will be asked to elect representatives for an International Council which will undertakefirst, the propaganda in favour of popularising and explaining the arrangements sanctioned by the Hague for the settlement of international disputes by mediation and arbitration; secondly, the study of questions which endanger the general peace; and, thirdly, the promotion of united action in favour of internationalism in every country.

President Loubet of the last month was the immense success of the mayoral banquet given by President Loubet to the mayors of France. It is the fashion in some quarters to belittle President Loubet and his Ministry, but it would be difficult for any one to suggest any improvement upon the tact and good feeling which the President and his Ministers have displayed during the whole of this year. They have been, of course, much disappointed by the non-arrival in Paris of the Tsar of Russia, upon whose visit they had counted. But they have displayed no more chagrin than they did over the absence of the Prince of Wales, whose failure to visit the Exhibition was one of those inexplicable bêtises of which our Royal personages are sometimes guilty. The skill with which the President took advantage of the attempt to create a hostile demonstration against the Administration by the Nationalists who control the Paris Municipality was consummate. The Nationalists had decided to invite the mayors of France to a banquet in Paris, hoping thereby to effect a hostile demonstration against the present rulers of the Republic. Only 1,300 mayors accepted this, and the banquet was abandoned. President Loubet then stepped in, and invited the mayors to a banquet in the gardens of the Tuileries, at which no fewer than 22,000 mayors sat down to dinner. 13,000 were absent from one cause or another, but the national character of the demonstration was complete. President Loubet made an admirable speech to those chosen representatives of the communes and municipalities of France, whose presence as his guests afforded a most imposing object-lesson as to the solid hold which the Republic has upon the French nation. The banquet itself was one of the largest affairs of its kind. As many as 4,866 persons were employed in cooking and serving it, and although no fewer than 150,000 plates were required for the service of the guests, the whole affair passed off without a hitch.

The Advent of the election the imagination of the Yerkes.

Even in the midst of the turmoil of the election the imagination of Londoners has been somewhat touched by the sudden advent of

Mr. Yerkes, of Chicago notoriety, in their midst. Some years ago parliamentary powers were obtained for making an underground railway from Charing Cross to Hampstead, but nothing has been done to Suddenly Mr. Yerkes, whose construct the line. methods of dealing with his tramways have made his name anything but odorous in America, appeared upon the scene, obtained possession of the right to make the line, and announced that the work is to be put in hand forthwith. As I set forth some months ago, the Americans have offered to supply London with a complete system of pneumatic tubes for the delivery of letters and parcels, but the prospect of having Mr. Yerkes established in our midst as the owner of a great underground railway is not very welcome. No one can deny the ability of Mr. Yerkes. He is the foremost representative of a school which acts upon the principle that when financial corporations want to attain their end, the cheapest and directest way is to buy up all the votes they need. He may not try Chicago methods on the local authorities of London, but should he refrain from doing so, the last cause to which that could be attributed would be any scruples of his.

The Bible in Australian Schools. the reaction against the extreme secular policy hitherto pursued in Victorian schools appears to be achieving success:—

In Victoria the heads of the Churches under the authority of a Royal Commission, have been preparing a series of Scripture lessons for school use. The Roman Catholic Church stood aloof. The heads of the other denominations in Victoria, however, have agreed upon what seems to be an admirable course of Scripture lessons, thus disappointing many evil prophecies. For it was confidently predicted that they would fall out violently with each other in the process! A plebiscite on the scheme of lessons will be taken at the approaching general election in Victoria, and it can hardly be doubted that, by a large majority, the electors will vote in favour of giving the Bible a place in their public schools.

DIARY FOR SEPTEMBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

Sept. r. The German American Cable to New York, via Azores, begins its service. 3. The Trades Union Congress opens at Huddersfield.

The Sultan's Jubiles.

The British and German Governments accept the Award for Compensation on the deten-tion of German vessels on their way to Lorenzo Marques

The Acts ratifying the treaties signed at the Peace Conference are formally placed in the Foreign Office archives at The Hague. The Association of the British Chamber of Commerce meets in Paris.

Ex-President Harrison accepts Membership on the International Board of Arbitration.

The British Association meets at Bradford.
The Duke of Abruzzi's Expedition returns from the Arctic regions.
7. The dissolution of the Austrian Reichsrath is announced by an Imperial rescript.

9. The Congress of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris urges the British Government to adopt the metric system in all Government departments.

President McKinley formally accepts his nomination as Republican candidate for the nation as Presidency.

great hurricane rages along the coasts of Texas and Louisiana, a sea wave almost sweeps away the town of Galveston, with the loss of about four thousand lives.

the loss of about four thousand trees.

10. Vesuvius i in violant eruption.

11. A bakers' strike takes place at Marseilles, while a hundred carters strike at Nimes.

The plague increases in India, over 1,000 deaths occur during the week.

12. The United Mine-Workers of America declare a strike in the anthracite region.

The Swedish Prime Minister, M. Bostrom, signs, and Admiral von Otter is appointed resigns, and his successor.

his successor.

13. The German Government raises a loan of £4,000,000 in American stock, by arrangement with the German Imperial Bank.

14. President Loubst gives his decision as arbitrator on the frontier dispute between Colombia and Costa Rica, which will be published when communicated to the two Governments concerned.

The Commission appointed commences work

The Commission appointed, commences work on the demarcation of the boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana.

15. A Mass Meeting of the employes of the Great Eastern Railway Company declares the concessions of the company to be totally inadequate, and places the matter entirely in the hands of the executive committee of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Ser-vants to obtain better conditions of service.

17. The great miners' strike in Pennsylvania,

America, begins.

President Loubet signs a decree submitted by
M. Millerand for the creation of "Labour Councils" in France.

The German Social Democratic Congress opens at Mayence.

18. The Royal Proclamation dissolving Parliament on the 25th inst. is published in the London Gazette.

Gazette.

The London Gazette also publishes the Royal Proclamation announcing that on and after January 1st, 1901, the Australian Colonies and Tasmania shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The Session of the States - General of the Netherlands is opened by the Queen at The Hague.

Hague.

Mr. Bryan's letter accepting the Democratic Programme adopted at the Kansas City Convention is published.

The German Socialist Congress unanimously pass a resolution against the "World policy of Germanu" of Germany.

1). A number of factories in Barcelona close 30. owing to the industrial crisis there.

1). The number of miners on strike in America is pended.
The French Army manœuvres terminate.

The strike of dockers at Calais ends.

Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain issue their election addresses.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman and Sir William Harcourt issue their election addresses. The "French Labour Party's" Congress opens in Paris.

in Paris.

The Council of State in Paris decides to reinstate Colonel Picquart in the Army.

Unprecedented rain and floods at Calcutta.

A great fête takes place in the Tuileries Garden, in Paris, when 22,000 provincial mayors are the guests of President Loubet.

The International Socialist Congress opens in Paris.

M. Jure's is elected President.

Lord Salisbury issues his address to the electors of the United Kingdom.

Lord Rosebery in a letter to Captain Lambton

Lord Rosebery in a letter to Captain Lambton expresses his views on the political situation.

The late Prince Albert of Saxony.

Mr. Goschen issues a farewell address to his constituents, the electors of St. George's, Hanover Square.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer issues his lection address to the electors of West

Mr. Morley issues his election address to the electors of the Montrose Burghs.

The Members of the International Railway Congress at Paris, who number about 1,000, are presented to M. Loubet. The Church Congress opens at Newcastle-on-

Writs to summon a New House of Commons sent out.

The Socialist Congress in Paris closes.
The New Zealand Parliament resolves to annex the islands of the Harvey and the Penrhyn groups.
Lord Roberts is gaz:ttd Commander-in-Chief in succession to Viscount Wolseley.

Mr. Chamberlain and fifty-nine Unionist members, fi e Liberals, and two Irish Nationalists, sixty-six in all, are returned usopposed.

The International Peace Congress of the Paris in Main Congress of the Paris in the Holland.

Lord Methuen captures a Boer convoy, with a 15-pounder gun lost at Colenso, cattle, sheep, and ammunition.

In the Dutch Chamber the Foreign Minister is questioned by Mr. F. van de Puttute upon its policy in connection with the Transvaal in the Cape Parliament by 46 votes to 37.

The British captures a Boer convoy, with a 15-pounder gun lost at Colenso, cattle, sheep, and ammunition.

In the Dutch Chamber the Foreign Minister is questioned by Mr. F. van de Puttute upon its policy in connection with the Transvaal in the Cape Parliament by 46 votes to 37.

The British captures a Boer convoy, with a 15-pounder gun lost at Colenso, cattle, sheep, and ammunition.

In the Dutch Chamber the Foreign Minister is questioned by Mr. F. van de Puttute upon its policy in connection with the Transvaal the Cape Parliament by 46 votes to 37.

The British capture a Boer convoy, with a 15-pounder gun lost at Colenso, cattle, sheep, and ammunition.

In the Dutch Chamber the Foreign Minister is questioned by Mr. F. van de Puttute upon its policy in connection with the Transvaal the putter of the Puttute upon its policy in connection with the Transvaal the putter of he International Peace Congress opens in Paris; M. Millerand welcomes the delegates.

M

28. T

Sept.

he number of miners on strike in America is 126,000; hundreds of railway men are idle in consequence of the coal service being suspended.

he French Army manœuvres terminate.
he strike of dockers at Calais ends.

The Belfoure and Mr. Chamberlain issue their Ladybrand garrison is surrounded by a force of Presidents Kruger and Steyn are at Nelspruit. General Buller meets with a check outside Lydenburg.

Botha, with 2,000 Boers, holds a very strong position among the mountains. Lord Roberts sends a column forward under General lan Hami ton.

The British have 60 casualties between Zeerast and Krugersdorp.

The Boers leave the vicinity of Ladybrand after capturing stores and a troop of horses.
The Hospital Commission takes evidence at Bloemfontein.

Lord Roberts issues another proclamation to the people of Orange River Colony.

The Boers attack the trains in the neighbourhood of Belfast and Krugersdorp; after an engagement with them by General Hart four Boers are found dead; one is supposed to be General Theron, who has led most of

to be described the roll of the attacks on the railway line.

10. Sir Redvers Buller follows up General Botha in the direction of Spitzkop; the British lose thirteen killed and nineteen wounded.

thirteen Killed and hineteen wound.d.
The Boers capture a train south of Klip River.
The Caps Town Chamber of Commerce passes a resolution against the introduction of Chiness labourers into Rhodesia.
President Kruger, Mr. Marais and Mr. Grobled arrive at Lorenzo Marques.

arrive at Lorenzo Marques.

Lord Roberts issues a proclamation to the Boers asking them to surrender.

General Buller reports himself and his treopas being at Spitzkop, where they find considerable Boer supplies.

Mr. Kruger takes up his residence with the District Governor of Portuguese East

Africa.

The Treason Bill passes through Committee. but on the clauses standing over the Ministry

14. Boer proclamation dated Komati Poort give-President Kruger leave of absence for six months to visit Europe. Schalk Burger appointed acting President in his absence.

16. President Kruger proclaims Lord Roberts' proclamation null and void, and says the Republics are unconquered. President Steyn remains in the Transvaal.

The Boer peace delegates at the Hague appeal for intervention against Lord Roberts's proclamation.

The Boers destroy the Krokodelpoort Bridge on the Preto.ia-Lorenzo railway. The British at Schwerzer Reneke are surrounded by Boar forces sittings. Nelsp:uit is occupied.

 Mr. Schreiner's Malmesbury constituents pass a resolution condemning him for deserting the Afrikander Party at a critical moment. The Lands Settlement Committee begins its sittings. Nelspruit is occupied.

President Kruger accepts the offer of the Netherlands Government of a warship to guess, having previously destroyed all their cannon. The British occupy Komati Poort. Mr. Schreiner moves in the Cape Parliament that the late Republics be placed under the protection of the Queen with a guarantse

Ca. amation annex.

on Sprigg reads f Assembly en-nation. etoria for Cape d by a force of at Nelsprait. heck outside

Lord Roberts General Ian ween Zeerust f Ladybrand

p of horses, evidence at clamation to ony. e neighbourrp; after an eneral Hart is supposed neral Botha British lose Klip River. ierce passes oduction of Mr. Grobler ion to the his treop they find lence with guese East Committee. e Ministry oort give ce for six k Burger bsence. Roberts' says the President ue appeal Roberts's rt Bridge he British inded by ents pass deserting moment.

of the rship to cattle.

inister is upon its aal. rried in 7. lear the Portui Poort. der th: arant ---

A stroif, mounted force leaves Pretoria in pursuit of De Wet.

25. Supplies of food are forwarded from Lorenzo Marques to British troops.

Mr. Sauer, in the Cape Parliament, makes a strong speech in favour of the independence of the Boer Republics.

Guns which have been destroyed are found in the Crocodile River by General Ian Hamilton.

27. The Legislative Council at Cape Town pass the second reading of the Treason Bill by 13 votes to 7.

13 votes to 7.

The Treason Bill is read a third time in the Cape Legislative Council.

The Crisis in China.

Sept. 1. The Russian Government declares its decision that its troops, along with M. de Giers and all Russian subjects, withdraw from Peking to Tientsin with as little delay s possible Sir Robert Hart resumes the charge of the

Chinese Customs

Chinese Customs,
Admiral Courriolles orders the French gunboat Surprise to ascend the Yang-tse-kiang.
Li Hung Chang, Yung Lu, Prince Ching, and Hsu-Tung are appointed peace commissionars by an Imperial Edict dated from Tai-Yuen-du.

A German battalion lands at Shanghai.

The Danish cable from Shanghai to Taku reopens.

7. The cable between Chifu and Port Arthur opens for the transmission of messages.

The Japanese arrest the assassin of Baron

The Japanese arrest the assassin of Baron von Ketteler.

9. General Chaffee is ordered by his Government to prepare for the withdrawal of the American troops from Peking. Mr. Rockhill, the American Commissioner in China, leaves Shanghai for Peking. The Feast of Lanterns passes off quietly at Hong Kong.

10. Peking is entirely looted; only the Imperial Palace is spared. Daily auctions of loot are held, in which valuable silks, furs, and bronzes are put up for sale, the chief bidders being army officers.

being army officers. rince Ching has an interview with Sir Robert Hart.

14. Li Hung Chang leaves Shanghai by the steamer Aufing. Before leaving he pays a visit to the German Minister at Shanghai.

Photograph by [Elliott and Fry. The late Professor Sidgwick.

preserving the national existence of those States:

atrong mounted force leaves Pretoria in pursuit of De Wet.

upplies of food are forwarded from Lorenzo Marques to British troops.

Ir. Sauer, in the Cape Parliament, makes a strong speech in favour of the independence of the Boer Republics.

uns which have been destroyed are found in whom die.

om die,

whom die, Li Hung Chang arrives af Tientsin. The cable between Shanghai, Chifu, Taku. Port Arthur and Wei-Hai-Wei is completed. The town of Liang is burnt down by the Germans.

18. The German Government issues a Circular Note on the Chinese question to the Governments of all the Powers concerned. Count von Waldersee arrives at Hong Kong.

19. Admiral Remey calls officially on Li Hung

Chang.

Chang.

The Allied forces capture the Pei-tang and Lutai forts, but suffer heavy losses.

The American Commissioner arrives at Peking. The Bitish countermand the order for winter clothing for the troops. Count von Waldersee arrives at Shanghai.

America declines to identify herself with Count von Bülow's Circular Note. Li Hung Chang von Bülow's Circular Note. Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching' are accepted as pleripotentiaries; Mr. Conger is authorised to enter into relations' with them. The reply to Russia is that the United States have not at present the intention of removing their Legation from Peking.

The German Minister (with a squadron) leaves Shanghai for the North. Li Hung Chang leaves, Tientein for Peking, escorted by Russian and Japanesse troops,

25. Russia and Japan reply to the German Circular Note. 26. The United States decide to change the status of the American forces before the arrival of of the American forces before the arrival of Count von Waldersee.

27. A Shanghai telegram states that inderfest has broken out amongst the cattle purchased for the German Commissariat.

the German Commissariat.
Count von Waldersee arrives at Tk.n-tsin.
29. The Russian Minister, M. de Girs, and all the members of the Russian Legation leave Peking for Tien-tsin. Russia leaves 1,300 troops in Peking.

SPEECHES.

Sept. 1. Mr. Birrell, in Manchester, on the enors cost of Government.

mous cost of Government.

Mr. Pickles, at Huddersfield, on the future development of the working-classes.

Sir William Turner, at Bradford, on the progress during this century in knowledge of biology.

The German Emperor, at Stettin, on Ckinese affairs.

8. Sir Matthew White-Ridley, at Blagdon Park, on South Africa and China.

Lord George Hamilton, at Weston, on the War in South Africa and the settlement in China.

in South Africa and the settlement in China.

Mr. Asquith, in East Fife, on the possibility of a General Election.

18. Sir W. Roberts-Austen, in Paris, on the work of France and Britain in the development of metallurgical science and industry.
Mr. Herbert Gladstone, at Leeds, on the Tory Government and the General Election.

Crewe, at Burton-on-Trent, on the Dissolution.

21. Earl Spencer, at Perby, on the Dissolution.

22. President Loubet, in Paris, on the centenary of the Proclamation of the French Republic,

23. The Duke of Devonshire, at Bradford, on the Election. Mr. Chamberlain, at Birmingham, on the ad-dresses of the Opposition Leaders. Lord Brassey, at Westminster, on Imperial Liberalism.

Mr. Asquith, in Fife, on the Liberal Party.

Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on the Dissolution.

Mr. Brodrick, at Carnleigh, on the policy of the Government in South Africa.

Sir William Harcourt, at Ebbw Vale, on the failure of the Government.

Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on the dissension in the Libral Party.

Photograph by [Barraud.

The late Sir Saul Samuel.

25. Mr. Chamberlain, at Oldham, in praise of the Government. Sir H. Fowler, at Wolverhampton, on the War.

Sir H. Fower, at Wolvernampton, on the War.
Mr. Wyndham, at Dover, on the Army.
26. Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on the Government's domestic achievements.
Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, at Stirling, on the mistakes of the Government.
Sir W. Harcourt, at Blackwood, on the Government's mismanagement and extravagance.

Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on Army reform.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Tunstall, in defence of the Government.
Sir W. Harcourt, at Rhymney, on the Education policy of the Government.

Mr. Courtney, at Exeter, on the Settlement in South Africa.
Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on the differences of the Opposition.
Mr. Chamberlain, at Bilston, on Supporting the Government.

the Government. Sir W. Harcourt, at Tredegar, on Temperance Reform.

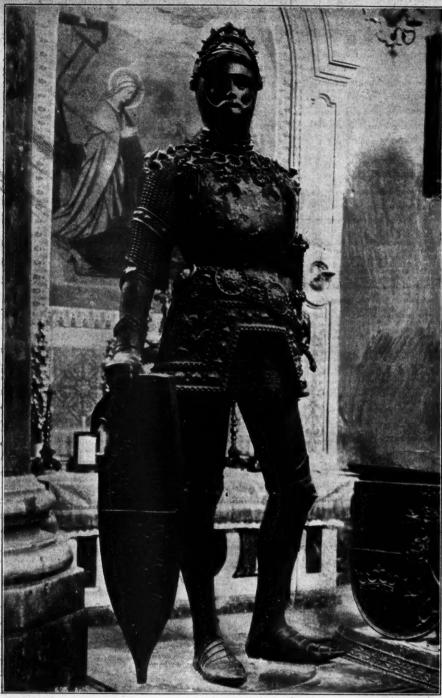

Reform.
Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Rochdale, on the Settlement of South Africa.
Mr. W. Burdett-Coutts, at Westminster, in defence of 1 is action in criticising the Hospitals in South Africa.
Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, in St. James's Hall) London, on the failure of the Government at home and abroad.
Mr. Chambellain in Riminghown.

Mr. Chamberlain, in Birmingham.

OBITUARY.

Sept. 2. Dr. Richard Sarell (at Constantinople).
3. Hon. S. S. Ingram (Bermuda), 80.
4. Rev. J. Gorton (late Archdeacon of Madras), 80.

Mr. Grattan Geary (Editor Bombay Gazefte).
The Archbishop of Aix, 80.
Captain Sir Alfred Jephson, 52.
Mr. Thomas Moore, F. R. C.S., 6t.
Rev. Canon Owen Jones.
Captain the Hon. M. A. Bourke, R.N., 46.
Prince Albert of Saxony, 25.
Mr. William Dealtry, C.M.G., 84.
Miss Margaret Stoks: at Howth, co. Dublinl.
Mr. Robert Rae (National Temperance League).
Marshal Martinez de Campos, 66.
M. Louis Ratisbonz (poet).
Hon. F. G. Marchand (Premier of Quebec), 67.
Professor Edward Albert (at Vienna), 59.

Statue in the]

KING ARTHUR OF ENGLAND.

[Hof Kirche, Innibrück.

"I, being simple, thought to work His will, And have but stricken with the sword in vain; And all whereon I lean'd . . . . . GENERAL ELECTION, 1900. Is traitor to my peace, and all my realm-Reels back into the beast, and is no more."

— The Passing of Arthur.

328

so of Mr. sugg cons the f cont lette which have Sali ness cou pite to elec See can wor ana pag not ent we cal ves H th as th ev au so aı is H

CHARACTER SKETCH.

THE BRITISH TSAR: THE GENERAL ELECTOR.

EXCEPT Mr. Chamberlain, no personality has emerged from the turmoil of the present election. Of Mr. Chamberlain I have written so much and so often that I have no wish to make him the subject of another Character Sketch. Mr. Morley is hors de combat; Mr. Goschen, whose retirement at other times might have suggested him as the subject for treatment, is only conspicuous for the moment because he is stepping out of the fray, not because he is taking a leading part in the contest; Lord Rosebery has only emitted a single letter, which was a poor substitute for the leading which even a leader retired from business might have been expected to suggest; and as for Lord Salisbury, his manifesto was almost labject in its feebleness. Surely never did a Prime Minister appeal to the country in so lachrymose a tone. Never before has a piteous wail over possible abstentions taken the place of direct challenge to the heart and conscience of the electorate on a great political issue. Seeing, therefore, that among the candidates there is no person who would seem to call particularly for analysis and delineation in these pages, I bethought me that it might not be a bad thing to regard the voter or the general elector as an entity, and to describe him as if he were individually, what he is politically, the British Tsar.

The Tsar of all the Russias is vested by the constitution of his country with the supreme power. He is autocrat. From his will From his will there is no appeal, but in practice, as no one knows better than Tsars themselves, they are hampered at every turn in the exercise of their autocratic power. In theory omnipotent, in practice their sovereign will can be exercised within a very small area, and by no means always even there. Our British elector is in precisely similar case. In theory he is supreme. He can make and unmake Ministries, reverse policies, avert or precipitate war, or, in short, do everything that the Tsar can do. But the occasion for exercising this supreme power occurs only once in half a dozen years, and then it takes place in circumstances which often reduce to a farce the much-vaunted power of the elector.

To begin with, the elector has no opportunity of express-ing his opinion, one way or the other, unless there is a contest. He may hate the candidate who sits for his constituency as much as the West Birmingham Liberals hate Mr. Chamberlain; but unless a candidate can be put into the field, he is powerless to express his disappro-This, it may be, is a matter that requires remedying; but at this election the right to vote has practically been denied to constituents who are responsible for the return of no fewer than one hundred and seventy members. The number of seats unopposed is larger this year than at some previous elections-for obvious reasons, into which we do not need to enter now. Suffice it to say that one quarter of the House of Commons can be elected without giving the electors any opportunity of exercising

It was said long ago by a cynic that British electors lived under a despotic government, tempered by the permission once in seven years to choose a new set of rulers. For electors in non-contested constituencies this right does not exist, and in many others it is more phantasmal than real. In theory, however, six million adult males being householders and on the register have the destiny of the country in their hands. Each one of them on polling-day is an uncrowned king. To his absolute free and unfettered choice the destinies of the Empire are committed, and upon the way in which he exercises that choice will depend the future history of our country. The responsibility of the voter is great, even when the results of his decision are operative over a very small area. How much greater must they be when his responsibility extends over land and sea, and when the weal and woe of unnumbered millions of mankind depend upon whether he chooses wisely or the reverse.

At one time, the glory of the General Elector and his power impressed me a good deal more than the reality does to-day. In my "Electors' Guide" in 1880 I wrote as follows, in terms which are curiously apposite to the issue as decided this month, merely substi-tuting the name of Mr. Chamberlain for that of Lord Beaconsfield :-

To the Electors of Great Britain and Ireland belongs the supreme and unquestioned sovereignty over an Empire vaster than that of Imperial Rome. In the crowned democracy of Britain

Than the conscience and the every citizen is a king. judgment of the British Elector there exists no higher tribunal within the borders of our world-encircling realm, and his will is the supreme law for one-fifth of the human race. To British householders, the free citizens of a free State, are submitted all those questions of high policy, the decision of which elsewhere is the proud personalive of the heir of a hundred kings or the cherished privilege of a lordly caste. Life brings with it no more momentous duty than that which falls this month upon those who are summoned by the voice of their country to decide what shall be the future history of the English race,

The destinies of the Empire, the progress of civilisation, the peace of the world, will be affected by the vote which the Electors cast this Easter. The nation stands in the Valley of Decision, at the parting of the ways, and now rings through the air the thrilling cry, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve!" It is no mere question of Tory or Liberal, of the Ins or the Outs, that awaits decision; it is a conflict of opposing principles which go down to the foundations of the State. . . . It is for the men of England-the heirs of the glorious heritage of centuries of Freedom-to say whether this is to continue. It is theirs to decide. Choose well; your choice is brief and yet endless.

The sovereignty vested in each Elector seems small-almost infinitesimal. Collectively, it is absolute and unlimited. Each Elector is as responsible for the faithful discharge of his duty to his country as if he were Autocrat of the Empire. If, from Birmingham Weekly Mercury.

Putting on their Armour.

A Fable.

[Westminster Gazette.

tra ma mi in un po ha wi th ha ap pr M th th fre ta by el di fo di

SC

adin

Once upon a time a Blunder-Fox was much troubled in his mind how he should elude his pursuers. Noticing his distress, two kind-hearted Red Herringwent to him and said: "Have no fear. When the hounds approach we will cross your track, and thus enable you to escape your foes."

(It is evident that during the General Election campaign Majuba and Khaki will be freely utilised by Tory candidates to throw yoters off the scent of the Government's blunders.

personal feeling or political prejudices, from idle caprice or from party loyalty, he is unfaithful to his trust, he is as guilty before his God and his country as if he were an Emperor who, from love of luxury and excess, neglected to govern justly the dominions over which he reigned supreme. Nor will the penalty fail to be exacted. If the nation continues to tread the path on which it has already entered, it needs no prophet's eye to discern, with a continent converted into one vast camp, that it would promptly lead to conscription or Sedan, it may be to conscription and Sedan.

To maintain our Empire, not merely intact, but uninjured by violent attempts to force its premature and unnatural expansion, to vindicate the fair name of England from the foul stain of fraud and falsehood attaching to so many of the acts of her present rulers; to restore morality to politics; to repel encroachments on the authority of Parliament; to secure the opportunity for promoting beneficial reforms: to resume our mission as a great Civilizing, Colonising, and Christianising Power; and to avert a catastrophe which would dismember our Empire and shatter the nation into remediless ruin, it is necessary to defeat at the poll the supporters of Lord Beaconsfield's Government,

Such is the theory. In practice one quarter of the electors have no chance of voting, and of the other three-quarters how many go to the polling booth with any consciousness of their responsibilities or obligations? No doubt there are some who are conscious of their Imperial prerogatives, but with the immense majority the decision as to how they vote is governed by a multitude of private or local considerations with which the problems of Empire have very little to do.

problems of Empire have very little to do.

In the present General Election a distinct step has been taken towards reducing the consciousness of responsibility to vanishing point. When the matter in dispute concerns the ownership of a cottage or a mere question of trespass, mankind has recognised the necessity for calm deliberation for the hearing of evidence on both sides, and the sternest penalties are imposed upon any who would disturb the judicial calm of the Law

Court or the still more sacred seclusion of the room where the jurors retire to give their verdict. But when the matter concerns not the ownership of a cottage, but the annexation of a republic, when the matter in dispute is not one of mere trespass, but the carrying of fire and sword through the territories of a neighbouring people, all the arrangements indispensable in a Court of Justice are flung on one side. In place of judicial calm there are heated appeals to party passion. Such controversy as there is consists in the haranguing of rival crowds, each of which meets apart, and neither manifests the least disposition to listen to what the other side has to say. Indeed, it is well if the impatient partisans can be induced to confine their demonstrations of enthusiasm to cheering their own side, instead of drowning by clamour the arguments of their opponents. The cynical philosopher would indeed find ample material for his sarcasm if he had noticed the way in which Radical rowdies silenced Mr. Wyndham's speech at Battersea or broke up the meetings of the Ministerialists at Northampton and North Lambeth. A verdict which may affect the welfare of millions yet unborn is arrived at more on the methods in vogue in a rough-and-tumble fight than by any attempt to preserve the judicial serenity of a Law Court.

They manage these things much better in America. It is true that there is plenty of partisan enthusiasm, perhaps more of it than in this country, but all attempts to disturb public meetings are sternly repressed with the utmost rigour, and although it is seldom that both parties agree to attend the same meeting, each party is secured by the baton of the constable an uninterrupted opportunity to hear what its own spokesmen choose to say. This, however, is not the only way in which the American General Elector has more chance than his English fellow. In America every election is contested as a matter of course, so that each elector has at least an opportunity of voting for or against the administration of the day. But the contrast between American and British methods is still more marked when we examine the tactics which have governed ministerialists at the present dissolution. In the United States the two parties hold their respective Conventions in June or July, and from that time till the 6th November the whole country is invited and expected to devote its uninterrupted attention to the issues which are presented by the opposing candidates. This, at least, renders it possible that the final vote when it is taken should have some relation to the questions which that vote will decide. How different is the method adopted in this country! Lord Salisbury and Mr. Chamberlain have reduced to a mockery the principle of an appeal to the people. There is no necessity for the present Parliament to be dissolved until next year. Ministers themselves did not appear to have made up their minds as to whether or not to make an appeal to the people until four days after President Kruger had crossed the frontier and sought refuge in Portuguese territory from the pursuing soldiers of Great Britain. In order to take advantage of the temporary excitement produced by this triumph of our arms, Parliament is dissolved at a week's notice, and before another week is over the Between the announcement of the elections begin. dissolution and the opening of the first polls less than a fortnight elapsed. The sudden proclamation of a dissolution found candidates and their spokesmen scattered all over the continent of Europe. or three days elapsed before they could return. Election addresses had to be written in hot haste, and in many instances the time was too short to permit even a reasoned statement of the questions at issue, to say nothing of having them thoroughly debated. Any such thing as a campaign of education was entirely out of the question. The election was snatched in a hurry for the express purpose of avoiding that close examination and reasonable discussion which have hitherto been regarded as the indispensable prelude to the vote. Business men, of course, will reply that an election interferes with trade, and that the sooner it is over the better. But on this principle it would be much better to do without elections altogether, because it stands to reason that if a fortnight's electioneering is better than a month, no electioneering at all would be better still. As a mere matter of practical detail it is simply impossible to print and to arrange for the distribution of the statement of the issue which is supposed to be decided at the poll. The only consecutive, reasoned presentation of the case against the Government, both on its political and military aspects, was that which was made by the Westminster Gazette, but their masterly and convincing indictment of Mr. Chamberlain's diplomacy and Lord Lansdowne's military administration could not get itself into type until a day after the dissolution, within less than four days of the opening of the polls. Great Britain is but a small country, it is true; but even in England distances of five or six hundred miles separate the outlying constituencies from the capital. By no human possibility could the electors of the constituencies which polled on Monday be supplied in time for their perusal with the statement of the case for the Opposition, the first copies of which were only issued from the press on the previous Thursday.

It is true that there is one precedent of somewhat unhappy augury which will enable the Conservatives to plead that the attempt to snatch an election, suddenly sprung at the eleventh hour upon the constituencies, has originated with Mr. Gladstone. In 1874 Mr. Gladstone, without even taking the counsel of many of his colleagues in the Government, suddenly decided to dissolve Parliament, and to appeal to the constituencies upon a proposal to abolish the income tax. But even then some time elapsed between the dissolution and the appeal to the constituencies. But although party men may be satisfied Dressing Up.

Ministers in the dressing-room preparing to go on the stage.

,

irse.

ting

ette.

Herring-room

when

e, but ispute

of fire ouring Court ce of ssion. guing either other partiutions ad of nents. terial vhich h at alists hich rived mble enity . It haps sturb most gree d by porsay. ican llow.

MR. C.: "Isn't this jolly?"
LORD S.; "H'm-I'm a little too old for this sort of thing."

with the recourse to the convenient tu quoque, the fact that both parties are guilty heightens rather than diminishes the gravity of the offence. The practice of snatching a sudden dissolution and of forcing an appeal to the country before either of the rival parties have their literature ready, is a reductio ad absurdum of the farce of democratic government. How the evil is to be met it is difficult to see. In the British constitution written safeguards against admitted evils are few and unimportant, but if the spirit of democratic government is not to be violated by a gross abuse of its forms, some method will have to be adopted by which a sufficient interim is allowed between the announcement of the declaration of the dissolution of Parliament and the choice of its successor.

Regarded from the point of view of reason, nothing could be more absurd than the way in which the unfortunate General Elector has been hustled into giving his decision on the present occasion. As long as the war was in progress, it was declared to be unpatriotic in the highest degree to criticise either its policy or its conduct. The moment the war could with any plausibility be said to be over, an appeal is rushed through to the constituencies, and the vote is taken before one half of the electorates have even had time to hear what can be alleged by the opponents of the administration. If this thing is allowed to pass without protest, there would seem to be no reason why in the near future any Minister should shrink from announcing the dissolution of Parliament on Saturday, and completing the whole of the elections by the following Saturday. Any brilliant victory on land or sea would afford both an excuse and justification for snatching an appeal to the constituencies before the glamour and the glory of the success of our arms had ceased to disturb the judgment and dazzle the imagination of the General Elector.

I have called the General Elector the British Tser. But if we were to find a parallel to the method of taking the decision of King Demos in the annals of despotic courts, we should discover that it resembled nothing so much as the attempt of courtiers to secure the signature of the autocrat to a ukase before he had time to read it.

or at a time when they had succeeded in befuddling his brain by a prolonged debauch.

w

G

ce

wi

la sa

pr

th

O

de

a

Lord Rosebery has repeatedly lifted up his voice in favour of reorganising the Government upon business principles. It would be interesting to ciples. know what an ordinary practical man of business would think of this method of taking the supreme decisions of the head of the firm. To arouse the senior partner at the dead of night, and to insist upon his there and then deciding whether or not he would reverse the principles upon which the business had been so far carried on, without giving him even time to examine his balance-sheet or check the accuracy of the figures presented to him-this is a method that might commend itself to dishonest cashiers, but could hardly be regarded as business-like. Yet wherein does it differ from the way in which the General Elector has been hustled into giving his decision at the present election?

It will be said that the main issues before the country have long been familiar to the General Elector, and that, in short, the case, both for the prosecution and the defence, had been closed, and all that was necessary was for him to retire from the jury-box and agree as to his verdict of guilty or not guilty. But a moment's reflection will be sufficient to prove that the very reverse of this is the case. At every General Election there are many important questions which occupy the attention of the electorate, but it is seldom that so many and so grave issues have been presented before the nation as those upon which the election is supposed to have turned. Three questions stand out conspicuously. The first is that as to the future government of South Africa. Upon this point Ministers themselves have afforded us but little light as to their intentions. So far as may be gathered from their election addresses, the Alpha and Omega of their policy is to continue themselves in office. They seek a renewed mandate in order that they may be free to do what they please. So far as they have given us any hint as to what they will do, it amounts to the indefinite establishment of a despotic government in two States, one of which was one of the freest Republics in the world, while the other, with all its faults, at least enjoyed a Parliament of its own, and was governed according to the will of the majority of the electors on the register. All that is to be swept off the board. That at least is clear, but as to when any system of free government is to be re-established in these Republics Ministers say nothing. It depends, they tell us, upon the attitude of the population, which has just been burnt out of house and home, and which will for many a long year to come remember with the bitterest feelings of regret and resentment the loss of thousands of its bravest sons, butchered to make a British holiday. So far, therefore, as Ministers may be said to have defined the issue upon which the vote is taken, it is to demand that they should have carte blanche to establish for an indefinite period military despotism in South Africa. This policy is one which involves so gross a departure from what have hitherto been regarded as the traditional principles upon which the General Elector has believed the British Empire was longed v lifted nising shiers, ed as es it 1 the d into resent untry at, in fence, r him ict of ll be case. quest it is prection d out vernnem-ewed they what nent was ther, own, ority t off any hed nds, ion. me. ber the to ters the ave ary

iich erto ich was

s prining to al man nethod of the se the night. d then would ch the ed on. ne to check sented might ceeded

their ction is to

to be governed, that the least that could be expected is that it should be fully expounded and carefully discussed. But what do we find in practice? That the unfortunate General Elector hears nothing, or next to nothing, concerning the future of South Africa. His ears are dinned with more or less ecstatic eulogiums upon Mr. Chamber-lain pronounced by Mr. Chamberlain himself and his satellites, who, with all manner of electoral tom-toms, proclaim night and day that there never was such a heaven-sent Minister as Joseph of Birmingham. On the other hand, in the absence of any organised Opposition with courage sufficient to call its soul its own, or to challenge the most revolutionary departures from constitutional practice, the electorate is left practically without any statement of the case against annexation. The leading spokesmen of the Opposition, in order to evade the difficulty of propounding an alternative proposition, have eagerly clutched at the convenient theory that annexation was inevitable and irrevocable, and that Ministers having terminated an unjust and unnecessary war by the extinction of an independent nationality, nothing can be done but to acquiesce in the crime which has been perpetrated before our eyes. Mr. Balfour, almost alone among Ministers, has had the courage to point out that annexation, so far from being irrevocable, not only could be undone, but ought to be undone if the war in its inception were unjust. But even if it were admitted that annexation was inevitable, there is all the difference in the world between annexation under which the population was admitted at the earliest possible moment to the full rights of responsible Government, and annexation which resembles the annexation of Poland by

I have called the General Elector the British Tsar, and so far as the main issue before him is concerned, he is really asked whether or not he will substitute the methods and policy of the Tsardom for the old established methods and principles of constitutional self-government. It may be quite right that the General Elector should arrogate to himself the prerogatives of the Russian autocrat, and should to that extent revolutionise the conception which has hitherto prevailed of the mission of England in the world, but the right and the wrong of the decision is not what we are now discussing. What we are asking is that before the General Elector remodels our African policy upon Russian and worse than Russian principles, he should have an opportunity first of clearly understanding what he is asked to do, and secondly of hearing the arguments which may be adduced against it. But this is the very last thing which Ministers desire that he should have. What they wish to do is to hustle the unlucky Elector to the polling booth, and bully him into voting for the Government on penalty of being denounced as a Little-Englander, a pro-Boer and a traitor.

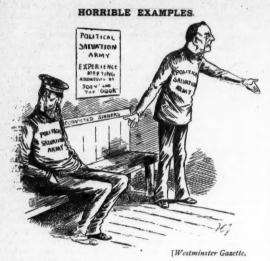

The second issue arises immediately after the first, namely, the extent to which it will be necessary to revolutionise the whole military system of the country. This was alluded to more or less vaguely by various Ministers in their election addresses. But although it is one which admittedly is vital to the safety and even to the existence of our Empire, the last thing in the world that Ministers think of is to give the General Elector any hint as to the lines upon which they intend to provide for the military defence of the Empire. And here we are confronted by a very extraordinary phenomenon. Ministers are appealing to the country on the ground of their military exploits, although by universal consent of every competent authority abroad, the net result of their floundering and blundering in South Africa has been to reduce British military prestige to zero. If anyone doubts this, let him read the article which Captain Gambier has contributed to the Fortnightly Review as to the effect of the war upon our military reputation. We are told that this is to be a khaki election, and that we have all to vote khaki at the very time when everyone who is in a position to speak with authority assures us that the Administration has brought the wearers of khaki into contempt for every military quality except that of bulldog valour. If this is questioned by any heated partisan, we have only to point to the articles which even in the very height of the election appeared in nearly all the Ministerial papers. Whether we turn to the National Review, whose editor is in close family relationship with the Prime Minister, or to the Spectator, which has for some time past held the position of journalistic chaplain to Mr. Chamberlain, or to Mr. Alfred Harmsworth, who is the Cleon of Tory Democracy, or to the staid and stupid Globe, we find the same chorus of dissatisfaction and contempt. Lord Salisbury has been told daily by the organs of his own party that the discontentent among the Conservatives and Unionists at the Administration of the War Office by Lord Lansdowne was such that thousands of electors would refuse to vote for Ministerial candidates unless a public pledge was given before the polls were opened that the Administration would be remodelled, and Lord Lansdowne, at least, cast into the waves like another Jonah. Here surely is a paradox sufficient to puzzle a much less befogged intellect than that of the average Elector. To be assured in one and the same breath that he must vote khaki because of the brilliant success with which the Government have carried out the war in South Africa, and then to be assured that the military administration of the Government has been so contemptible and discreditable as to necessitate making jettison of the War Secretary in the very middle of the election, this surely is not to present a clear and sharply cut issue that may be understood by the Man in the Street, who is this month also the Man in the Polling Booth.

Westminster Gazette.]

MR. BRODRICK (to John Bull): "Hus—s—sh! Not a word! Wait till the election is over, and then we'll inquire into everything."

"Look at me and my friend the Dook. We wus 'orrible sinners once, our wick-dness wus downright 'orful. Why, we acshully 'elped ter give back the Transvaal to them depraved Boers, and after Majuba too! Think o' that, now. So I sez, 'Friends all, if you comes across any coves like wot me and him wus, don't vote for 'em. Cast 'em out and call 'em traitors. My friend the Dook 'ill tell yer the same w'en'e wakes up.'

Apart from the paradoxical absurdity of this appeal to the people on a khaki issue, there lies immediately ahead the gravest question that can possibly confront any nation. It is admitted by Ministers themselves that the net result of their management or mismanagement of South African affairs is to make South Africa fifteen times more difficult to hold for the Empire than it was before the war began. Instead of maintaining a small force of 3,000 men at the Cape and in Natal, they will henceforth have to maintain at the very least a garrison of 45,000 men. Where these 45,000 have to come from no one can say. Every military authority admits that the military system which was in existence twelve months ago was even then barely adequate to meet the claims which continually arose for Imperial defence, and that the necessity of providing additional garrisons of 42,000 men in South Africa would reduce the whole scheme to shapeless ruin. Nor is it only that we shall require 42,000 more men in South Africa. The reckless and aggressive spirit which hurried us into the South African war has aroused in every foreign capital a feeling of suspicion and alarm which will in turn inevitably compel us to strengthen our armaments elsewhere. The Ministerial papers and magazines teem with articles suggesting this, that, and the other method of meeting the increased demand for men, most of which involve as an indispensable condition the adoption of some form of compulsory service. A strong, active, and enthusiastic party in Ireland has undertaken the tisk of counter-working the blandishments of the recruiting officer by a strike against recruiting. Nor recruiting officer by a strike against recruiting. must it be overlooked that the desperate expedients adopted for the purpose of filling our depleted ranks in South Africa during this war are calculated to have a distinctly prejudicial effect upon ordinary recruiting. Soldiers' letters received from the seat of war bear unmistakable testimony to the fact that Tommy Atkins does not see the fun of having to bear the brunt of campaigning at 1s. a day, while the Colonial and Yeomen

Volunteers were drawing 5s. and 7s. 6d. a day for doing much more easy work. This is recognised by some army reformers, who proclaim that the inducement to the soldier to recruit must be increased even to the extent of doubling his pay. This raises another question, and that is where the money is to come from to meet the expenditure which these additions to our army will inevitably entail. The 1s. income tax imposed this year has not yet been collected, but next year it is probable that it will have to be increased. But concerning all these things, the men who are appealing to the General Elector for his vote and interest say nothing. He is urged to consent to the acquisition of this, that and the other piece of territory, but nothing is said as to the price. The policy of the spendthrift is recommended by Ministers of the Crown, and the leaders of the Opposition neither have the spirit nor the time to bring home to the mind of the General Elector how much he will have to pay for his

There is a third great question, to which some Ministers have made passing allusions. A great and ancient empire, which contains within its frontiers one quarter of the human race, is at present invaded by the allied forces of the European Powers. It is obvious that their interests conflict, and that they are with difficulty kept in line. But the General Elector looks in vain through the manifestoes of rival parties for any clear guidance as to a policy to be adopted. Here and there we find assertions that the guilty must be punished, or a negative statement that we must annex no territory; but there is no policy clearly stated on either side, nor is the issue as to China presented in such a form that the general elector or his candidates can come to a definite decision one way or the other. The whole thing is a muddle, and, what is worse, it is purposely muddled, in order that the courtiers of the Tsar may induce him to give them a new lease of nower.

But it will be said by some, especially those who live under Governments avowedly despotic, "What else can you have but a farce when you attempt to entrust the guidance of the affairs of the Empire to the politicians of the pothouse?" The answer to this is that, however difficult it may be to present a clear political issue to the understanding of the General Elector, the thing has been done in the past and could be done to-day if Ministers would have allowed Parliament to run out its natural The difficulty of the task of bringing home to the electorate of Great Britain the moral, economic, financial and political issues involved in the new policy which they are asked to adopt in South Africa is small indeed compared with that of similar tasks which have been undertaken and successfully accomplished in the past. In our own history the most conspicuous and signal instance of the success with which great and complex issues can be presented to the judgment of the electorate was the Midlothian campaign of 1880. Lord Beaconsfield's policy raised many questions of great difficulty and complexity. He had involved us in dangerous responsibilities in Turkey, in Egypt, in Afghanistan, and in South Africa. But the issue between him and Mr. Gladstone was clearly defined and fully debated. The result was that the electorate by a large majority condemned Lord Beaconsfield and placed Mr. Gladstone in power. The memory of the results which followed the Midlothian Campaign was probably one of the reasons that convinced Mr. Chamberlain as to the necessity for hurrying on this General Election. It may be said that the Midlothian campaign depended for its success upon Mr.

n

C

h

u

t

n

a tl V e t.

in

p

G

h fu

th

a

m

is

m

q

al

fr

CC

st

m ar

in 70

Cu A

m en

a day ised by cement n to the estion. neet the inevitear has that it l these Elector rged to r piece The sters of neither nind of for his inisters incient quarter allied t their cept in gh the as to a ertions ement Policy China or his e way , what urtiers ease of o live e can st the ans of wever to the been nisters atural home omic. new South milar sfully the the with o the paign ques-

pt, in ween fully by a and y of Camnced ying

the

Mr.

olved

Gladstone, and as Mr. Gladstone is no more with us, we cannot hope to attempt any similar task of enlightenment. This is nonsense. Mr. Gladstone, no doubt, was a pillar of strength and took the leading part in the great campaign, but Mr. Gladstone was not alone. The press teemed with publications, both official and unofficial, and every method of bringing the salient facts of the case home to the attention of the elector was used with unsparing hand from one end of the land to the other. Contrast that with the miserable and paltry effort which has been made by the Liberal Publication Department to enlighten the electors on the great questions at issue. Read over the list of pamphlets and leaflets which have been issued by this department. In the whole long list of appeals addressed to the electorate, how many are there that touch upon the great questions upon which the election is supposed to turn? I do not know what Mr. Herbert Gladstone may think of the method in which the Publication Department of the Central Liberal Association has boycotted the moral, military and political questions raised by the war; but I have a pretty good idea what his father would think of it. He would feel that the Liberal Publication Department had failed in its duty to the electorate, and had not even touched upon most of the gravest issues of the election. Whatever has been done to bring the issues involved in the war and its settlement before the attention of the general elector has been done, not by the Liberal Publication Department, but by Sir Howard Vincent, who is at the head of the Tory literature of the election on the one side, and by the Conciliation and Stopthe-War Committees on the other. However zealous and well-deserving these latter may be, they could not possibly appeal to the whole country in the way in which party organisation can do. The General Elector has been left in the lurch very badly. The counsel for the prosecution has practically thrown up his brief, and if a verdict of "Not Guilty" is returned, who can wonder at it, when no pains have been taken to elicit the truth by crossexamination, or to call attention to the facts which are in evidence. In this matter, as in many others, we shall do well to take example from the way in which the General Elector is appealed to by our kinsmen across the sea. There was probably never a more heroic enterprise in the shape of political education undertaken by any party than that which was successfully grappled with by the Republican messengers at the last presidential election. The difficulties were appalling. Of all questions that can ever be submitted to an uneducated electorate, that of the currency is one of the most maddening. "My son," said a wise man at the beginning of this century, "give currency questions a wide berth. They are so bewildering that if you wish to keep your reason leave currency alone." When the Democratic party decided to make When the Democratic party decided to make free silver the issue in the Presidential Election four years ago, the Republican messengers found themselves confronted with the duty of educating an electorate stretching from Maine to California, and numbering many millions, most of whom had hardly any acquaintance with the reality of the economic questions involved in the problem of the currency. To educate a nation of 70 millions as to the fundamental facts underlying the currency question was a task from which any but Americans might well have recoiled. Instead, however, of recoiling, they set on foot a campaign of education the memory of which should never be forgotten. It is an encouragement and inspiration to all who believe in democracy and who refuse to despair of government of the people, by the people, and for the people. All the difficulties which confront us in attempting to educate our electorate are the merest child's play compared with those which the Republican managers successfully overcame. To begin with, our General Elector, in whatever part of the three kingdoms he resides, has a common language. In Wales, no doubt, some candidates may find it necessary to address their constituents in Welsh; but with that exception there is no necessity to print our electoral literature in any language but English. In the United States the campaign litera-ture had to be issued in no fewer than ten different languages-namely, German, French, Spanish, Italian, Swedish, Norwegian, Finnish, Dutch, Hebrew, and, of course, English.

When I was at the Hague I had an opportunity of hearing a good deal about the way in which the literature department of the Republican campaign was worked from Mr. Holls, who held a position of great importance in directing the work of propaganda, especially among the foreign-born citizens of the United States. The first thing that differentiates the American campaign of education from the miserable and piffling attempts made to educate our electorate was the fact that they had an unlimited command of funds. Mr. Hanna levied apparently at discretion upon the millionaires of the Party for contributions to the campaign fund, and almost the whole of that money was spent in paper and ink. During the campaign the Republican National Committee issued over 200,000,000 publications of one kind and another, besides about an extra 50,000,000 which were sent out from the headquarters at Washington. This literature was usually distributed from the Central Committees of the State. About 20,000 express packages of documents were shipped, nearly 5,000 freight packages, while half a million packages went through the post. But they did not by any means confine themselves to the distribution of literature specially prepared and printed by the Bureau of Publication and Printing. They devoted infinite attention to the task of utilising the country newspapers in every State in the Union. The journals of the country were divided into categories. The first, with an aggregate weekly circulation of 1,650,000, received every week three and a half columns of specially prepared matter. The second category, with a circulation of a million, received their campaign copy in stereoplates; and the third class, with a circulation of three millions per week, were supplied with specially prepared articles from headquarters, which they published in the rest of their reading matter; while the fourth class received special supplements ready printed for distribution with their sheet. It was calculated that five million families every week received newspapers of various kinds containing political matter issued from the Republican Bureau. But this was only one department of activity of these men who undertook the task of acting as political and economical schoolmasters to a whole nation, while it is probable that their posters, their cartoons, their pictorial placards did quite as much to drive their conclusions home as the more carefully printed arguments in their leaflets and their newspaper articles. The Republican Committee in 1896 issued about 500 different political posters, many of which were admirably printed in five colours, and which, when displayed upon hoardings throughout the country, made every street a political picture-gallery for the instruction of the electors. Nor was it only in posters that they displayed their ingenuity. The caricaturists in every newspaper vied with one another in pointing a moral and emphasising the

THE LAST FOUR GENERAL ELECTIONS: THE BOROUGHS.

CONSERVATIVE
SINGLIBERAL UNIONIST LIBERAL LIBERAL

IN 1885.

IN 1886.

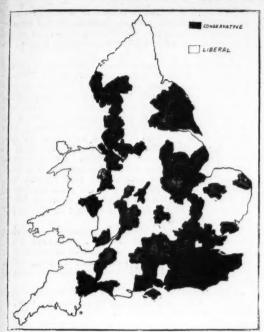

IN 1892-95.

IN 1895.

THE LAST FOUR GENERAL ELECTIONS: THE COUNTIES.

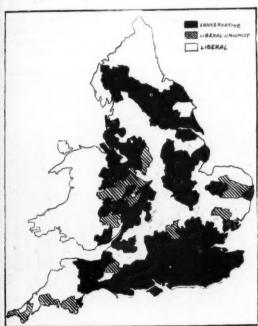

CONSERVATIVE

DERAL UNIONIST

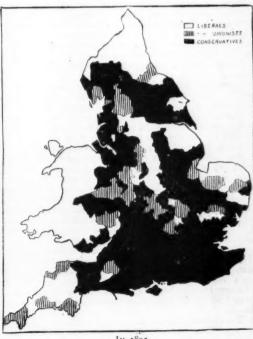

LIBERAL

IN 1885.

IN 1886.

IN 1895.

Westminster Gazette.]

Hiding the Unionist Corpse of the Government Record under the Union Jack.

lesson that their leaders on the platform and the press were endeavouring to bring home to the mind and conscience of the people.

Such was the campaign of education as carried out in America in 1896. Contrast that with the campaign of education, if such it may be called, that has been carried out in the United Kingdom for the instruction of our poor general elector. With the exception of Mr. Gould of the Westminster Gazette and the caricaturist on the Morning Leader, the contributions to the pictorial literature of the campaign have been simply beneath contempt. The Ministerialists have indeed produced a few posters here and there, chiefly for the purpose of holding up individual members of the Liberal Party to ridicule and contempt, and we have, of course, the infamous National Cartoon issued by the Daily Chronicle, which pandered to the vulgarest sentiment by its boastful exultation over the defeat of the two small Republics by the forces of the British Empire. Mr. Moscheles' painting, which I have used as a frontispiece to the present number of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, was suggested by this national cartoon, the embodiment of all that is most unlovely and unworthy in the national character. Such cartoons, and ail appeals to national vanity and vainglory, are equivalent to the flatteries with which courtiers have lured emperors to their doom. The history of the world is full of stories of the wreck of empires, when their rulers, abandoning the duty of vigilant circumspection and careful prevision, give themselves up to the feverish pleasures of debauch and the seductive allurements of flattering courtiers. To request the elector to count the cost of the policy in which he is asked to embark is decried as incipient treason, while any attempt to warn him as to the consequences which will inevitably follow the adoption of a policy of militarism and aggression is to take your stand among the enemies of your country.

There can naturally be only one end to such a course. That way madness, and not only madness, but suicide, lies. If the General Elector succumbs to the influences with which he is assailed, he will awake too late to discover that he has cast the die of his destinies in a mould which no subsequent repentance will be able to break.

The General Elector is a noun of multitude signifying many, There are estimated to be between five millions of him on the Register in England and Wales, of whom probably not three millions will vote. Scotland and Ireland have about three-quarters of a million each; 200,000 will probably not vote in Scotland, and 400,000 in Ireland. Altogether the General Elector is about 6,700,000 strong, of whom about  $4\frac{1}{4}$  millions may go to the poll.

To enable such a multitudinous personage to record his vote is a costly operation. At last General Election it cost 3s. 8\frac{3}{4}d. per head all round. In Scotland he cost 4s. 7\frac{3}{4}d. to poll, in Ireland 3s. 1\frac{1}{2}d., while in England his vote could be recorded for only 3s. tod. This was cheaper than it cost to poll him in 1885, when he veraged 4s. 5d. per head. In 1886 his voting cost dropped to 4s. In 1892 he cost a little over 3s. tod. The cost of polling him differs materially according to whether he lives in county or borough. The average in 1892 was 5s. in counties and 3s. in boroughs. The total cost of the expenses incurred at 1885 election was £1,026,645, but in 1886, owing to the great number of uncontested seats, the bill for election expenses fell to £624,000. In 1892 it rose to £958,000; in 1895 it fell again to £773,000.

The million-headed General Elector is somewhat limited in the range of his choice. He has to elect 670 persons out of about double that number of candidates. In 1892 there were 1,307 candidates; in 1895, 1,181. About 500 or 600 defeated candidates have to lament their rejected addresses.

At the present Election, owing to the fact that the new register does not come into force till January 1st, 1901, in England, and November 1st in Scotland, it is estimated that a million electors duly qualified will not be able to record their vote. This is an outside estimate. Sir W. Harcourt says that 1,500 are disqualified in his own constituency. So we take it that the snatch at a khaki majority deprives half-a-million persons of their vote. To disfranchise 500,000 in order to obtain a majority for a war waged to obtain the vote for 20,000 persons two years earlier than it was offered is thoroughly in keeping with the topsy-turvey, kind of reasoning by which the General Elector is exhorted to support the Government.

The system by which the General Elector is registered sorely stands in need of reform. A person must be an occupier of a house or other premises for twelve months

Westminster Gazette.]

BILL-STICKER CHAMBERLAIN: "What a relief to get :id of all these old Social Programme Promises!"

6 001

previ

the s voter

he d

the

follow fought fought for the factor of the f entition opin the last votes Compluramajo 2,400 in t Min carr

pren

of the point

T

ndidates. 5, 1,181. Iament

elect 670

on each:

1901, in stimated a able to Sir W. his own the at a of their btain a c 20,000 proughly ning by port the

gistered t be an months

764

these

A cartoon issued by the Tory Party.]

The Unionist Lion.

previous to 31st July, or a proprietor for six months before the same date. When this qualification is admitted, the voter's name is entered on the register on 1st August, but he does not become entitled to vote in England till the January following, and in Scotland till the November following. As this election takes place in October, it is fought on a roll of voters made up fourteen months previously.

Another thing that urgently requires reform is that the returning officer's expenses necessary to enable the General Elector to make known his will, must at present be borne by the candidates who solicit his suffrages. The last four General Elections entailed a cost of £3,381,000, so that every candidate had to pay from £500 to £600 for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the electors. Less than half of this sum represents the returning officer's expenses. The other part is that which the candidate spends in promoting his own candidature. It is unnecessary to point out how this operates in discouraging the candidature of poor men and acts as a premium upon the plutocrat.

The General Elector is a strange and even whimsical entity. A very slight change in the balance of his opinion produces an altogether disproportionate result in the balance of parties. This appeared very plainly at the last election. In 1892 the Liberals had a plurality in the votes of 205,825 with a resultant majority in the House of Commons of only 40. In 1895 the Unionists had only a plurality of 36,981, but it yielded them a Parliamentary majority of 152. The total vote cast in 1895 was 2,406,898 Conservative against 2,369,917. If the majority in the House had corresponded to that outside, the Ministerialists would not have had more than 20 to carry on with.

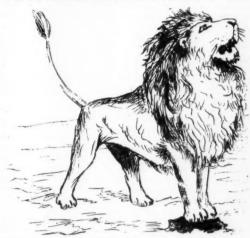

This, however, is but a small thing compared to the extraordinary difference there is between the voting value of the General Elector in different parts of his domain. The Liberals, who raise the cry of one man one vote, point out that there are 500,000 persons who have more than one vote owing to their residential or property qualifications in more than one constituency. One vote one value, cries the Unionist, who points out that in England it takes 10,521 electors to return one member, whereas in Scotland 9,321 suffice, and in Ireland only 7,000. Seventy thousand electors in Ireland have 10 members; 70,000 in England only 7. And in England the same disproportion exists between one constituency and another. From all of which it appears that the General Elector is fearfully and wonderfully made. He is difficult to get into being, costly to record his opinion, and when it is recorded there exists no standard of value by which its weight can be appraised.

All this, however, sinks into insignificance beside the arrangement by which our poor Tsar, the General Elector, is mocked by the Oligarchical Constitution under which he is content to live.

For the unfortunate General Elector is really living in a vain show. He is but a puppet Tsar at best. When the five millions of him have with infinite pains been enabled to record their sovereign will and pleasure, and have succeeded in returning a majority on one side or another, he is apt to consider when he has returned a Liberal m jority, that, to quote Hosea Bigelow, he has only just been changing the holders of offices. The new Parliament meets, and the General Elector waits to see the result of his exertions. is a new Ministry, no doubt, and so far that is to the good; but when that new Ministry gets to work, it finds itself in a very different position from that of a Minister charged with a Ukase from a real Tsar. If the election has taken place upon one specific point, and the response of the General Elector has been decisive and overwhelming, then it is possible that a Bill embodying the views of the Elector may pass into law; but that is only when the Elector's will has been unmistakably made known, not for the first time, but for the second, and even for the third.

On all other questions on which the General Elector has expressed a decided opinion, but which could not be said to be the dominant issue submitted to him at the General

Cartoon by " Veritas" (M. Hitchcock).]

The Brave Lion and the Two Terrible Wild Boars.
Drawn to Scale.

With apologies to the author of "The National Cartoon.")

Election, he is absolutely powerless to prevent the rejection of any and every Bill in which his wishes are embodied. In other words, while the General Elector is mocked with a semblance of power, the real sceptre is held in perman-ence by the House of Lords, whose four hundred members appeal to no constituency, but sit by virtue of hereditary privilege and right of birth, with a perpetual mandate to veto any and every scheme submitted by the House of Commons which they do not like, and which is not literally forced upon them by overwhelming popular pressure. The Grand Elector, therefore, while he can make a Liberal statesman a prime minister, and can pass one bill, if he is very angry and has expressed his opinion with emphasis when appeal was made to him upon that specific question, has no more power beyond this. Our so-called democracy is really a vast oligarchy, and until there is radical alteration in the position and power of the House of Lords, every general election is more or less of a solemn Of course when the majority is Conservative it does not matter, for then the two Houses are in accord; but how much longer the General Elector will consent to be ruled in permanence by the Conservatives, whose majority in the House of Lords is as overwhelming as it is unchangeable, remains to be seen. But that such an arrangement should continue to exist seventy years after the Reform Bill is a striking proof of the ease with which a democracy can be cheated out of the substance of power if it is allowed to play with the bauble of the semblance

There is one very remarkable thing concerning the General Elector at this General Election, and that is that he has been left entirely without any spiritual or religious guidance. At the election of 1892 the heads of all the Churches combined to give advice to the electors as to how they should exercise their functions, especially in the selection of candidates of high moral character. might have been thought that if there was anything in the theory of the responsibilities of the Church to the State, when the supreme appeal is made to the electors to decide a vast number of questions of the first religious and moral importance, our spiritual masters and pastors would at least have thought fit to remind the laity of some considerations which in the heat and strife of the election are too often forgotten. It would, for instance, be a distinct gain if the Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal Vaughan, and the President of the Free Church Federation, and the Jewish Rabbi, would combine to issue a manifesto addressed to the candidates reminding them that the command "Thou shall not bear false witness against thy neighbour," is not repealed during election times, and at the same time they might remind electors that "Thou shall not kill " still stands in the decalogue, nor can it be pleaded in justification of its breach that the killing is profitable for national prestige, for the acquisition of new markets, or even for the stealing of gold mines. It is not my purpose, however, so much to point out what our spiritual guides should tell us as to comment as a humble layman upon the extraordinary fact that when the nation is in the valley of decision it has received absolutely no guidance one way or the other from those whose profession it is to interpret the law of God to man.

So far, I have dealt with the great question which is supposed to be submitted to the adjudication of the general elector. It would, however, be an immense mistake to think that it is with reference to these leading issues that the majority of the electors cast their votes. A multitude of by-issues, some local, some sectional, combine to obscure the judgment and to render it impossible to regard every vote as the serious judgmen pronounced upon the question of the day. Of all these by-issues there are two which cast all others into the shade. The first is spirituous, the second is spiritual. The private circular which was issued to the electors of Battersea on behalf of the trade, sums up in a sentence the logic of Boniface and the brewer. It runs thus: "Do not vote for John Burns. He is your greatest enemy. He always votes against you, lock, stock and barrel. Now is your chance to vote against him." This appeal addressed to the publicans of Battersea probably affected more votes than all the denunciations which the patriots have levelled against what they are pleased to call the pro-Boer or unpatriotic attitude of Mr. Burns. That which is done in Battersea was done everywhere else. The trade constitutes a standing army always mobilised and always ready to take the field. The only other class interest which can be compared to it is that of the clergy of the Established Church. They are, as a rule, as ready to subordinate the interests of the nation to the interests of their sect as the publican is to subordinate the welfare of the Empire to that of the tap-room.

This leads me by natural transition to speak of another issue which is peculiar to this election, the electoral effect of which is somewhat difficult as yet to estimate, and that is the determined effort that has been made by the strong Protestant party to exact from all candidates a pledge that they will to the best of their ability support the movement for harrying the Ritualists out of the Church. They have raised a large sum of money for the circulation of millions of leaflets, and they have in some instances succeeded in compelling the retirement of candidates who were not sound according to the standard of Mr. Kensit. Secular persons must marvel that good men should attach more importance to the number of candles that should be lit in daytime in the church than to the question whether or not we have done the will of the Prince of Peace in setting the torch to innumerable Boer homesteads, merely because they happened to stand within ten miles radius of a spot where a perfectly legitimate act of war was committed.

All these questions, however, are questions of detail. The election is really a plebiscite, and a plebiscite of the most dangerous kind. The real issue and almost the only issue upon which the General Elector is allowed to have a vote, is whether he is for or against Mr. Chamberlain. It is a vote not so much for or against this or that principle, but for or against a particular man, who although not a soldier, appeals to the constituency; he is the author of a war which, however humiliating it may have been in its incidents, terminated in the destruction of our enemy. From this to the appeal of a successful soldier for a popular vote, enabling him to govern the country as he pleases, there is not a very great step. The Government is avowedly appealing for support on the strength of the victories of Lord Roberts. It is obvious that if Lord Roberts himself were a candidate, Mr. Chamberlain's claims for support on military grounds would have to take a very far back seat. So long as our army constitutes an infinitesimal part of the population, and that by no means the most influential, the danger which constantly haunts the minds of the French Republicans will not be very real in this country: but we are on the inclined plane which leads with fatal descent to military dictatorship, and when that day comes the Tsardom of the General Elector will disappear. He will be a General Elector no longer. Having installed his successor in the shape of the successful soldier he will be relegated to limbo.

beau this less whic recei class and world with

recei

infini

which

tions sure schoo work ampl a lad all the : husba pital, some is a a lov pictui pleasi forwa galler tinue numb are e letter clergy that be us We s courag this 6 quotin large are to school metho to im beauti young purpos beauty while after s of ligh

No. 3

Our sake of of Wa given illustra Beside and en

in eve

A PORTFOLIO OF BEAUTY.

S announced in the last issue of the Magazine the latest number of our Masterpiece Portfolio is defamous painters, viz.:—"Head of a Girl, with Scarf," voted to a series of well-known pictures of female beauty by English and French portrait painters. And this No. 4 seems to be no less appreciated than those which preceded it. Letters received every day from all classes of the community, and from all parts of the world, testify to the interest with which the pictures are received, and not less to the infinite variety of ways in which the artistic reproductions are made to bring pleasure into the home and the school, the hospital and the workhouse. Here, for example, is a letter in which a lady says : " I have taken all the portfolios up to the present date to my husband who is in a hospital, and will be there for some months to come. He is a retired General and a lover of art, and these pictures give the greatest pleasure to him; he looks forward to his 'little picture gallery,' and I shall con-tinue to take them as the numbers come out, for they are excellent." The next letter is from a country clergyman, who is so pleased that he orders No. 1 and No. 3 by the hundred, to be used as school prizes. We shall be glad to encourage others to follow this excellent example by quoting special terms for large quantities when they are to be given away as school prizes. No better method could be adopted to implant a love of the beautiful in the minds of young people. One great purpose of picture study is that of opening the eyes to beauty about us, which an artist's trained eye perceives while it is missed by others; and many a boy and girl after seeing, say, Rembrandt's love for beautiful contrasts of light and shade, will all the rest of their lives notice and enjoy more of the exquisite effects of light and shade in even the most commonplace surroundings.

Our No. 4 Portsolio will be much in request for the sake of the very pretty collotype picture of the Princess of Wales, permission to publish which was very kindly given by the artist, Mr. Hughes. The accompanying illustration will show the composition of the painting. Besides this attractive portrait, however, the folio contains

Greuze; "The Artist and her Daughter," Madame Lebrun; "Madame Mola Raymond," Madame Lebrun; "Portrait of Mrs. Siddons,"

Gainsborough; "The Hon. Mrs. Graham," Gainsborough; "The Broken Pitcher," Greuze; "Portrait of the Countess of Oxford," Hoppner; "The Countess of Blessington," Lawrence; "Lady Hamilton as Spinstress," Romney; "Portrait of Madame Recamier," David; "The Duchess of Devonshire," Gainsborough and Mrs. Braddyll," Reynolds. As long as England has had any art to speak of, the portrait painter has flourished here; and it will be seen that such masters in the art of portrait painting as Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, Laurence and Hoppner, are all represented in this shilling folio, to say nothing of French artists like Greuze, and David and Madame Le Brun.

The Animal Portfolio (No.3) has, naturally enough, become a favourite among school teachers, whilst among the general public it is eagerly sought after if for no other reason than thisthat it is the only way by which so perfect a reproduction of Sir Joshua Reynolds' picture in the National Gallery, "The Cherub Choir," can be obtained for a shilling. Our plate is 16 in. by 131 in. (without a margin), and when framed in a flat green or brown moulding with a bevelled gilt slip close up to the edge of the print, the picture will delight even the most critically artistic purchaser. It is very curious, however, to note the steady persistency with which the No. 1 Portfolio, with Burne-Jones's "Golden Stairs," still keeps its place beyond all doubt as prime favourite. Apropos of this we have an interesting and helpful communication from Mr. Hy. T. Bailey, State Agent for the Promotion of Industrial Drawing in Massachusetts, who says, "Do you care for an American appreciation of your Masterpiece Portfolios?

If so, then let me begin by saying that your 'Golden Stairs' is by far the best reproduction of that masterpiece which I have ever seen."

H.R.H. the Princess of Wales.

(By permission of the artist, Mr. Hughes.)

udgmen all these into the spiritual. ectors of tence the s : " Do enemy. l barrel. s appeal affected patriots the prowhich is he trade d always interest y of the ready to erests of elfare of al effect and that e strong pledge port the Church. ne circun some ment of standard at good mber of rch than e will of merable ened to e a per-another

e of the nost the lowed to . Chamthis or ir man. tuency: niliating l in the peal of a ng him t a very aling for Roberts. a candif detail.

So long of the luential, s of the ountry : ith fatal y comes ar. He alled his e will be military

Photograph by]

MISS ELIZABETH ROBINS.

[H. S. Mendelssohn.

in th with minu I tolme i to th famo diver mere Amn mou view drop more coats I me I ha phete who rent earn was she appli me t fectly to th boar coun Or hear been come forth to so more Nom within her ende to obt the ende to obt the ende to obt the ende to the end to

THE YERY LATEST GOLDFIELD IN THE ARCTIC CIRCLE.

LETTER FROM MISS ELIZABETH ROBINS.

T is ten years ago since I first had the pleasure and privilege of making the acquaintance of Miss Elizabeth Robins. I remember it as if it were yesterday. It was in the summer of 1890. I had just brought out my book on Ober-Ammergau, when a card was brought in to me with the message that its owner wished to see me for a minute. Not having the least idea as to who she was, I told them to send her in, and the next moment found me face to face with Miss Robins. As I do not go to theatres, I apologised for not recognising her as the famous Ibsenite actress, who had virtually created the rôle of Hedda Gabler on the English stage. The remark diverted her from her original purpose, which had been merely to ask for an introduction to somebody at Ober-Ammergau who would enable her to study the mounting of the Passion Play from the point of view of the stage manager. This, however, immediately dropped into the background, and I found myself once more in the presence of a categorical imperative in petti-My first experience of the kind was when I met Olive Schreiner fifteen years ago, since which time I had not met as charming a representative of a prophetess with a message. Olive Schreiner's message those who know her can divine. Miss Robins's was of a different nature, but it was delivered with no less decision and earnestness, which was charming to behold. Her theme was the wickedness of boycotting the theatre, upon which she preached so fervent a sermon, so full of personal application and striking illustration, that it almost sent me to the penitent form. I fear that I was but imperfectly converted, for I have not yet paid my maiden visit to the theatre, not even to see Hedda Gabler on the boards; but from that day to this I have been proud to count Miss Elizabeth Robins as one of my best friends.

One can imagine then with what dismay it was that I heard at the beginning of this year that the idea had been borne in upon her mind, or in some way or other had come to encompass her whole being, that she must set forth all alone to the uttermost parts of the earth, in order to see a beloved relative who she feared was sick. Klondike is out of the world, but Cape Nome is even more far removed from civilisation; but it was to Cape Nome of all places in the world, that new Eldorado within the Arctic Circle, that she must fare forth to seek her kinsman. From the first I saw it was no use to endeavour to dissuade her, for with such natures to hear is to obey the inward call. So as soon as the ice broke, in the early spring months of this year, Miss Robins took her passage on one of the first steamers to Cape Nome, and there she spent some eventful months this summer. Her descriptions of life in Cape Nome, in the strange newly improvised city that has sprung up more than half-way to the North Pole will, I hope, appear shortly in some newspaper or magazine, and will, I suppose, afterwards reappear in a book of travel which ought to be one of the successes of the publishing season, for Miss Robins is not only a delightful friend and, I understand, a most gifted actress, but she is also a writer of very considerable literary powers, combining grace of style, originality of thought, and the limitless audacity of the seeress. I was accumulating her letters until they were sufficient to permit of consecutive and rapid publication, when I was grieved by a telegram announcing that on her way home Miss Robins had been stricken down with typhoid fever, and was in the hospital at Seattle. There she lay for some weeks, fortunately in good hands, and the other day I had a welcome telegram to the effect that her health was almost restored and she hoped soon to be able to leave the hospital. All being well, her many friends may expect to welcome her back to London before many weeks are over, when it is to be hoped we shall find her none the worse for her adventures in the Arctic Seas.

Among her other contributions—a little heap of which is now lying before me, pending choice of a fitting channel for publication—she sent me on July 16th a letter describing the foundation of the very latest of these Arctic gold towns which are springing up like mushrooms in the frozen North. It is curious that whereas the digging of gold has hitherto been chiefly carried on under torrid skies—under the blazing sun of Australia, Africa and California—all the more recent gold finds have taken place in the region of eternal frosts. But without more introduction, I print Miss Robins' letter:—

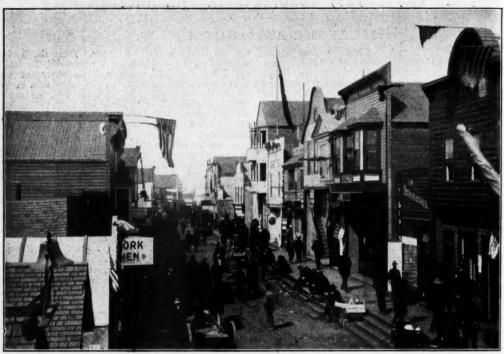

Grantley Harbour, or New Town, Port Clarence District, Alaska. July 15th, 1900.

I have to-day been present at the birth of a new campa future city. Twenty-four hours ago this bit of gravelly shore between Port Clarence and Grantley Harbour (about seventy-five miles north-west from Nome) was, like all the surrounding country, the home and hunting-ground of a few scattered Esquimaux.

But there were rumours afloat in Nome and other camps of a new strike up in the region of the Kougerok River, and of good prospects in the neighbouring creeks and gulches.

Yesterday some English and Americans landed on this point, and to-day in my presence a town was staked out and called-temporarily-Grantley Harbour, after the fine body of water it looks out on to the north-east. Whether the name of this town, like that of Nome (which started out as Anvil City), will later be changed-at all events the site which white men tramped over to-day. surveying, shaping into streets, blocks, lots, purposing settlement and civil government here for the first time since the creation of the world-this fine dry tongue of land between the two great harbours which yesterday morning was the haunt of ptarmigan, wild geese, and a handful of the vanishing race of Esquimaux, is to-night the town of Grantley Harbour echoing with the sound of English speech, and dotted with the tents of Anglo-Saxondom. Already it has elected a Mayor and sundry officials. It has a public spirit, as exemplified in the indignation expressed against the missionaries for letting the sick natives die like sheep, giving them tracts and Bibles instead of the sorely needed food and medicine. Let it be recorded to the credit of Grantley Harbour that before men staked their lots they found time to show humanity to the Esquimaux, among whom the prevalent eridemic, a kind of pneumonia, is raging.

Looked at on a glorious July day, there are few townsites equal to this. Imagine a great land-locked harbour to the south and west (Port Clarence Bay), and, stretching inland through a strait, another body of water, widening out to the north and east of the new town, which thus commands the water system draining that whole vast section of Alaska by way of the Kougerok, the Noxapaga, the Agiopuk and other great rivers, and the lakes (really inland seas) Emuruk and Cowyinik, and other waters in the regions north and east, which upon the newest maps are marked "unexplored." Men stood to-day upon the tongue of land commanding this terra incognita, that held no human soul knew what—but commanding, too, by the great Port of Clarence, the highway to the riches of the South. And the men establishing that new outpost, water-washed north, east, and west, said, "This town will hold the key."

Main Street of Nome. A Photograph taken on July 13th.

What the future and the energy of our race combined will bring about up there, it is no concern of mine to prophesy. What I saw was perhaps more beautiful than the things that are to be. A pebbly strand sloping sharply down from a natural flower-garden, luxuriant grass, starred with anemones and bluebells, and flowers I had no name for, but whose faces I had seen on far-off Southern hillsides and in English meadows. Here and there on the landward side, standing out sharp against the glorious evening light, were the high perched Indian graves—bodies bound up in blankets and lashed with seal and reindeer thongs to the rude driftwood platforms, raised from eight to twelve feet above the ground.

Below, on the Point, the half-dozen stained and tattered Esquimaux tents were hung about with fishing-nets, skin boats, poniaks, and weather-worn rags of every description. Kyaks are lying near, and sleds, and—fastened high up out of reach of dogs—clusters of what I took at first for game, but they were bunches of dried fish, the stiff, black shapes like dead birds' outspread wings silhouetted against the light.

Above the picturesque grime of the little Esquimaux group the tents of Anglo-Saxondom shine white and clean. Driftwood fires are burning before them, and sunburnt, sturdy men are preparing supper. The coffee smells very fragrant as we pass. A youth of Scandinavian aspect is drawing a pan of well-browned bread out of the one Yukon stove in the camp. We had meant to stay at the settlement of Port Clarence, where there would have been no difficulty in finding a Road House (rude pioneer lodging and eating-house); and here we were in a place not yet set down on the most ortimistic map-a "town" that a few hours ago had no existence—and we without camp outfit (only biscuits and oranges), at five o'clock in the evening. There seemed nothing for it but to hire a boat and return ignominiously to the abominable little cockleshell we had just left (the Elk), or go out to one of the bigger vessels that dotted Port Clarence Bay and beg to be taken on board. But, hungry as we were, we remembered the dirt and the execrable food one finds on all these coasting steamers, and here was clean dry land, very unlike the soaking Nome tundra, and here were bright camp fires-and oh, the coffee must surely be the very best ever brewed by mortal man!

We asked a competent-looking person, who seemed to be in charge of things, if we could get a tent for the night. Our interlocutor turned out to be an Englishman representing a British syndicate. After a very slight parley, he pointed to a brand new A-tent lying flat on its poles a few feet from where we stood. "That is quite at your service," he said; and a couple of blankets in a corner of one of the other tents was offered to my escort. He made acknowledgment, and began to pull out the tent poles preparatory to "putting up." "You needn't in a and dinn "ca walk end spit, saw stock "Pe cent Is the risin said to se pea wol roa mine belie bette find nibb "wh when to be that, Enguine in h

pern stov with says But laid It w were vari wan bear coffe wan dinr popi gath pub we o of n was Gra

inac desp judg com whice off over know here loca you ther stak

proj

stay

to bother about that," said the Englishman; "I'll have my men attend to it in half an hour. You'd better come, in a few minutes, and have some dinner." And we "came"—after walking to the end of the sandspit, where we saw a sign in wellstocked tent, also "Peaches 50 cents. a dozen." stopped, read the legend with rising spirits, and said I should like to see those same peaches. "So would we!" roared the miners; but I believe they were better pleased to find a chuckako

Three Nome Prospectors.

nibbling at their bait than if I'd produced a bushel of "white heath clings." Returning to the English camp, where were none of these delusive promises, we were not permitted to join the standing group round camp-fire and stove, dining on their feet, tin plate in hand piled high with smoking-hot beans. "Sure sign of a prosperous camp," says one, "when men can't even sit down to their dinner." But for us a box was put in the middle of a tent, one bag laid down for me, and another for my escort to sit upon. It was the only tête-à-tête dinner I ever ate, where there were half a dozen butlers-hosts rather, agreeable men of various nationalities to fly and get you everything you wanted. There was corned beef, and ham, and pork and beans, and fresh bread and butter, biscuits, capital coffee (quite as good as it smelt), and, for any one who wanted it, a chasse of whisky to wind up with. After dinner we went up the shore a bit to where the modest populace, to the number of less than a score, were gathering round the hour-old mayor to listen to his first public and official utterance. He was just beginning as we came up, and he stopped a moment, catching sight of my escort, for the young municipal judge of Nome was not unknown, it seemed, to the middle-aged mayor of Grantley Harbour. He hesitated—and silence and inaction fell upon the first town council, but presently, despite unexpected onlookers in the shape of a Nomite judge and a nomad lady: "I have been chosen by the committee to tell you boys about this new town which has just been surveyed "-the mayor looked off to where a man in the distance was still bending over a transit-"is being surveyed, and to let you know under what conditions you can stake lots here. Now, if you boys have come to stay, or to locate and improve, and so hold property here, I can tell you you've got hold of a good thing. You can start up there from the government surveyors' limit-post, and stake as far down the coast as you like. It is a good proposition, boys, for Grantley Harbour has come to stay." (Then followed a rough but picturesque description of the town site's geographical advantages.) When he found that his eloquence had not intoxicated his little audience he laid on the colour somewhat thicker winding up: "Not that have any interest in the matter, I have simply been chosen to lay the situation before you. We have a qualified Recorder here. and if you boys choose to come along with me I'll show you how to stake your claims, and you can have 'em recorded for five dollars each. I'm not urging anybody, I'm only pointing out how any fellow who has any use for a town lot in this" (more colour) "metropolis that is to be, can have it by coming with me and getting his lot fixed before the rush. Now that's all I've got to say, boys; that's all the committee deputed me to say." Voice in the group, "What committee?" Orator stumped. "The—a," he looks vaguely off at the surveyor, then recovering his official command of the situation he spits with sudden energy upon the virgin soil between the mayoral feet, "the committee appointed by those—those who have the interests of this place at heart." As every soul on the sand-spit except two or three Englishmen and a handful of natives were in the group, the committee must have wished to remain incog. But the mayor, undaunted, went on, wound up with a little flourish and started off full tilt up the shore, populace at heel. And so is a town born on the borders of the "unexplored region."

Judge Van Dyck, seeming superior to the charms of town lots, turned to walk back with me toward the tent, which had been put up in our absence, and was now standing forth bravely in all the angular pride of its upright A-ness. But it was too soon to turn in. We walked about, looked at the homes of the Esquimaux, the living and the dead, saw from the height the great harbour full of ships, chiefly whalers, some Government transports and coasting steamers schooner-rigged. There was the Wanderer with the square-built crow's nest of the whaler, the Alexander, first ship in at Nome this year, the John Winthrop, the Karluc, the graceful white-hulled government ship Seward, the Aloha, and our despised diminutive Elk, transformed by the glorious late sunset into a radiant thing of grace and

When we get back to camp my tent is ready and furnished, dressing-bag and my few effects arranged beside a bed of our own rugs and furs made on the bone-dry gravel. After saying good-night to my hosts and to the Norse cook, here sit 1 in my new white house, as fine

uimaux
te and n, and coffee navian
of the
to stay would e (rude vere in

e (rude vere in nap—a and we at five it but inable out to ce Bay finds in dry here surely ned to or the hman slight on its ite at in a scort.

edn't

as any princess, writing to my friends across the sea by the after-glow of the sunken sun at a few minutes to The Esquimaux dogs are howling at intervals, and all the time, boom! boom! the surge is beating on the shore a few yards behind me.

As I lay down my pen and begin to think of going to sleep, a voice outside. The Judge is asking if I am warm and all right. "I've just staked two town lots," he says. "Good-night."

I am nearly asleep, when other voices arouse me just a little—on the left this time, by the camp fire. I hear the clink of the granite cups, and I know that a midnight Kafee Klatsch is on among the Englishmen's men. A good many "By G—ds!" and the infectious laugh of the Irishman Mike. Several times I hear a man's name called: "Egerton, Egerton!" and then "Howard!" Another is spoken of as "Seymour;" and sleepily I fall to thinking of the vitality there is in some of the old English names-how their bearers go up and down on the earth and the seas, heading still for "regions unexplored," as they did in the days of Drake, making gold and founding cities, and sending the old names sounding lustily down the ages. "I am here with Brandon's outfit," someone was explaining. "My partner is a descendant of Sir Walter Raleigh. He was a favourite of Queen Elizabeth, you know. Do you remember how he got in with the old lady? She didn't know him never heard of him, and she was on her way to one of the Thames barges. She had to cross a puddle. Well, sir, this chap Raleigh, he offs with his cloak, all over gold and stuff, and, by G-d! he slings it into the puddle for her to step on. He hadn't a penny, and he wasn't anybody; just a fightin' feller, you know, and belonged at that time to—a—I think it was the Duke of Suffolk's outfit." The voices grow indistinct, and soon there is no echo on these shores of Queen Elizabeth and Sir Walter; no sound in the day-old town but the beating of the eternal surf and the snarling of the Siwash dogs.

"Sluicing" on the Beach at Nome.

Bern

Peac Paris me. mori writi Con recei ably and fourof th nigh natio after cour of c in m

W

n

water

legen had day

Hofe

Two

a pr

Elect

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

A PARABLE OF THE GENERAL ELECTION.

Ober-Ammergau revisited: "Not this man, but Barabbas!"

I WAS on the lake of the Four Cantons, when on Wednesday, September 19th, I heard that Parliament was to be dissolved on the 25th. The blue waters of the lovely lake, the eternal mirror of the heroic legend of William Tell, lay at my feet. That morning I had crossed the battlefield of Sempach. The previous day I had traversed the Tyrol, threading the valleys of Hofer's country from Innspruck to the Lake of Constance. Two days before I had been at Ober-Ammergau. What a preface to the turmoil and passion of a General Election!

all my meditations and reflexions, I ought to say to my readers, who form one of the most widely scattered congregations of the children of men.

I have noted the diary of the last week not because it may interest any one, but because it will explain perhaps the note of the present article. In the eyes of some it will be a justification, to others it may only be an excuse and partial condonation; but whether justified, excused or condemned, I deem it better to take my readers frankly behind the scenes and allow them to see exactly how it was that I came to be in the mood to say the

"His blood be upon us and upon our children!"

Wednesday night I spent in Berne, discussing with M. Ducommun, the head and heart and soul of the Berne International Peace Bureau, the programme of the Peace Congress, that met the first week of this month in Paris. Then home as fast as the express could take me. I was in Paris at night, in London at six next morning. And for the next week I was absorbed in writing "The Candidates of Cain; a Catechism for the Constituencies," which I finished on the 25th, and received the printed copies two days later. It was a tolerably stiff piece of work, and the printers, Messrs. Clowes and Sons, did their work smartly. Hastily compiling a four-page broadsheet of 15,000 words from the 70,000 words of the original Catechism, I returned to Paris on Thursday night, just a week after I left it. The Union Internationale held an important committee meeting on Friday afternoon, and I had to meet friends of peace from many countries. And now, after this week of whirl and bustle, of constant strain and vivid contrast, I sit down alone in my Paris chamber to say what, as the net resultant of things which I feel must be said, knowing as I do that they will scandalise many. But woe is me if I do not testify to what seems to me the innermost truth of the things which I have seen and heard and the events which are occurring around us in these last days! For all the time that I was travelling to and fro in the classic land of European freedom, all the time I was among the Bavarian peasant players of the Sacred Mystery, all the time I was discussing peace programmes in Berne and in Paris, all the time I was busy writing "The Candidates of Cain," one sound was ever surging in my ears. The cry of a nation in the death agony rang out loud and shrill across land and sea, heard plainly above the roar of cannon, the tramp of armed men, the yells of the drivers, the confused and maddening hubbub of the stampede of the defeated towards the frontier. And ever above the streaming clamour of maddened men and frenzied women was heard the hoarse laughter as of fiends from the nether pit, exulting in the all too articulate placard and editorial over the "glorious" exploits of the British arms.

explored," gold and sounding Brandon's
ner is a favourite her how

w himto one of

Well, sir,

gold and

e for her nybody :

hat time

t." The on these sound in surf and de vic ha

ou pli received the mo

an ph an all pro o f

ha fla be the full of mo lish Ki Pr

ap COL Bu clo rig COL col de has in It mi tho rev las wit use nor Th flor the fine

Ma

the most about to an endered THE STATUE OF ANDREAS HOFER.

The Kruger of the Tyrol.

Day by day came the telegrams describing the widespread devastation that had been wrought by the advance of our victorious troops. A quarter of a million trained soldiers having at last, after twelve months' effort, succeeded in breaking down the resistance of 40,000 undisciplined men and boys, the work of avenging the long-drawnout humiliation of the last year was being accomplished with horrible completeness. The sky flared red with the burning homesteads of the country folk, the veldt was dotted with the figures, frozen and starved, of the women and children upon whom we are waging war.

What twelve months ago was regarded as but an exaggerated phrase is now seen and recognised by all men to be a prosaic definition of what has actually taken place. Hell is let loose in South Africa, and millions of moral. religious and Christian Englishmen are warming their hands at the flames-really believing that they are therefore fulfilling the law of Love and promoting the establishment of the Kingdom of the Prince of Peace.

What a ghastly nightmare it is; what cruel fantasy of delirium it will appear to us all when the inevitable exorcism comes, and John Bull, once more clothed and in his right mind, can contemplate in cold blood the devil's work he has been doing in South Africa! It was with my mind full of such thoughts that I revisited Ober-Ammergau. Ten years had passed since I last spent a week in the village of the Passion Play, but with the exception of the new railway, with its hideous and useless chevaux de frise of electric-wire poles—the line is now worked by steam—nothing seemed changed since 1890. The lofty crag of the Kofel, the clear waters of the swiftflowing Ammer, the picturesque confusion of the streets, the crowded church—all these were as before. Nor did I find much change even in the personnel of the players. Mayer, three times Christus, is the stately central figure of the Chorus. His hair is white, his beard almost as white as mine. Ten years have bleached us both. "It is now winter for us," he said cheerily—but the snows of age have added dignity to a figure always impressive. Anton Lang, the new Christus, a potter only twenty-five, who looks ten years older, is weaker and softer than his predecessor. Mayer, the third time that he took the part, was almost too majestic in his conception of the Son of God. Anton Lang portrays rather the suffering and sympathising Son of Man. In other respects very little has been changed. There is a new Caiaphas and a new Maria, but Judas and John and most of the disciples are as they were. There is a new theatre also, so that 4,000 persons can now sit out the play whether snow or rain is falling outside, without more than a thousand of them getting wet. For the seats between the best places and the stage as well as the front of the stage are open to the sky.

The play-as before, perhaps even more than before-is faultlessly mounted, and the setting of the scenes, the grouping of the performers, and the whole stage business is simply marvellous. From a merely artistic point of view the play is almost as wonderful as it is unique. Madame Patti was one of the audience on September 16th, but not even she had ever seen in any opera house in Europe so vivid and natural a piece of realistic acting as the mustering of the crowd which came together to demand "not this man, but Barabbas." The music, under the direction of Jakob Rutz, in whose house I stayed, is sweetly simple and quaintly pathetic. The strains of some of the melodies haunt the ear long after the chorus has defiled to right and left in their often repeated march from the stage. And more than all else the spirit, the reverence, the simplicity of the people are unchanged. It is almost as strange this, as the miracle of the burning bush. Hither come every week, often twice and sometimes even thrice a week, four thousand visitors from all parts of Europe to admire, to praise, and to pay. And notwithstanding this incursion of the outer world, the Ammergauers remain as unchanged, as simple, and as delightful as their cows, the tinkling of whose bells makes sweet music on their hills.

The Winkelried Monument at Stanz.

Of the play itself I have little or nothing to add to what I wrote six years ago, except perhaps this—that, owing it may be to the inaction of the Christian Church, and the worse than inaction of many Christian ministers in hounding their people on to war, the objection, brought on the ground that it is wicked to make a stage play of the story of the Passion, seems to me even more idle than it did in 1890. It is not that the Passion Play has gained in reality; it is that so often the services of the Churches have sunk perceptibly to the level of the most unreal of theatricalities. The Church Congress, which met last year at a time when one strong vigorous demonstration on the part of the united clergy against war to avenge Majuba, and against war before the alternative of arbitration had been tried, never opened its mouth to say one word for peace. This year, after the bloody butchery which its silence rendered possible is visible to all men, the Congress meet again to listen to essays by reverend gentlemen in praise of war. Dean Farrar, in one of the magazines, revives with complacent approval Wordsworth's line, "Yea, Carnage is God's daughter," forgetful of Byron's response, "Then Carnage, I suppose, is Christ's sister." The conscience of mankind outside the British Isles shudders at the unspeakable horrors that have been committed by British troops, who have been employed simply and solely because our British Government refused to accept the alternative of arbitration. But these ministers of Christ or of Moloch exult in combining Christ and Carnage, and-while the rooftree is burning over the heads of women and children whose husbands and fathers we can only beat when we are six to their one—they say their prayers and sing their hymns and preach their sermons, and imagine that this is religion! The Passion Play may be a blasphemous farce, as some pious critics who have not seen it aver; but it is a thousand times less of an unreality and an abomination than the "Divine worship" that is offered in churches by men whose hands are dripping red with their brother's blood. How often Lowell's lines recur to the mind in these days when noting the punctiliousness of pious folk over attendance at Divine Service and the due performance of ritual, the omission of this gesture or the introduction of this vestment, while not a word of protest or of pain arises from pew or pulpit over the tortures which we have deliberately inflicted upon the least of these His brethren in the African veldt, because we chose to prefer war to arbitration! Our Churches, said Lowell, have become the mere sepulchre of their Risen Lord, Divine Service a mere formal mustering, as for roll call, of men in the empty tomb. He went to seek for Christ, he says :-

All must on stated days themselves imprison,
Mocking with bread a dead creed's grinning jaws,
Witless how long the life had thence arisen.
Due sacrifice to this they set apart,
Prizing it more than Christ's own loving heart.

In such mood it was that I took my seat in the theatre at Ober-Ammergau on Sunday morning, September 16th, 1900. But before proceeding with the parable of the Passion Play and the General Election, let us glance at the region in which this mystery or miracle play has survived down to our time.

II.—THE LAND OF HOFER AND OF TELL.

In the heart of middle Europe there stretches a long and broken parallelogram of mountains where for centuries Liberty has found her central citadel. The plain is ever the throne of Despotism; but the mountain is the natural rampart of Freedom.

Two Voices are there; one is of the Sea, One of the Mountains—each a mighty Voice. In both from age to age Thou didst rejoice; They were Thy chosen music—Liberty!

The Tell Monument at Altdorf.

This mountain-walled region, dedicated from creation to be a sanctuary of liberty, is divided into two parts—the Western Switzerland, the Eastern the Tyrol. The Switzers and the Tyrolese are the most conspicuous instances of hardy mountaineers who have availed themselves of the resources of their mountains to baffle the forces of their would-be conquerors. The heroic tradition of William Tell and his confederates who met in the meadow at Rutli, the splendid self-sacrifice of Arnold of Winkelried, the glories of Sempach and of Morgarten, are counted everywhere among the most precious heirlooms of the heritage of man. Every school-boy throughout the civilised world glows with enthusiastic admir which baffle milita famili which of the Oberland. Tyro despe suc

fro Pla

mo fan

Pa

bri

mo

Wil

pa ne

en

TELL.

s a long here for el. The nountain

nountain

e.

damiration as he reads of the indomitable heroism with which these rude mountaineers, herdsmen, and smiths baffled again and again the disciplined soldiery of great military empires. The story of the Tyrolese is less familiar to universal man. But the heroic resistance which they offered to Napoleon in 1807 inspired several of the finest of Wordsworth's sonnets, and the tradition of Hofer's valour and Hofer's sacrifice is as inspiring as that of Tell, and is more recent and more historic. In Ober-Ammergau we are on the threshold of Hofer's land. Ober-Ammergau itself stands in the Bavarian Tyrol, and the Bavarians were among the tools of despotism by which Napoleon attempted, and at last

Portrait of Hofer.

succeeded, in crushing the resistance of Hofer. But from the heights around the village of the Passion Play we look out over the great panorama of mountains which form the natural pedestal for the fame of Andreas Hofer. A lovely drive from Partenkerchen through a mountain pass to Zeil brings you into the valley that was the scene of Hofer's most brilliant victories.

The mountains that around us stand Do sentinel enchanted land,— within which was fought one of those desperate campaigns that, although the patriots were overborne by numbers, re-illumined the lamp of liberty in Europe, gave new hope to a well-nigh despairing continent, and enriched the annals of mankind with a story of heroic self-sacrificing valour that will last for generations yet to come.

For there among the untaught poor Great deeds and feelings find a home That cast in shadow all the golden lore Of Classic Greece and Rome.

Great deeds were those of Andreas Hofer and the brave men of Tyrol. In the early years of the century, when dynasty after dynasty crashed and fell before the attack of Napoleon, it was the peculiar glory of the Tyrolese that they almost alone among the small nationalities of Europe refused to bow the knee before the universal conqueror. The Spaniards no doubt kept up a persistent guerilla warfare against the French, but they had the potent help of Wellington, who from his base upon the sea was able to give them assistance, without which they would have fared but ill. The Spaniards also were in the end victorious. Their story lacks the deeper note of tragedy. The Tyrolese fought alone. And although for a season they enjoyed a brief and brilliant success, in the end they were crushed by the overwhelming forces of the enemy. It is true that at one stage in the gallant struggle of the mountaineers they were assisted by five hundred Austrian regulars, but for the most part they fought and conquered singlehanded against a European coalition under the supreme direction of the greatest military genius of the century. Their daring, their valour, their indomitable perseverance, excited the admiration of Europe. Wordsworth, in the series of sonnets which were inspired by the heroism of Hofer, but expressed in verse the emotion which thrilled the most prosaic minds :-

Of mortal parents is the hero born
By whom the undaunted Tyrolese are led?
Or is it Tell's great spirit from the dead
Return'd to animate an age forlorn?
He comes like Phœbus through the gates of morn.

And, again, it was of these Tyrolese peasants Wordsworth said:—

A few strong instincts and a few plain rules Among the herdsmen of the Alps have wrought More for mankind, at this unhappy day, Than all the pride of intellect and thought.

It is true that the cynical observer might have found much to criticise in their gallant resistance to overmastering odds. The armies of Napoleon, it may be said, carried with them the seed of modern freedom. The French may have been violent and apparently lawless, but they were the vanguard of civilisation. Napoleon himself was but the thunderbolt which the Fates were hurling against the feudal system. Hofer was a Catholic, and so superstitious that he spent hours in reading his Bible and praying to the Virgin and the saints. The Tyrolese were fighting for Austria— Austria, the incarnation of the past, the bulwark of tyranny, the bane of the East. Nevertheless mankind refused to allow its natural human sympathies to be deflected by political and philosophical considerations of this kind. It saw, and to this day refuses to see anything else but the natural healthy instinct of a race of brave mountaineers, willingly going to battle and to death to rid their native land of the hated foreigner. Whether it was Bavarians from the north, Italians from the south, or French from the west, they were all alike intruders, bent upon subjecting the valleys of the beautiful Tyrol to a foreign yoke. Politicians may declaim and philosophers may argue, but the heart of humanity never fails to respond to those who count not their lives dear unto them

ation rts— The cuous ailed paffle eroic met e of d of most noolastic if so be that they can deliver their fatherland from the accursed hoof of the invader.

Again to quote Wordsworth, who in his sonnet, "Feelings of the Tyrolese," expresses the sentiment with which all men everywhere regard the struggle of a nationality against those who would annex it against its will:—

The land we from our fathers had in trust,
And to our children will transmit, or die;
This is our maxim, this our piety,
And God and Nature say that it is just.
That which we would perform in arms, we must.
We read the dictate in the infant's eye,
In the wife's smile, and in the placid sky,
And at our feet amid the silent dust
Of them that were before us. Sing aloud
Old songs, the precious music of the heart.
Give herds and flocks your voices to the wind,
While we go forth, a self-devoted crowd,
With weapons in our fearless hands, to assert
Our virtue, and to vindicate mankind.

Three times in the course of the year 1807 Hofer led his mountaineers to do battle for their rustic independence. Twice he was signally, almost miraculously, successful. But when the third time came, and the Tyrolese were handed over by their own sovereign to be divided as a prey amongst the neighbouring States, not all the valour and the genius of Hofer availed against the converging forces of the French and their allies. The mountaineers, who had repeatedly hurled back the tide of invasion, were at last surrounded, overwhelmed. and hunted down like wolves. Hofer and his gallant companions lurked for weeks concealed in almost inaccessible clefts in their native mountains. But treachery did its fatal work, and the end came. Hofer was betrayed into the hands of his enemies and carried off as a prisoner of war to Mantua, where, after a lapse of time, he was murdered-or executed, according to the cant phrase by which Governments disguise the foulness of their crime. Years rolled on; Napoleon went the way of other great conquerors, and then men remembered Hofer. His remains were reverently exhumed and carried across the Alps, in order to be accorded a more than regal burial in the Hof Kirche of Innspruck.

I paid a visit of reverential homage to the tomb of the Tyrolese patriot. I found his statue standing in a place of high honour in the midst of effigies of mighty monarchs whose very names are strange and unfamiliar. But the memory of the peasant leader, the son of the village publican, is as fresh to-day as it was when first his ashes were laid to rest in the Hof Kirche. And as I looked at his statue, and then coming out of the church I looked up at the snow-capped mountains, the eternal monument of the patriot chief, my thoughts reverted to another continent where, against even greater odds, the Hofer of our own times was still keeping up a desperate struggle against the overwhelming forces of the British Empire. And I felt what probably every man in the Tyrol, and not in the Tyrol alone, but everywhere on God's green earth, not poisoned by the selfish interest or not less selfish arrogance of the conquering race, is feeling to-day :-

Shame on the costly mockery of piling stone on stone To those who won our liberty, the heroes dead and gone, While we stand by and see law-shielded ruffians slay Those who fain would win their own, the heroes of to-day.

We reverence Hofer. We hunt De Wet. We count the Tyrolese peasant as one on fame's eternal bederoll worthy to be fyled; but we exult with savage delight over the collapse of Kruger. Yet the Boers, judged by any and every test, are heroes more superb even than Hofer and his Tyrolese. The men of the Tyrol in 1807 always outnumbered the most powerful armies that could be spared to operate against them. They were far more numerous than the Boers. They occupied a much more difficult country, and the whole forces of a great military empire could never be massed for their destruction. The Boers, men and boys together numbering only 40,000, had to withstand the onslaught of the whole military strength of the British Empire. They had not a leader in their midst of scientific military training. They were opposed to the picked generals of an Empire which is practically always at war. Yet against odds, which at last were those of six to one, they kept up the desperate struggle for a whole twelvemonth. They were in the end as unable to save their fatherland as Leonidas and his 300 men were unable to check the advance of Xerxes'

A Mountain Stronghold in the Tyrol.

million. They did not succumb until they had inflicted upon their arrogant foe the loss of 10,000 dead and 50,000 sick and wounded. But that was a bagatelle to the blow which their determined valour dealt to the military prestige of the victor. The Boers, although defeated, have won for themselves imperishable glory, while the much-vaunted prestige of the victor hangs shrivelled like a pricked bladder exposed to the derision of the world. It is Nemesis indeed; but the measure of our retribution is not yet full. Once more to quote Wordsworth:—

It was a moral end for which they fought: Else how, when mighty thrones were put to shame, Could they, poor shepherds, have preserved an aim, A resolution, or enlivening thought? Nor hath that moral good been vainly sought; For in their magnanimity and fame Powers have they left—an impulse and a claim Which neither can be overturned nor bought.

At Peac exhibitor of favor "No was react when Peace of p

Naza

us

10 obsective who start together who bro tha

agi

Cru

Repact

clea

the

Sleep, warriors, sleep! Among your hills repose! We know that ye beneath the stern control Of awful prudence, keep the unvanquish'd soul;

And when, impatient of her guilt and woes, Europe breaks forth, then, shepherds, shall ye rise For perfect triumph o'er your enemies.

III.—THE PARABLE OF THE PASSION.

At a committee meeting held in connection with the Paris Peace Congress, a member, who happened to be a Jew, exhibited a very striking picture representing Christ looking down in sorrow from the clouds of heaven upon the carnage of a battlefield. It was not received with favour. "Too ecclesiastical," objected one member. "Not sufficiently liberal," said another. The picture was not received with favour. To such an extent has the reaction against Christianity gone on the Continent, that when even a Jew uses the sacred figure of the Prince of Peace to point a moral, many even of the sworn-friends of peace resent the introduction of any allusion to the Nazarene! It would have done these liberal and anti-but impotent wrath as they noted the continually increasing enthusiasm of the people for the Prophet from Nazareth. This popular movement culminated in the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, when Jesus, arming himself with a scourge of small cords, drove the traders and the money changers from the Temple. Until Jesus struck at the servants of Mammon, and cleansed the Temple of the tumult of the usurers, His enemies had been powerless. But the moment He laid His hand upon the chartered rights of the moneyed class His doom was sealed. It was the alliance between the Sanhedrim and the traders of the Temple that was fatal to the Galilean, just as in our time it was an alliance between the clerics, the journalists, and the capitalists that brought on this war. No one can see the play without feeling that the pivot upon which everything turns in the great tragedy of the Passion was not the offended pride of the rulers, or the sacerdotal intolerance of the priests, but the simple, everyday, sordid spirit of traders who, to avenge the loss of their usurious gains, slew the Son of God and hanged Him on a tree. As the Chorus sing-

The Mountains around Innsbrück, Hofer's Land.

ecclesiastical friends of peace much good to have visited Ober-Ammergau. For the peasants of the Tyrol have preserved the true tradition of the Christ. When that pathetic but sublime figure appears on the stage the obscuring mists of ecclesiasticism and the prejudices of centuries of intolerant orthodoxy fade away. face to face with the carpenter's son, the Man of Sorrows, the proscribed Revolutionist, the hated heretic to compass whose destruction the most powerful forces of Church and State, of Clericalism and Nationalism, banded themselves together. But that which gives so startlingly modern a note to the Passion Play is the bold relief into which it throws the most salient feature of modern politics—the domination of the money power. The war in South Africa was not more certainly brought about by the action of the financiers than the Crucifixion of Christ was the result of the agitation of the moneyed traders of the Temple. The Crucifixion, like the destruction of the South African Republic, was the work of the capitalist. The very first act in the Passion Play brings this out with the utmost clearness. The Sacerdotalists, the High Priests, and the Jingoes of Jerusalem gnashed their teeth in savage Ist ein getreues Bild der Welt. Wie oft habt ihr durch eure Thaten Auch euern Gott verkauft, verrathen?

Was hier sich uns vor Augen stellt In this that's set before our eyes A picture true of this world lies. How often through your deeds have you Betrayed and sold your God

The mind once turned in this direction becomes absorbed with the parallel. Soon all thought of the historical significance of the story on the stage faded away. I saw no longer Jerusalem and the Temple of 1900 years agone. The whole scene took place in London-in Parliament and in the Stock Exchange. Mary's Son became to me but the symbol of the Dutch nationality in South Africa. Pray do not let any reader imagine from this that I regard the Afrikanders as impeccable or divine. They are neither. But they are sons of men, who assuredly may rank at least with the outcast and the slave as the least of these His brethren, akin to Him in their suffering humanity, being at this moment, indeed, men of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Gradually one by one all the characters became transformed. They still wore their Oriental or Roman costume, but their features were familiar to me, I seemed to recognise their voices. I lived over again

flicted

0,000

blow

pres-

have nuchike a

d. It oution

7 always could be ar more ch more military

n. The 40,000.

military leader

ev were which is hich at esperate

the end and his

Xerxes

the year of strife and strain and struggle now drawing to a bloody close. Nor was it only in the action of the sacred drama that I recognised the eternal types whose contemporary representatives meet us every day in the Senate or in the market place. The series of superb tableaux, living pictures combining the immobility of marble with the reality of living flesh and blood, which portray scenes in the Old Testament story prefiguring the life and death of our Lord, were full of a subtle suggestiveness. There, for instance, was the twelfth tableau, in which Micaiah, the spokesman of the Stop-the-War party of those days, was smitten on the cheek by Zedekiah, the Priest of Baal, for daring to prophesy disaster to Ahab in the war against Benhadad. Micaiah seemed to remind me of Mr. Massingham, of Mr. Crook, and of Mr. Croowright-Schreiner. As for Hezekiah and Ahab, they need not be particularised.

Wer frei die Wahrheit spricht, Den schlägt man ins Gesicht. He who truth does speak Is smitten on the cheek.

is as true to-day as it was in ancient Israel. The stoning of Naboth of course was even more suggestive. General Roberts held on high the huge stone which was to crush Naboth. Generals Buller, French and Methuen were in the rear, possibly sympathising as much with poor Naboth as some of our generals who are known to sympathise with the Boers. The proclamation annexing the vineyard was not visible. It must have been behind the scenes. And now, as then, the warning of the Chorus is sorely needed.

Ihr micht'gen Herrscher dieser Welt Zum Wohl der Menschheit aufgestellt Vergesst bei Uebung eurer Pflicht Des unsichtbaren Richters nicht. Ye rule s of the world, in might Appointed for to do men right, Forget not, as your office ye Fulfil, the Judge ye cannot see.

But to return to the play. The moment that the financiers strike hands with the Clericals and Nationalists a conspiracy is formed which follows pretty closely the lines of recent South African history. No one can have the least difficulty in allocating the parts. The parallel is marvellously close. The fiction of the great Afrikander conspiracy has its counterpart in the plausible fiction that Jesus was at the head of a treasonable conspiracy to throw off the Imperial yoke and proclaim Himself king. Then, as now, side by side with the imaginary conspiracy of the innocent there was a very real conspiracy of those who thirsted for innocent blood. The South African League and the Outlanders' Council would have been recognised even by Mr. Fitzpatrick in the Committee of Action formed by the traders and the Sanhedrim for compassing the ruin of their victims. He would probably accept it as a compliment, for the priests and traders did their work with a thoroughness and a finish which even the South African League could not excel. The methods were much the same in both cases. To organise public opinion, to suborn false witness, to twist the most innocent sayings so as to give them the most mischievous meaning, to get up tumultuous meetings, all these things they do on the stage at Ober-Ammergau exactly as they have been doing it now in Africa and in Britain. The great scene when four separately organised contingents of excited citizens rush down, shouting hoarse cries of vengeance, upon the Trafalgar hoarse cries of vengeance, upon the Trafalgar Square of that day, was most painfully true to life. To have made it an exact reproduction of our mobs, there ought to have been more drunkenness and vulgarity. But that would have offended the audience. It was near enough the real thing, and in nothing as much as in being admittedly got up to order by the interested wirepullers. The mob that clamoured for Barabbas was enthused" by organisers who in our day would be paid so much a head. The high priests and Pharisees were men of business who knew how to put things through, and as there was no lack of money they triumphed at Calvary just as their counterparts have triumphed at Pretoria.

After Christus the part of Judas is of all the most conspicuous and the best acted. The play brings into prominence the good that was in Judas. He was a practical man and a financier to boot. He really loved his Master, and never dreamed that his little plot to force the hand of Jesus and compel Him to assert Himself would lead to His death. When He saw the terrible mistake he made, he felt very much as Mr. Rhodes, the Judas of the Dutch, must feel when he realises how disastrously his policy has played into the hands of his worst enemies, the screaming Jingoes of the coast towns, and has overwhelmed with ruin the people who made him Prime Minister and rendered Rhodesia possible. In his case the dénouement is not yet complete. Let us hope it will resemble the repentance of Peter rather than the despair of Judas.

Another character whom the play to some extent rehabilitates is Pilate. Pilate, as representative of the Roman Empire, stands for that Concert of the Powers which has succeeded collectively to the possessions and the power of ancient Rome. It was his duty-it was his right-to have saved Jesus. But the work was dangerous; how dangerous none can realise until he puts himself in Pilate's place and asks what an Anglo-Indian judge would feel when threatened with the revolt of a dangerous tribe if he persisted in protecting a more or less contumacious mystic who had been condemned by the highest tribunal of his own people for setting on foot a dangerous conspiracy against British rule. Christ, after all, was only a unit. Life was cheap, and Romans did not hesitate to kill. Pilate had shed too much blood to dare to be too squeamish about the taking of a single life. He meant to do well, and his wife—who may in the present case represent the various peace and pro-Boer organisations in Holland, Germany, France and America -urged him strongly not to have anything to do with the death of that just man. Pilate made a much better struggle for Christ's life than the European Concert made for the life of the South African Republic, But in the end they adopted Pilate's course, and handed the doomed one over to the executioners.

Caiaphas of course is Chamberlain. Annas resembles, both in countenance and in counsel, the aged Prime Minister. Nathanael the Pharisee reminded me much of Mr. Hugh Price Hughes. Mr. Morley seemed to speak with the tongue of Nicodemus, and Mr. Courtney was Joseph of Arimathæa. When the false witnesses appeared before the Sanhedrim and testified against the Prophet of Galilee, I seemed to see our leading Jingo editors all in a row. The false witnesses were more careful to speak the truth than our editors have been. They were more like Mr. Cook than Mr. Harmsworth—speaking the truth but applying it so as to convey a false suggestion.

As the play approached its close, the tragic events in South Africa seemed to be absolutely in motion before our eyes. The procession down the Via Dolorosa, the staggering under the Cross, the agony of the sufferer, the tears of the holy women, the coarse and ribald jibes and jests of the vulgar crowd, the exultant pride of Caiaphas and his fellows—all these were veritable reproductions with the fidelity of the kinetoscope of the scenes with which we have been only too familiar for months past. And when behind the curtain we heard the dreadful hammer strokes which nailed the Victim to the Cross, they seemed to me, each of them, as a bulletin mem singi the f voice cryin

In

of vi

recor task.

Tews

agair

veng

mina

playe

Pilat and

They

with

Bara

elect

Him

man

Gene

Char

respo

plair

Only

Char

Bu

TI

hrough, phed at was a y loved to force Himself terrible Rhodes, es how so of his towns, o made oble. In us hope aan the extent of the Powers ns and was his gerous; nself in judge gerous contunighest gerous gerous ll, was id not to dare le life. in the o-Boer merica o with better made in the oomed

mbles, Prime auch of speak y was peared rophet editors reful to y were ng the tion.

ents in before sa, the afferer, ribald cultant were oscope amiliar heard tim to ulletin of victory despatched by General Roberts, complacently recording the progress he was making in his deadly task.

The great scene when Pilate, having challenged the Jews to prove that public opinion is on their side and against Jesus of Nazareth, was simply the General Election anticipated. The motives of pride, selfishness, vengeance, a dread for national safety, and a determination to vindicate personal interests, all were displayed before us, wielded by the organising genius of the Sanhedrim and the Bourse into an irresistible force. Pilate saw in a moment that Jesus was lost. Caiaphas and the traders knew how to organise public opinion. They were experts in running general elections. The disciples, divided, disheartened, without money, and without leaders, could do nothing. There was as little chance of persuading the Jewish populace to reject Barabbas as there is to-day of inducing the British electorate to veto annexation. Once more "Crucify Him! Crucify Him!" is the popular cry. "Not this man, but Barabbas!" sums up the verdict of the General Election. And the self-satisfied smirk of Mr. Chamberlain as he contemplates the acceptance of the responsibility for his blood-guiltiness by the nation was plainly visible on the lips of Caiaphas at Ober-Ammergau. Only Caiaphas is a more dignified figure than Mr. Chamberlain.

But afterwards?

There is one terrible moment in the Passion Play, the memory of which clings and burns. When the chorus is singing "Seht! welch' ein Mensch," immediately before the final scene before Pilate's judgment-seat, the hoarse voices of the populace behind the curtain are heard crying:—

Ans Kreuz mit ihm, Ans Kreuz mit ihm!

In vain the chorus pleads for the innocent victim of the great conspiracy. The cries continue. Then assuming a sterner tone the chorus sings:—

Jerusalem, Jerusalem, Das Blut des Sohnes rächet noch an euch der Herr.

Jerusalem, Jerusalem,
The Lord will yet avenge Messiah's blood on thee!

All undismayed then peals out the defiant challenge :—
"His blood be upon us and upon our children."

And the chorus at its last word solemnly accepts their decision, singing:—

"Yea, let it come upon you and your children."

We all know how that ended. What centuries of agony the Jewish race has passed since that fatal choice was made, and the guilt of slaying the innocent was assumed by the representatives of the people. We in Britain this month have made a similar choice. What will the issue be?—

Careless seems the great Avenger. History's pages but record
One death-grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and His Word.

Right for ever on the scaffold; Wrong for ever on the throne. But that scaffold sways the Future, for behind the dim unknown Standeth God within the Shadow, keeping watch above His own.

A rather terrible reflection this, for those who this month have, by their vote for candidates approving the war, branded their own forehead with the mark of Cain.

But I would not conclude this article without one word of hope. For us and for our children there may be only a terrible looking forward to of judgment to come. But the trampled victims of our vengeance may take comfort from the thought that the Passion Play does not end with the Crucifixion. The last scenes portray the Resurrection and the Ascension. Sursum corda! O children of tribulation! The birthday of the free Afrikander nation of the future may not be further removed from the death-day of the Republic than the three days which divided the Resurrection from the Crucifixion.

Tableau at the Passion Play: the Adoration of the Cross,

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

THE RIVAL PLATFORMS.

MR. H. L. WEST contributes to the Forum for October "A Comparison of the Republican and Democratic Platforms," in which he summarises and characterises the leading features of the declarations of the rival parties. The chief distinction between the two platforms is that the Democrats are specific and make much of one great issue, while the Republicans claim credit for a great many things, but do not state their policy very definitely:—

The Republican declaration consists of an infinite number of brief paragraphs, which scatter like bird-shot discharged from a gun. The vast amount of ground which it covers tends to weaken it, both force and earnestness being totally lacking. The Democratic platform is like a thirteen-inch shell, all the ammunition being practically concentrated in one charge.

IMPERIALISM.

Imperialism is, of course, the one great issue. The points of difference between the two parties are here very clearly defined, but while the Democrats define their policy clearly as being "against the seizing or purchasing of distant islands to be governed outside the Constitution," the Republicans defend their policy by means of generalities such as "conferring the blessings of civilisation," without defining what these blessings are to be.

TRUSTS.

On the subject of trusts the Democrats are equally definite:

What does the Democratic party do? It pledges itself to an unceasing warfare against private monopoly in every form; to enforce existing laws, and to enact more stringent ones requiring publicity; to amend the tariff laws by placing products of a trust on the free list; and to deal severely with corporations which attempt to influence legislation or public affairs. In the Democratic platform, therefore, we find trusts not only severely denounced, but a remedy for the evil suggested. It may not be the proper remedy, but it is, at least, offered to the voter in a straightforward manner.

The Republican platform, on the other hand, indulges in a wholesale condemnation, and "favours such legislation as will effectively restrain and prevent all such abuses, protect and promote competition, and secure the rights of producers, labourers, and all who are engaged in industry and commerce." It is almost impossible to consider this assertion in serious spirit. Judging from the record of the past, the Republican party favours nothing of the kind, or, at least, its leaders do not. Certain it is that under Republican administration the laws against trusts have not been enforced; and the attempt made in the House of Representatives, during the last session of Congress, to pass a constitutional amendment was simply a transparent humburg.

THE MONEY QUESTION.

The issue of Bimetallism has changed since 1806.

The financial planks of the two platforms stand for something entirely apart—the Republican, for the unadulterated gold standard; the Democratic, for an alleged bimetallism based upon the free and unlimited coinage of silver. To this extent the money issue is much more sharply defined than it was in 1896, when both parties were pledged to bimetallism, although promising to secure that result by different paths. The platforms of 1900 are not to be misinterpreted. There can be no room for doubt. There is no disguising of purpose. The Republicans have taken an advanced radical stand, the wisdom of which seems justified by a prosperity which, while it may be only temporary, is at least very real while it lasts.

MINOR ISSUES.

Mr. West sets forth the minor issues to be decided as follows:—

The Republican platform demands protection to American labour, urges restriction of immigration, appeals for the development of the merchant marine—which means a subsidy of at least 9,000,000 dols. a year to a special class—commends civil service reform, denounces negro disfranchisement in Southern States, commends extension of the free rural delivery system, and promises reduction of the war taxes. Upon all of these subjects the Democratic platform is silent. On the other hand, the Democrats suggest amendment of the interstate commerce law, endorse the election of senators by the people, oppose government by injunction, ask for a Department of Labour, and suggest amore rigid enforcement of the Chinese exclusion law; all these subjects being ignored by the Republicans.

But none of these issues are likely to have any great effect upon the voting.

A DEMOCRAT'S VIEWS.

Mr. W. L. Stone writes on "The Campaign from a Democratic Point of View." He declares that Mr. Bryan will be elected:—

Now, as to the election. What are Mr. Bryan's chances? While it is true that Mr. McKinley's plurality over Mr. Bryan in 1896 exceeded 600,000, and that his electoral majority was 95, it is also true that a change of 22,078 votes, properly distributed, would have given Mr. Bryan the States of California, Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, North Dakota, Oregon, and West Virginia, which would have elected him. A change of 38,191 votes, properly distributed, would have added Maryland to the Bryan column, in addition to the States named, and thus given him the selection by a majority of 23 in the electoral college. Of the eight States named, a part were carried by only slight pluralities; and the aggregate opposition vote, not cast for either Mr. McKinley or Mr. Bryan, amounted to 39,438, of which 14,303 were gold Democratic votes cast for General Palmer. These figures make it clear that the Republican victory of 1896 was not so sweeping as some would make it appear; and when we reflect that at least half of the eight States named are ordinarily and normally Democratic, and that all are fairly debatable, and when we further reflect that most of the gold Democrats who deserted the party in 1896 are disposed this year to support the ticket, there is nothing in the returns of the last election to discourage Democrats in striving for a different result this year...

THE PHILIPPINE PROBLEM.

The North American Review for September contains an article by Mr. Marrion Wilcox entitled. "The Filipinos' Vain Hope of Independence." Mr. Wilcox analyses very impartially the negotiations carried on by the American generals on their first landing in the Philippines, and comes to the conclusion that neither of the extreme contentions of American publicists as to the rights and wrongs of the case is correct. From the quotations Mr. Wilcox gives there is no doubt whatever that General Anderson, the leader of the first military expedition, did give Aguinaldo reason to believe that the Americans would not permanently occupy the islands. In spite of this, however, Mr. Wilcox holds that it is quite impossible to restore independence to the Filipinos.

THE DUTY OF GOLD DEMOCRATS.

In the North American Review for September, Mr. M. E. Ingalls writes on "The Duty of Gold Democrats," who, he maintains, ought to vote for the Republican party in the coming Election. He says that the financial

356 questime time Un nation

have

we ar The busin by th In which his be his m railro nativ think

the se

Or Cent the mac. Mr. of th inter canr mac secu rem

of p who The elect of th of th He with select President President Choice

T mer each For State lation State Rep there four through the state of the state of elec E vent Eac

can

in v

question is the permanent issue in 1900 as it was in 1896, and that if the will of the voters is against the Silver this time the question will be regarded as settled for all time:—

Under the gold standard we have become the leading creditor nation, and we are financing the world. We have produced three great crops in succession, and we are feeding Europe. We have had three years of unexcelled manufacturing industry, and we are finding a prompt and generous market all over the world. The American farmer, the American labourer and the American business man were never so prosperous as they are to-day. It is by their suffrages that this Presidential election must be decided. In what direction do their interests lie?

The American farmer is selling for 37½ cents a bushel corn which it costs him 15 cents to produce. His wheat and cotton, his beef and pork are selling at profitable prices. He is spending his money in luxuries and enjoying himself. He is riding in railroad trains, and, as he looks from the car windows over the bountiful harvests, he is taking a new view not only of his native land, which was never fairer or happier, but is also thinking of his new markets and new "possessions" across

How the Constitution Works.

One of the most timely articles in the Nineteenth Century for October is that in which Mr. James Boyle, the American Consul at Liverpool, describes the machinery of "An American Presidential Campaign." Mr. Boyle's article does not deal with any of the aspects of the present campaign; but his article is not the less interesting, for if there is one thing which an Englishman cannot understand about America, it is the complicated machinery devised by the tramers of the Constitution to secure the impartial election of the President.

The intention of the Constitution-makers was to remove the election of the President from the turmoil of party strife, and to leave it to a select body of citizens who should be perfectly free agents:—

Theoretically, the people of the United States do not directly elect their President; but practically they do, although the forms of the Constitution are punctiliously observed. All the citizens of the new Republic wanted Washington for the first President. He was also the universal choice for the second term. From that time, however, politics began to have its influence in the selection of the President, and for one hundred years the President has been selected by popular ballot—although indirectly in theory; that is, the people have chosen their President by vote, while at the same time they have observed the forms of the Constitution, especially designed to avoid the choice of the President by direct popular vote.

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGES.

The President is elected by representative bodies of men known as the Electoral Colleges—one college for each State:—

For example: Take the State of Ohio. It has two United States Senators (and each State, irrespective of size and population, is entitled to two Senators in the Congress of the United States); and Ohio sends twenty-one members to the House of Representatives of Congress. The Ohio Electoral College therefore consists of twenty-three members. There have been four different methods of appointing, or selecting, these electors throughout the different States, but now they are all elected by the people direct, on one general ticket in each State; and it is in voting for these electors that the people practically vote for the President direct.

The Presidential Election is really the election of the electors who elect the President:—

Each political party selects in representative National Convention its candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency. Each party also selects candidates for Presidential electors—a candidate being named from each Congressional District in each

State, and two at large in each State. These candidates' names are placed upon the ballot sheet, generally underneath a party emblem. The voter does not declare in form, say, for instance, that he votes for Mr. McKinley, for President, or for Mr. Bryan for President, but he votes for the electors of his party choice. In so doing he is practically voting directly for Mr. Bryan or Mr. McKinley, for the reason that he absolutely knows that if the Democratic electors are elected, they will, when they meet at the Electoral College of their State, on the second Monday of January, vote for the Democratic candidates for the Presidency and the Vice-Presidency; while he is also absolutely certain that if the Republican electors are elected they will vote for the Republican nominees for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency.

The electors have no legal guarantee whatever that their wishes will be carried out by the Electoral College, but Mr. Boyle says that no case has ever been known in which the electors abused their trust.

GAINS AND LOSSES FOR MR. BRYAN.

In his review of "The Month in America," in the National Review for October, Mr. A. M. Low discusses, as usual, the chances of the candidates for the Presidency. He regards Mr. Olney's declaration in favour of Mr. Bryan as a sign that the Conservative Democrats who opposed Mr. Bryan four years ago, are anxious to return to their party, and also as foreshadowing the adhesion of the Cleveland following. Mr. Olney's example will have great influence in Massachusetts—though there the Democrats are hopelessly outnumbered—and also in other states where the dissident Democrats four years ago made success possible for Mr. McKinley. Mr. Bryan has however received a serious blow from another quarter:—

Unfortunately for the Democratic candidate, Secretary of the Treasury Gage has now infused new vigour into the Silver question, and so adroitly that he has done Mr. Bryan incalculable harm. He has forced Mr. Bryan into a corner from which he finds it almost impossible to extricate himself. In an interview, Mr. Gage has pointed out that if Mr. Bryan should be elected he could order his Secretary of the Treasury to pay off the "coin" bonds of the United States in silver, and he could, without violating the law, force silver on the country in other directions. It has generally been supposed that the gold standard law passed by the last Congress had so firmly buttressed the national credit and made it impossible for the country to be brought to a silver basis, that the men who are more interested in the financial policy of the Government than in anything else have not regarded the election of Mr. Bryan as dangerous in threatening the national solvency. Mr. Gage's interview, however, has revived all the old doubts, and he has explained the situation so clearly that it is quite evident a Silver Secretary of the Treasury could force silver into circulation.

As to the general trend of political sentiment Mr. Low can discern no definite indication.

"THE Telephone of the Future" is announced by Mr. S. A. Raper in the October Windsor. It is an invention of M. Germain, an official of the French Telegraph Department. Its great feature is the utilisation of stronger currents, by means of a more sensitive microphone, composed of silica and other bodies. This makes long-distance telephony a certainty of the near future. "His microphone has already given birth to a microransmitter,' which acts as a loud-speaking telephone over 2,500 miles." The loud-speaking telephone makes possible the reproduction of sounds not directly spoken into it, and along with phonograph and cinematograph will actualise afresh—say in mid-Atlantic—a play first acted in the Lyceum and stored up for the passengers' behoof.

Ir. M. crats," party ancial

cided as American

develop-of at least nds civil

Southern

y system, of these er hand.

ommerce

, oppose

our, and on law;

y great from a at Mr.

chances?

r. Bryan

rity was erly dislifornia.

nd West

38,191

land to nd thus electoral by only not cast

,438, of General

appear;

named

re fairly

he gold

his year the last it result ntains

ipinos'

s very erican

s, and treme is Mr. eneral n, did ricans

pite of ssible

MR. BRYAN'S POLICY FOR THE PHILIPPINES.

MR. E. M. SHEPARD contributes to the American Review of Reviews a paper in which he endeavours to answer the question, what President Bryan could practically do with the Philippines which President McKinley is not now doing or proposing to do? Mr. Shepard thus summarises the difference between the Philippine policy of the two candidates :-

That President McKinley proposes, with the military force of the United States, to complete the conquest of these Asiatic islands, and in future to hold their inhabitants as subjects, with no rights except such as may be granted them by the United States, and with no share, therefore, as matter of right, in the Constitution of the United States. So much is clear; and another thing is equally clear: That Mr. Bryan proposes a reversal of the policy of conquest; that, if elected, he will make no further effort to conquer the islands, unless Congress shall constrain him by resolution or act passed over his veto,—a contingency obviously not worth consideration, for it implies that, though successful at the polls, Mr. Bryan will not have the support of one-third of either house of Congress; that the American troops will, with his approval, remain for no other purpose than to promote the properly expressed views of the Filipino people with respect to their islands; that the Filipino people with respect to their islands; that the Filipinos will be freely permitted, and, so far as may be, aide by American means, to create government in place of that which we have destroyed or suppressed; that Filipino independence will be recognised as soon as there shall appear any government sufficient for recognition which fairly represents the 5,000,000 of civilised natives; that a treaty will then be negotiated, under which the United States will secure proper commercial rights and reasonable guarantees (that is to say, guarantees which are reasonable in view of the distressed condition of the Filipino people) for the protection of American and other foreign rights; and that the port of Manila will be retained by us and conceded by the treaty. Manila is largely European in population and interest; it was conquered from Spain by the United States, and has since remained in its possession; it was never in possession of the Filipinos; it is a proper naval and coaling station; and it is necessary to any protectorate by the United States.

WHAT MR. MCKINLEY HAS DONE.

In carrying out President McKinley's policy, the following things have happened :-

We have sent nearly 100,000 troops to the Philippines and now keep there over 60,000; we have made war upon the Filipinos at a cost of tens of thousands of their lives, and of thousands of American lives, and of hundreds of millions of money; we have aroused their hatred; the moral repute of our nation has suffered; we have sacrificed the ideal of our civilisation and government; and the advocates of a President of the United States seeking re-election, instead of asserting the supreme obligation of the "Immortal" Declaration of Independence, are now compelled to vindicate the exceptions, lamentable, disastrous, and even disgraceful as they have been, which we have permitted, and our inconsistencies in performing its obligations.

WHAT HE MIGHT HAVE DONE.

Mr. Shepard maintains that when the Paris Treaty was concluded, the following course should have been adopted by Mr. McKinley :-

He should have asked the Filipinos to designate their own representatives. If it were not possible to reach all of them, there was, at any rate, a de facto and sufficient government, which should have been asked to take part in the Treaty of Paris, so far as the concerns of its own land and people were to be disposed of. If its commissioners could not, because of Spanish susceptibility, be admitted to the conference, the American commissioners should themselves have conferred with them respectfully and intimately. If the President be sincere in his fear that the Tagalogs will oppress or misrepresent the remaining Filipinos, let him instruct his military subordinates to take care that all civilised Filipinos be permitted to choose their representatives and share in forming the Philippine constitution. Surely we may trust the intelligence and conscience of the officers to certify truly which of the Filipino representatives are truly representative. It would be easy to constitute a government as genuine as was the government of the National Defence of France with which Prince Bismarck negotiated the Treaty of Paris in 1871. If the Filipinos desire Aguinaldo for their president, they should have him; if they desire some one else, they should have him. All this will require patience, self-restraint, and sympathy and tact no doubt far greater than would have been required two years ago; but there are no insurmountable difficulties. new government is established let a treaty be made. If Mr. Bryan be elected it is certain that the Filipinos will regard his subordinates with a confidence which they cannot, if they be human, possibly extend to any subordinates of President McKinley. Our commercial rights, our ownership of the port of Manila, and all other details of the relations between the Filipino archipelago and the United States being established, we should withdraw our entire army, excepting such part as may be necessary for the occupation of the fortifications at Manila.

The same course he thinks Mr. Bryan could adopt to-day. Mr. Shepard maintains that Mr. Bryan would find no difficulty in carrying out the policy which, in his opinion, Mr. McKinley should be carrying out to-day.

DERVISHES DANCING AND HOWLING.

MISS LUCY M. J. GARNETT in the Sunday Magazine sets the monks of Islam in a light different from that shed about them by the popular fancy. To begin with, begging is strictly forbidden except among certain wandering orders; and they are expected to work for their living. Their piety has won to them great wealth, but "the possession of wealth has not caused the monks of Islam, as it did those of Christendom, to depart from the original rule of their founders. Their manner of life has remained simple and frugal in the extreme." The sheikh of the tekkeh (abbot of the convent) is not allowed like his inferiors to follow a worldly calling: he must live, according to the Dervish expression, "on the doorstep of Deity," receiving what is needful from disciples and the charitable. Describing the sacred dance of the Mevlevi,

The faces of even the youngest neophytes wear an expression of devout serenity as they revolve to the sound of the reed-flutes, a music which appears to have an entrancing effect on those who understand its mystic language. For the Dervish "Lovers of Allah" it expresses the harmony of His creation, in which they circle like the planets of the empyrean detached from the world in a rapture of spiritual love and communion with the Eternal.
. . . Love is the leading principle of the Mevlevi; their mutual greeting, "Let it be love!"

One wonders if ever in Christian lands dancing will be redeemed from its frivolous and secular associations and consecrated to purposes of graceful worship. The howling dervishes, or the Rufai, combine with the dance shouts of praise to the Deity, "Ya Allah!" or "Ya Hoo!" The writer adds :-

The Rufai, or "Howling" Dervishes, not only exceed the other Orders in the violence of their exercises, but in their strange religious frenzy cut themselves with knives, sear their flesh with hot irons and swallow fire, all without evincing any sign of pain, but rather as if these wounds caused them exquisite pleasure. When all have finally sunk exhausted and apparently unconscious on the floor, their sheikh leaves his prayer-mat, and walking from one prostrate devotee to another, he whispers in his ear some mystic word which recalls him to life, breathes upon his face, and anoints his wounds with saliva. It is said, and, indeed, commonly believed by the Moslem spectators, that all traces of these self-inflicted injuries disappear in the course of twenty four hours.

CAL Natio for th convi is ine Power the in separ Tho and ar

stand how li comm anthor centra Gover canno wheth should throug rights Ea > of ac sphe It foreig them. carrie where rende carrie and I To > > is n

capit

ever tions Th one. Pami been Weihand have rema rity o ackn is pr natu In one the 1 have me a which duri year ofter a v

C

the

chai

WHAT IS TO BE DONE IN CHINA?

DEAL WITH THE VICEROYS.

CAPTAIN F. E. YOUNGHUSBAND contributes to the National Review for October an article entitled, "A Plea for the Control of China." Captain Younghusband is convinced that some form of partition or control of China is inevitable, and he thinks that the proper policy of the Powers is not, as they are doing at present, to accentuate the importance of the Central Government, but to deal separately with the local viceroys as far as possible:—

Those who have lived all their lives in European countries and are accustomed to centralisation of authority hardly understand how loosely an Empire like China is held together, and how lightly the provinces are bound to the capital. And before committing ourselves to a policy of emphasizing the central authority we should be wise to mark how very little power that central authority has. We obtained, e.g., from the Peking Government the right to navigate the inland waters, but we cannot yet navigate them. We ought to be clear in our minds whether in this and similar cases our general trend of policy should be to enforce our rights through the central authority or through the viceroy of the particular province in which our rights have been infringed.

LOCAL CONTROL AND AN OPEN DOOR.

Each Power should contribute to the control of the capital, and at the same time assume its special sphere of action. The Open Door should be preserved in each sphere.

It is quite ridiculous to suppose that when there are antiforeign risings in Manchuria all of us can go there to suppress them. That task would obviously be much more effectively carried out by Russia alone. Similarly, if the Yang-tsze region, where 64 per cent. of the foreign trade is in our hands, is rendered insecure, the task of settling it would be most easily carried out by us with our sea-power and our troops from India and Hong Kong.

A BREAK UP INEVITABLE.

To such a policy Captain Younghusband thinks there is no permanent alternative. Though no empire has ever held together so long as that of China, the indications are plain that it is now breaking up:—

The outlying dependencies have been falling away one by one. Annan, Tonquin, Siam, Burma, Sikkim, Hunza, the Pamirs, the Amur Region, Formosa, Hong-Kong, all have been broken away, and pieces even of China itself—Port Arthur, Wei-Hai-Wei, Kiao-Chau Bay, Kowloon—have passed into the hands of others. And many other instances besides those I have already given could be quoted to show how loosely what remains is held together. While the Emperor has little authority over the Viceroys, the Viceroys on their part, as they freely acknowledge, have but slight control over the people. Patriotism is practically unknown. Mid-China and South China were perfectly callous as to what the Japanese did in North China.

CHINESE AND EUROPEANS.

Captain Younghusband thinks that the antipathy of the Chinese to foreigners is a radical trait of their character. European antipathy to the Chinese is no less natural:—

In travelling through a strange country for one's own pleasure one naturally tries to think the best of the people; and most of the people (except the Mashonas and Matabele) among whom I have travelled I have formed some attachment to. But between me and the Chinamen there always seemed a great gulf fixed which could never be overcome. The Chinese gentlemen I met during my three months' stay in the Peking Legation and the year I spent in Chinese Turkestan were always very politie, and often cheery and genial; but even then I could always detect a vein of condescension and superciliousness. They were polite because they are bred to rigid politeness, but I never felt drawn towards a Chinese gentleman as any one would be towards a Rajput, a Sikh, or an Afghan gentleman.

COMPOUND WITH RUSSIA.

The Fortnightly Review contains three articles on "The Far Eastern Crisis." The first of these, which is anonymous, is entitled "Why Not a Treaty with Russia?" and is by far the most reasonable and far-sighted contribution to the Far Eastern question which has appeared in any of the reviews since the question assumed its present acute phase. Briefly, the writer's points are, first, that Russia does not want China, which she could not assimilate; secondly, that Russian policy is against the acquisition of unassimilable populations; and, thirdly, that so far from Russia's advance in Asia being directed against British India, four-fifths of Russia's territory in Asia was acquired before our Indian Empire was even in its birth.

BRITISH POLICY.

As to British policy, the writer says :-

We proclaim the integrity of China without any intelligent or merely obstinate effort to re-assert the primacy of our diplomacy at Pekin, or even to maintain its parity with that of Russia. We consecrate the Middle Kingdom to an integrity of putrescence without any more lucid conception than in the case of Turkey, that the propping up of a decaying despotism necessitates a liberal indulgence of its crimes. On the other hand, with inexplicable complacency, we reserve our right in the last resort to an almost impossible share of China, without taking the least steps towards the preparation of the masterly plans and the enormous forces which would be required to vindicate that claim.

RUSSIA'S EXPANSION.

Our pretensions to the hegemony of the Yangtse Valley have been already destroyed by the action of the other Powers in landing troops, while as to Northern China, no sane politician could have hoped to prevent the last stage of the Siberian railway from becoming Russian:—

It is excessively rare to find, even among educated Englishmen, a perception of the simple fact that the landward expansion of Russia has been as natural, gradual and legitimate as the spread of British sea-power, and that the former process has been ir finitely the less aggressive and violent of the two. Russophobia in this country rests upon the assumption that the devouring advance of the Muscovite has been exclusively dictated by a melodramatic and iniquitous design upon our dominion in India. There never was a stranger fallacy of jealous hallucinations. If our Indian Empire had never existed, if the continent-peninsula had disappeared at a remote geological epoch beneath the waves, and if the Indian Ocean had washed the base of the Himalayas for ages, Russian expansion would still have followed precisely the same course it has taken at exactly the same rate.

The trail of the frontal attack, says the writer, has been all over our diplomacy, and unless some prolonged equilibrium between England and Russia can be established there will be small hope for British interests in China.

"Is Russia to preponderate in China?" asks Mr. Demetrius Boulger, who bases his article on the enlightened proposition that any suggestion "emanating from Russia would arouse suspicion," and that "Russia will never be pulled up in the Far East except by the absolute opposition of this Empire." Mr. Boulger is an extremist of the most extreme type, and though he does not repeat his amazing proposition of a few months back, that we should land 200,000 men at St. Petersburg and capture the city, he goes pretty far in that direction by pleading that we should oppose Russia merely for the permitted ming the he intelly which tive. e as was th which If the ould have im. All and tact wo years Vhen the If Mr. gard his President the port reen the ablished, adopt a would in his ay.

mila.

agazine it shed egging dering living.
"the Islam, riginal

nained

of the

ke his live, step of ad the evlevi, ression flutes, se who vers of

th they world ternal. mutual vill be s and howl-lance their their their g any uisite rently , and ispers

Too!"

said, that ourse sake of opposition. We must not negociate with Li Hung Chang because he is the friend of Russia, and we cannot negociate with anyone else because there is no government in China. Instead, we are to-define and assert our claim to the Yangtse Valley, and at the same time support it by sending twenty thousand British troops to Chusan. At the same moment we should notify Japan, Germany, America, and France that we will respect and support similar claims to "a material guarantee" on their part in Corea, Shantung, Chekiang, and Kwangsi respectively. It would be necessary also to take the precaution of mobilising the fleet. If these steps were taken promptly, quietly, and firmly, there would be no war, the prestige of England would be raised to a higher point than ever, and the Powers, agreed on their own position and relative claims, could attack the Chinese problem with the genuine intention of solving it. There will, indeed, be no place in such an arrangement for Li Hung Chang, and we might even entertain the hope that the Dowager-Empress and her satellites would before long receive their deserts. It would be a partition of responsibility; whether it extended over much

DIPLOMATICUS'S INDISCRETION.

"Diplomaticus" contributes the third China article to the Fortnightly. His article is entitled "Count Lamsdorff's First Failure," and was written with the object of proving that Russian diplomacy is not as infallible as the ordinary Russophobe believes. According to "Diplomaticus," Count Lamsdorff's proposal was a perfectly comprehensible one from the Russian point of view, the "failure" being that it was too absurd for acceptance. As a specimen of "Diplomaticus's" inaccuracy of statement I may mention that he speaks of over £200,000,000 having been expended in connection with the Siberian railway, when, as a matter of fact, not a quarter of this sum has yet been expended.

KEEP AN EYE ON GERMANY.

"In China the work of superseding the British Empire shall begin." This is the startling proposition of an anonymous writer in the National Review for October. The writer, who signs himself "X," gives a very long and careful account of Germany's movements in the international sphere for the last few years, and concludes that Germany is our real rival all over the world, and that it is against us and not Russia that Germany is now preparing.

GERMANY AGAINST ENGLAND.

It is in China that our interests are to be first attacked. Germany has convinced herself that the partition of China cannot now be permanently avoided. Her first conception was that as a result of the Japanese war there would be a regeneration of the middle Kingdom under German auspices, and it was only after waiting in vain for several years that she came to the conclusion that disintegration was inevitable. Her avowed purpose in taking possession of Kiao Chau was to be ready for either alternative:—

The landing of German troops at Shanghai, and the despatch of German gunboats up the Yang-tsze are explained away by the Kolnische Zeitung in the venerable manner. Germany, we are told, has no aggressive designs in that region, and agrees with England that it is a sphere in which the "open door" must be maintained. Exactly. It is not recognised as our sphere. It is to be the cosmopolitan sphere. Germany is to entrench herself in her monopoly in Shan-tung, and to share the advantages of the "open door" with us upon the Yang-tsze. This is a characteristic Anglo-German bargain. It is with a particular view to our position in the event of a break-up of China that we seek German support. It is in that event we shall most surely lose it. The Chinese pledge was simply that the Yang-tsze region would not be alienated to "any Power"—ourselves included. Other nations hold us to our bond, which, of course, would become waste paper if the Chinese Government by any mishap should cease to exist. No nation recognises on our part a territorial claim to the Yang-tsze. It is certain that in the case of the disruption of China, Germany would claim the whole region from the Yellow River up to the north bank of the Yang-tsze. Much the most probable of all eventual results of the Kiao-chau episode is that we shall lose at least the northern, and incomparably the better, half of the great middle region.

A RENEWED TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

"X" declares that when the partition of China begins the real antagonism between our interests and those of Germany will come to light, and Germany will at once take steps to reconstitute the Triple Alliance with Russia and France for the purpose of preventing the realisation of our claims to the Yang-tsze Valley.

GERMAN AIMS ON THE YANG-TSZE.

So long as China remains undivided, Germany's advantage in guarding the Open Door is second only to our own:—

It may even be conceded, since it is beyond the requirements of the argument to discuss the point, that the stability of the Middle Kingdom is desired in Berlin as sincerely as in London or Washington. But what if, as will be admitted to be possible, it should prove beyond human power to preserve the integrity of China or to prevent the break-up-what then? There is a vague idea abroad in this country that in the last resort Germany would content herself with her present sphere in the province of Shan-tung, with some indefinite and unalarming additions of interland, and that her friendly support would enable us to enter into peaceful possession of the Yang-tsze Valley and the enjoyment of the lion's share in the partition of China. imagine, so far as we examine the matter at all, that the Kaiser and his subjects, if discontented with their modest slice in their present admitted sphere, would turn to the north and effect a vigorous aggrandisement at the expense of Russia. For such theories as these there is not a vestige or a shadow of evidence or reason. The interests of Germany, who already resents the inordinate extension of our dominion, and attributes the extension of the British Empire to an irritating chronological accident, do not lie in conniving at the aggrandisement of a Power in her view so exorbitantly overgrown, and if her interests do not lie in that direction her policy will not. The transfer of the whole Yang-tsze Valley to us would bring under the British flag half the inhabitants of the earth. Of all States in the world, Germany has the deepest interest in preventing such a consummation, and the most fixed determination to do it.

DEAL HONESTLY WITH THE CHINESE.

Mr. Stephen Bonsal's paper in the North American Review "What the Chinese Think of Us," is mainly a long indictment of the policy of the European Powers. Mr. Bonsal points out that from the very first the Chinese representatives protested that they could not protect Europeans in Pekin, but in spite of this the representatives of the Powers were installed in Pekin by force. The reasons which the Western Powers, who participated in the spoliation of China, adduce in explanation of their policy do not appeal to the Chinese mind:—

The Western Powers maintain that they were compelled to interfere in the internal affairs of China to preserve law and order; to which the Chinese reply that law and order had reigned for hundreds of years, and was only disturbed by the coming of the barbarians. The Chinese still hold that nations, like individuals, have a perfect right to choose their associates in business or in pleasure. When they declined to trade with us, they think we should have immediately withdrawn from their world, perhaps protesting as we did so, to save our "face," that we did not care to trade with them. And so there would have been an end of the matter.

minist they a The to the their p

The

Mr. forts a which people came massa Mr.

that, to once, was the Mancresult hundre conquisidera

The Govern country policy and it encount expect presen part m sea-coal Japane

Dr. writer Europe Control excell which toward and Ross capacity coward philo

Bu have dealis want Euro In and appea The sive. prower has y

g.

Or

CHINESE TREATMENT OF ENVOYS.

The Chinese have always recognised the sanctity of the person of an envoy, but they discriminate between Ministers who are forced upon them and those whom they are willing to receive:—

The representatives of the Western Powers in Pekin belong to the former category. The Chinese have never withdrawn their protest against the presence of these Ministers in the capital of the Empire; it has only been drowned in musketry fire.

Mr. Bonsal holds that it was the attack on the Chinese forts and the slaughter of a couple of thousand Chinese which led to the attack on the Legations. The Chinese people felt exactly as Europeans felt when the false news came that the members of the Legations had been massacred.

Mr. Bonsal concludes his article by recalling the fact that, though the Chinese have been conquered more than once, they have always assimilated their conquerors. It was thus with the Golden Horde, the Mongols, and the Manchus, and even their conquest of China was not the result of two or three campaigns, but of wars which lasted hundreds of years. The moral is, that as we cannot conquer the Chinese, we must treat them with more consideration in the future.

WHY NOT A JAPANNED CHINA?

The editor of the new Monthly Review discusses the situation "After Pekin," and concludes as follows:—

The great necessity for British interests in China is a settled Government. Far better that even Russia should annex the country than that chaos should continue. But the commercial policy of Russia is worse for us than that of any other nation, and it would be better that Japan or even Germany should be encouraged to take over the government of the southern and central part of the Empire. In the meantime an attitude of expectancy is all that the Government of this country can at present take up. It may well be that eventually a more active part may be open to it, in the direction of keeping order in the sea-coast towns and waterways of an imperfectly pacified Japanese Empire.

RESTORE THE EMPEROR.

Dr. John Ross is a welcome addition to the number of writers who recognise that China has rights as against Europe as well as Europe against China. In the Contemporary Review for October he publishes an excellent article on "Our Future Policy in China," in which he says plainly that the only policy to be observed towards the Chinese in future is to treat them with justice and as equals, for no other policy will ever pay. Dr. Ross has a high opinion of the morals and intellectual capacity of the Chinese. In the first place they are not cowards, and their detestation of war is based upon a philosophy which Europeans might envy.

CHINESE NOT COWARDS.

But the Chinese when oppressed and bullied in the past have not shown themselves incapable soldiers when dealing with enemies of equal armament, and they only want arms and a leader to enable them to repel European aggression with equal success.

In their past normal life they had no warrior leaders. Insult and wrong produced national wrath and the warrior leaders appeared. Similar causes will again produce the same effects. The men are now more numerous, their resources more extensive. The raw materials for an army, formidable no less by prowess than by numbers, are lying all over China. The man has yet to appear who will pick them up and utilise them. The Chinese lack military leaders, but leaders will come.

THEIR LOVE FOR JUSTICE-

One of the most prominent characteristics of the Chinese, says Dr. Ross, is their admiration of, and love for, justice:—

A sense of injustice rouses them to wrath as nothing else can. The most serious losses in the way of business, or from the action of natural forces, they endure with patient equanimity. A small loss—even an insignificant one—by what they consider to be injustice rouses them to indignant protest and to serious resistance. If that sense of injustice is sufficiently acute there are no bounds to their wrath, and to obtain redress they take the strongest measures without counting the cost.

-AND REASON.

No people revere Reason more than the Chinese:—
Their instruction from childhood teaches them to trust to Reason and not to Force for the statement and the acquisition of their rights. Years ago they appealed in this way to Western nations, by whom their appeal was spurned with contempt—hence the present horrors in China. Their etiquette, again, which is strictly observed by all classes, makes a police force unnecessary. Their deference to seniors, their politeness to strangers, all combine to form a powerful restraint on the coarser feelings and on that resort to physical force not uncommon among, many Western nations.

PARTITION IMPOSSIBLE.

Dr. Ross does not believe that China can be parcelled out among the Powers. Nor does he think that Captain Younghusband's policy of treating separately with the Chinese viceroys is a good plan. The unity of the country is essential, and the Emperor is the best instrument for preserving it:—

Incomparably the best policy for China and for Europe, in order to secure peace now and security for the indefinite future, is that the Western Powers should unite harmoniously to the end in resisting any temptation to personal aggrandisement in theway of annexing Chinese territory; and throughout China should declare by public proclamation that their one aim is the restoration of order under the Emperor through wise officials of his choosing, who will work towards the improvement of the country. This policy will render the restoration of peace now a comparatively easy task, and will secure the hearty good wishes and the permanent gratitude of all the better classes throughout China, with whom lie the government and the influence of the country when the restoration of peace brings back the rule of reason.

Mr. John Foord, Secretary of the American Asiatic Association, writes in the North American Review of September on "The Root of the Chinese Trouble," which he maintains is not missionaries, merchants, or concessionaires, but the ignorance and corruption of the rulers of the country. Mr. Foord's only suggestion for the bettering of things is "to deliver China into the hands of honest Chinamen," but how it is to be kept in such hands, without some form of foreign control, he does not say.

GORDON'S CAMPAIGN IN CHINA.

The Fortnightly for October publishes the second part of Gordon's account of the operations which resulted in the capture of Soochow, Yesing, and Liyang from the Taepings, operations which had the effect of cutting the rebellion in two halves mutually isolated. Gordon's final recommendation was as follows:—

Should any future war with China arise, too much attention cannot be paid to the close reconnoitring of the enemy's positions, in which there are always some weak points; and it is to be hoped that our leaders may incline to a more scientific mode of attack than has hitherto been in vogue. The hasty attacks generally made on Asiatic positions cost valuable lives, invite failure, and prevent the science of war, theoretically acquired at considerable cost, being tested in the best school, viz., that of actual practice.

d become ap should territorial ase of the objective region Yang-tsze, Kiao-chau incompar-at once Russia alisation rmany's only to irements

ty of the London

possible,

a begins

those of egrity of ere is a Germany province itions of the us to and the a. We e Kaiser in their effect a or such dence or ents the tes the ological nt of a nterests nsfer of British in the such a

erican inly a owers.
hinese protect ratives
The ted in their

led to w and r had by the utions, ates in ith us, their "that

have

WHAT A GOOD BOY AM I! By the Amir of Afghanistan.

THERE is not much in common between little Jack Horner and Abdur Rahman, the Amir of Afghanistan, but in one respect they are in absolute accord. Little Jack Horner, after his exploit in extracting the plum from the Christmas pie, called all the world to witness what a good boy he was, and the "Details in my daily life," published by the Amir of Afghanistan in the first number of the Monthly Review, show the same complacent reflection, almost as naively expressed. "From my childhood up to the present day," says the Amir, "my life is quite a contrast to the habits of living indulged in by nearly all other Asiatic monarchs and chiefs. They live for the most part a life of idleness and luxury, whereas I, Abdur Rahman, believe that there is no greater sin than allowing our minds and bodies to be useless and unoccupied in a useful way . . . . My way of living and dressing has always been plain and simple and soldierlike. I have always liked to keep myself occupied day and night in working hard at something or other, devoting only a few hours to sleep. As habit is second nature, it has become a habit of mine, that even when I am seriously ill, when I cannot move from my bed I still keep working as usual at reading and writing documents and various Government papers. . . . If my hands and feet cannot move from my bed, I can still go on moving my tongue to give orders to those about me, and tell them what I wish to be done..... I never feel tired, because I am so fond of work and labour." This love for work he owes to God himself, for it is a matter of Divine inspiration. "The true ideal and desire of my life is to look after the flock of human beings whom God has entrusted to me as humble slave."

HIS DREAM.

It is no wonder he is worried, poor man! for his whole life is dedicated to the fulfilment of his dream. Long before he became Amir he dreamed a dream, which he published and distributed about the country. That dream was that before his death he should finish making a strong wall all round Afghanistan, for its safety and protection:—

The more I see of the people of other nations and religions running fast in the pursuit of progress, the less I can rest and sleep; the whole day long I keep on thinking how I shall be able to run the race with the swiftest, and at night my dreams are just the same. There is a saying that the cat does not dream about anything but mice: I dream of nothing but the backward condition of my country, and how to defend it, seeing that this poor goat, Afghanistan, is a victim at which a lion from one side and a terrible bear from the other side are staring, and ready to swallow at the first opportunity afforded them.

He is a great dreamer, is the good Amir, and many other dreams of his, all of which he tells to his courtiers, have come true. And so, having his life-work marked out before him in dreamland, he is able to go ahead and work with an untiring energy to complete his task. It is curious, he says, that the harder he works, the more anxious he is to continue working.

AN ANXIOUS LOVER.

After this promising introduction, he tells us that it is rather difficult to give details of his daily life, because he has no fixed time for sleeping, nor any definite time for taking his meals, and he is often so absorbed in thought that his meals are kept on the dinner-table for hours at a time, while he forgets all about them, from which it may be imagined that either there is an endless relay of dishes kept waiting, or that His Royal Highness has no objection to cold meat. In the same manner his absorbing preoccupation in his work plays the mischief with his sleep. When he begins reading and writing at night, he sometimes never raises his head until the night is past, and the morning has come. His health suffers, no wonder! and his doctors tell him that he must take his meals regularly at fixed times, but his answer is, "Love and logic have never agreed together"; and he is so much in love with his people that he cannot consider his own health when compared with their well-being. Altogether it is evident that the Amir is a very nice man indeed, at least when he looks in his own mirror, nothing can exceed the charm of the countenance which confronts him. Certainly he writes well, his illustrations are apposite, poetical and romantic. He is dominated by the metaphor which he uses as to his being the lover of his country. Afghanistan is to him the mistress of his heart, and as the pains of the lover are the luxuries of his love, so the difficulties and anxieties of a reformer only add to his enthusiasm and spurs him to fresh exertions. He is often discouraged on account of the misbehaviour of his people, who keep on rebelling and quarrelling and intriguing against one another in a way that makes him sometimes despair. He wastes half his time endeavouring to ascertain the truth, and he is often tempted to retire from the impossible task. This, however, would be cowardly. So he goes on working, so hard that he often has to ask his courtiers whether he has eaten his dinner or not, his stomach apparently nct being capable of reminding him of that fact.

"UNEASY LIES THE HEAD."

He usually goes to sleep about five or six in the morning, and gets up at two in the afternoon. During the whole of that time when he is in bed, his sleep is so disturbed that nearly every hour he wakes, and keeps on thinking about improvements. Then he goes to sleep again. As soon as he arises, he sends for his doctor, who prescribes the medicine which he has to take that day. Then comes the tailor bringing with him several plain suits in European style. After he has selected the one he will wear, he washes and dresses and has tea; but during the whole of that time his officials stand looking at him, saying in their minds, "Oh, be quick. Let us each put our work before you." As soon as breakfast is over, he is worried to death, for no sooner does he appear at work than officials, sons, household servants, come in for instructions. Every page-boy, of whom there are hundreds, and men of the Detective Department, walk in upon him, with letters in their hands whenever any suffering person requires help or assistance. In this way he is pretty crowded. None of his subjects have one-tenth part of his work to do. He only gets a few minutes for his meals, and none at all for his family, and even at meal times his courtiers and officials keep on asking him questions!

HIS RECREATIONS.

In addition to all these officials, who are always in attendance upon him from the time he wakes until he goes to sleep, and in addition to the half a hundred persons who are thus surrounding him, he has always near the durbar-room, to be ready when required, a company of professional chess-players and backgammon-players, a few personal companions, a reader of books, and a story-teller. Musicians of several nationalities attend at night, "and although I am never entirely free, yet the courtiers enjoy the music, and I listen in the his and the be and year there mee

lette

inte

atte

sup "A

the

to a noti

fille brea

on gun or t his

with turi

wat

the ord

Am

abo

the

and a s slav crea

enti

operalson has must palarelig through pray will numbed mist the hav him ficti inte pref the I who bed

of biog

C

intervals." When he rides out, every one of his personal ghness attendants and servants start with him, including, I nanner suppose, the backgammon-players and story-tellers. ys the "Altogether, with the cavalry, infantry, and artillery of ng and the body-guard, he is always ready as a soldier on the march s head to a battle, and can start without delay at a moment's come. notice. The pockets of his coat and trousers are always ell him filled with loaded revolvers, and one or two loaves of bread, for one day's food." A considerable number of times, agreed gold coins are sewed into the saddles of his horses, and people on both sides of the saddles are two revolvers. Several npared guns and swords are always lying by the side of his bed, t that or the chair on which he is seated, within reach of his least hand, and saddled horses are always standing in front of eed the his office. All his attendants go to sleep when he does, ertainly with the exception of the following who keep awake in al and turn; the guards and their officers, the tea-bearer, the ich he water-bearer, the dispenser, the hubble-bubble bearer, anistan the valet, and the tailor who has always to be at hand in ains of iculties usiasm en dispeople, riguing

netimes

ing to re from wardly.

to ask not, his ng him in the During sleep is keeps oes to ds for ich he tailor ropean

during

at him,

ich put ver, he at work in for ndreds, on him,

person

pretty t of his meals,

nes his vays in ntil he undred always ired, a mmon-books, nalities

ly free,

in the

is!

wear,

order to do any repairs or to have instructions when the Amir thinks of them.

The Amir maintains that he has cleared out and abolished the cruel system of slavery, although he keeps the word slave to describe persons who are more honoured and trusted than any other officials in the kingdom. If a slave is badly treated, and the cruelty proved, the slave has his liberty "by my orders, because God has created all human beings children of one parent, and entitled to equal rights."

HIS HOME LIFE.

He then goes on to describe his sitting-rooms and his bed-rooms, and the way in which he furnishes them and pays allowances to his wives. He does not mention the exact number of his wives, although there seems to be an allusion to seven. "My wives," he says, "come and pay regular visits to me ten or twelve times in the year for a few hours at a time." If there are seven of them, and each comes ten times, the husband and wife meet about three times a fortnight. He opens all the letters with his own hand if they are addressed "not to be opened by any one excepting by the Amir," and he also writes the letter with his own hand. He tell us he has always loved beautiful scenery, flowers, green grass, music, pictures, and every kind of natural beauty. All his palaces command beautiful views. He is also very religious, is the good Amir, for he has appointed directors throughout the whole country, who first of all advise people to attend the mosque five times a day for their prayers, and to fast in Ramadan, and then if the people will not listen to their advice they administer a certain number of lashes, "because a nation which is not religious becomes demoralised, and falls into ruin and decay, and misbehaviour makes people unhappy in this world and the next."

HIS BEST SLEEPING-DRAUGHT.

One more extract from this charming article, and I have done. The Amir tells us that he writes books himself, but that he likes better to have them read to him, and that he likes his information in the form of fiction, from which it may be seen that the Amir is an intensely modern man. At the same time his reasons for preferring to be read to are not very complimentary to the authors. He says:—

I do not go to sleep directly I lie down in bed, but the person who is specially appointed as my reader sits down beside my bed and reads to me from some book, as, for instance, histories of different countries and peoples; books on geography, biographies of great kings and reformer, and political works.

I listen to this reading until I go to sleep, when a story-teller takes his place, repeating his narratives until I awake in the morning. This is very soothing, as the constant murmur of the story-teller's voice lulls my tired nerves and brain.

One also remembers better what is told in the form of a story when read aloud. The stories are mostly full of exaggeration and superstitions, yet even in these I learn much of the old habits of thought and ideas of ancient peoples, and I think of the progress that the world has made since those old times. There is another advantage in sleeping through the droning noise of the story-teller's recitations, namely, that one gets accustomed to noise, and I can sleep soundly on the battlefield and under similar circumstances.

AMERICAN TESTIMONY TO THE BOERS.

"THE Last Days of Pretoria" is the mournful heading of Mr. R. H. Davis's mournful paper in Scribner. He laments that Generals De Wet and Botha, instead of the aged Joubert and the stubborn Cronje, were not in command throughout the most critical portion of the war. He proffers this testimony to the general character of the Boers, which is the more impressive as he had been predisposed to an entirely opposite view. He says:—

I left Pretoria with every reason for regret. I had come to it a stranger and had found friends among men whom I had learned to like for themselves and for their cause. I had come prejudiced against them, believing them to be all the English press and my English friends had painted them: semi-barbarous, uncouth, money-loving, and treacherous in warfare. I found them simple to the limit of their own disadvantage, magnanimous to their enemies, independent and kindly. I had heard much of the corruption of their officials; and I saw daily their chief minister of state, at a time when every foreign resident was driving through Pretoria in a carriage, passing to and from the government buildings in a tram-car, their President living in a white-washed cottage, their generals serving for months at the front without pay and without hope of medals or titles.

THEIR UNWORLDLINESS.

Their ignorance of the usages and customs of the great world outside of their own mountains, for which the English held them in such derision, harmed no one so greatly as it harmed themselves. Had they known the outside world, had they been able to overcome their distrust of the foreigner, had they understood in what way to make use of him, how to manipulate the press of the world to tell the truth in their behalf as cleverly as the English had used it to misrepresent them; had they known how to make capital of the sympathies of the French, the Americans, and the Germans, and to turn it to their own account; had they known which men to send abroad to tell the facts, to plead and to explain; had they known which foreign adventurer was the one to follow implicitly on the battle-field and which to "vootsak" to the border; had they been men of the world instead of farmers in total ignorance of it, they might have brought about intervention, or an honourable peace. The very unworldliness of the Boer, at which the Englishman sneers, did much, I believe, to save Great Britain from greater humiliations, from more frequent "reverses" and more costly defeats.

"A HOLY WAR."

Mr. Davis may perhaps be pardoned for the dejection which leads him at the end to say of the Boers:—

They are the last of the crusaders. They rode out to fight for a cause as old as the days of Pharaoh and the children of Israel, against an enemy ten times as mighty as was Washington's in his war for independence. As I see it, it has been a Holy War, this war of the burgher crusader, and his motives are as fine as any that ever called a "minute man" from his farm or sent a knight of the Cross to die for it in Palestine. Still, in spite of his cause, the Boer is losing, and in time his end may come, and he may fall. But when he falls he will not fall alone; with him will end a great principle, the principle for which our forefathers fought—the right of self-government, the principle of independence.

MILNERISM IN SOUTH AFRICA.

A REPLY BY MR. HOBSON.

Mr. J. A. Hobson contributes to the Contemporary Review for October a very vigorous reply to Mr. Garrett's adulatory article. Mr. Hobson deals closely with certain features of the negotiations which led to the war, but the most interesting part of his article is that in which he compares Sir Alfred Milner with Sir Bartle Frere and with Froude, and characterises his policy and temperament.

PARTIALITY AND ACADEMICISM.

The academic temper combined with dogmatism and partiality have been Sir Alfred Milner's ruin :-

For that academic temper and attitude of mind which made Mr. Froude such a lamentable failure in the task he set himself, are plainly discernible in Sir A. Milner, though in him they are combined with and in part concealed by other attributes. Both men are temperamental Imperialists of the sentimental academic school, thoroughly convinced that British rule is "the greatest secular agency for good known to the world," and not disposed to entertain nice scruples as to the methods of extending so beneficent an agency. Sir A. Milner was com-mended by a dignitary of the Church, when he set forth on his South African mission, as "the finest flower of human culture that the University of Oxford has produced in our time."
But there is reason to suspect that the intellectual atmosphere in which these "flowers of human culture" are produced exercises some hardening influence on their humanity and morals, substituting for those warm, wholesome sympathies which are the safest guides in understanding our fellows and in regulating our conduct towards them, a cold critical demeanour of superiority which lays down carefully calculated ends, applies casuistic subtlety in adopting means, and is capable of fierce resentment and even persecuting zeal, if any attempt be made to question their authority or thwart their will. This inhumanity is, of course, quite consistent with a certain superficial courtesy and even affability of manner, which, though not expressly so designed, serves as a glove upon the iron fist.

Sir Alfred Milner's political experience, says Mr. Hobson, was no better adapted to fit him for his work than was Sir Bartle Frere's:—

Sir Alfred Milner's experience fitted him in no degree for such a task: it made him what he is, a strong-headed bureaucrat, extremely capable in the autocratic conduct of affairs, able to impose his will upon inferiors and to drive reluctant and evasive Easterns along paths of British "good government," but incapable of that genuine and full-hearted sympathy with the free and sturdy humanity of colonists who would not be driven, and unable to throw off the habits of his past official career.

A TEMPERAMENTAL JINGO.

The Blue Books alone are enough to show that Sir Alfred Milner, "partly from temperamental Jingoism, partly from deficient power in judging character," allowed himself to become the instrument of the wreckers:—

As matters were nearing the catastrophe, he lost his head and even permitted passion so to overrule his sense of common honesty as to mutilate that portion of Mr. Steyn's despatch which he professed to transmit intact. Those who follow most closely his conduct since the outbreak of hostilities will best appreciate the chorus of applause with which he is greeted by the League and their financial backers. This "strong man" destroys the constitutional self-government of the colony, openly espouses the League policy, and vehemently denounces those who seek "conciliation"; utters hysterical speeches, in which he propounds the false finality of a "Never Again!" policy; and trusts in militarism and disfranchisement as a means of securing peace in South Africa. But it is the sheer collapse of intellect which stands out most clearly in the documents, the weird jumble of sharp reasoning and claptrap, the pitiful inability to distinguish good evidence from bad, which mark his despatches.

Mr. Hobson concludes his article as follows: To claim actual success for Sir Alfred Milner's policy requires considerable effrontery. One may assume that Sir A. Milner did not want war; yet he had three distinct opportunities of settlement upon terms and by methods honourable and profitable to Great Britain, and he evaded all of them; he deceived the Government into thinking Mr. Kruger would not fight, being so deceived himself, and into believing that Free State opinion was such as to preclude active armed co-operation, believing this himself. This same man, governed by the same temper and receiving his information from the same sources, now asserts that an era of annexation for the Republics and of martial law, followed by wholesale disfranchisement in the Colonies, will form the basis of a lasting peaceful settlement in South Africa. Is it reasonable to believe him, or to obey the demands of that British South Africa which has so often and so terribly deceived us with regard to the likelihood of war, and its measure and duration, when it seeks to place in Sir Alfred Milner's hands the full administration of the new order in South Africa?

OLIVE SCHREINER ON THE BOERS.

In the Revue des Revues for September Olive Schreiner has two long articles on the psychology and history of the Boers. Most of the articles is but a résumé, though a very graphic and interesting résumé, of the history of the Boers, from the time when their grievances against the English caused the first trek, down to the present dark phase in their life story. "In twenty-five years," says Olive Schreiner, "as I foresee with regret, there will no longer be a single real Boer born in South Africa, and yet there will then be more than half a million South Africans, of Dutch-Huguenot origin." Her verdict is deliberately that, "If only enough tact, sympathy and judgment had been used in our relations with the original inhabitants, there would have been no white man's problem in South Africa."

Taking what may be called the orthodox Jingo estimate of the Boers, Olive Schreiner says: "It has been said, but it will probably never be said any more, that the Boer is cowardly and cannot fight. Considering his history during the last two centuries, it has always been amazing to us how that opinion could have been spread, even by his worst enemies." The whole Boer nature is intensely averse from war. In bygone days he fought and fought much and hard, but from necessity and never from choice.

The Boer is also constantly taxed with conservatism, and with some justice. But it is this very conservatism which shows his strength and tenacity. In similar isolated conditions, Europeans too often degenerate; but the Boer has not degenerated, and his conservatism is in no wise such as to prevent his rapidly assimilating new ideas and habits. "To any one who studies with patience and impartiality the history of the Boers of South Africa, there is nothing more pathetic than this strange and half-savage clinging to the past. The cry ceaselessly uttered for generations past, by the Boer woman sitting in her arm-chair, 'My children, never forget that you are white people! Do as you see your father and mother do!' is not the cry of a feeble conservatism which dreads danger. It is the incarnation of the passionate determination of a small nation full of greatness, resolved not to lose the little which it had, nor descend in the scale of humanity."

very of the no call, what capital as la occur group mod not,

but

com defin

River Combave index which of all or felect would not felect would not felect be greateness faile

how neces not is ov what they jects will population

Afri

little gove

Dust to to to ture Is is the any transbe of be fair on projecthe national dra

y to dis-

requires . Milner mities of rofitable ived the being so nion was ving this nper and serts that ial law. ies, will Africa. of that deceived

Olive gy and ésumé. of the vances to the ty-five regret, South half a rigin." tact, en no timate said. it the g his been oread. are is ought never milar ; but is in new with rs of this cry Boer never your tches.

ure and s hands

ations

itism,

atism

conon of ill of

, nor

THE SETTLEMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE Contemporary Review for October opens with a very excellent article by Mr. J. B. Robinson on the subject of the "South African Settlement"—somewhat premature, no doubt, for there is evidently to be no settlement at all, but nevertheless extremely interesting as illustrating, what I have repeatedly noticed, that the higher Rand capitalists compared with their parasites in the Press are as lambs compared with hyenas. Mr. Robinson, however, occupies a different position from that of the Rhodesian group, and that may to some extent explain his moderation.

JUSTICE TO THE BOERS.

Justice to the Boers is Mr. Robinson's motto. This is not, of course, justice as understood by the "Pro-Boers," but justice as understood by a man who is firm for complete annexation. I quote Mr. Robinson's most definite suggestions :-

There will have to be in the Transvaal, as also in the Orange River Colony, a Lieutenant-Governor (acting under the High Commissioner) and an Executive Council; and both States will Commissioner) and an executive Council; and both States will have to remain Crown Colonies for a certain period; unless, indeed, the two be administered as a single Crown Colony, which would be better. The Executive Council should consist of about twelve members, and it would be wisdom to offer four or five out of the twelve seats to the Boers. They might elect their own representatives, and the remaining seven would be nominees of the Imperial Government (advised, no doubt, in their selection by the loyalists in South Africa), who might be relied upon to insist upon an enlightened system of administration. As to the four or five seats to be offered to the Dutch, I should not hesitate to offer them to Botha, De Wet, and other prominent men. Indeed, one of our greatest dangers for the future is lest the Government of these new Colonies should fail, as the Government of the Transvaal failed in 1880, for want of knowledge of the people of South Africa. It is common enough for Englishmen, and Colonists, to suppose that they understand the Dutch population. After a war of conquest it is frequently imagined that it matters but little whether the people are understood or not. Military government may be necessary for a brief period. It should, however, be very brief, for in military government it is not necessary to understand the governed. It is a system of order, not of justice-a state of siege; but when this transitory régime is over, it will be of the first importance not only to understand what the Dutch want, but so to act that when they realise that they are not set aside, but that they form a part of the subjects of a country ruled and governed on equitable lines, they will appreciate the position and fall into line with the general population.

FIRST END THE WAR.

If this is done, Mr. Robinson prophesies that there "will be no easier race in the world to govern than the Dutch." But first the policy of continuing the war of extermination must be abandoned, and overtures made to the Boer leaders. As Mr. Robinson says, such overtures could not be construed as weakness :-

It may perhaps be said: "The Boer diplomacy is very clever: is there not danger in opening any discussion?" Perhaps so— any discussion of a general kind; but that is no reason against the plain offer of a safe return home to the farms without transportation or confiscation, on condition of surrender of arms. I have said nothing of any armistice; the offer would be one to be accepted or rejected at once. No doubt arms might be buried or concealed. But the amount of the armament is fairly well known, and it would be well to give notice that any concealment of arms would be punished by confiscation of property. Further, it is not so simple a matter to conceal arms; the country swarms with natives; and it is not easy to find the native from whom the sight of a few half-crowns would not draw any secret he had at command.

It is not pleasant to see Mr. Robinson recommending Sir Alfred Milner's atrocious policy of employing the natives as spies. But certainly his policy is preferable to the tactics of the Chamberlain-Milner gang.

SOUTH AFRICA'S FUTURE.

As to the future development of South Africa Mr. Robinson is as ever optimistic. It may become the greatest of British Colonies.

The resources of the Transvaal are endless. It is seamed with rich minerals of every kind. Its population, under a modern administration, will go up by leaps and bounds. It may well be, in population, wealth and commerce, our premier Colony. Certainly the Vaal Colony will lead South Africa. Johannesburg is now the capital of South Africa, and such it will remain: while its trade with England with shortly become a mainstay of our home prosperity. What we are doing we must do well; and so build as to endure.

JOHANNESBURG THE CAPITAL.

Johannesburg, he says, must be made the capital, and he gives the plausible reason that the Boer farmers as well as the industrials would find this the more convenient, as it would make the market for stock and the headquarters for business transactions the same place. Under the late Government, Mr. Robinson says, the Boers were forced to come to Johannesburg to sell their stock, and then to make a second journey to Pretoria to carry out any business transactions. As to the expenses of the war, Mr. Robinson says :-

I have been asked how the expenses of the war are to be met. In my opinion there is no difficulty whatever in the question. The opening up of the Transvaal by an honest and fair adminis-tration will develop a trade with Great Britain which will tell heavily even on the magnificent figures of her exports and imports, and she ought to be prepared to pay a heavy share herself. Then the revenue from imports, licences, etc., will rise enormously. Besides, the new Transvaal Government will inherit from the old very large estates in land-much of it goldbearing—in addition to the State share in the railway—little or none of which, I have reason to believe, has been sold; and this will provide also a large share of the sixty or seventy millions which the war seems likely to cost.

The Annual Index to Periodicals.

THOSE of our readers who have occasion to consult indexes and other works of reference in search of information on current topics may be glad to know that the volume of the "Annual Index to Periodicals," covering the year 1899, is now ready. The volumes of this work, which are now ten in number, cover the years 1890-1899 inclusive, and are simply invaluable for reference purposes. Judging by the number of inquiries for references to articles which reach this office, one is sometimes inclined to doubt whether the Indexes are known or are made known to the frequenters of a considerable number of our public libraries. It would be well if they had a place on the counter or some similar accessible place in every library, so that readers could look up for themselves the subjects they happen to be interested in. All who have used them regard them as an indispensable adjunct to the catalogue of the library. By their aid the librarian can make the contents of his volumes of periodicals more interesting and serviceable, and if he handed over the Indexes to his inquirers and allowed them to make their own selection a great deal of his valuable time would be saved. Vol. III. is out of print, but the remaining volumes can still be had-Vols. I., II., IV., and V. (1890, 1891, 1893, and 1894), at 5s. nett, or 5s. 6d, post free; and Vols. VI.—X. (1895-1899), at 10s. nett, post free

ON THE BEIRA RAILWAY.

IF the Siberian Railway beats the world for length, the Beira Railway easily holds the record for nastiness. A very interesting account of the Portuguese line is contributed to the Contemporary Review for October by Mr. L. Orman Cooper, who, if his account is not exaggerated, certainly must have had a tough constitution to survive and tell his experiences. The portion of Portuguese territory through which it lies is the plague-spot of the earth, "inhabited by every kind of beetle, bug, and insect which stings, buzzes or smells." It is the region of the tzetze fly, and almost uninhabitable by Europeans.

AN ENGINEERING FEAT.

The Beira Railway is unique as an engineering feat :-The sleepers are laid on piles to start with. The line slithers through miles of thick, dank, unfathomable mud. Then it crawls up steep hills, and intersects a forest in which lion, tigers, harte-beestes, etc., continually do cry. Its engines are fed with green wood. Its officials are mostly educated gentlemen "down on their luck." In fact, it holds a unique place in the annals of railway work.

FEVERLAND.

The railway runs through a fever district, and accidents are so common that the company employs a medical man entirely to look after its employés. His life is not a

He is continually on the move. One man is only able to look after about 200 miles of the railway. Even along that small area seldom a day passes but he has someone to mend up or physic. Sometimes he has to travel over 100 miles on a nigger-propelled trolley in order to look up one sick case. Yet, at the same time, many die without attention. The fever on the Beira Railway is about the worst kind of fever to be met with anywhere. It never fails to attack the white man sooner or later. It is extremely stealthy in its onslaught, and nothing can be done to ward it off entirely. Windows shut at sunset, so as to prevent the dank, deadly mist which nightly arises from the swamps, can do something. Attention to hygiene, and avoiding the long grass in springtime and after sunset, can do Abstention from alcoholic beverages can do most of all -at least, attention to the latter detail very often prevents fatal

VENOMOUS LIONS.

The country through which the railway runs is infested with lions, who, in addition to their other virtues, have a poisonous bite:-

The lions roaring after their prey do seek their meat from God—at least so the Psalmist says. They seek it also viâ man. Fortunately not always with success. On one of these surveying expeditions a man fell off a tree close to the open mouth of a lion. (It was to escape the said lion he had climbed it.) The creature sucked in a toe. Then he let go in order to seize an ankle, and repeated the operation until he had the poor fellow's knee in his mouth. Whilst the beast was chewing at the knee, a comrade was fumbling with the safety-cock of a Magazine Colt a contract was tuning with the safety-cock of a staggard corrifle. Only for a moment. In another he had the trigger free, let fly, and killed the lion. The mumbled man was terribly mauled, and had to be carried to a Dutch farm hard by. The "baas" was kind enough to him, but it was a ghastly sight to see the foul matter left by the lion's molars squeezed from the wounded leg daily. The man recovered after a long time, but many a one has succumbed to lion poison, even when the wounds were, apparently, trifling. The smallest bite sometimes gangrenes in that terrible climate. So the onslaught of a lion has a double terror about it.

THE GROWTH OF THE RAILWAY.

The Beira Railway was opened for traffic as far as New Umtali in April, 1898 :--

Old Umtali, its original terminus, was done away with then, because it was cheaper to compensate folks for their buildings, and give them new sites, than to bring the railway through the rugged country to the old town. The line was moved ten miles eastward at that date (from the old to the new town), and £70,000 was paid as compensation to the Umtalians for this change of route. It was whilst the extension of the railway from Beira to Salisbury was being made that the gauge was altered from 2ft. to that of the other Cape lines. At first it was only a contractor's line, practically, with only one train a week each way for passenger traffic. Now the trains are fairly numerous.

For the first few years, too, the telegraph only went as far as Umtali. Now it is extended to Salisbury, and thus is in communication with Cape Town. In those days the postal arrangements were most disgraceful, as is every job undertaken by the Portuguese. Pioneers were quite shut off from civilization, and were dependent on the ships which came into Beira about five times a month, or on the post-cart from Salisbury.

THE LINE OF THE FUTURE.

In spite of all its drawbacks, Mr. Cooper thinks that the Beira route is the route of the future. The Cape Town-Buluwayo line is of so tremendous a length and so artificially created that its charges for freight are enormous. It will never, however, become noted for its attractions :-

The windows of heaven cannot be shu: by human ingenuity, and the enormous rainfall of the Eastern strip of land called Mozambique territory will never be free from that. Mud, mud, mud, will ever be the prominent object of Baira. Crocodiles will still bask and enjoy existence wherever there is such slimy, black, oozy, alluvial deposit, and mangrove swamps must always afford hiding ground for water-snakes, green-striped Where there are snakes, puff-adders, and boa-constrictors. snakes there must be corresponding destroyers; so that life on the Beira Railway is never likely to be much sought after.

THE FEDERATION OF AUSTRALIA.

A FEDERAL SONG, 1900.

MR. GEORGE ESSEX EVANS, the Queensland poet, has written the following poem in praise of the unity of Australia :--

In the greyness of the dawning we have seen the pilot star, In the whisper of the morning we have heard the years afar.

Shall we sleep and let them be When they call to you and me?

Can we break the land asunder God has girdled with the sea ? For the flag is floating o'er us,

And the track is clear before us. From the desert to the ocean let us lift the mighty chorus For the days that are to be.

We have flung the challenge forward. Brothers, stand or fall as

She is coming out to meet us in the splendour of the sun, From the graves beneath the sky,

Where her nameless heroes lie.

From the Forelands of the Future they are waiting our reply. We can face the roughest weather, If we only hold together,

Marching forward to the Future, marching shoulder-firm together,

For the Nation yet to be.

All the greyness of the dawning, all the mists are overpast, In the glory of the morning we shall see Her face at last.

He who sang, "She yet will be," He shall hail her, crowned and free,

Could we break the land asunder God has girdled with the sea? For the Flag is floating o'er us, And the Star of Hope before us.

From the desert to the ocean, brothers, lift the mighty chorus, For Australian Unity.

DR. T

pape Less com Em of es

T

says 0 selve Grea out i force wear coul and

SO 6 agai

the

has sola

pass

upo

rele sold libe ing the pro mo one

tra

Do

out

wea onl hig for of bu

tha the gre COL > out COF we san tru

ve the

DR. CONAN DOYLE'S LESSONS FROM THE WAR.

gh the n miles

), and

y from altered

only a k each far as

com-range-by the n, and

u. five

s that

Cape

and t are nuity, mud.

odiles

slimy, must triped

e are ife on

, has ty of ea !

all as

y.

-firm

sea ?

S,

rous,

THE first place in Cornhill for October is given to a paper by Dr. A. Conan Doyle entitled "Some Military Lessons of the War." The writer begins with the comprehensive conclusion "that the defence of the Empire is not the business of a single warrior-caste, but of every able-bodied citizen."

INVASION OF ENGLAND-IMPOSSIBLE!

This apparently alarming demand is promptly followed by a piece of most cheering optimism. Dr. Doyle says:—

One of the most certain lessons of the war, as regards ourselves, is once for all to reduce the bugbear of an invasion of Great Britain to an absurdity. With a moderate efficiency with the rifle the able-bodied population of this country could without its fleet and without its professional soldiers defy the united forces of Europe. A country of hedgerows would with modern weapons be the most terrible entanglement into which an army The advantage of the defence over the attack, could wander. and of the stationary force against the one which has to move, is so enormous and has been so frequently proved by the Boers against ourselves, as well as by ourselves against the Boers, that the invasion of Kent or Sussex, always a desperate operation, has now become an impossible one. So much national consolation can we draw from the ordeal through which we have passed. While we can depend for the defence of our own shores upon some developed system of militia and volunteers we can release for the service of the empire almost all the professional soldiers.

"ONLY ONE WEAPON IN THE WORLD."

The writer urges the need in the infantry of more liberal musketry practice, of greater facility in entrenching, and of better knowledge of cover. He would require the officer to carry a rifle like his men: and to "take his profession more seriously." He says, "During five months' intercourse with officers I have only once seen one of them reading a professional book." He would transform the cavalry wholly into mounted infantry. Dr. Doyle is very emphatic on one point:—

One absolutely certain lesson of this war is that there is outside the artillery—only one weapon in the world, and that weapon is the magazine rifle. Lances, swords and revolvers have only one place—the museum.

FIELD GUNS AND FIELD EXPLOSIVES.

Turning to the artillery, the writer does not think very highly of lyddite as employed against troops in open formation. The Boers he spoke to had no high opinion of it. He knows "of at least one case where a shell burst within seven yards of a man with no worse effect than to give him a bad headache." He anticipates the use of much heavier guns in the battlefield. "The greatest cannon of our battleships and fortresses may be converted into field-pieces."

THE HOSPITAL SCANDALS.

Of the Bloemfontein epidemic he says :-

The true statistics of the outbreak will probably never come out, as the army returns permit the use of such terms as "simple continued fever"—a diagnosis frequently made, but vague and slovenly in its nature. If these cases were added to those which were returned as enteric (and they were undoubtedly all of the same nature), it would probably double the numbers and give a true idea of the terrible nature of the epidemic. Speaking roughly, there could not have been fewer than from six to seven thousand in Bloemfontein alone, of which thirteen hundred died.

The lack of hospital accommodation he attributes to a very laudable motive :-

It sprang largely from an exaggerated desire on the part of the authorities to conciliate the Free Staters and reconcile them to our rule. It was thought too high-handed to occupy empty houses without permission, or to tear down corrugated from fencing in order to make huts to keep the rain from the sick soldiers. This policy, which sacrificed the British soldier to an excessive respect for the feelings of his enemies, became modified after a time, but it appeared to me to increase the difficulties of the doctors.

Dr. Doyle does blame the Department for not having more medical men on the spot, at a time when "Cape Town was swarming with civil surgeons."

A SCHEME OF ARMY REFORM.

On the general subject of Army Reform, Dr. Doyle does not agree with a common opinion that the Army should be increased. Rather, he argues—

we should decrease the Army in numbers and so save the money which will enable us to increase its efficiency and mobility. When I say decrease the Army I mean decrease the number of professional soldiers; but I should increase the total number of armed men upon whom we can call by a liberal encouragement of volunteering and such an extension of the Militia Act as would give us at least a million men for home defence, setting free the whole of the highly-trained soldiers for the work of the Empire.

To the regulars he would give pay at the rate of half-acrown a day.

ONLY 100,000 PICKED MEN.

He thus goes on to outline his scheme :-

Having secured the best material, the soldier should then be most carefully trained, so that the empire may never have the expense of sending out a useless unit. Granting that the professional army should consist of a hundred thousand men, which is ample for every requirement, I should divide them roughly into thirty thousand mounted infantry, who should be the elite, trained to the last point, with every man a picked shot and rider. These might be styled the Imperial Guard, and would be strong enough in themselves to carry through any ordinary war in which we are likely to engage. Thirty thousand I should devote to forming a powerful corps of artillery, who should be armed with the best weapons which money could buy. Ten thousand would furnish the engineers, the army service corps, and the medical orderlies. There is no use in feeding and paying men in time of peace when we know that we can get them easily in time of war and rapidly make them efficient. In all these three departments it would be practicable to fill up the gaps by trained volunteers when they are needed. For example, the St. John's Ambulance men showed themselves perfectly capable of doing the hospital duties in South Africa. From the various engineer battalions of volunteers the sappers could extend to any dimensions. There remain thirty thousand men out of the original number, which should form the infantry of the line. These should preserve the old regimental names and traditions, but should consist of mere "cadres"-skeleton regiments to be filled up in time of war. There might, for example, be one hundred regiments, each containing three hundred men. But these men, paid on the higher scale, would all be picked men and good rifle-shots, trained to the highest point in real warlike exercises.

The October Quiver has some interesting reminiscences of the late Dean Vaughan, formerly headmaster of Harrow, by one of those whom he taught and whose veneration he won and retained. The writer concludes his tribute by saying: "Many men have left their stamp on this generation, but I doubt if any have left a wider and deeper influence than Charles John Vaughan." Other articles are on the Home of the Pilgrim Fathers—the American Plymouth—as it now is, and "Some Famous Market Halls" still to be found in old England.

~~~~~~~

COLONIAL PLEA FOR ARMY REFORM.

ONE of the most interesting articles in the Contemporary Review for October is that in which the Hon. J. M. Creed, of Sydney, gives "A Colonist's Views of Army Reform." Many of his suggestions are extremely original—so original indeed that their chance of adoption is thereby diminished.

DEMOCRATISATION.

The first need of all is, of course, to democratise the

What the nation requires is that the pay and prospects shall be made so good as to induce the best men, though neither noble nor rich, to adopt the Army as a profession affording the means of livelihood. What can be done on this principle is shown in the instance of the British officers in the service of Egypt, than whom a more efficient body of leaders probably never existed, the best proof being the number of men of the higher rank who were withdrawn from the Soudan and sent to South Africa when things were going badly there. If officers of this type could create the present Egyptian Army from the material at their disposal, what could they not do with the voluntary recruits of Great Britain and her colonies?

THE PART OF THE COLONIES.

Mr. Creed does not think that the plan of enlisting large bodies of men for the Imperial Army in Canada and Australia would succeed. But the Colonies can supply what is even more necessary than men:—

It would be a more practicable arrangement for the Imperial Government to obtain from the various Governments of Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, tracts of land for military stations so situated that the neighbouring country would afford convenient exercise ground for operations on an extensive scale under campaign conditions. Sufficient ground might be chosen on the level for the huts or barracks, but yet so near to mountains as to render it possible to use these for more extended movements. I would recommend that Imperial troops of all arms be sent to each station and depôt formed, which young colonists might join on English conditions if they chose. The men selected for these new stations should, I think, be recruits, who, having been put through their preliminary drill at the depôt in Great Britain, where they first joined their selected regiment, require more extended training, such as is not possible there, and only obtainable under conditions which are present in comparatively new countries.

A CHAIN OF REINFORCEMENTS.

A very marked gain to the Empire would also be that detachments especially fit for service would be available at shorter distances from India and China, where they are most likely to be needed, than if they were kept in Europe, and in the event of the Suez Canal being blocked, had to proceed round the Cape. As to South Africa, as a mere precaution and object-lesson, the presence of more than the usual force for some years is necessary, and more troops might be placed there than in Canada and Australasia, where especial care should be taken to avoid any excuse for the supposition to arise, either in the minds of Britons or foreigners, that troops were sent to these colonies to ensure greater security. It should be understood that their land defence would be still left distinctly to themselves, and that, when occasion arose, every Imperial soldier might be removed at a moment's notice to any place where he was required in the interest of the Empire. If such a system were established, probably no reliefs would be sent direct from the United Kingdom to India or China, but they would be selected from the Colonial stations. Egypt, Malta and Gibraltar should, I think, get their garrisons from troops going home from the East.

A REGIMENT OF GENTLEMEN.

Mr. Creed revives the old suggestion that a regiment should be raised of men drawn from a social class higher than that of the ordinary recruit. All barracks should be altered so as to give each man a separate cubicle in which no one but the occupant and the daily inspecting officer should enter, the ordinary social intercourse of the regiment being restricted to the common rooms. As to the question of transport, Mr. Creed says:—

My suggestion is that the Imperial Government should take steps to secure, in all the British Colonies having such a climate as not to necessitate the housing of stock in winter, suitable areas of land for the establishment of depôts upon which to break and train horses, mules, and, perhaps, camels and oxen, for transport purposes. I am of opinion that an ideal transport service should consist of sound, unstabled animals, not less than six years old, so broken as to be perfectly staunch and docile, and used to work on grass or herbage with, when at work, at most, a feed of corn morning and night. To bring the cost of maintenance within due limits, I would suggest that after being broken, and arriving at say four years, the animals should be let on hire to settlers and carriers at a fair charge, for use in their teams, both for farm and road work, with the condition that they should be fairly treated, fittingly fed, and so harnessed as to exempt them from chronic sore shoulders or backs. Numerous beasts being available, directly any one became unfitted for work it should be changed for another and be allowed a rest-spell.

HOW HORSES SHOULD BE TRAINED.

Above all the horses should be trained to eat unaccustomed food. Horses will eat almost anything, and in Iceland they are frequently fed on such foods as dried fish, while in Singapore it is not uncommon for horses to be given a loaf of bread soaked in beer. Horses of not more than fourteen hands should be employed for all ordinary purposes.

I have jound that even with a weight up to sixteen stone, if not unduly forced in pace, they are as well able to support a long journey as are horses of sixteen hands, and even better in mountainous districts. This conclusion is also justified by accounts of the Burmese ponies, which, though generally not more than twelve hands, yet carry sixteen stone from thirty to forty miles, day after day. Newspaper reports say that the contingent sent to South Africa from Burmah took these ponies, and that they were found to do well on little food and to carry the men better than the larger horses. Such ponies will keep in condition upon half the food required by the bigger animal, and they suffer from change of climate or the absence of shelter from inclement weather in a much less degree.

MOUNTED INFANTRY.

Mr. Creed holds that all linesmen should be trained to act also as mounted infantry. A hundred ponies should be supplied to each regiment, and each company trained separately:—

Were this done we should not only have our linesmen as useful as ever for what has hitherto been considered their legitimate work, but every one could be mounted at any time if the exigencies of the situation rendered it advisable. I would suggest that the light company should be the one to which the ponies, when not in use by the others, should be permanently allotted, and it would, from the lighter weight of the men and their more constant mounted drill, be the most fit to unite with similar bodies from other regiments to form a brigade or division of that type. Such a company would take its ponies with it. These animals, from their constant work, would have acquired such knowledge of what was required of them as to add materially to the efficiency of the force.

COMPULSORY SERVICE.

Blackwood heads its contribution to the discussion with the summary sentence, "The military policy of the country should be an offensive policy." It advocates the spending of £20,000,000 on rifle ranges, barracks, and other buildings. It urges further:—

Every man in Great Britain should be willing either to serve voluntarily in the Militia or Volunteers, or to pay towards the maintenance of those forces. Militiamen and volunteers should be given such privileges as will justify this measure of compulsory service. we author a concandir Forth has it militar gives but fla

But consid Generathe be Foreign between this af

Th

way i so de

the si

Preconque forcib our mof the cannot inhab of the essent beneate constitute of the reintell where

Ca

Gene

foreig

were see 2, from havin it is f was (earth piteo and mem milit want displ ment our i for the entre lost. thin mule

to ca

OUR MILITARY PRESTIGE ABROAD.

d to the ort, Mr.

uld take a climate ble areas

reak and transport

e should

s old, so

work on of corn

ng at say carriers

nd road treated, chronic ailable.

changed

accus-

and in dried rses to of not for all

, if not a long tter in ed by ly not irty to at the onies, carry keep nimal, helter

ed to ould

ined

use-

mate

igen-

that when nd it

conodies

ype. nals.

edge

the sion

the ates

and erve the

ould

ory

WE have had enough of candid criticism from home authorities on the state of our army to take down our pride a considerable peg. It only needed the comments of the candid critic abroad to complete the picture. In the Fortnightly Review for October Captain Gambier, who has made a careful study of the reports of the foreign military attachés, both with ourselves and with the Boers, gives us a summary of their opinions which is anything but flattering.

NO BRITISH NEED APPLY.

According to Captain Gambier the South African War so destroyed all our claims to be a military nation that the suggestion that a British General should command the Pekin Relief Force very nearly wrecked the joint action of the Powers.

But the plain unvarnished English of it was that, under no consideration, would the Allies consent to be led by an English General. For it is now an open secret, freely discussed amongst the best informed-the common knowledge of every clerk in the Foreign Office-that extremely humiliating negotiations passed between England and the other Powers with reference to this affair of the Generalissimo.

FOREIGN VIEWS OF OUR ARMY.

The following is Captain Gambier's summary of the way in which our military power is regarded abroad :-

Prestige, after a war, does not of a necessity fall to the conqueror, and there is no lesson that the Boer War should more forcibly bring home to us than the plainly demonstrable fact that our military prestige is most seriously impaired in the estimation of those abroad whom it behoves to measure our strength, cannot be seriously denied that amongst nine-tenths of the inhabitants of Europe, and possibly amongst a larger proportion of those Asiatic nations whose belief in our military strength is essential to our existence, not only is our military organisation beneath ridicule, but the very matériel of which our armies is constituted has proved itself anything but invincible and quite the reverse of formidable, whilst in point of training and of any intelligent grasp of modern warfare we are held to be precisely where we were at the end of the Crimean War.

AN ITALIAN CRITICISM.

Captain Gambier takes the report of the friendly Italian General, Count Luchino dal Verme, as a specimen of foreign opinion :

"What astonished all military men," says the Count, "who were accustomed to regard the British troops as so brave, was to see 2,200 men in the open in broad daylight, only a few miles from their camp, surrendering to an enemy, or, at any rate, not having made that enemy pay dearly for their temerity." I say it is folly to blink these facts. This story of the "surrender" was copied with avidity into every newspaper on the face of the earth; and not that surrender alone, but numerous others, with piteous tales of bungling and ineptitude, which all the cheering and waving of flags by shop-boys can never wipe out of the memory of our so-called Allies in China. To follow this military and friendly critic through all the untold instances of want of scouting, to read his description of the ignorance we displayed of the elementary rules of war: our "small detachments of cavalry scattered all over the country where they ought to be in force," the "endless requirements of men and officers in our infantry battalions," and, "worst of all, the slow marching, for the English soldier carries very little and grumbles at having to carry so much ' (God knows how true this is !).

NO ENTRENCHMENTS.

Count dal Verme declared that the soldiers would not entrench, and as a consequence hundreds of lives were The more reinforcements were sent the worse things became :-

As fast as men and guns were sent out numbers of horses, mules, and drivers were despatched . . . but all this was of no avail without previous organisation. When all these supplies arrived at Cape Town and Durban weeks were required to put them in order, and months passed before the transport began to work properly at the arduous task of supplying an army in the The English were in a country traversed in every direction by roads, and even by railways.

Captain Gambier sums up these judgments as Nations, even less than individuals, are capable of a just appreciation in such matters. Every reverse we had was hailed as a crushing defeat; every prisoner was a coward; every mistake or "unfortunate incident" was the work of an incompetent general. And, honestly speaking, it is difficult to see how foreigners could think anything else-especially when the literal facts remain that the small Boer army of peasants had led away captive nearly 5,000 of our best Regulars, had captured guns and convoys-that our generals were being bundled home, the situation only saved by a supreme effort, and by denuding the Islands of Great Britain of almost every soldier of the regular Army; when the official numbers, as given by our Minister of War, showed that we had over 200,000 men and close on 500 guns in the field, whilst the Boers at no one moment ever had over 40,000 men; that by the 3rd of March we had lost 182 officers killed, 565 wounded; 1,593 men killed, 7,108 wounded; officers prisoners 138; men 3,191—a total of close on 13,000 men disposed of in actual battle by this handful of farmers and I say it is no wonder that there has been no passionate desire by foreign armies to entrust the conduct of an extremely complicated and arduous campaign to our guidance. No sane man could expect they would carry fatuity to such a

WAR AGAINST WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

CLARENCE WATERER, in the Westminster Review, surveys afresh the dreary course of South African affairs, and finds in the Raid and its condonation by the Committee of No Inquiry the fons et origo mali. He concludes his survey by showing the kind of war our troops are now waging. First he cites this proclamation :-

"V.R .- PUBLIC NOTICE.

"It is hereby notified for information that unless the Men at present on Commando, belonging to families in the Town and District of Krugersdorp, surrender themselves and hand in their arms to the Imperial Authorities by the 20th July, the whole of their property will be confiscated and their families turned out destitute and homeless. "By order.
"G. H. M. RITCHIE,

" Capt. K. Horse, Dist. Supt. of Police.

"Krugersdorp, July 9th, 1900."

This proclamation was cancelled a week later, and high prices are offered for copies of it by the Imperial authorities. well understand their anxiety. Such a proclamation under the initials of the first lady of our realm might prove an inconvenient handbill even in a khaki election.

Next he quotes a letter of a Trooper Morris, published September 6, 1900 :-

"Since we are with Clements we have had plenty of work, burning farms, destroying crops, and commandeering cattle. It is very hard sometimes, but it must be done. Last Sunday six of us, including myself, went out with an Imperial officer to a fine farm-house, giving the occupants five minutes to clear out all their goods as well as themselves. There were an old grandmother, three married daughters, and several children, There were an old crying and asking for mercy; but no. And when the time was up we burnt it to the ground."

What an exhibition for a nation that has had the right to be proud of its record. Because with our 200,000 men we are unable to guard our communications, the raiding of which, it must not be forgotten, is a perfectly legitimate act of war—because of our failure to keep up our line of supplies, we devastate miles of country and turn defenceless women and children out destitute and homeless.

WHAT WE MUST DO TO BE SAVED.

1. BECOME PROFESSIONALS.

THE cry for reform and reconstruction which inevitably follows every great war continues to echo in the reviews this month. The Nineteenth Century for October opens with a paper in which the Hon. George Brodrick, Warden of Merton, declares that we are a nation of amateurs in every department, and that nothing but stricter attention to business will save us.

AN AMATEUR ARMY.

No competent foreign critic would disparage the virtues of British soldiers or British officers, but he would assuredly say, and not without reason, that, conspicuous as they are, these virtues are essentially the virtues of the amateur, and not of the professional, arising from the native vigour of our national temperament, and not from intelligent education or training, The actual introduction of competitive examination, the nominal introduction of promotion by merit, and the institution of autumn manageryres, have done something to raise the standard of culture among officers, and even to inspire them with a certain appreciation of military science. But these improvements have failed to eradicate their hereditary and traditional spirit of "amateurism.

AMATEUR LAWYERS.

The amateurism which characterises the army pervades every department of public life :-

So far as training is concerned, nine-tenths of young barristers are essentially amateurs at starting. It might be supposed that competition would soon convert them into professionals, in spirit at least, and so it does in many cases. But the absolute predominance of interest in the distribution of briefs among juniors, and the knowledge that no degree of merit will command success without interest, has a sensible effect in perpetuating the amateur spirit. It is true that in the higher stages of a barrister's career, incompetence is pretty sure to be found out and punished by a loss of practice; it is true, also, that a rising barrister's efforts are stimulated by enormous fees and the prospect of splendid prizes, but it is then too late to make himself an accomplished lawyer, and the flagrantly unscientific character of the English law is not unconnected with the amateur education of those who, as counsel, draftsmen, or judges, ultimately frame and mould it.

AMATEUR LEGISLATORS.

The Church is manned by amateurs, and the British farmer has been an amateur from time immemorial. As for Parliamentary life it has always been a paradise of amateur ambition :-

Not to speak of the Upper House, how few candidates for a seat in the House of Commons have the smallest notion of seat in the House of commons have the smallest mount of treating politics as a serious and lifelong career! Some, indeed, belonging to privileged families, have thus imbibed a considerable knowledge of political affairs; some have gained experience as private secretaries; some have travelled widely, not without the hope of learning something of foreign and colonial insti-tutions; many more being experts in law, commercial business, or other branches of national activity, make valuable contributions to Parliamentary debates on subjects within their cognisance. As legislators and statesmen, however, nearly all are essentially amateurs, and would probably reject the idea of being anything else.

How we are to cease being amateurs Mr. Brodrick does not go out of his way to point out. The only suggestion he can make is that each should combat amateurism in his own circle.

2. THE CIVIL SERVICE.

In the Nineteenth Century for October Sir Algernon West replies very sharply to Mr. Lyttelton Gell's article, which was published in the same review for July, calling for administrative reform in the public service. He declares flatly that during the present war the Civil Service did not break down at all :

The strain and the stress which suddenly came upon the civil departments of the State at the commencement of the Boer war were prodigious, and I maintain that they were not found wanting, and Mr. Gell has not shown what their shortcomings, if they existed at all, were. There are doubtless many points on which praise and blame can only be fairly apportioned when we know more; the Royal Commission which is now investigating the alleged breakdown in the hospital arrangements at the seat of war will tell us if there were failures, and what branches of the Service will be held responsible for them. But, without prejudging the verdict of the Commission, it appears that there were plenty of hospital stores sent from this country, and that the failure to get them up the country, however accounted for by the necessities of war, cannot reasonably be attributable to the civil side of the Service.

3. IMPROVE THE BREED.

Dr. Hely Hutchinson Almond, head master of Loretto, writes in the Nineteenth Century on the need of improving "The Breed of Man." In regard to the Army, he holds that the system of training and selection is at fault. His chief recommendation is as follows :-

Let one subject less be taken up for examination, and let marks be given freely for tests of vision and hearing, for strength of grip, for doing a long walk, say twenty-five miles, go-as-youplease, in creditable time, and for a foot steeplechase or obstacle race—marking here also by time—and above all for rifle shooting. Nor do I see why marks should not be given also for boxing and gymnastics. Proficiency in military drill should be an essential in all cases.

THE BURDEN OF EMPIRE.

Mr. W. S. Lilly, in the Fortnightly for October, writing under the title of "The Burden of Empire," diagnoses the disease of England in the following words:

The truth is that in England our so-called governors do not govern; they gamble. Politics have become a game played for office and all that office means, the dearest interests of the country being quite a subordinate consideration, or no consideration at all; a game in which one party's great and constant aim is to "dish" the other; a game which, indeed, like other games, must be played according to rule, but in which the players are no more guided by ethical considerations than are their fellow-gamblers at Monte Carlo, or in an East End London hell. Noble sentiments are, of course, from time to time, upon their lips; that is part of the game. But noble thoughts are not in their hearts. Their eyes are ever fixed anxiously upon the next General Election; their minds are set on vote-catching; their motives and maxims are derived from wire-pullers and ballot-mongers, from the newspapers and the Stock Exchange.

· How is it, asks Mr. Lilly, that a Government like the present, composed of men who in private life are honourable and virtuous, shirk the most momentous parts of the work for which they receive power and pay?

It is because the sense of duty, the feeling of obligation to God and man, has become extinct in our Parliamentary life. It is because politics are supposed to be exempt from the moral law: to be independent of the principles and rules which in other segments of human activity determine right and wrong.

Having thus diagnosed our parlous position, Mr. Lilly proceeds to declare that the only thing that can cure us is the leadership of Mr. Chamberlain!

5. PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. J. C. Tarver, writing in the Fortnightly Review for October on "The Public Schools and the Public Services," says :-

The public schools must be recognised as places of preparation for the public services. The recognition need not be confined to existing schools, but should be capable of extension to any school which could show that it possessed the necessary organisation and appliances.

THE entitle The st Border even in novel contril Schim philan procla telegra and is sends what good instan c'airvo It is Duen.

curly-h about a

North

saw the water. my lad waves. sight o crew in the spo minute both la this, ar strokes seen it mate v he was both v genera and ca warnin An says t

which telepa single

in rec away. to pro comm MR Revie Jamai says t Colon the U capita becon trade. a red the cu for gi ratifie montl the p pover

PROPHETIC CLAIRVOYANCE.

THE STORY OF COUNTESS SCHIMMELMANN.

THE Puritan for October publishes a symposium entitled "Wireless Telegraphy in the Spiritual World." The subject is one which I have frequently discussed in Borderland, and it now seems to be gaining recognition even in the most orthodox circles. There is nothing very novel in any of the theories which are put forward by contributors, but the following story by Countess Schimmelmann, who is described as the "well-known philanthropist," is interesting. Countess Schimmelmann proclaims that she is a sceptic about the matter of telegraphy of thought. The only thing that she knows and is sure of, is the influence which her heavenly Father sends through His spirit and His angels. An instance of what she calls this telegraphy from Heaven is a very good illustration of a phenomenon of which many instances are on record, namely, that of prophetic clairvoyance:—

It is now two years since that I anchored with my yacht, the Duen, in the Lymfyord. My youngest son, a bright, golden curly-haired boy, was rowing with one of our sailors in a boat about a mile and a half from our yacht. In the clear air of the North they were yet to be seen, and I, watching them, distinctly saw the boy rise and overturn the boat so that it was filled with water. I saw him and his comrade struggling in the waves, and my lad sinking until only his golden curls were floating on the waves. All this took several minutes of time, and already at the first sight of the overturning boat I cried out for help and hurried the crew into the lifeboat. With great quickness they tried to reach the spot, but it was impossible to do so before the lapse of fifteen minutes. When they arrived they found the boat quite safe, and both lads fishing. They could not think what had made me see this, and turned to row home, but after they had taken several strokes homeward, the whole thing happened exactly as I had seen it about fifteen minutes before, but the boat being near, the mate was just in time to catch the golden curls of my boy when he was sinking, while the sailor was clinging to the boat; so both were rescued. I am not subject to sights of any kind generally, and I simply give this fact as we all saw it happen, and cannot give it any other explanation than that it was a warning sent from God to rescue the lives of the boys.

An electrical engineer of the name of E. W. Roberts says that he has conducted a series of careful experiments which have proved to him that he is able to communicate telepathically with persons at 400 miles distance, not in a single instance, but repeatedly. He has also succeeded in receiving a message from one who was over 1,000 miles away. He claims also that he has abundance of evidence to prove that this ability to send and receive telepathic communications is possessed by everyone.

JAMAICA AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. JULIUS MORITZEN contributes to the American Review of Reviews for October an article entitled "Does Jamaica contain a lesson in Colonial Government?" He says that the Cuban War has waked up the West Indian Colonies, that Jamaica has no desire for annexation by the United States, but she has a great desire for American capital. She anticipates that Cuba and Porto Rico will become formidable rivals to Jamaica in the American trade. Jamaica wants American goods, and in return for a reduction in duties asks the United States to reduce the customs duties on fruits, but the Reciprocity Treaty for giving effect to this arrangement has not yet been ratified, and is not likely to be. Mr. Moritzen has spent two months in Jamaica, and his paper is a valuable study of the present condition of the colony. He says that the poverty of the island is due to excessive taxation; and in the opinion of prominent men in the island, including the leading elected members of the Legislative Council, Mr. Chamberlain is to blame, "for the Transvaal is not the only spot on earth where the name of Joseph Chamberlain is unbeloved." The Americans have done much to revive the prosperity of Jamaica. The United Fruit Company is an American firm, which has £5,000,000 invested in fruit-growing in South and Central America and Jamaica. Mr. Chamberlain has insisted upon the Colony contributing £20,000, half of the subsidy to be paid to Elder, Dempster and Co. for running fruit steamers direct from Jamaica to Liverpool. Many prominent citizens in Jamaica are of opinion that this subsidy is a great mistake. Most of the best fruit in Jamaica is too perishable for export, and can only be made valuable by the establishment of large preserving factories. As Mr. Chamberlain has refused to assist in this, it is probable that they will appeal to Americans. Mr. Moritzen gives an interesting account of the effect produced in Jamaica by the introduction of the mongoose. The rats were eating up everything, so they brought the mongoose to eat the rats. They killed out all the rats, and then as soon as they had demolished the rats they attacked all the birds which laid their eggs on the ground, killing the birds and eating their eggs. Now these birds were the only means by which a certain pestiferous tick was kept under. With the disappearance of the birds, the ticks have reappeared in great numbers, and by a curious Nemesis have attacked the mongoose, and the Jamaicans are rejoicing in the prospect of celebrating before long the disappearance of the last mongoose. The birds are coming back again, and it will be inter-esting to see how long it will be before the rats reappear. Meanwhile it may be noted that the American Congress has prohibited the importation of the mongoose into the United States or its colonies. Mr. Moritzen reports an interview with Mr. D. S. Gideon, Member of the Legislative Council, who is by no means satisfied with Mr. Chamberlain's administration of the island. He says that the Jamaicans are looking anxiously for object-lessons from the United States, when the Americans settle down to real business in Porto Rico and Cuba. Mr. Moritzen concludes his survey of the question by declaring that "as a lesson for the United States to profit by, the Government of Jamaica may well stand as an example of how things colonial should not be done."

A Plea for Indirect Taxation.

"THE Working Man and the War Charges" is the title of an article by Mr. Frederick Greenwood in the Nineteenth Century for October. Mr. Greenwood does not deal with the question of the cost of the present war, but concerns himself with the general principle of war taxation; the object of the article being to show that the policy of closing all sources of indirect taxation is a mistake. Mr. Greenwood thinks we are on the eve of a new era of trade wars, in which the interests of all the nations will clash with those of England. The need for new sources of taxation is therefore, he holds, imperative, and it does not frighten Mr. Greenwood to reflect that raising taxation indirectly is the most potent of all ways of putting a premium on jingoism:—

Experience proves that, wisely applied (a condition which it is reasonable to presuppose), indirect taxation can gather in much that its contribuors are quite insensible of parting with; and though science may object that nevertheless it has been parted with, and more also, the answer is of small consequence at the contribution of the contribut in the conditions assumed.

he Civil

Boer war of found teomings, ny points ned when investigats at the branches without that there and that

Loretto, proving e holds t. His and let strength

-as-youobstacle e shootalso for ould be writing ses the do not yed for of the siderae other ich the ian are London e, upon hts are y upon ching;

rs and ange.

ce the phourof the

tion to fe. It moral ich in g. Lilly

w for re us

eparaot be nsion essary

THE RE-MAKING OF IRELAND

ON A CO-OPERATIVE BASIS.

THE economic regeneration of Ireland, which is being initiated on co-operative lines by Mr. Plunkett and the Irish Agricultural Organisation Society, is the subject of a pleasing sketch in Blackwood by Mr. Stephen Gwynn. He tells what he saw during "a month in Ireland," notably in Donegal and Mayo. He describes the co-operative creamery at Killygordon. He shows how the milk is tested and paid for according to the quality revealed by the test.

MILK-AND-WATER REPRISALS.

Incidentally he mentions a difficulty characteristically Irish, which comes out in the following letter from a local

"SIR,—There was a man sending in milk, and we suspected him of watering. We had the analysis taken, and it showed twenty-five per cent, of water. We told him he should be ashamed of himself, and he came to the committee, and he knocked down two members of the committee and blacked their eyes. Sir, what are we to do?"

Happily, this is an exceptional case. Mr. Gwynn tells how the Society has taught the people to spray their potatoes on the first sign of disease; and but for the spraying there would not have been a stalk left in the potato fields.

THE RURAL BANK.

The rural banks, as he finds them, have been remarkably successful. Here is a typical case:—

A man owning a couple of fields had sold a cow to pay his rent, and had no money with which to restock; but for the bank, the grass was going to waste. He borrowed £10, paid 18s. for a pair of "suckers," and £8 13s. for a pair of young beasts. The pigs he sold in four months for £4 10s. The heifers he sold in ten months for £20. He then repaid his loan, which, with interest at 6 per cent., made ten guineas, and was left with £14 to the good.

Mr. Gwynn holds that these successes disprove the familiar charge that "the Irish have no capacity for business."

THE INITIATIVE OF THE PRIESTS.

It is interesting to know the part which Roman Catholic priests have played in this promising new departure. Mr. Gwynn says of the movement in Mayo:—

Here, as everywhere else, the priest had addressed his people from the altar, and told them there was a gentleman that had things to say to them that they would do well to listen to, and the first work of the propaganda had been done outside the chapel—by a Catholic among Catholics for Ireland, with no taint or suspicion of any party purpose.

The Society has, Mr. Gwynn claims, done for Irish agriculture what has been done in France, Denmark, Canada, and other countries by the State—at a cost to subscribers in nine years of £15,000.

IRISH ARTISTIC SENSE.

There is reserved to the close of Mr. Gwynn's most cheering paper an account of the woollen industry in Donegal. He says :-

A member of the Congested Districts Board fell in with Mr. Morton of the famous Darvel carpet-making firm, and heard of his factories at work in remote parts of the Highlands. Why should not the same be done in the West of Ireland? he asked; and Mr. Morton was willing to make the experiment if a place could be found with railway and sea communication. Killy begs was pitched upon, and the work was started in a provisional way—the Board guaranteeing a considerable sum if, at the expiration of two years, it seemed unprofitable to go on with it. But there was no want of workers with fingers that naturally took to the swift, deft work, and the expiration of the two years found the firm completing a fine factory. It was only newly opened when I passed through, and I was lucky enough to meet Mr. Morton himself—an employer of artistic labour with all the instincts of an artist. What struck him most was, it seemed to me, the inborn artistic sense of the Irish peasants, their manifest pleasure in watching the pattern grow on the loom; and next to that, the fact that the hills about the district were exactly fit to feed the right class of sheep and produce the right wool.

THE BEAUTIES OF A FACTORY.

A week later he saw the factory in operation :-

A prettier sight it would be hard to find. There was a great room, perhaps 200 feet by 150, lit like a studio, clear, clean, with pine-boarded walls. At the farther end were the looms, nine of them—with seven or eight girls sitting in a row before each; and beyond the looms were piled the great masses of rich coloured wool—reds, greens, blues, and browns; and on every loom rose the rich glow of the costly carpet... But the beauty of the place lay in the human factor,—the rows of young girls set there, bare-headed, against this gorgeous backing.

Ireland has been a pioneer in the work of smashing the Manchester school. It looks as if she might be the pioneer of the co-operative era which many people say is to follow on the competitive.

A FRENCHMAN IN SCOTLAND.

To the first September number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, M. Roz contributes some interesting impressions of Scotland. He had hardly landed at Leith before he noticed the unmistakable signs of alcoholism in both young and old men, and he is struck by the signs of a brutal Anglo-Saxon civilisation, totally lacking anything of the joy and sympathy of life. Arrived in Edinburgh, he falls an easy victim to the charm and historical associations of the capital of Scotland. In the Canongate he finds it necessary to walk with care, for the street is full of drunkards, women and even young girls intoxicated with whisky staggering about and even falling in the street. He describes admirably the Gordon Highlanders going to Sunday service at St. Giles' Cathedral; during the service he was impressed by a sense of the harmony of Scottish life which has reconciled so many contradictions. This Puritan people has forgotten its hostility to Mary Stuart and Knox, and it prefers to inherit the past rather than to insult it. Its love for Queen Mary does not prevent it from being loyal to the throne of Elizabeth; and M. Roz pays a tribute to the carefulness of the English in endeavouring to avoid any disrespect to the national traditions of the conquered (! country. The real presiding geniuses of Scotland seem to him to be Robert Burns and Sir Walter Scott, who form the centre of a world of mingled truth and dreamland which envelops the nation like an atmosphere. The great men of Scotland have preserved for her her individuality, and the political union with England has not availed against their prestige. M. Roz seems to have enjoyed himself very much in the Highlands, where certain patriarchal traditions greatly caught his fancy. The custom of family prayers, and the absence of servants at breakfast he noted with interest; and nothing could be more appreciative than his account of the hospitality that was shown him. He praises, also, the universal politeness of the Scotch people, especially towards their inferiors. The Scottish genius, speaking generally, stands, he thinks, to the French genius as the wild rose is related to its cultivated cousin of the rose garden. He finds in Scotland the idealism, the grace, and the courtesy of France under forms apparently ruder, and the difference between the two countries is, in his opinion, the result of their different histories.

IT is begins Scribn
In won lis

you list mining is her for the same re

" Ru

therefe

Its c church ficent t here or St. Isa view of upon i unsurp unappr was bo the cat name o sapphin and it "0 to be room ' assass

> Amerightly Tolsto one, Russia sage a furniti

daugh

lies th

by his writer

displa

But express words, ments one wo law, p to the with deferer person

The the will I as Russia a hom replied that duntil I that in man to

MR. HENRY NORMAN, M.P., ON RUSSIA.

IT is a brilliant paper with which Mr. Henry Norman begins his series of essays on Russia of To-day in Scribner. He opens quite dramatically :-

In world affairs, wherever you turn you see Russia; whenever you listen you hear her. She moves in every path; she is mining in every claim. The "creeping murmur" of the world is her footfall—the "poring dark" is her veil. To the challenge of the nation, as they peer from their borders, comes ever the same reply—
"Who goes there?"
"Russia!"

THE MOST SPLENDID OF MODERN CHURCHES.

Mr. Norman finds St. Petersburg "cosmopolitan, and therefore as a whole uninteresting." Yet,—

Its churches, for example, are the most splendid of any modern churches in the world. In other countries cathedrals are magnificent through the faith and the munificence of men of old time; here our contemporaries have set their creed in gold and gems. St. Isaac's Cathedral, from whose magnificent dome the best view of the city is obtained, whose gloom hides untold wealth upon its altars, whose four sides of great granite monoliths are unsurpassed, and whose pillars of malachite and lapis lazuli are unapproached elsewhere, was consecrated the year in which I was born. A semicircular colonnade leads from the Nevski to the cathedral of our wonder-working Lady of Kazan, where the name of the Almighty blazes in diamonds, where half a ton of silver marks an outburst of Cossack piety, where pearls and sapphires seem to have no value, so lavishly are they strewed, and it dates from 1811.

"One of the loveliest water-views in the world," is said to be found at the point on the Neva. The sketch of the room which Alexander II. occupied on the morning of his assassination, with its simple camp bed, its plain furniture, the "portrait rather crudely painted of a little daughter who died-and below the portrait, neatly folded, lies the last frock she wore, which her father kept always by him "-is singularly pathetic. Moscow strikes the writer as "the most highly coloured city in Europe," and displaying "the quaintest architecture."

VISIT TO TOLSTOY.

Among the most typical Russian sights Mr. Norman rightly ranks along with the Kremlin the venerable Count Tolstoy:—" The typical Russian is doer and dreamer in one, and Tolstoy is the dreamer incarnate in every Russian heart." Mr. Norman gives a photograph of the sage as he saw him in his garden :-

But the lens cannot portray the infinite sweetness of his expression, nor the pen convey the exceeding gentleness of his words. For him the law and the prophets, the ten commandments and the categorical imperative, are all comprised in the one word—love. Who has it, has everything—religion, ethics, law, politics; who has it not, has nothing. And his devotion to the race marks his attitude to the individual. He greets you with genuine pleasure, he asks your opinion almost with deference, he considers your answer with respect. Your personality is evidently a thing he regards as sacred.

THE PAINT ON THE ENGINE.

The interview with Tolstoy is the most valuable part of the whole article :-

I asked him if he sympathised with M. Witte's fostering of Russian manufactures at the expense of agriculture—that seemed a home-query that he must consider. Vain expectation! He replied that he did not see what difference it makes to the engine that does the work whether it is painted red or green. Not until next day did I interpret that Delphic reply. He meant that in comparison with the question whether the relations of man to man and man to men are inspired by love, all matters of tariffs and bounties are as infinitely irrelevant as the paint on the boiler is to the stroke of the piston.

Strange to say, the great Russian proved to be an anti-

But I ran him to earth, so to speak, over the Dreyfus case, at that moment being re-heard at Rennes. And to my unspeakable astonishment I found him a believer in the preposterous "secret dossier," a defender of the egregious General Staff, accepting the guilt of Dreyfus as an easier alternative than the conspiracy of his fellow-officers against him.

HIS TRINITY OF EVIL.

"Three things I hate," he said to me, "autocracy, orthodoxy, and militarism," and these are the three pillars of the Russian State. I asked him point-blank, "How is it that the government has never arrested or banished you?" "I cannot slowly, in a tone of much solemnity, "I wish they would. It would be a great joy to me."

His immunity from arrest, Mr. Norman thinks, may be due to the purely spiritual and impracticable nature of his teachings.

TOLSTOY'S CREED.

Mr. Norman essays the somewhat formidable task of compressing the sage's theories of reform into a paragraph. He says :-

I tried to summarise them, immediately after my conversation with him, as follows: No more nations and frontiers and patriotism, but the world; no more rulers and laws and compulsion, but the individual conscience; no more multitudinous soil, eating of the fruit of his toil, exchanging with his neighbour the work of his hands, and finding in the changing round of natural processes alike the nourishment of his body and the delight of his eyes; while like some directing angel poised above, the law of love, revealed in Christ, lights each man's path, and so illumines the world.

CHARACTERISTICS.

Mr. Norman reports that the influence of the throne is increasing rather than diminishing. He remarks on the general illiteracy of the people, and the "universal, monotonous, hopeless poverty," which is the national characteristic: with famine, drunkenness and disease as evil familiars. This is his view of the average Russian:—

Personally, the Russian common people are attractive. They are simple, good-natured, kindly, very ready to be pleased or to laugh. Nobody can fail to like them. The ordinary Russian policeman—the gorodovoi, not the secret police—is the gentlest specimen of his kind I have ever met. And the soldier, typical of his class, is a great child, and is treated as such.

But "the most significant and important aspect of Russia of To-day," as Mr. Norman sees it, is the extraordinarythe almost incredible-growth of industrialism.

BESIDE the delightful "Study in School Jokes," referred to elsewhere, the October Longman's is chiefly notable for Mr. George Paston's narrative of the capture of Cape Town in 1795, with its extracts from an unpub-lished narrative by Sir John Malcolm. He recalls the curious circumstance that the British force set out to protect Cape Town as an ally of the Dutch Stadtholderate, but on arriving had, as an enemy of the Batavian Republic set up by Napoleon, to attack and capture the town. There is not a little of what Sir John says then about the South African Dutch which is true one hundred years later. After the Cape troops had been beaten in the field Cape Town fell as suddenly and bloodlessly as Pretoria did the other day.

y opened neet Mr. all the emed to manifest . and next cactly fit ool.

e looms, w before s of rich on every e beauty ing girls ing the be the ple say s a great

r, clean,

s Deux essions fore he n both ns of a ything burgh, storical ongate reet is xicated

in the High-

edral; of the many ten its fers to ove for to the to the id any ered (!) d seem tt, who lream-. The r indias not have where fancy. rvants could oitality iversal their erally, d rose . He urtesy differ-

n, the

CONTINUITY OF PARTY PRINCIPLES.

GREAT and sacred is the principle of continuity in our ever-changing human affairs; and the editor of the new Monthly Review performs a pious task in trying to trace an unbroken sequence of Party lines in the present political tangle. His paper on Parties and principles sets out to prove that neither Conservative nor Liberal has changed his ultimate principles. In home affairs "the division is as genuine and fundamental to-day as it has ever been."

THE "FUNDAMENTAL DIVISION."

The Conservative still wishes to conserve the existing order, and only introduces changes to conserve it more thoroughly. He is in the main content with what is. The Liberal is not content, but aspires after a loftier national ideal. In the writer's own words:—

This distinction in temperament involves a difference in the spirit in which political problems are faced by the two parties. To a statesman imbued with Conservative instincts, government is chiefly an intellectual problem of deep interest, an adjustment of forces here and there, a studying of the influences which are working beneath the surface, and a planning how to modify and curtail their operation in order that, notwithstanding the change of conditions, the social fabric may remain uninjured—that is, substantially unchanged. On the other hand, the political action of the genuine Liberal arises far more from a moral, almost a religious, impulse. Much ridicule has been thrown upon the extravagances of what is called "the Nonconformist conscience," but it should be remembered that this conscience has a positive as well as a negative side.

Since the propelling force in the case of the Liberal is not mere sympathy, but a desire for progressive improvement towards what he deems a higher ideal of national life, the genuine Liberal is never really content with those "measures of circumspection tentative in their character" to which Lord Salisbury pledged his party, but treats them as mere instalments of a temporary kind, whilst he presses on towards the more thorough fulfilment of a sacred duty and the realisation of a more ideal scheme of life.

LIBERALISM THE SAME IN THE NEW ERA.

The writer is bold enough to declare that between "the impulse and ideals" of the Liberals of to-day and those of fifty years ago there is not only kinship but "a real identity." He accepts as a summary of "the ideal and docrine of Liberalism" the phrase "liberty and equality through progress." In the working out of this formula he grants the party has entered on a new era:

A new era seems to be coming inevitably upon Liberalism—an era in which less emphasis will be laid upon constitutional problems, which are ceasing to touch the hearts and consciences of the electorate, but an era in which the energies of the Liberal party will be directed more and more to the production of social and economic equality and liberty by new methods of administration and by constructive legislation. In other words, there is a twofold development in progress. It seems that the Liberal party, in order to apply its principles to the actual needs of contemporary life, must now pass from the destructive to the constructive stage, and from constitutional to social reform. At present the party suffers from the process of transition, and as yet it scarcely believes in what is logically its future. Thus it loses all the impetus and enthusiasm which arise from certainty of conviction, and is inclined to cast its eyes back on controversies which are really extinct.

FROM GRUB TO BUTTERFLY.

The plain man will doubtless be willing to believe as firmly in the identity of the Old and the New as he believes in the identity of grub and butterfly. But he may turn out to be as unwilling to call the New by the old name as he is to call a butterfly a grub. At present he seems inclined to restrict "Liberal" to the grub, and to find another name (is it "Progressive"?) for the butterfly.

The writer shows no qualms of this kind:—caterpillar, chrysalis, butterfly—it shall be for him always Liberal. He has no programme to offer:—

If the Liberals are to fulfil their proper function in the political life of the country, they will do well to put the attainment of office for the moment into the background of their minds, and to devote themselves to the fostering and popularising of Liberal thought among their countrymen.

NO BREAK-UP OF PARTY SYSTEM.

His conclusion will be comforting to party managers, and is eminently conservative:—

The principles upon which the Conservative and Liberal organisations are based are to-day, in our opinion, so vital, real, and distinct, that, given capable leaders and reasonable discipline, there is not only no necessity for any break-up of our twofold party system, but it is really essential to our political life that these broad principles should remain clear and unconfused, and that the inevitable controversy between Government and Opposition, between those in office and those out of office, should neither have nor be thought to have any less broad or less honourable foundation.

The Wedding Ring Circle.

A 312, in sending in his resignation, writes to sav. "You will no doubt be encouraged to hear that through the medium of Round-About I have secured the brightest little gem in all England—and all for a guinea! For this you have my best thanks." A lady member who, previous to her joining, was living a lonely and uninteresting life, declares that she has now quite a circle of interesting "paper-friends," whose letters she enjoys reading and answering. As there are more gentlemen under thirty years of age than ladies, a member has suggested that parents and guardians should allow their daughters and wards to join, and superintend their correspondence. There is no doubt great prejudice exists against intellectual friendships between men and women, but the Wedding Ring Circle seems destined to act as a connecting link between those (1) who live lonely lives; (2) who seek interesting correspondence from the other sex; and (3) who desire to meet life-long The subscription is one guinea for twelve months, or twelve shillings and sixpence for the halfyear, which entitles the member to receive the post-bag post free; to have letters forwarded, provided stamps are enclosed, and to have the personality inserted for the period for which the subscription is paid. The Conductor, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C., on receipt of stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope, will send all

Why Men Sleep Longer than Animals

DR. LOUIS ROBINSON writes on "How Anirals Sleep" very entertainingly in the October Pearson's. His article is illustrated by amusing photographs. The widely different sleeping habits of man and the lower animals Dr. Robinson attributes to the fact that—man is almost the only creature who has been able to render himself absolutely secure from attacks of enemies during his hours of slumber. Another reason why man sleeps both sounder and longer than the lower animals is because his highly organised nervous system requires it. As a general rule the more lowly organised a creature is the less is its need for slumber. Hence the lower vertebrates, such as fishes and certain reptiles, appear scarcely to sleep at all; and the so-called "sleep" of plants is something totally different from the sleep of animals.

The young infant still shows traces of the free dwelling habits of its parents, its fingers being tightly closed during sleep—a relic of the time when, like all young monkeys, its ancestors held on to their mother's hair when sleeping.

MR. World' remark go rou of the to the use of just the

It is in many output during tailed be. The wa of coal, the proon the

Mr. sion a The increas simple prices.

He ducers Unite produ any me the Asituati writer Pacific

A of the U revela In 220,0 State durin

Th

The grant may mater would 41,000 export tons; that last y that 50,000 missi

tions says
It is no

The

one,

THE COAL FAMINE.

MR. BENJAMIN TAYLOR writes a timely article on "The World's Coal" in Cassier's Magazine for September. He remarks that "'tis coal, not love, that makes the world go round," and then proceeds to inquire into the causes of the coal famine in Europe. Some people attribute it to the war in South Africa, but though the war has made use of large numbers of steamers, these would have used just the same amount of coal elsewhere. He says:—

It is true that the war has caused the suspension of operations in many of the South African collieries; but the entire annual output of South Africa has never exceeded 2,000,000 tons, while during the war the consumption in South Africa has been curtailed by the suspension of the railways and industrial operations. The war has, to a certain extent, diverted the export movements of coal, but has not increased the total consumption, nor reduced the production to any extent sufficient to have any material effect on the general situation.

THE TRUE EXPLANATION.

Mr. Taylor points to the phenomenal industrial expansion and activity of the past two years, and says:—

The increase in the production of coal has been great, but the increase in the consumption has been greater. That is the simple explanation of the scarcity and of the consequently high prices.

He gives a general survey of the different coal producers, and points out that the United States and the United Kingdom alone among the thirty odd coal-producing countries were able to increase their exports to any material extent. He thinks that—the American supply seems destined to control the future situation in the Atlantic region, as the China supply is, in the writer's opinion, destined to control the ultimate situation in the Pacific region.

A TREMENDOUS ADVANCE.

A comparison of the output of the States with that of the United Kingdom will, as he says, probably be a revelation to the complacent Briton.

In 1899 the total output of coal in Great Britain was 220,085,303 tons. For the same year that of the United States was 230,838,973, an increase over their output during the previous year of 54,500,000 tons!

REQUIRED ANOTHER COMMISSION.

The last British Royal Commission was in 1871, and its report is sufficient evidence that another is needed. Mr. Taylor says:—

The reasons why another inquiry is deemed desirable—though the government has declined to nominate another Commission—may be briefly stated. In 1871 the Royal Commission estimated that the population of the United Kingdom in 1901 would be 35,000,000; the census returns will probably show 41,000,000. They estimated that in 1901 the consumption and exports of British coal would require an output of 174,400,000 tons; the output in 1899 was 220,000,000 tons. They assumed that the exports would not exceed 12,000,000 tons; the sales last year to foreigners exceeded 43,000,000 tons. It is probable that the output in 1901 may be 225,000,000 tons, or over 50,000,000 tons more than the estimate of the Royal Commission.

THE DURATION OF THE COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. Taylor does not view with much alarm the predictions concerning the exhaustion of the coal supply. He says:—

It seems to the present writer, however, that sufficient account is not taken of the probable development of mining dexterity. The term "cheaply-worked," applied to coal, is only a relative one, and future generations will be able to unearth the deepest seams at a cost which to as is impossible. This should be kept in view as a qualification of the alarmist calculations of the president of the London (1899) Conference of Mining Engineers, who advanced reasons for thinking that all the best seams of coal in the United Kingdom will be exhausted within the next fifty years

A BLESSING IN DISGUISE.

The price of gas is directly dependent upon that of coal, and therefore—

The dearer gas becomes through dear coal, the greater must be the impetus given to electric lighting. Great Britain has been behind other countries in adopting the electric light, mainly because she has had cheaper coal, and, therefore, cheaper gas, than any other country in the world. The more general adoption of the electric light in Great Britain will tend to a reduced consumption of coal. And there is room for tremendous extension, as there are now only about 7,000,000 incandescent lamps in London and the provinces, and only about 150 towns which have a public supply of electricity. Dear coal affords a splendid chance for the electrician, and the more extensive use of electricity for illuminating purposes will be one of the things to help make coal cheaper again.

LIQUID FUEL.

The rise in the price of coal offers a better field for liquid fuel. Quoting Sir Marcus Samuel, Mr. Taylor writes:—

A notable feature of liquid fuel is that it occupies much less space and does double the work of coal. There are German boats using liquid fuel on the Yangtse River, in China. There is also the fact that the Hamburg-American Line are actually adopting it, that the Rotterdam Lloyd Line have decided to adopt it, and that the P. and O. Company are considering it. . . . He much regretted the attitude of the engineers of the Royal Navy in regard to the question. . . The German Government are adopting it for their navy; Emperor William has adopted it for the Hohensollern; and it is extremely unsatisfactory to find that our own naval experts are unable to deal with the question, which is very simple, but of overwhelming importance The complete combustion of liquid fuel is far more smokeless than that of any coal even of the very best kind. . . . On a small torpedo-boat even a shovelful of coal put on means a difference in the speed, and it stands to reason that a system under which one can burn unlimited quantities of fuel automatically and irrespective of the heat in the stoke-hole (where no stoker need be) is preferable.

Mr. Taylor writes strongly against the restriction of the export of coal. He says :-

The stoppage of the export of coal would mean the ruin of the industries and commerce of the British Isles. There is no other heavy cargo to give the vessels which steam outwards to all parts of the earth in search of cheap food-stuffs for the hungry people and of material for their insatiable mills and factories.

Relief must be found in the use of liquid fuel, and prevention of waste which is extremely large at present. Millions of tons of coal per annum could be saved by the effective use of water power now running to waste. On the whole the article is cheerfully optimistic.

The Character Sketch of Malcolm McHardy, M.D.

In the character sketch of Dr. McHardy, which appeared in our August number, we printed at the request of our contributor a photograph by Mr. W. E. Gray of the bust of the Professor, which was exhibited in the Royal Academy this year. Our contributor omitted, however, to mention that this bust was the work of Miss Kathleen Shaw. Needless to say, the omission of the sculptor's name was not intentional, and our attention having been called to the matter we gladly correct the omission.

terpillar, Liberal.

of their oularising

anagers,

so vital, asonable break-up l to our in clear between ad those have any to say, hrough rightest ! For er who, ninterircle of enjoys tlemen er has w their their ejudice en and ned to dence fe-long twelve halfst-bag ps are or the luctor, ipt of all leep "

The

render ng his ounder anised lowly Hence elling uring vs, its ıg.

ppear

HYMN TUNES WITH A HISTORY.

"HELMSLEY" AND "YORK."

MR. J. CUTHBERT HADDEN has an interesting contribution on the subject of "Hymn Tunes" in the October number of the Quiver.

Beginning with the old tune to the Easter Hymn "Jesus Christ is Risen To-day," Mr. Hadden notes that the well-known tune has been ascribed to Henry Carey and Dr. Worgan, whereas the tune appeared sixteen years before Worgan was born.

Another tune, "Helmsley," associated with "Lo! He Comes, with Clouds Descending," has had a confused history. Of this Mr. Hadden writes :-

Musicians rightly point to the somewhat boisterous style of this tune as a reason for supplanting it, but "Helmsley" keeps its place notwithstanding. It is certainly melodious, and it represents a part of the historical life of the Church, which must be allowed to count for something. And, after all, its vulgarity is, perhaps, to some extent imaginary; for the popular misconception of the tune's having been derived from a hornpipe melody leads the popular mind to see what it expects to see. At melody leads the popular mind to see what it expects to see. At any rate, the notion is exceedingly unfair to the tune; for instead of "Helmsley" having been adapted from the hornpipe, the hornpipe was very likely adapted from "Helmsley"!

The statement usually made is this: that "Helmsley" traces its origin to a hornpipe danced by Miss Catley in "The Golden Pippin," produced at Covent Garden in 1773. Now this is very easily disposed of, because "Helmsley" was published by John Wesley in 1765, under the name of "Olivers," thus preceding "The Golden Pippin" by eight vears. The tune, according to a tradition among musical years. The tune, according to a tradition among musical Wesleyans, was the composition of Thomas Olivers, one of John Wesley's travelling preachers, and as it bears his name in a collection issued by Wesley himself while Olivers was alive, there is no reason to doubt the tradition.

The tune, it may just be added, was first called "Helmsley" in the Lock Hospital collection of 1769, published by Madan, the chaplain of that institution, who was a cousin of William Cowper. As usually harmonised it is somewhat weak, but under the clever hands of the late Henry Smart it is transformed in a stirring and dignified melody. There is another fine in o a stirring and dignified melody. There is another fine arrangement in Hugo Pierson's little-known oratorio, "Jerusalem."

The tunes "Wareham" and "Bedford," are named after the places of residence of the composers—William Knapp of Wareham and William Weale of Bedford.

Another popular tune is "York":-

Sir John Hawkins, writing in 1776, said of it: "Within memory half the nurses of England were used to sing it by way of lullaby, and the chimes of many country churches have way of Iuliaby, and the chimes of many country churches have played it six or eight times in four-and-twenty hours from time immemorial." The tune appears first in the Scottish Psalter of 1615, where it bears the curious name of "The Stilt." When Ravenscroft printed it in his "Whole Booke of Psalmes," 1621, he expressed an opinion that it was "a northern tune," yet it was he who called it "York." There is a general belief that the tune was the composition of John Milton, the father of the poet: but all that Milton did was to "connecs it into four poet; but all that Milton did was to "compose it into four parts"—that is, harmonise it—for Ravenscroft. The tune "York" is, however, presumably of Scottish origin, since it appeared for the first time in an Edinburgh psalter.

In the Temple Bar for October B. Solomon draws attention to a little-known aspect of Alexander Pope. How few readers of the "Essay on Man" have any idea that its author was a painter? The writer describes certain of his paintings, and concludes that "Pope's work is in no way distinguished by any great originality or talent; and we have no reason to regret that a weakness of the eyes compelled him to abandon painting for poetry."

THE MUSIC OF FINLAND.

In the October number of the Leisure Hour Mr. A. E. Keeton has a short but very interesting article on "The Music of Finland." He writes:—

At Helsingfors literature and art are ardently cultivated, not as foreign offshoots grafted on, but as native entities. A University flourishes, and much attention is paid to the education of women. Music is especially dear to the Finnish nature; there exists at present a brilliant little coterie of Finnish musicians, both composers and performers, whose aim it is to create a native school redolent of native inspiration and colour.

The Finnish Folk-songs are of a simple, melancholy, soft character; as a rule, they are moodier than those of Sweden, smoother and more final in their cadences than the questioning note which comes to us from Norway, but far less passionate and rhythmic in their colour and intensity than the songs of the Slavs. The instrument with which the peasant folk accompany

The "Kalevala" is full of legends and sagas, which nineteenth-century composers are constantly setting to music. Philip Schanz is one who has used it most effectively in a fine overture

"Kullerwó." He is also widely known in Finland for his stirring national chorus, "Wi are andens fria folk" ("We are a free-born people"). Still more original is the work of Jean Sibelius, whose symphonic poems are all built upon episodes from the "Kalevala," or upon legends from a rich mythology. His music to Adolf Paul's tragedy, "Christian II.," has been given repeatedly in Finland, Sweden, and Denmark, and will probably be produced shortly in Paris.

A Finnish opera composer of promise is Oscar Merikanto, who likewise has had recourse to the "Kalevala" for his subjects. Four more composers of merit are Karl Collan. Gabriel Ingelius, Konrad Greve, and August Ehrström, all true Finns by birth and inspiration. The man whose encouragement called these musicians into activity was Frederik Pacius, a German violinist, born at Hamburg in 1809, and a distinguished pupil of Spohr. He early settled at Helsingfors, where he died in 1891. The Finns regard him with gratitude as the founder of their modern musical culture. He remained until his death teacher and music director at the Helsingfors University. Besides several operas written for the Finnish stage, Pacius was the composer of the Finnish national anthem, "Vårt land! Vårt land!" ("Our land!") set to the noble words of Runeberg, and first sung outside Helsingfors on May 13th, 1848, when its ringing strains were taken up by thousands of Experiments in Wheat-breeding.

In the September Harmsworth Mr. W. S. Harwood has a most interesting paper on "Experiments with Wheat," which may indeed lead to "Doubling the World's Harvest." We need not yet fear that there will be more people in the world than it can feed. Just as animals are selected and crossed to produce new and finer stock, so American growers have selected different kinds of wheat, and crossed them to produce in suitable regions not two, but five, bushels per acre. This is how the crossing is done :-

With the utmost care and delicacy the dissecting-room scissors find their way into the head of growing wheat just before it flowers. One by one the lesser embryo kernels are The remaining florets are robbed of their anthers. No trace of pollen may remain in the floral envelope, or Nature, true to her laws, will go on and complete the fertilisation herself-for the wheat plant is one of those which is selffertilising. Deft fingers then draw a hood of tissue paper over the head of wheat, so that no meddlesome insect may approach with the yellow pollen of some foreign plant aglow on wing

The new wheats are constantly tested to find their value as food; and their pedigrees are as carefully kept as those of stud horses.

N of t the an i Per T chu viol Aft me mis of ' sec ren Ny rela of t visi arc reli of exp wa me Th sm Ch sec tov life his orig

cel it i sh th me in ob

M CO th

M un he of m da ne b

of

A RUSSIAN AMONG CHINESE SECTARIES.

M. DELINES contributes to the first September number of the Nouvelle Revue an interesting article describing the experiences of a Russian engineer, M. Lobza, among an important Chinese sect called "The Protectors of the Persecuted."

The headquarters of the sect was at a town in Manchuria called Nyn-Guta, and there M. Lobza made violent efforts to discover the points of difference which separated the sect from the official religion of Buddha. After being most politely put off by one of the principal men of the sect, M. Lobza turned his attention to a miserable temple on the outskirts of the town, the priest of which he knew to be connected with the heads of the sect. The task which the Russian had set himself was rendered unusually difficult because the Governor of Nyn-Guta had ordered all his officials to enter into no relations with Russians, and never to reveal to them any of the private life of the Chinese people. M. Lobza visited the temple, and he told the priest of it that the architecture of the temples of Nyn-Guta had made profound impression on him owing to their ginality, that he took a great interest in the originality, that he took a great interest in the religion of the Chinese, and, above all, in the beliefs of this particular sect, which he would be glad to have explained to him. The priest explained that the temple was dedicated to Poussa, the only divinity of the sect, members of which did not attend other places of worship. The sect were distinguished by their sobriety; they smoked neither opium nor tobacco, did not drink any Chinese brandy, and called one another brothers. The sect is spreading very widely through China; in each town the members elect a chief, who holds his office for life, and whose business it is to supervise the morality of his co-religionists. Membership of the sect is only obtained with the consent of all the members of the particular town, and the admission of a new adherent is celebrated with great pomp. In the prayers which the priest addresses to Poussa on behalf of each new member it is remarkable that there is no petition that the convert should become a great trader, and this is held to prove that the sect despises riches. On admission the new member changes his name by putting the syllable "lai" in the middle, a practice which enables members to recognise one another easily wherever they may be. Members of the sect are very benevolent, and assist one another in old age and trouble.

So much M. Lobza learnt from the priest. He also consulted an official of his acquaintance who belonged to the third, or blue ribbon class. This gentleman received M. Lobza with great ceremony, and at first was extremely unwilling to speak about the sect; but when he found that M. Lobza already knew a good deal on the subject he spoke more freely. He declared himself an opponent of the sect, the members of which he described as weak men, dissimulating their vices and their crimes under the mask of lofty doctrines. The society, he declared, was dangerous in the extreme, and he explained that when a neophyte entered the sect he was obliged to take an oath never to divulge its mysteries under pain of being killed by his comrades. This appears to have proved to the Chinese official that the sect was altogether bad; he added that the Chinese authorities greatly disapproved of it, and forbad any one to belong to it. Ten years ago, he went on, the sect had instigated a revolt in Peking, and had attempted the life of the Emperor.

Naturally, the Russian was much puzzled by these two completely different stories. But one circumstance made him suspect the account given by the mandarin-namely, that he blamed the sect for their love of equality. "This wretched people," he said, "consider the old man and the youth, the mandarin and the peasant, the rich man and the mendicant, as being equal, and having a right to the same honour." M. Delines, however, does not entirely solve the question whether the priest or the mandarin is to be believed, though it is evident that he is, on the whole, inclined to accept the account given by the priest.

RANDOM SHOTS BY "THE YOUNG IDEA."

A MOST entertaining "study in school jokes" is supplied by Miss E. M. Griffiths to the readers of Longman's. The man is to be pitied who does not laugh out loud as he comes on these choice selections of unconscious humour.

AMUSING BLUNDERS IN SPELLING.

The writer is careful to classify. There are five orders of school jokes. First, she presents several mistakes in spelling made by juvenile examinees, of which the following may be cited here :-

The blood in the body is taken by means of tubs to the heart and there detained.

His brain was teething with grand ideas in all directions. Stored in the trouser-house of mighty kings.

The lungs are organs of execration.

Cæsar's famous epigram appears in this novel form: "I came sore and conquered."

GUESSES AND GLOSSES.

Guesses form the second class. Here are two of the many culled by the writer :-

A watershed is a shed for keeping water in.

The three highest mountains in Great Britain are Ben Nevis, Ben Lomond and Ben Jonson.

Anachronisms come next. The writer truly observes :-It comes upon one with a slight shock to read that "the priest of Midian reproved his daughters for not inviting Moses to come in to tea," that "David boarded with the witch of Endor," and that, "when Moses' mother laid him in the ark among the bulrushes, she did not forget to give the baby its bottle."

A new "fact" in the history of journalism is offered by one sharp little student: "The earliest newspaper of those times was the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle."

"FLASHES STRUCK FROM MIDNIGHT."

Gropings after the only partly realised furnish a host of odd remarks. The quality of the rest may be imagined from this one :-

A diplomat is some one who puts true things in a better (!) light, which changes them and alters their sense.

Of sheer imagination in its inventive freedom many samples are given. We shall content ourselves here with America is oblong in shape; it has a long coast-line. In it there is the United States of Canada and the Sahara Desert. A lake is a piece of water that the earth has grown round.

The child may have been thinking of the Atoll, in which case the above definition is not incorrect. What follows may be interpreted as a picturesque rendering of electors' perquisites during a general election :-

Roman citizenship was a ship on which the Romans went out fishing free of charge.

"Fishing free of charge" is a great many people's notion of citizenship.

Miss Griffiths concludes with this exquisite mot from a Birmingham scholar :-

Parliament is a place where they go up to London to talk about Birmingham.

Ir. A. E. n "The rated, not Univeracation of re; there nusicians, create a oly, soft Sweden, estioning nate and s of the company ch nine-Philip overture for his '("We work of lt upon n a rich an II.." enmark. rikanto.

for his Collan, all true gement cius, a guished he died nder of death Besides vas the ! Vårt ords of 13th, nds of rwood g the e will ust as v and ferent itable

s how -room t just els are thers. or tilisas selfover roach wing their kept

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

"MORE Humours of Irish Life" brighten the pages of the October Cornhill. Here is an Irishman's gibe at his climate:—

At a large exhibition of pictures an Irishman was standing, catalogue in hand, before a vivid representation of the Deluge, when an old lady, seeing he had a catalogue, asked him to tell her the subject of the painting. "A summer's day in the west of Ireland, madam," replied the Irishman promptly.

The Irish press supplies two oddities :-

"Michael Ryan begs to inform the public that he has a large stock of cars, waggonettes, brakes, hearses and other pleasure vehicles for sale or hire," runs an advertisement in a local paper, the same paper which, in a glowing description of a funeral, announced that ""Mrs. B. of G—sent a magnificent wreath of artificial flowers in the form of a cross."

A few sermonic "bulls" end with a somewhat hoary specimen, "the concluding words of a sermon on Grace— 'And, me brithren, if ye have in y'r hearts wan spark of heavenly grace, wather it, wather it continually."

AN INTERRUPTED PICNIC.

To be up a tree does not always mean to be at a grave disadvantage. It meant quite the contrary to a gaolbird mentioned by Major Arthur Griffiths, who describes a day at Dartmoor in the Pall Mall Magazine:—

Among Dartmoor traditions are some strange, even comical, episodes, such as that of the fugitive who took refuge in the upper branches of a tree, went to sleep there, and found, when he woke, a picnic party at lunch underneath him. The story goes on that he dropped upon the table-cloth, put every one to flight, finished the lunch, and then made good his own escape. Another remarkable venture was that of the convict who broke out of prison, and then broke into the surgeon's house, stole a full suit of clothes, and thus effectively disguised got clear away. There are others more sensational in the earlier records, when Dartmoor was a war prison: one that runs on similar lines as that last told. The surgeon at that time was in the Royal Navy, and his uniform proved an excellent passport to Plymouth, where the fugitive found friends, and sent back the clothes with thanks, saying they fitted extremely well. The cleverest escape, perhaps, was that of the French officer, who was employed with others in building a new chimney in the chaplain's quarters, and who suffered himself to be built up inside the flue. At night, by a great effort, he threw down the green masonry, released himself, and was never recaptured.

A "FOWL IN THE POT."

"Dogs that Earn their Living" furnish Mr. C. J. Cornish in Cornhill with much interesting matter. Here is one of his stories:—

Recently a retriever was sent after a winged partridge, which had run into a ditch. The dog followed it some way down the ditch, and presently came out with an old rusty tea-kettle held in its mouth by the handle. The kettle was taken from the dog amid much laughter. Then it was found that inside the kettle was the partridge! The explanation was that the bird, when wounded, ran into the ditch, which was narrow. In the ditch was the old kettle with no lid on. Into this the bird crept; and, as the dog could not get the bird out, it very properly brought out the kettle with the bird in it.

THE DOG AS PRINTER.

That the Press is going to the dogs is the frequent complaint of austere moralists, in face of a Yellow Peril much nearer than Pekin. But it is, according to Mr. Cornish, literally true that the press is in one case worked by a dog. He says:—

It is interesting to know that there is one dog who makes his living by driving a printing press. It is only a development of the old turnspit business, but the dog prints a whole edition of 1,000 papers in one hour. The dog is named Gypsy, and is the property of Messrs. Carroll and Bowen, proprietors of the Plymouth (Wisconsin) Review. He is a two-year-old English mastiff, weighs 100 lbs., and does his work by running round in a wooden wheel eight feet in diameter. To the wheel is attached a belt connecting with the presses in the next room, and when the dog has worked off his copy with one press he sets to work on another.

THE POPE'S SNUB TO A RAKE.

TI

be e

the o dent

copi

with

Vice

Uni

the fess

if h

Lau

Rac

Mr.

Tru

Pro

" A

whi

Spa

par

the

wh

Co

sec

ho Or

wh

Le

wh

F

MEE m

d lo

It is a pleasant sign of growing comity among Christians when Good Words publishes, as it does this month, a thoroughly sympathetic sketch of Leo XIII. The writer, Signor G. D. Vecchia, bears witness to the way in which the present Pope "has succeeded in raising the moral tone of the internal life of the Vatican." He illustrates the change by the following story:—

When Leo was at Brussels as Nuncio, a baron, the ambassador of one of the great Powers, showed the Nuncio a not very decent picture of a woman enamelled on his snuff-box. The Nuncio looked at it, and returning it to its owner, he said, "It is Madame la Baroness, I suppose." The baron made haste to pocket it, and went elsewhere for consolation. The action of the baron indicates the moral standard Leo found; Pecci's answer indicates the moral standard he adopted.

WHY "GOD MADE FOOLS"-

The Monthly Review in its first number contains an appreciation by Mr. Quiller-Couch of the late T. E. Brown, of Clifton School. In the realm of humour the writer declares "T. E. B.'s" judgment to be infallible. He goes on:—

All honest laughter he welcomed as a Godlike function.

God sits upon His hill, And sees the shadows fly; And if He laughs at fools, why should He not?

And for that matter, why should not we? Though at this point his fine manners intervened, correcting, counselling moderation. "I am certain God made fools for us to enjoy, but there must be an economy of joy in the presence of a fool; you must not betray your enjoyment."

-AND CHURCHES!

There is quoted also a spurt of fun which will appeal to the non-church-goer as having in it at least a splash of truth

This silence and solitude are to me absolute food [he writes from the Clifton College Library on the morning of Christmas Day, 1875], especially after all the row and worry at the end of Term. . . . Where are the men and women? Well, now look here, you'll not mention it again. They're all in church. See how good God is! See how He has placed these leitourgic traps in which people, especially disagreeable people, get caught—and lo! the universe for me!!! me—me. . . .

"Leitourgic traps" is a phrase which might stick.

THE CHINAMAN AND THE CHICKEN.

Mr. Thorold Dickson in Macmillan considers certain aspects of the Chinaman. He mentions one feature in the complex character:—

A common crime among the Chinese, as among Orientals generally, is petty theft. Except in cases of habitual thieving, it is not treated very seriously, and it occasionally gives rise to an amusing defence, as when a Chinaman, charged with stealing a chicken, gravely informed me that he had taken it up because he saw it had its feet in a puddle and he felt very sorry for the poor little chicken.

Scribner for October is an interesting number. Three articles give it distinction—Mr. Henry Norman's on "Russia," Mr. Harding Davis's on the "Last Days of Pretoria," and Mr. Walter Wyckoff's on the "Arctic Highlanders," all of which claim to be dealt with separately.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE American Review of Reviews for October, as might be expected, devotes a very large measure of its space to the discussion of the question of the impending Presidential election. The collection of caricatures is very copious and most interesting. The character sketch deals with Mr. Stevenson, the Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency. It is written by Mr. J. H. Ewing, formerly United States Minister in Belgium. There are two articles on Trusts-one by Mr. Monnett, on Mr. Bryan and the Trusts, taking an anti-trust view; the other by Professor Laughlin, who discusses what Mr. Bryan could do, if he were elected, in relation to trusts. Professor Laughlin says that depends entirely upon the growth of Radicalism in America, because until Radicalism influences the Senate, Mr. Bryan could do very little. Mr. Charles R. Flint reviews Dr. Jenks' book on the Trust Problem in an article entitled "New Light on the Problem of Trusts." The Director of the Mint gives "A Republican View of Mr. Bryan's Financial Policy, which is bracketed with a paper by Mr. Charles B. Spahr, who gives the Democratic point of view.

Apart from the Presidential issues there are three papers, two of them of considerable political importance, the other dealing with Jamaica and the Philippines, which I notice elsewhere. One is a fully illustrated paper on the growth of golf in America, by Mr. Price of the English und in tached when work

Collier.

is the

nong

this

III.

ising

He

sador

very

The

" It

te to

on of ecci's

an wn,

iter

He

this

ing

ol;

las sh

Pe

as

h.

ic

ht

n

it

n

THE AUSTRALIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE Australian Review of Reviews for September is a second Chinese number, and is devoted to the revolt of the Yellow man. Besides the articles on this subject, however, there are several others of general interest. One of the distinctively Australian features is that in which Mr. Irwin Blake, of the West Australian Federal League, describes how the battle of Federation was won in Western Australia. On July 31st the vote was taken, which resulted in an altogether unexpected majority for Federation, the figures being-

For Federation 45,718 Against 19,768

Even if the votes in the mining districts were eliminated, there would still be a majority in favour of Federation.

The other articles of interest are the sixth chapter of Mr. Fitchett's papers on "What an Australian sees in England," which is devoted to a discussion on why the Englishman succeeds. Mr. Fitchett is somewhat optimistic in his estimate of English success. He says:—
"By some unanalysed magic the Englishman wins in a degree, unrivalled by the men of any other race, the loyalty of his many-tinted and myriad-tongued subjects." Some day Mr. Fitchett will go to India and Turkestan, when he will probably discover that there is another race besides the English which has even in a greater degree than the English the art of winning the affection of its Asiatic subjects.

Mr. Fitchett also contributes another instalment of his episodes in British history, which describes the final dispersal of the French fleet.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE Contemporary Review for October contains twelve articles, of which five call for special notice.

RUSSIAN POLICY.

"A Russian Publicist" contributes a short and not very enlightening article on "The Secret Springs of Russian Policy." The article is really an attack on Russian policy rather than an explanation of it. The author declares that Russia is not herself in a fit condition to take the part of civilising the Orient, and that she ought rather to devote herself to internal reforms.

THE PREVENTION OF DISEASE.

Mr. Arthur Shadwell writes on "The True Aim of Preventive Medicine," the object of his article being to advocate the cultivation of natural immunity or resistance to disease. As the restoration of the tissues to health is the best way to counteract disease, so keeping them in a healthy condition enables men to resist infection. Mr. Shadwell's theory is that in time of epidemics those people who suffer from minor illnesses which are not classed as actual cases have in reality been attacked by the same deadly disease as the admitted victims of the epidemic, but have been enabled to resist its development owing to their having more healthy organisms. recommends that bacteriologists should turn from their present methods of research to the study of this question of natural resistance.

COUNT WALDERSEE IN 1870.

Colonel Lonsdale Hale describes the part taken by Count Von Waldersee in 1870. It was the Count's success in that year which gained him the position of Chief of the Staff in the German Army. Waldersee's duty in 1870 was to report to the King of Prussia, as supreme head of the army, the course and progress of the campaign in one of the theatres of the war. After the battle of Sedan the general opinion among the Germans was that the war was over, but the King knew better, and sent the Count to the Army of the Loire to warn Prince Frederick Charles, and report to him daily until recalled. Waldersee acquitted himself with success, and gained the approval both of the King and of Von Moltke, while at the same time keeping on good terms with the Crown Prince.

THE GOSPEL OF SUFFERING.

The Rev. W. W. Peyton, in his article on "The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation," writes thus on the educational value of suffering :-

We are qualified for service by suffering. The man who carries the rankling memory of a great sickness, who has stood on the edge of the mire in which so many have sunk, on whom has fallen the shadow of the grave, in whose years a tragedy is set which he wished had not been, who has struggled against denial and hindrance, whose theology has been human with heresy-he is the man whose voice has the notes which touch the troubled and shaded soul. The clergyman who goes into cottage and villa with healing words and a sunny face carries a wounded heart; the physician whose prescription has a virtue goes into the sick room carrying our sicknesses; he who can be trusted in need has known misery.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. R. Warwick Bond writes on "Ruskin, the Servant of Art." Professor Marcus Hartog, in an article entitled "The Interpolation of Memory," describes an experiment in the education of children.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly Review for October is a good number. I have noticed elsewhere Mr. W. S. Lilly's article on "The Burden of Empire," Captain Gambier's on "Our Military Prestige Abroad," Mr. Edward Dicey's character sketch of Lord Russell of Killowen, Major Arthur Griffiths' paper on "Heroes of the War," Mr. Demetrius Boulger's "Is Russia to Preponderate in China?" Diplomaticus's on "Count Lamsdorff's First Failure," and the excellent anonymous article "Why Not a Treaty with Russia?" There will also be found among the Leading Articles short notices of the second part of Gordon's account of his campaign in China, and Mr. J. C. Tarver's paper on "The Public Schools and the Public Services."

THE CHAPERON VANISHED.

Lady Jeune contributes an amusing paper on "The Decay of the Chaperon." The emancipation of girls has resulted in the relegation of the chaperon to the things of the past. But not for ever, Lady Jeune thinks, and after all who could be a better judge ?-

Let us cherish our belief, however, that the dethronement of the chaperon is only temporary, and not a visible and outward sign of her decay. We may be wrong, and possibly future generations will take their children to the British Museum to pay her effigy a visit, pointing her out as, at one time, an important character in English social life. But, on the other hand, it may be that this age of freedom is on the verge of a reaction, which will restore her to her pristine glory, with fuller powers, just as the fashions of past years return, and assert themselves with renewed rigour and tyranny.

SATURNALIA AND CARNIVAL.

An extremely interesting article is that in which Mr. J. G. Frazer, writing under the title of "The Saturnalia and Kindred Festivals," traces the history of the Carnival to the Roman Saturnalia, and at the same time shows the affinity of both these festivals with the Greek Cronia, the Jewish Purim, and the Babylonian Sacea. The essential feature of all these festivals was the temporary overthrowal of all social relationships. The resemblance between the Saturnalia of ancient and the Carnival of modern Italy has often been remarked:—

But in the light of all the facts we may well ask whether the resemblance does not amount to identity. It is well known that in Italy, Spain, and France, that is, in the countries where the influence of Rome has been deepest and most lasting, a conspicuous feature of the Carnival is a burlesque figure personifying the festive season, which after a short career of glory and dissipation is publicly shot, burnt, or otherwise destroyed, to the feigned grief or genuine delight of the populace. If the view here suggested of the Carnival is correct, this grotesque personage is no other than a direct successor of the old King of the Saturnalia, the master of the revels, the real man who personated Saturn, and, when the revels were over, suffered a real death in his assumed character. The King of the Bean on Twelfth Night and the mediæval Bishop of Fools, Abbot of Unreason, or Lord of Misrule, are figures of the same sort, and may perhaps have had a similar origin.

THE BRITISH CONSUL AND TRADE.

Writing on the Struggle for Industrial Supremacy, Mr. Benjamin Taylor makes some severe strictures on the 4 Little Englander British Consul," who is for ever condemning his own countrymen for their lack of trading capacity. The Consul, he says, is himself not a competent person to judge of the matter. As for the British traders' complaint that the British Consul does not forward his interests, Mr. Taylor gives some very apposite quotations to show that the Germans make similar complaints against the inactivity of their consuls in comparison with those of England and America, while those of America do likewise in regard to theirs. Mr. Taylor agrees with Count Goluchowski that the industrial menace comes from America, not from Germany:—

A careful consideration of the commercial and financial position of Germany leads to this conclusion, that whilst the economic development has been natural and inevitable, the industrial expansion has been too rapid. Like a youth growing too quickly, the country has overshot its strength. If the pace of development is not abated there will come soon a period of exhaustion and collapse. There will come also a rise in the level of wages and of the standard of living—both now lower than our own—not to be reached, probably, without some of the Sturm und Drang of industrial warfare through which Great Britain herself has passed. We are inclined to believe, therefore, that German competition with us in the world's markets has reached its high-water mark.

OUR MOST FORMIDABLE RIVAL.

On the other hand, the real strength of the industrial competition of America has yet to be felt. The measure designed to revive the American mercantile marine did not pass through last Congress, but some measure of the sort will certainly become law within the next four years if the Republicans are confirmed in power. Even now American manufacturers are sending shipbuilding material to this country, not at a sacrifice and merely to lighten their stocks, but at remunerative prices. America has obtained and will retain the lead as the greatest iron and steel producer in the world. And as such she is compelled both to increase her home market by shipbuilding and to obtain foreign markets. As for American coal, it has certainly come to stay in Europe, though it may cease to come to Great Britain when our own inflated industry is restored to a normal condition. It is not necessary, however, for American coal to come into our ports in order to make a serious inroad upon our foreign trade.

OTHER ARTICLES.

"The Kingdom of Matter" is the title of a very abstract article by Maeterlinck, which is translated by Mr. Alfred Sutro. Mr. George Gissing concludes his series of papers "By the Ionian Sea."

The Woman at Home.

THE most interesting article-to women at all eventsa symposium on the domestic servant difficulty, is noticed elsewhere. But there is also Mr. H. A. Vachell's illustrated paper on "The Women of the West"-of America that is-which claims attention. He divides Western women into two classes-leisured and non-leisured. The former "is a charming creature; clever, plastic, cheery and always womanly (the English girl who hunts, shoots, swears and gambles has no understudies on the Pacific Slope); but, be she maid, wife, or widow, she obeys no law save that of her own sweet will. The Western woman of leisure, in startling contrast to all other women, does what she likes rather than what she ought." Their independent careers, Mr. Vachell considers, have undeniably caused the non-leisured Western women to lose womanliness; but his slightly retrograde ideas about women may be pardoned when one reads his deplorable but amusing experiences of the new woman of the very newest pattern. On the whole, it is a pleasing picture that he gives. The worst fault he has to find is that there is in the West a "gradual backsliding of maternal love and tenderness as the child grows older."

"An Officer" sketches the early career of Lord Roberts, an Anglo-Irishman and a soldier not only by profession, but also by heredity.

O Octo The one, trea artic refo Mas sion on Mr.

he fa a state and has thou gro

han

rep

who insi year

Fre

aga the eco eco dov affe its yea was his me kill bat wh eve reg Du dis

hin

attr

noi sev Mr Na

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

ake

suls

hile

Mr.

rial

cial

the

the

ing

ace

of

the

the eat

ore,

has

m-ned igh

nly

are

are ice es.

est

is ng

ias

me

) a

an ad

iis

d

sa

n ie

y ic

0 n

r

11

d

OUT of fourteen articles in the Nineteenth Century for October I have noticed ten among the Leading Articles. The number, however, is not by any means an enlivening one, and it is the subjects of the articles rather than the treatment which call for so many separate notices. Three articles deal with various departments of national reform. Other articles claiming notice are Professor Max Müller's on "Taoism," Sir Henry Blake's "Impressions of a Tour in China," Mr. Frederick Greenwood's on "The Working Man and the War Charges," and Mr. James Boyle's on "An American Presidential Campaign,"

NIETZSCHE.

Mr. Oswald Crawfurd contributes an appreciation of Frederick Nietzsche, the key to much of whose writings he finds in the fact that Nietzsche was not a German but a Slav. Much of Nietzsche's influence was due to the fact that he possessed a style and a clarity rare among German philosophers:—

Like Schopenhauer, Nietzsche arrived at his mastery in the art of expression by refusing to consider language as a mere scientific exponent of thought, but rather as an artistic instrument through which, as through a violin or an organ, the hearts as well as the understandings of others could be reached. This is not always the Teutonic method of writing, it is not always the English method, but of course it is the best and the highest method. Such a style Nietzsche seems to have possessed, and this style, together with his strange magnetic personality, has helped to spread his views and tenets in the world of thoughtful men. Whether as a seer his work will live on and grow and develop as a true seer's work deserves to do by the handling of adequate disciples is doubtful, for unfortunately his reputation is for the moment in the mouths mainly of fanatics who confound his later visions and obscurities with the keen insight, the wide outlook, the large, clear utterance of his early years.

ECONOMY AND THE SCHOOL BOARD.

Sir Charles Elliott defends the London School Board against the accusation of extravagance. He sums up the case for the Board as follows:—

Grant that there are some things which a strict educational economist might object to, and that there is a want of the economical atmosphere in little things which is needed to keep down expenditure. But how small a part of the total outlay is affected by this admission! The outgoing Board has spent in its last year £430,000 more than its precedessor spent in its last year. Of this about £300,000 was inevitable, about £100,000 was optional, but incurred to obtain reforms and expansions of the highest value, and possibly about £20,000 or £30,000 was attributable to a want of strict vigilance in little things.

THE DUTCH AT WATERLOO.

Mr. C. Oman takes Sir Herbert Maxwell to task for his defence of the part played by the Netherlands regiments at Waterloo. He maintains that the statistics of killed among the Dutch and Belgian soldiers in that battle were really made up by the addition of the runaways, who formed the greater part. Mr. Oman does not, however, make any reflection on the courage of the defaulting regiments. The real cause of the misbehaviour of the Dutch and Belgians was that the rank and file were disaffected, most of them having served under Napoleon himself, and being favourable to his cause.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The only other articles are that of Mrs. Henry Birchenough, "Wanted, a New War Poet," in which she is very severe on Mr. Kipling's latest indiscretions, and that of Mr. W. H. Witt describing "Five New Pictures in the National Gallery."

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE National Review for October does not contain any article of exceptional interest. Separate notice is needed for the anonymous article on "The German Danger in the Far East," Captain Younghusband's "Plea for the Control of China," Mr. H. Brodrick's paper on "The Oxford Undergraduate," Mr. McHardy's on the state of the Navy, and Mr. A. M. Low's on the struggle for the Presidency. There are five other articles.

CATHOLICISM IN AUSTRALIA.

A writer who signs himself "An English Catholic," takes on himself the task of warning the British public against the intrigues of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in Australia, their object being, he declares, to found an independent Irish Australian State. One of their chief weapons, he says, is the effort to form a distinct caste of Irish Australians. According to the writer these Irish-Australian intriguers make use of the Press much in the same way as the Rhodesians use the Press of South Africa.

VATICAN AND QUIRINAL.

"Vatican and Quirinal" is the title of an article in which Mr. Richard Bagot draws a distinction between the policy of the Vatican and the upper clergy of Italy, and that of the rest of the Church. Mr. Bagot holds that the real responsibility for the quarrel between Church and State in Italy is restricted to the Curia, the great mass of the clergy holding by no means inimical sentiments to the cause of the State:—

There is one thing, and one thing only, which the Vatican dreads, and that is, a reconciliation between Church and State in Italy. Events of very recent occurrence have demonstrated this. The momentary rapprochement of the Quirinal and the Church over the dead body of the late King was sufficient to arouse the fears of the Ultramontane Party that a passing impulse of humanity might be taken to signify that the Italian clergy were patriotic Italians as well as priests of the Church of Rome, and that the Vatican approved of their being Those fears must indeed have been great to necessitate so savage a method of proving to the world that the Pope was still the bitter enemy of the Italian Monarchy and of the cause of law and order which that Monarchy represents. It may reasonably be suspected that the outrage upon humanity and good taste directed by Leo XIII. against the widowed Queen and the memory of a conscientious ruler was prompted by personal mortification and offended vanity, as well as by political and, indirectly, by pecuniary motives. The outburst of popular enthusiasm for the Constitution and the Monarchy which declared itself when the fatal news from Monza became known and realised in the country, was as unexpected as it was unwelcome to the Vatican. The impression created was the more disagreeable in that the sympathy displayed by the great mass of the clergy, both in the cities and in the provinces, revealed the fact that the latter was by no means so unfriendly to the Italian Constitution as the governing body of the Church had believed.

THE INVESTOR'S OPPORTUNITY.

In an article entitled "The Investor's Opportunity," Mr. W. R. Lawson deals with the decline in "gilt-edged" securities since 1896. Mr. Lawson takes British Consols and sixteen other chief securities, every one of which has fallen since 1896, the average drop being 14'1 per cent. Consols have fallen 15½ and India 3 per cents., 18½. The average depreciation has been 3½ per cent. per annum. Mr. Lawson holds that all these securities will soon be on the rise again, and that as a consequence the investor at present prices will realise a large profit.

THE MONTHLY REVIEW: No. 1.

A POSITIVE luxury to read—that will probably be the verdict of most readers of the new half-crown monthly published by John Murray and edited by Mr. Henry Newbolt. The eye, too often wearied by traversing acres of poor print, finds a genuine pleasure in following the wide-spaced lines and large, clear type of the new periodical. The mind is thus prepossessed in favour of the contents even before it has seriously reflected on them. The matter is intended to be varied enough. In the words of the prospectus—

Religion, ethics, literature, art, science, and history: international relations, colonies, empires, navies and armies: politics, social questions, hobbies, pastimes and amusements: all these the Monthly Review, like others, will survey, discuss and criticiae.

It will give prominence to unsigned editorial articles, which number in the first issue three as against eleven signed articles by non-editorial contributors. It disclaims the formulation of a party policy, but does not disguise a lively sympathy with the fortunes and principles of Liberalism.

THE TWO SORTS OF IMPERIALISM.

The first article is entitled "The Paradox of Imperialism." The editor is concerned about the anti-Imperialist attitude of many Liberals. Imperialism is taken by them to denote restriction of liberty, militarism, centralisation. These elements were certainly present in Imperial Rome. But there was present also "the thoroughly Roman idea of universal denationalisation," of freedom of intercourse, of the brotherhood of peoples. These he distinguishes as the "political" and the "organic" sides of Imperialism. Mediæval Germany developed the organic, France and Spain the political. In modern Russia "the political stream has submerged everything else." In the British Empire "the organic conception has taken as absolute possession." The editor finds the explanation of what he calls the paradoxical attitude of many Liberals in their confusion of the organic with the political evolution. In their hatred of the Roman, French, Spanish, Russian Imperialism which is essentially anti-Liberal, they denounce the Imperialism which is Roman, German, British and as essentially Liberal. "The duality of the idea which underlay the Roman Empire is the whole root of the matter." The immediate application of this analysis is that it was the Liberalism of our Colonies which made them eager to suppress " a nationality where liberty had grown corrupt." Liberals have only defended small nationalities that were Liberal. "Where true liberty and enlightenment have been with the aggressor, Liberalism has always been on the side of aggression." The editor concludes: "Liberalism has set its seal on the Empire, and the mark is indelible; it has established, and must uphold, a democratic autonomous commonwealth."

Having thus made clear his Imperial policy, the editor passes to foreign affairs and discusses the situation in the Far East "After Pekin." He then treats of the continuity of party principles in home affairs. Both these articles are quoted by us elsewhere, as also the Afghan Amir's "Details in my Daily Life."

WHAT A SURGEON SAW IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. G. A. Bowlby's "Surgical Experiences in South Africa" are full of interesting facts. He said that men wounded in victories were mostly keen to fight again, but men wounded in defeats were noticeably less keen. He pronounces the physique of the men as a whole very good, and ridicules the talk about "feeble, undersized lads who compose our army." He testifies to the fortitude and absence of grumbling which were displayed almost universally. He attributes the prevalence of enteric at Bloemfontein to the defective water-supply. He thinks it likely that the plague of flies which befel there conveyed the contagion, "for they were always thick on the lips and faces of the worst cases of typhoid." The orderlies, whom he praises very highly, "were all St. John's Ambulance men, and had had no previous experience of hospitals or sick people." He mentions some remarkable recoveries from wounds. "It is quite certain that some men did recover who were shot through the brain." He closes by remarking on the smallness of our Army Medical Corps—only 800 for the whole Empire outside of India, and 200 of these were wanting. The service is unpopular, he says, both pay and position not being high enough.

T

Sep

artic

Ste

H.

Can

P

amo

chie

I

livir reta sent epic

pres

cha wha

ind

If C

the

but as I

she

Fr

be

Pr

tril line

all nu

de

66

17

Of

37 va

Pa

of

W

re

ba

CC

se

PLEAS FOR REFORM OF OUR FIGHTING FORCES.

"Puzzles of the War" are solved by Mr. Spenser Wilkinson in no flattering manner. He concludes:—

The failures of the autumn of 1899 and some of the delays of 1900 are to be ascribed by no means exclusively to defective armaments and to imperfect organisation, but rather to the spiritual and intellectual weaknesses of representative men of the governing caste. Our statesmen are too indolent or too little in earnest to think out their problems to the end; our generals, the product of the War Office and Aldershot, are so slightly professional that their strategical principles are only skin deep; the army, broadly speaking, has not disciplined its intelligence by familiarity with the best thought that the world has produced on the subject of war.

He specially enforces the need of a knowledge of German among British officers. Lieut. Carlyon Bellairs pleads for less booklearning ashore and more practice afloat in the war-training of naval officers.

POETIC TRIBUTE TO GORDON.

The editor contributes "an ode" on "the Nile," for the Inauguration of the Gordon College at Khartoum. Of this characterisation of the hero these lines touch the core:—

For this man was not great

By gold or kingly state, Or the bright sword, or knowledge of earth's wonder;

But more than all his race He saw life face to face

And heard the still small voice above the thunder.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Art is represented in 26 pages by Mr. Roger E. Fry, on "Art before Giotto," illustrated by many fine pictures. Astronomy has its place in Prof. Turner's account of recent eclipses, and the light they have cast on the inner and outer Corona of the Sun. The Drama is not forgotten. Mrs. Hugh Bell urges that the influence of the stage ought to be morally upward, and expresses her detestation of "The Belle of New York," but laments what she considers the ill-advised and ill-informed censures of Mr. Samuel Smith in Parliament. Mr. Quiller Couch's review of T. E. Brown's "Letters" has been mentioned elsewhere.

The impression left by the new monthly compels a hearty welcome.

"JAPAN'S Attitude Toward China" is the title of an article by Mr. D. W. Stevens in the Forum for October. Mr. Stevens reviews Chino-Japanese relations since the war, and says that though there is a great deal of sympathy felt for China by the Japanese the idea of danger to European interests through the union of the two countries is absurd. The proper policy is for the Powers to work together.

THE FORUM.

o the

dis-

lence upply.

befel

lways noid."

e all vious

tions

quite ough

ss of npire

The

not nser

ys of ctive

the

f the le in

, the pro-

the by d on e of airs tice

the

his

r;

of er

r-

he

eat es

1's

ed a n

le

1-

er

0

THE Forum for October is a number of average interest. Separate notice is required for Mr. P. S. Reinsch's article on "China Against the World," with Mr. D. W. Stevens's on "Japan's Attitude Toward China," with Mr. H. L. West's comparison of the Republican and Democratic platforms, and with Mr. W. J. Stone's "Presidential Campaign from a Democratic Point of View."

GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

Professor Max Müller writes on "Anti-English Feeling among the Germans." He seems to think that it is chiefly the fault of the Germans:—

In England there is as yet no hatred of Germany; Germans living in England have never been insulted, except they provoke retaliation. It might be easy enough to cull some anti-German sentiment from the newspapers, but there never was such an epidemic of political madness in England as there is at the present moment in Germany. The German and English characters form complements of each other. Why not admire what is good in Germany and what is good in England? Why indulge in envy when each nation has so much to be proud of? If Germany, wherever she turns in her colonial expansion, finds the ground occupied by England, this is no doubt provoking, but it cannot be helped now. Property is property, and as little as England envies Germany her army should Germany boast that she will soon excel the navy of England.

LABOUR IN FRANCE.

Writing under the title of "Work and Wages in France," Mr. W. B. Scaife thus summarises what has been done towards the solution of the Old Age Pensions Since January 1st, 1895, the miners have by law been contributors to and recipients of an old-age pension. The trunk line railroads have their systems of pension, while the sailors and all permanent workers for the Government are also of the number who look forward to relief from toil and care in their declining years. An official investigation in 1896-97 counted 660,000 working people as insured for an old-age pension, or 17 per cent. of all those in the country designated as workers. Of this number, 461,000 were employed in private enterprises, 37,000 in industries under the Government, 42,000 were roadmenders, and 120,000 were sailors. The amount of the pensions varies from almost nothing up to 8,000 francs a year. In Parliament a bill is now pending for making general the system of old-age pensions to working men.

A NEW CEREAL.

Mr. E. L. Johnson contributes "A Plea for the New Cereal, the Cotton-Seed." As an article of utility cotton-seed only sprang into notice after the American Civil War. Cotton-seed was at one time thrown away as refuse, but it is now worth 20 dols. a ton even on the banks of the Mississippi. Mr. Johnson gives the following comparison of the relative values of wheat and cotton-seed in food components:—

WHEAT AND COTTON-SEED COMPARED.

Wheat	Protein.	Carbohydrates.	Fat.	Value.
1		73.69	5.09	$1,00
Cotton-seed.	17.57	10.83	20.10	1.39

Cotton-seed oil is used for making artificial butter, and its other products for fattening cattle in the South.

THE CRISIS IN AUSTRIA.

Mr. Maurice Baumfeld writes optimistically on the subject of Austria's internal condition. He says:—

While it is undeniable that the present constitutional crisis has shaken the internal organisation of the Empire, the sense of union existing among the various states is still too strong to admit of the wide dissemination of pangermanic or panslavistic ideas. Only recently the question of succession has again been clearly enunciated, while faithlessness to the dynasty is restricted to the small circles of a few provinces. Furthermore, the acquisition of these disaffected elements by a neighbouring state would be a questionable gain, inasmuch as the methods of disintegration now.employed in Austria would then be extended also to the other country.

A PAN-AMERICAN UNION.

Mr. W. W. Rockhill, describes the "Bureau of the American Republics," which is established at Washington, for the purpose of promoting closer union, and more general knowledge of the various portions of the Western Hemisphere. The Bureau publishes a monthly handbook of commercial and other intelligence in all the languages spoken in North and South America. The first International American Conference met at Washington in 1889-90, and the second meets next year in Mexico. The Bureau has a library of over 6,000 volumes, and receives the official newspapers of all the Republics, and most of their periodical publications, and its library is largely utilised by the general public for the purpose of obtaining information as to the states of the International Union.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Professor W. F. Willcox writes on "American Census Methods." Professor W. P. Trent writes very appreciatively of Mr. Frederick Harrison's "Essays," and Mr. A. H. Washburn contributes "A Plea for Consular Inspection."

Harper's.

THE principal article in the October number is Mr. Poultney Bigelow's description of Wei-Hai-Wei. Mr. Bigelow compares the government at this spot to that at Kiao-Chau, considerably to the detriment of the latter. Commenting on the justice meted out to the Chinese, he says:—

The facility with which the Chinaman commits suicide in order to annoy one who has offended him is at first embarrassing to an Anglo-Saxon judge. . . . Such questions as these would have given sleepless nights to the Governor of Kiao-Chau, but they evidently injured no one's digestion at Wei-Hai-Wei. . . . The crimes with which Captain Gaunt had to deal were mainly evasions of sanitary regulations, and were settled on the spot by placing the culprit at an obtuse angle with his face downwards over a nicely rounded stone in the courtyard and dismissing him with half a dozen strokes of a cane in the hands of a bluejacket. This saved expense, it wasted no time, and has given the Chinese an immense respect for humanity and justice.

The methods of Mortimer Menpes are described by Chalmers Roberts, the paper being illustrated with sketches by the artist. H. H. Lowry writes on "The Chinese Resentment," and waterways of America are described by A. Hume Ford.

The Strand Magazine.

BESIDES the symposium on "The Finest Building in the World," the October Strand contains an article by Lord Charles Beresford on "The Rank and File of the British Navy," much of which is in strange contrast to the recent revelations in the Morning Leader, which met with such vigorous confirmation and such feeble refutation. An amusing paper is that upon "An Extraordinary Swimming Race." Other articles are on "Artificial Rock Formation" and a "Tug-of-War on Horseback."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

THE North American Review for September is largely made up of Chinese articles. Special notice is claimed by Mr. Stephen Bonsal's paper, "What the Chinese think of us," Mr. John Foord's "Root of the Chinese Trouble," Mr. Alleyne Ireland's "Commercial Aspect of the Yellow Peril," the Rev. Dr. Clarke's "Empire of the Dead," Mr. H. A. Giles' "Confucianism in the Nineteenth Century," and Mr. M. Wilcox's "Vain Hope of the Filipinos."

IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

The Rev. Dr. Farrar, writing under this title, is at great pains to reconcile Christianity and war. He says:—

War in any just and holy cause is not only defensible, but is a positive duty. If all men were just, if all men loved each other, war would indeed be unnecessary, but as law courts and policemen and prisons are necessary, even in the polity of a Christian nation, so, while the world continues to be what it is, the suppression of all appeals to the decisic n of war would involve the certain and absolute triumph of robbery, oppression, greed and injustice.

The reverend Dean omits, however, to say how we are to decide that our own cause is "just and holy" when the enemy claims that theirs is equally so.

THE ASSASSINATION MANIA.

Dr. Felix Oswald, taking the murder of King Humbert as his text, declares that the key to the problem of political assassination lies in the recognition of the fact that death has no terrors, but on the contrary is welcomed by such men as the murderer of the Italian king. The remedy is for States to adopt the Swiss plan of punishment. "Life-weary desperadoes may become less ready to run amuck if they know that mankind will compel them to bear the yoke of existence with added burdens."

THE CURE FOR ANARCHY.

Mr. Charles Johnston deals somewhat philosophically with "Nihilism and Anarchy":—

Behind the secondary causes of anarchy, as ever, lies the primary cause: the failure of justice between man and man; the willingness to take advantage of another's necessity for our own profit. There is no cure but true and generous dealing, giving to others the measure we desire for ourselves.

CATHOLICS IN AMERICA.

Bishop J. A. McFaul, writing on "Catholics and American Citizenship," maintains that American citizens, because they are Catholics, are discriminated against. He gives an account of some of the alleged Catholic grievances, but it cannot be said that they are very serious. Bishop McFaul says that there are only three Catholic chaplains in the American navy, and in the army but four.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Mr. G. W. T. Ormond writing on "The Art of R. L. Stevenson," compares him with Scott in the following words:—

The art of Stevenson has been compared to the art of Scott. But their methods were essentially different. Scott poured forth treasures of knowledge, invention, humour, pathos, anecdote from an exhaustless store, poured them forth artlessly, almost at random. Stevenson, who, brilliant though he was, had neither the accumulated resources of Scott, nor so luxuriant a fancy, collected his materials with immense pains, sifted them laboriously, and when he came to use them never rested till he had everything in its proper place, and displayed to the best possible advantage. His jewels are none of them rough diamonds. Every gem is cut, polished to the highest point, and set in gold of rare and cunning workmanship.

THE CENTURY.

THE October may almost be called a "Chinese number," so many articles deal with the question. Most of these are noticed elsewhere.

A CHINESE GROWL.

Wu Ting Fan, the Chinese Minister at Washington, writes an article on the Chinese question which he calls "A Plea for Fair Play." He does incidentally mention that a dispute should not be settled by the interested parties, but by some impartial third. But most of the article is a general growl and grumble that people take everything against the Chinese for granted, and only believe what the Celestials tell them when it is proved by other sources beyond a doubt. Everyone believed the reports of the massacres of the Legations, although it was only a Shanghai tale, but people said that he was not speaking the truth when he produced the cipher message from Mr. Conger. Wu Ting Fang naturally takes objection to the following:—

A certain returned missionary, who said he had spent fifty years in China, was reported to have used the following language: "I believe the entire foreign legation in Peking has been killed, and the responsibility for this killing is to be found in the deceit and cunning of the Chinese minister at Washington. There is no doubt that the Chinese minister had private despatches on this subject several weeks ago. He knew of the impending disaster, but he was too cunning to tell it."

How, he says, could I be responsible who was more than ten thousand miles away from the scene of action?

CROMWELL UNSPOILED.

Mr. Morley's twelfth paper on Oliver Cromwell concludes the series. He deals in it with personal traits, foreign policy, and the embarrassments which he encountered at the end of his Protectorate. Writing on Cromwell's family life Mr. Morley says:—

There is no sign that the wonderful fortunes that had befallen Cromwell in the seventeen years since he quitted his woodside, his fields and flocks, had altered the soundness of his nature. Large aftairs had made his vision broader; power had hardened his grasp; manifold necessities of men and things had taught him lessons of reserve, compliance, suppleness, and silence; great station brought out new dignity of carriage. But the foundations were unchanged. Time never choked the springs of affection in him, the true refreshment of every care-worn life. In his family he was as tender and as solicitous in the hour of his glory as he had been in the distant days at St. Ives and Ely.

"HANDS OFF!"

The Right Rev. Henry C. Potter writes upon "Chinese Traits and Western Blunders." He says that there is no great discontent with their rulers amongst the Chinese, and concludes his article as follows:

She (the Empress) has been guilty of the gravest crimes against international rights and comities. Let her be punished for them as she deserves. But let not the mad acts of ignorant and inflamed revolutionists be made the pretext for pulling down a venerable and historic civilisation, whose younger and worthier sons are just now turning toward the light. Hands off, gentlemen, kings, emperors, and presidents, until a people, stirred at length by the vision of nobler ideals, shall show us what they can do for their own regeneration!

OTHER ARTICLES.

Pauline King contributes an interesting article on "American Miniature Painting," which is profusely illustrated with miniatures. Romyn Hitchcock describes Chinese education. Sir Walter Besant continues his pictures of East London types, and Mr. William Mason gives some memories of a musical life.

FIRST article b to Siam, engineer

The wing sente which sunited

I can thorough sive allia general re oppose a the life imperille gogues a the Unit

Mr. I States Englan the En United by the with Gr for the Empire 402,000 as 300, the bu canals electric all the Wester this a f

Mr. deals t used in cars, E Mayna Thorne distant

Mr. exhibit the fact Vincent out of stock:

that. vehicles Mr.

points
(1) 7 engines
(2) 7
(3) 7

since th (4) T

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

inese

stion.

gton.

calls

ntion

ested

the take only

d by the

was not sage akes

fifty wing has und

ton. vate

the ore

on-its,

he

ing

len

de, ire.

ned ght

e;

the ngs ife.

of

ly.

se

no se,

291

ed

nt

vn

ier

e.

at

ey

13

FIRST place is given in the September number to an article by Mr. Barrett, the late United States Minister to Siam, upon the crisis in China, and its meaning for engineering interests.

THE ANGLO-SAXON BROTHERHOOD.

The whole note of the article is taken from the following sentence, in which Mr. Barrett speaks of the relations which should be preserved between England and the United States :-

I can make this statement without prejudice. While I am thoroughly convinced that there should be no offensive or defensive alliance between England and the United States in their general relations with the rest of the world, and while I would oppose any formal alliance, except in heroic instances where the life and institutions of the Anglo-Saxon race might be imperilled, I do contend, despite the antagonism of some demaogues and some sensational newspapers, that the interests of the United States and England are almost identical in China.

PRESERVE CHINESE INTEGRITY.

Mr. Barrett says that every one knows that the United States have no wish for territory, and he thinks that England has now reached "the limit of conquest which the English people would favour or permit"! United States has everything to lose and nothing to gain by the participation of China, and will therefore work with Great Britain and other nations, or without them, for the preservation of the integrity of the Celestial He discredits the reputed population of 402,000,000, and puts it down at the highest estimate as 300,000,000. The chief opening for engineers is in the building of railways, the improvement of rivers, canals and harbours. Cities require sewerage systems, electric car lines, telephones and telegraphs, and in fact all the hundred and one things which go to make up a Western town. Nor, says the late Minister to Siam, is this a fanciful picture.

MOTORS FOR ROAD SERVICE.

Mr. Fred. W. Maynard contributes an article which deals technically with most of the heavy motor vehicles used in England; for although behind in light passenger cars, England leads the way with heavier waggons. Mr. Maynard gives premier place to the steam vans made by Thorneycroft, of torpedo-boat fame. They can cover a distance of from forty to fifty miles at a stretch.

LOCOMOTIVES AT THE EXHIBITION.

Mr. Charles Rous-Marten writes on the locomotive exhibit in the Paris Exhibition. He begins by deploring the fact that the exhibit is placed in the annex at Vincennes. Few people trouble to take the hour journey out of Paris to see the magnificent show of rolling

For it is a splendid show, there can be no two opinions about that. So great and varied a collection of fine locomotives and vehicles can hardly have been brought together ever before.

Mr. Rous-Marten was most struck by the following points :-

(1) The enormous preponderance of the compound type of engines over the simple high-pressure type.

(2) The comparative scarcity of eccentricities in design.

(3) The immense increase in size and weight of locomotives since the last exhibition.

(4) The specially huge size and power of certain Russian engines.

(5) The almost universal employment of coupled wheels in express engines, and the consequent all but complete disappearance of the single-driver type.

(6) The large augmentation of heating surface and of steam pressure.

He was struck by the disinclination of Great Britain to adopt the compound principle for locomotives. Only one British exhibit is constructed on this system, whereas amongst exhibits of other nations the proportion of compounds to non-compounds is ten to one, if not more.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The other contributions are rather more technical. Mr. S. F. Walker gives his second paper on "Electric Mining Machinery in the British Collieries." Hugo Diemer continues his series on "Commercial Organisation Diemer continues his series on "Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop." "The Fourth Era of the Leadville Mining District" is described by Mr. Thomas Tonge. Mr. E. F. Cassel writes on "Commercial Requirements of Water-Power Governing," and Mr. W. Ripper on "The Continuous Recording of Steam-Engine Performance." The customary review of the engineering press concludes the number.

CASSIER'S MAGAZINE.

I HAVE noticed elsewhere Mr. Taylor's article on "The World's Coal." The other articles are rather more technical.

SUGAR ENGINEERING IN CUBA.

Under the above title Mr. E. Sherman Gould contributes an article descriptive of the sugar engineering practice in the Pearl of the Antilles. He remarks that the mechanical features of sugar-making are greatly in advance of the agricultural ones. He mentions that in some of the larger sugar works there are as many as thirty or forty miles of light railway laid and operated. Sugar cane has apparently a large advantage in that it provides its own fuel. Mr. Gould says :-

A sine quâ non in a sugar factory is to keep a steady supply of cane going into the mill, in order to furnish a steady supply of fuel to the furnaces. If the mill stops, the supply of fuel stops, steam goes down, and all goes wrong in the factory.

COAL AND ELECTRICITY.

Mr. W. S. Barstow writes upon "Electricity in Large Cities." Coal is the factor which is indispensable and causes most trouble. The tremendous increase of the coal consumption makes the supply and the storing of a reserve stock a problem. In conclusion he says :-

The electrical part of the system has developed by such rapid stages that its efficiency has already reached a very high standard, but the steam portion has continued to supply the mechanical power at much the same figures as it did many years ago. reciprocating steam engine of the present day must surely fall to the rear in the onward march of electricity supply, and what new impetus the industry will then receive can hardly be

OTHER ARTICLES.

Chief Engineer B. F. Isherwood continues his paper on "The Sloop-of-War Wampanoa," and enters minutely into details of her machinery. "Gas-engines, Fuels, Types, and Uses," are discussed by Professor C. V. Kerr. He describes the uses to which gas-engines can be put and reviews various types. The magazine opens with a finely illustrated article by Arthur C. Johnston on "American Ore Dock Machinery."

CORNHILL.

THE October number is full of readable matter, though few of the articles possess eminent or permanent value. Mr. Conan Doyle's lessons from the war will be widely read, and has already found separate notice. So have Mr. Cornish's paper on dogs that earn their own living, and an unsigned assortment of "more humours of Irish

Mr. E. H. Parker writes on the Imperial Manchu family, and unravels the strange dynastic tangle which envelops the present emperor. He deplores the crumbling away of a family once so noble and courageous. So far as he can judge, the Dowager-Empress " has pluckily done the best she can for the dynasty." He seems to think her origin has been unduly depreciated. She is of the good old family of Nala, which is mentioned so far back as A.D. 1600. "Slave" and "concubine" are words which in relation to the Chinese Emperor convey, he argues, no dishonouring idea.

The rest of the papers are historical. Mrs. M. C. M. Simpson communicates a letter by her uncle, Colonel Henry Senior, describing his adventures with an American privateer in 1813. His capture off Barbadoes, his detention in a pirate's island, and what he saw of Civil War in Venezuela supply gruesome glimpses of the time. Another ghastly picture is presented by Mr. W. Westall, who tells the "tribute of blood" shed by Napoleon's Swiss levies in his retreat from Moscow. Dr. A. W. Ward supplements these memories of Napoleonic times with a sketch of the girlhood of the Prussian Queen Louisa. The early romanticist, sketched by Miss Clara Thomson, is a severe critic of Warburton, Thomas Edwards by name, who wrote in the middle of last century.

BLACKWOOD.

By far the most interesting thing in the October number is Mr. Stephen Gwynne's "Month in Ireland," with its sketch of Irish economic renascence, which claimed special notice elsewhere.

The article on the Dissolution of Parliament is conceived in the spirit of Mr. Chamberlain's electioneering speeches or of Nebuchadnezzar's boast about Babylon. So cheered is the writer with the survey of the glories of the Unionist Government that he indulges in the surprising confession that "the establishment of democracy, however precipitately effected, has not been fatal to the ascendency of common-sense. It has ruined the doctrinaires. It has enthroned imperium et libertas. It has rejected Gladstonian policy and methods. . . . The Unionist Government and party which now appeal for the support of the democracy are essentially its own creation." The writer insists that the issue in the General Election is the settlement of South Africa, "Shall two independent and hostile Governments be restored?"

"The ecclesiastical situation in Scotland" enables a writer to get rid of a great deal of bile. He is especially exercised over the union of the Free Church and the United Presbyterians, and chortles in his glee over the final acceptance of Voluntaryism by the successors of Dr. Chalmers. He doubts "whether Rome herself has ever produced anything superior in astuteness, and what a mere worlding would describe as the gift for sharp practice, to what the Free Church may boast of in her leaders during the last thirty years." How Mr. Chamberlain's reckless metaphors are vulgarising controversy, appears in what the writer says of Presbyterian -"Some of the reverend gentlemen who have bestowed their benison upon it are of the class with whom if one is to sup, one requires an uncommonly long spoon," While rejoicing that the Auld Kirk does not follow the practice of removing city churches to suburbs merely to follow the rich, the writer does deplore "that spirit of latitudinarianism which is one of the besetting dangers of the Church of Scotland."

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Pearson's is one of the best of the lighter October magazines. Captain Grogan's adventures in unknown Africa are separately noticed. Miss Maud Goodman's popular pictures of home and child life (with flowing Empire scenes and Chippendale furniture) are discussed in an article on "The Art of the Age." Mr. Turner Morton writes on "Driving in Russia," and tells us that "the Russians, above all people, delight in being driven, yet they hate driving, and are the worst whips in the world."

"Indigo Planting in India" is an interesting account of the production of the well known dye. Another article is on "Doctoring by Machinery," an account of the movement cure for stiff, or weak, or in any way defective joints or muscles, now so much in use on the Continent. It is wonderful now that anybody can ever manage to die at all, so manifold and marvellous are all the ways for prolonging and preserving life.

SOVEREIGNS AS SPORTSMEN.

"Imperial Sportsmen" is the title of Mr. Ryall's particularly welf-illustrated article on the sporting tastes of European monarchs. The Prince of Wales and others of our own royal family are known to be good sportsmen, but the crack shot seems to be the Duke of York. The Emperor of Austria is also a first-rate shot. He prefers chamois hunting, and is deterred by none of the difficulties connected with that risky sport. The German Emperor, too, is "a mighty hunter, and notwithstanding the fact that his left arm is of no use to him, an excellent shot. He shoots with light weapons as a rule, but when posted for boars and other dangerous game he has the assistance of a support for his rifle." His Imperial Majesty's mailed fist quite lately slew as many as forty wild boars in a day. He recently, we are told, like Simple Simon, went on a special expedition to Norway "for to catch a whale," and what is more he caught, or rather shot it.

The Tsar hunts in ancient forests where a tree is never cut, never entered by any save himself and his guests. Here and in the Caucasus the auroch can still be hunted, but for fear of them becoming extinct auroch-hunting only takes place once in three years. The writer says, "Since the Tsar has broached the idea of disarmament, it is said that his views on sport have undergone a considerable modification."

King Humbert and the late President Faure were both good sportsmen, as is President Loubet. King Oscar of Sweden is "an all-round sportsman, but he does not like to shed blood," and confines himself chiefly to revolver

THE September Harmsworth contains an article by Mr. W. J. Wintle on "Rooms in which Public Opinion is Formed," illustrated by photographs of the sanctums of the best known London and provincial editors. Mr. Bernard Owen's account of the General Post Office, under the title of "Sorting 3,000,000 Letters," Mr. Birnage's paper on the "Biggest Pigeon Race in the World," Mr. Philip Astor's not very sympathetic if amusing account of "Home Life in China," and several shorter articles, make a very varied number. The article on "Doubling the World's Harvest" is noticed separately.

North the H more count North. Reid Mr. H dialect publish well. to co writers the T poem is righ better the ex histori counti the T is, per tory; countr which North nobles an att

IAM

Mr. the bir

The histori Sir Wi of Mo story 'merit o bride, means spectre trash, weak p rowan

The by a d of the to 1,30 in weig of twe still sta year 67

The

Lucas, writes is a ver a crazy possess worship possess made f with a spoon."
llow the merely that esetting

October inknown odman's flowing iscussed Turner us that driven, in the count of article is e moveve joints t. It is ie at all, blonging Ryall's g tastes d others ortsmen, k. The e prefers fficulties imperor, the fact int shot.

n posted sistance s mailed n a day. ent on a ale," and is never guests. hunted, hunting er says, nament, rgone a ere both Oscar of not like revolver opinion anctums rs. Mr. e, under irrnage's World," amusing shorter ticle on rately.

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES MAGAZINE.

I AM glad to welcome the new sixpenny magazine as an attempt to create a first-class provincial magazine. Northumberland, meaning all the counties lying between the Humber and the Tweed, is quite as large and much more important than many continental states which count their monthly periodicals by the dozen. The Northern Counties Magazine is published by Andrew Reid and Co., Limited, of Newcastle, and edited by Mr. Howard Pease, whose short stories in Northumbrian dialect will attract some considerable attention. It is published at 6d. net, and the first number promises very well. Among the list of those who have promised to contribute to its pages are nearly all the writers who have been born between the Humber and the Tweed, and the first number opens with a spirited poem by Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne. The editor is right in saying that he could hardly have chosen a better part of England as the area from which to begin the experiment of a provincial magazine. The wealth of historical, antiquarian and legendary lore of the northern counties, probably exceeds that of any other district in the Three Kingdoms. The history of Northumberland is, perhaps, rather too much of a drum and trumpet history; but there are many other things in the north country worth writing about besides the age-long tourney which went on between the Tyne and the Tweed. Northumberland Mr. Swinburne describes as "the noblest shore Fame holds in fee."

Even here, where English birth seals all men free—Northumberland.

Mr. Swinburne has the good conceit of himself which is the birthright of all Northumbrians:—

None save our Northmen ever, none but we,
Met, pledged, or fought
Such foes and friends as Scotland and the sea
With heart so high and equal, strong in glee
And stern in thought.

The longest article in the magazine is devoted to an historical description of the growth of the Elswick Works. Sir William Eden contributes a short paper upon "Aspects of Modern Art." Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe writes a short story "The Tale of a Dead Lad's Rigg," which has the merit of containing an excellent ghost, a three-months' bride, who manifests herself apparently by no other means than a soft white hand. There is also a thrilling spectre in the shape of an infernal dog called the Guytrash, a fiendish animal indeed, who fortunately has one weak point—that he cannot stand before a blow from the rowan bough.

The antiquarian part of the magazine is represented by a description of Bewcastle Cross, the oldest monument of the Angles in England. It is said to be from 1,200 to 1,300 years old, and stands upon a great base six tons in weight. It was not until 1891 that the wear and tear of twelve centuries necessitated some repairs, but it is still standing in the open air, where it was erected in the year 671.

There is a literary letter from London by Mr. E. V. Lucas, and some other short papers. Miss Coleridge writes on "The Last Hermit of Warkworth," and there is a very curious paper entitled "An Antiquary's Letter," a crazy tale indeed, which seems to point to some kind of possession by the spirit of an old Norseman or Odinworshipper of the body of a fisherman, who when under possession by this spirit, offered sacrifices to Odin and made free with his neighbour's cattle. It is a weird tale, with a curious suggestiveness.

The Women's Agricultural Times.

LADY WARWICK has brought out a special eastern counties issue of the Women's Agricultural Times for November, which contains a leading article by Lady Warwick herself upon the need of individual effort, and an account of Miss K. M. Courtauld, who is one of the famous women-farmers of England. Miss Courtauld farms 243 acres of land in Essex at Colne Engaine. She employs 15 men and boys, and manages them all herself. In fact, she does all her own buying and selling, with the exception of corn, which she sells through a local salesman. Miss Courtauld has had considerable success as a breeder, and last Christmas she took the first prize for the best beast at the local fat stock show.

Another paper deals with the distillation of perfumes. One of the most interesting articles in the number is that on "Poultry-keeping for Women," which deals chiefly with geese. The writer says that, contrary to general belief, geese are more intelligent than other fowls, and will come flying from a long distance at the sound of a well-known voice, to which they are accustomed, calling them to their food. They are almost as good as watch-dogs about a place; and the writer says that when he has sat up late at night, or walked about early in the morning, the geese would hail the sound of his familiar footstep by notes of jubilant welcome.

Good Words.

THERE is much that is interesting in Good Words for October. G. D. Vecchia's sketch of Leo XIII. is appreciative and racy. Mr. J. A. Macleod supplies a most vivid picture of a holiday he spent in Basutoland, which he declares to be well called "The Switzerland of South Africa." The under world of London, with its pictures of subterraneous windings, furnishes L. W. Lillingston with a theme of mysterious and almost awesome interest. Rev. J. A. Dron recalls "a banknote which helped a reformation"—a grisly cartoon by Cruickshank in the form of a banknote satirising the prevalence of capital punishment for minor crimes, and signed "For the Bank of England, J. Ketch." He was moved to produce it by seeing several men and women hanged for issuing counterfeit one-pound notes. His skit made a great sensation: its publisher realised more than $700 over it in a few days. The Bank directors were furious, but had to stop the one-pound' notes. Cruickshank claimed that his counterfeit banknote compelled Parliament to reform its barbarous penal code.

May we ever Kill Wife and Child?

"Would homicide have been justifiable in Pekin?" is the question which the Princess Gagarine discusses in the October Humanitarian. The writer is the wife of the Russian Chargé d'Affaires at Tangier, and she was much surprised to find a great difference of opinion in the town as to whether the besieged Europeans would have been right in killing their women and children in order to save them from Chinese devilry. Those who took the negative view did so on the ground that it would be wrong to deprive Christians of the glory of martyrdom, and that suicide in any case was an illicit means of escape from appointed suffering. The Princess herself declares emphatically in the affirmative. She asks:—

The spirit which animates our actions in war time is praised, why then must the merciful wish to spare our dear ones be blamed? It is ambition and vanity, and the greed of gain which makes men go forward to fight and kill, but it is love which guides our hands to take lives which can only exist to endure fearful mental and bodily suffering.

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Die Zukunft.

THE Zukunft of September opens with an anonymous conversation—" Gods, Heroes and Waldersee"—between Bismarck, Caprivi and Moltke, not well written, but throwing interesting sidelights on the Chinese question. Bismarck is, of course, the chief speaker, and the words which are put in Caprivi's mouth are quite unworthy of that gentleman. Bismarck regrets the complete self-effacement of Hohenlohe, which does not surprise him, however, and does not understand what Waldersee, for whom he has no particular regard, is to do in China. His chief-commandership in Pechili—not in China, as he accentuates—would only cause embarrassment. "If political Dalai Lamas and Napoleonic illusions are to become possible with us, I should like to be still alive."

Then follows the dignified speech which Professor K. Breysig delivered at Nietzsche's bier in Weimar, "the man who never wrote a word that did not advance our knowledge of the human soul and of the world's events."

Karl Brumm's "England of To-Day" is a reply to Tille's "The Boer War in Great Britain." Dr. Tille is the German professor at Glasgow whom the rowdy behaviour of his students forced to resign. No doubt he had given provocation, and Mr. Brumm wishes to rectify the picture which Tille had drawn. Speaking as a German merchant who has lived in England for twenty-five years, not mentioning that he is German Consul at Manchester, he is anxious to remove the misunderstandings which prevent the maintenance of friendly relations between his two countries. In this praiseworthy desire he makes many a good point, and not only because Tille exposes himself badly. phrases like "The just will not forget how nobly England has often taken the part of the weak" might be eliminated from all political sketches, no matter to what nation they refer. And why state that not even Wellington and Nelson—not to speak of Kitchener, after whom a certain Society set and the yellow press had been running-had been fêted as national heroes? He has also an extraordinary belief in John Bull's resources, "what would ruin other nations, does not harm him." Mr. Brumm belongs to those who first sympathised with the Boers, but came to the conviction that their administration was rotten, their principles hostile to civilisation, and the war inevitable. "If the German holds to the Briton, as he has often done, with mind and sword, they need not fear man, only God," he concludes.

Lastly, we mention a note by Karl Jentzsch on Naumann, the National-Socialist and political parson. This is the way in which he comments on the Emperor's "No Pardon!" speech:—"What are we to do when it occurs to fifty thousand Chinamen to surrender? To feed them won't do; therefore——! What can we do when we meet a procession of fifty thousand caterpillars? We crush them with a roller. Disgusting business; but it cannot be helped. We do not know how Jesus might have spoken if He had lived not in a world of peace, but of wars." Is this sufficiently disgusting to finish this parson?

Deutsche Rundschau.

The September number contains many good articles. Eugen Zabel contributes a very interesting description of the Siberian Railway, or the "Magistrale" as it is called. As he truly says, Siberia does not now only call to mind the convicts who work in its mines; the huge, sparsely populated country as large as Europe has now been opened up by the railway. The result will be that the country is peopled, and that the towns become prosperous. He mentions the two other chief building projects of recent years-namely, the American line over the Rockies to the Pacific and the railway in the Soudan. The Siberian railway's construction, however, was more difficult than either of these. First of all, the materials had to be brought tremendous distances, but, worse still, the labour of the surrounding country was quite useless. The engineering difficulties also were enormous. Of these he gives descriptions. The comparisons of the different lengths of rail are interesting. The Canadian Pacific line is 4,677 kilometres long; from San Francisco to New York by Chicago is 5,359 kilometres, but from the Russian frontier to Vladivostock there is a stretch of 7,588 kilometres. As the railway after that traverses Russia we can include the distance to the German frontier, a total of 10,211 kilometres, or a quarter of the earth's circumference! At present the traffic between Europe and Eastern Asia goes through the Suez Canal. It takes 35 days between London and Shanghai, and costs about £80. By going from London via Moscow and the Siberian railway, Shanghai can be reached in half the time at one-third the cost! After the line has been made a double one the process of developing the resources of Siberia will progress much faster. Zabel, however, laughs at the notion of some enthusiasts that Siberia will eventually rival the United States.

M. von Brandt discusses the settlement of China in a thoughtful paper. Walther Gensel contributes his second paper on "Art at the Paris Exhibition." The relations between Russia and Prussia during the first quarter of this century are described by Paul Bailleu.

Deutsche Revue.

The most interesting article in the September number is that by Vice-Admiral a. D. Werner on the Chinese War. The gallant admiral was present at a good deal of the fighting. He considers that the courage of the Chinaman has not increased since the Japanese captured impregnable position after impregnable position with hardly any loss. He says that he sees the papers speak of a force of some 9,000,000 men in the Chinese army, but he fails to see where the trained soldiers are to come from. He puts their number at 25,000—no more. These would have modern weapons. The admiral describes some of the mutilations the Chinese inflicted upon Europeans, and echoes the sentiments of his Kaiser, saying "they must be punished so that they will remember not had anything to fear from them, but unless some restrictions are set upon the import of weapons and the instruction of the Chinese by European instructors, Europe will have to look out. In his opinion it was an imbecility, from the Chinese point of view, to raise the cry "Death to the foreigners!" at the present moment. They should have waited another fifty years, continuing meantime the instruction of their soldiers in European methods; then, he says, things would really have been serious for the Powers. But at present it was much too soon, and the Chinese will suffer for their haste. The article concludes as follows: "Chinese fortifications cannot resist the attack of the foreigners, and it is as much against Chinese nature to withstand a bayonet charge in the open as it is to withstand cold water. If it were possible to play a fire-hose on their bodies, a bloodless victory would result for the allies."

Rog article appears are co Blind v Dr. He though century interest

Karl Danger mation He po Govern good to that ex compla the pre of salt ment. the sa is sho The re of hors he will to fight that R absorb in that is a sm: of suzer the suze there w stan, ar the pret varied sway, in division

> Paul deals w literatur ing wha general ten year Former everyth carpets Horn s during t silkworn has bee Europe he says, England to succ does no

M. B. August There charact

by the Machra

Rogalla v. Bieberstein contributes an interesting article on the Rhine-Ems Canal, the chief reason of which appears to be to cut out the Dutch ports which at present are competing too well with those of Germany. Karl Blind writes a defence of the Saga of Wieland the smith. Dr. Herman Schiller gives an interesting summary of his thoughts on the education of the people during the coming century. On the whole the present number has fewer interesting articles than usual.

ow been that the prosper-projects

over the Soudan.

as more materials

t, worse

try was criptions.

rail are 77 kilo-

York by Russian

588 kilo-ussia we

r, a total circum-

ope and

It takes sts about and the half the

as been ping the thusiasts

nina in a s second relations uarter of number

Chinese

d deal of

of the captured on with

rs speak se army, to come. These lescribes ed upon ser, say-member

we have

and the tructors, was an

the cry moment.

ntinuing

uropean

ve been nuch too

e. The fications

it is as bayonet

er. If it a blood-

Nord und Süd.

Karl Blind writes an interesting article on England's Danger in Afghanistan. Mr. Blind draws his information from reliable sources, although not at first hand. He points out how necessary it is for the English Government, through the Indian Viceroy, to keep on good terms with the Amir. He then proceeds to show that exactly the contrary is being done. The chief complaints are that the Amir's wishes with regard to the prevention of the export of horses and the import of salt are set at naught by the Indian Govern-ment. The desire to exclude salt is prompted by the same anxiety to protect home industries as is shown by the Government of the United States. The reason given for the desire to stop the export of horses is that the ruler of the Afghans sees that he will probably need them for his army when he comes to fight Russia. For all through the article we are told that Russia is the danger to India. She desires to absorb all Central Asia and to destroy English prestige in that continent. Mr. Blind mentions the fact that there is a small group who consider that England has a claim of suzerainty over the Amir somewhat after the style of the suzerainty over the Transvaal. But in South Africa there was no Russia in question as there is in Afghanistan, and in St. Petersburg they laugh in their sleeves at the pretence. Mr. Blind gives a long description of the varied and diverse tribes over whom the Amir holds sway, in order to prove therefrom the impossibility of any division of the country between Russia and England.

A BUFFER STATE.

Paul Horn writes at length on Persia. He specially deals with the former position of the country in politics, literature and religion. He begins his article by showing what a little is known about Persia by Europeans generally. As he was a resident within its borders for some ten years, he can speak on the subject with authority. Formerly, of course, Persia was great in pretty nearly everything, and recently was famed, at any rate, for its carpets and silk. Even this fame is likely to wane. Mr. Horn says, "The silk industry has gone back badly during the last ten years, owing to the prevalence of the silkworm illness (Muscordine), while the carpet weaving has been seriously injured by the introduction of bad European dyes." As for Persia's political position, it is, he says, simply that of a buffer state between Russia and England, and that the stronger it is the more likely it is to succeed in preventing war. Altogether, the article does not give a cheerful prospect for Persia.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. Bernardi writes upon Naples under the Bourbons. August Strindberg describes life in the Latin Quarter. There is a frontispiece of Ludwig Jacobowski, and his character sketch is given by Karl Bienenstein.

THE first item in a very appetising bill of fare offered by the Windsor this month is a sketch by Robert Machray of the India Office.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THE death of King Humbert and the possible consequences, both political and religious, still occupy the minds of Italian writers, and the reviews continue to publish appreciations of the situation from every conceivable point of view.

The Civiltà Cattolica (September 1st) considers the moment opportune for reasserting its intransigent attitude on the subject of the Temporal Power, and adopts as its own an expression recently employed by the Liberal Italie, that conciliation between the Vatican and the Quirinal was "neither possible nor desirable." Such is its answer to the dreams of conciliation in which some indulged for a few brief days after the tragedy at Monza.

In the Nuova Antologia (September 1st) Professor Zanichelli of Siena treats of the reign of Humbert I. in its constitutional aspect, pointing out that the late king was the model of a constitutional sovereign in a parliamentary state, and concluding that the monarchy, thanks to his attitude, is very much stronger to-day than on the death of Victor Emmanuel II. Professor Vidari of Pavia points out with much solemnity that it is the lack, both of religion and education, which is driving the Italian people into anarchism, and that consequently merely repressive measures are of no avail. The most striking contribution of the month, however, and one that has excited much discussion in the Italian press, is an outspoken article by Sidney Sonnino, the distinguished deputy, under the title "Quid Agendum" (September 16th). Starting from the candid assumption that Italy is morally and politically sick, that discontent is on the increase, that her administration of justice has fallen into illrepute, and that the frequent ministerial crises were a constant source of weakness, he declares the first need for his country to be an understanding between public men as to the reforms to be introduced. Among those concerning which all just men should be agreed. Sgr. Sonnino places the better administration of justice, the moral education of the young, especially in the primary schools, and the diffusion of true principles of co-operation in order to counteract the evil effects of industrial capitalism. Socialism, he declares, is rapidly invading both the State and the Commune; the right to combine and to go on strike being fully accorded to industrial workers, the government should restrict itself to general laws for the protection both of the commonwealth and of individual liberty. The agrarian worker, he maintains, requires special protection. In the reduction and re-distribution of taxation the Parliament has before it a task of exceptional difficulty. These are the main points in an article which has been hailed with delight by the Socialists as embodying the greater part of their own political programme.

General Luchino del Verme, whose admirable articles on the Transvaal war have repeatedly been noticed in these columns, is now turning his attention to China, and publishes in the Antologia (September 1st) an excellent summary of Russia's advance through Manchuria during recent years. The same subject pointing out the rival interests of England and Russia in the Far East is ably treated in Flegrea (August 20th).

~~~~~~

ONE of the most notable papers in the Sunday at Home for October is a sketch of a "mission to the taverns," carried on by the London City Mission. The different kinds of character met with in these sinks of humanity are graphically delineated.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THERE is not very much of importance in the October number. Attention has elsewhere been called to Mr. Clarence Waterer's indictment of the war in South Africa.

VICTORIANS AND THE SWEATER.

Mr. John Hoatson's paper on anti-sweating in Victoria is a record of progress in colonial opinion and law since 1880. It is rather a series of notes for the student of social questions than an essay for the general reader. The writer claims that the Factories and Shops Act which came into force in May last is "the most advanced in the world." It empowers the Governor in Council to nominate special Boards to fix wages, such Boards to consist of equal numbers of employers and employed. It extends the principle of minimum wage to all trades usually carried on in factories. It extends from female to male shop assistants in the metropolitan area the limit of 52 hours a week. In the agitation for these reforms, the Press and the Church seem to have taken prominent part; and the Anti-sweating League has been chief champion.

"FULL GALLOP TO DESPOTISM."

E. B. Husband's reflections on wage-earners and South Africa are sombre in the extreme. He admits that the Government responsible for the war is about the most representative of modern governments. And this makes the outlook so gloomy. He says:—

It would appear that, whatever pride we once had in ideas associated with an enlightened democracy, we have by this time quite exhausted it and are in full trot, or rather gallop, towards despotism of the most ultra type, accelerated and rendered more remarkable than former despotisms by an enormous and overwhelmingly increased power of the Press. In other despotisms the chopping off of a few heads or the firing of a cannon down some street thronged with people would have a corrective or alterative effect, but the power of largely circulated newspapers cannot be easily got rid of, since the interests of advertisers and of the readers of advertisements are too strong to be suddenly turned aside, with the result that a useful instrument, by the introduction of editorial articles and other modes, can be made, and has been made, a means of so misleading minds, not trained to reason, that the most dreadful calamities have to be endured, of which the South African war is a striking example, and amongst its effects must be counted an enormous increase of one of the most serious drawbacks to political freedom that can be imagined—a standing army.

OTHER ARTICLES.

The Mission of Empire is set forth by Ernest D. Bell as making for the ultimate unification and harmonisation of mankind; to be welcomed, therefore, not deprecated. An American, Mr. P. A. Bruce, gives a comprehensive survey of the course of American feeling towards England, closing with a strong plea for concerted action between both powers in their own interest and in the interest of mankind. Mr. Frederic W. Lugman, who has served in the army, and whose literary style seems modelled on the staccato ejaculations of the drill sergeant, details in a scattered series of imperatives his proposals for Army Reform. The abolition of short service, the reduction of our army to 100,000 seasoned troops, the universal use of the rifle and encouragement of rifle practice, are some of his recommendations. Frances Freshfield traces the development of the Jingo from the over-indulgent methods of the nursery. Mr. James Dowman laments clerical ascendency in Scottish School Boards, and pleads for secular education.

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE MOTE IN OUR NEIGHBOUR'S EYE AND THE BEAM IN OUR OWN.

"NATIONAL ILLUSIONS" is the title of an article by M. J. Novicoff in this magazine for September, the gist of which that every nation tends to pride itself immensely on the possession of some virtue which it emphatically does not possess, and severely condemn another nation for a sin which all the time it is committing itself. M. Novicoff spares no nation, but France and England come in for specially severe censure, France for her Napoleonic wars and England for her South African. Both nations are equally fond of high-sounding precepts which they never practise. "The English," says M. Novicoff, "are constantly talking of humanity, and in practice they are very often the most inhuman of all nations." Our policy with regard to the Ottoman Empire means the permanent misery and comparative desolation of some of the fairest countries on this earth. England is little loved, which proves that she is not lovable. But, M. Novicoff concludes, no one nation is much better than another, at least not so far as selfishness, brutality and cruelty are concerned.

UNSUPPRESSED SLAVERY.

M. Jules Durand is another of those French colonial officials who assist in governing some distant colony and then write a scathing indictment of what goes on there. Under the title of "Ebony Wood," he describes at length the system of predatory raids on the natives of Nouméa and other South Sea Islands, a practical though not ostensible slavery. Many of these slaves, he asserts, are taken to Queensland. His remedy is not legislation, but the conversion of the New Hebrides into a French possession. "This natural annexation would not have the advantage of dealing a final blow at English influence which is now penetrating into these islands, but from the economic point of view as well as in the name of humanity it would save races on the point of disappearing. Let France act, it is time!"

OTHER ARTICLES.

Those hitherto unpublished fragments of Marie Bashkirtseff's pathetic journal, in which are several references to Maupassant, will attract most readers' attention. Dr. La Touche-Treville writes of the discovery of a fourth gospel, contained in an ancient parchment put up for sale last year by some Cairo merchants and bought for the Strasburg library. Written in the Coptic language this fourth gospel is said to contain not only the words of Christ to his disciples, but a new version of the scene on the Mount of Olives; and there is also a fragment relating to the Resurrection.

There are, besides, several excellent scientific articles, notably on "a Revolution in Journalism," to be brought about by the new telegraphic typewriter, by which 170 words can be, and have been, telegraphed in a minute, and the inventor, who, by the bye, is an Australian, Mr. Donald Murray by name, hopes to reach 500 words a minute.

MR. ERNEST E. WILLIAMS, in the October Windsor, boldly essays the task of describing Africa and forecasting its future. To condense a continent into a magazine article and to add an estimate of its economic possibilities is a somewhat daring feat even in these days when men are learning to think in continents. The writer's outlook is distinctly hopeful.

Chines article bracket Hope."

the cor

politics Captain campai pathy avoids fact, hi technic knowin reached accordi M. I modern fighting war is a and all will dis all, from perils, a followed comn thought the onu sharing action ; no long instinct to Nape natural campai necessa the rule intellige

In the place of the presignor of these to the fit the battletters t as to the Victoria "small not plain vivid li interesti all a mastrong s

A cull Exposit sian tra represent change, progress "Made many." tion is resulting yards br paper n

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

DESERVING of notice elsewhere are "A Russian among Chinese Sectaries," and M. Jules Bois's remarkable article on fortune-tellers, crystal gazers, and palmists, bracketed under the picturesque title of "Dealers in Madame Adam's name is again absent from among the contributors of the rejuvenated Nouvelle Revue, and politics are scarcely touched upon, save indirectly in Captain Gilbert's able analysis of the South African campaign. Although the writer is in undisguised sympathy with the Boers, he is rigorously impartial, and avoids the vexed white flag and loot controversies. In fact, his careful account of the campaign is so highly technical that it can only be recommended to those already knowing something of the science of war. He has not yet reached, in his history, the first marked British successes; accordingly it would appear that these articles will continue to appear throughout the winter.

M. Depasse offers some curious theories as to the modern prestige which surrounds war and the soldier or fighting man. Once let it be understood, he says, that war is a matter of hard work, and not a game of chance, and all the romance now surrounding military operations will disappear. In old days, when a nation went to war, all, from the king and queen downwards, shared in the perils, as well as the glories and excitements, of all that followed. A modern campaign partakes of the nature of a commercial operation, of which every move has been thought out in a counting-house. Those on whom lie the onus of declaring war are practically quite safe from sharing any of the unpleasant consequences of their joint action; and money plays a preponderant rôle. Nations no longer fight for love, for glory, or from mere warlike instinct. The great military commanders, from Alexander to Napoleon, have cared nothing for money. M. Depasse naturally draws a moral from the late South African campaign, which commenced from low motives, has been necessarily continued and concluded, not according to the rules of the old war game, but with mathematical intelligence and merciless logic.

In the second September number of the Revue the place of honour is given to a number of letters written by the present Pope, in the days when he was only Monsignor Pecci, Papal Nuncio at Brussels. In the second of these (written in 1843) he describes a visit paid by him to the field of Waterloo, where he bought some relics of the battle to send home to his mother. In these home letters the future Pope goes into many little intimate details as to the cost of living in Belgium. He describes Queen Victoria, then paying her first visit to the Continent, as "small in stature, with a bright expression and, though not plain, scarcely pretty." These letters, which throw a vivid light on the general character of the writer, are interesting as showing that Leo XIII. must be above all a man of shrewd wit and common sense, gifted with a strong sense of family affection.

A eulogistic article on the Russian exhibits at the great Exposition gives some curious details concerning Russian trade. In 1867 the great Empire was scarcely represented, but thirty years have wrought a vast change, and if Russia continues to make commercial progress at the same rate, we may live to hear "Made in Russia" substituted for "Made in Germany." To quote some figures in support of this allegation is easy. In 1867 there were 179 timber yards, resulting in a party profit of 3,000,000 roubles; now 1,200 yards bring in 70,000,000 roubles. Thirty years ago the paper mills of Russia were 150 in number, producing paper to the value of 5,000,000 roubles; now 201 factories bring in 34,000,000. The same increase is to be found in bring in 34,000,000. The same increase is to be found in the chemical trade. Naphtha has always been a source of great profit to Russia, but whereas in 1867 the naphtha springs brought their owners 30,000 roubles each year, the 247 companies now dealing with this natural product earn a yearly income of 36,000,000 roubles! This wonderful advance in the trading prosperity of the country is owing in no small measure to the patient efforts made by the much-abused autocratic Government of Russia. The powers that be have built railroads and telegraphs, have opened up mining districts, and encouraged in every way possible native industry and inventive faculty. Those who are inclined to believe that France and French investors have done badly in seeking Russia's friendship would do well to study "A. R.'s" instructive article.

Other subjects treated in the September numbers of the Nouvelle Revue are "Port Royal," the convent which played so great a part in the religious and political history of France, the "Berlin Art Museum and its Contents," "J. K. Huysmans, the Novelist," and the "National Poetry of Hungary."

THE LEISURE HOUR.

THE October Leisure Hour, besides several travel articles on Russia and Montenegro, has a paper by Miss Frances Low on "Where Poor Ladies can Live in London." The poor—or, as she is often called, "decayed"—gentlewoman is one of the most difficult problems. What is to become of ladies past any work they were ever able to do, without money and without friends able to maintain them? There is, we might add, a worse problem still-that of similarly destitute ladies, untrained for any kind of work, utterly unfitted in every way to shift for themselves, but yet far below the age of superannuation. What is to become of such? They have a long life before them; but years of training would be necessary to fit them for any active position—a training which no one can be called upon to give them. And they are not such a small class as might be thought. The poor, elderly, and often ailing lady, however, has had at least something done for her, and she need no longer be at the mercy of an often merciless landlady. Miss Low considers that such ladies would be immensely better off in a "humanely managed Home;" but she is careful to explain that she does not think all Homes are humanely managed. She singles out for special admiration the Royal Homes at Wandsworth, and the Frederica Homes at Tulse Hill, in both of which a lady must have at least £20 a year income, and be over fifty-five or sixty years of age. In the Westbourne Park Home each lady has two rooms, and may have a sister, mother or friend to live with her. To Miss Low, as to many others-

It seems strange to find well-to-do women holding meetings and congresses for all sorts of absurd and fancied wrongs and evils, and yet showing themselves entirely unconcerned and apathetic with regard to this real and undeserved suffering. the poverty of many, perhaps of most, of these old ladies is due to no want of foresight or prudence, but simply to the nature of things—to the fact that out of small salaries it is impossible to save sufficient for old age, to ill health, which swallows up little savings, to the claims of parents and sisters, which it will be an ill day for humanity if women ever disregard on the score of prudence and provision for self.

£350 she considers enough to support a home for one year capable of accommodating ten ladies.

o words indsor, d foreinto a conomic se days The

E BEAM

rticle by the gist mensely

hatically

r nation

g itself.

England

for her

African.

precepts says M.

and in n of all

Empire

solation

England

But,

orutality colonial ony and n there.

t length

Nouméa

ugh not erts, are ion, but

French

ave the nfluence

rom the ame of pearing.

e Bash-ferences

n. Dr. fourth up for ight for inguage vords of cene on relating articles.

brought ich 170

minute,

tralian,

XUM

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE September numbers of the Revue de Paris are excellent and fully maintain the revived reputation of this review, which may be described as a somewhat less solemn Revue des Deux Mondes.

The place of honour in the first September number is given to an anonymous article on the dealings of Europe with China. It is for the most part a brightly-written summary of events now perfectly familiar, in which due prominence is given to the very natural grounds for alarm which the action of the Powers had given to Chinese opinion. The writer then goes on to ask what Europe will do now that she is in Peking, and he answers his own question by asserting that she will do what France advises. She is in a good position for giving advice, we are told, inasmuch as she is herself practically disinterested, is on particularly good terms with Russia, America and Japan, and has identical interests with Germany. Great Britain, it will be noticed, is ignored. We are reminded of M. Delcasse's speech at Foix, in which he laid it down that the presence of the Allies in Peking will serve to obtain reparation for the past and guarantees for the future—a declaration which was closely followed by the Russian proposal of withdrawal. Finally, the writer asks whether Europe has dearnt the real lesson of recent events. Nothing can exceed the blindness-to use no harsher term-with which Europeans have outraged the habits, customs, and most cherished beliefs of the Chinese, and then stood thunderstruck before the inevitable catastrophe. The writer says, truly enough, that it is the egoism which prevails on both sides that has caused the danger. Europeans in China are so busily engaged in watching one another out of the tail of their eyes in the great game of concession-hunting that they have no time to study the Chinese themselves.

ENGLISH OPINION AND THE BOER WAR.

M. Chevrillon continues his extremely interesting study of English opinion on the Boer War. It is a merciless yet perfectly fair exposure of the blind limitations, the pride, the complete inability to conceive any point of view other than the purely selfish one, the astonishing pressing even of Christianity itself into the service of Imperial expansion, which M. Chevrillon encountered in the course of his visit to this country. Yet he recognises the somewhat humbler spirit which breathes throughout such writings as Kipling's "Recessional." He thinks that England will come out of the war more strongly confirmed than ever in her own special delusions.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned a continuation of M. de Rousiers's study of German commercial prosperity, and a curious collection of oral traditions about Waterloo gathered from the inhabitants in and mear the great battlefield.

In the October number of the Century, Mr. William Mason, a well-known American musician, concludes his most interesting "Memories of a Musical Life" with reminiscences of some famous violinists, opera-singers, and composers—Vieuxtemps, Ole Bull, Sivori, Remenyi, Henrietta Sontag, Johanna Wagner, Raff, Berlioz, Rubinstein, Liszt, Theodore Thomas, Gottschalk, Hans von Bülow, and many more distinguished musicians.

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

NOTICE elsewhere is claimed for M. Firmin Roz's impressions of Scotland and the correspondence of General John Hardy. For the rest we have nothing but praise for M. Brunetière's September numbers.

THE REFORM OF THE FRENCH SYNTAX.

lise

El

tha

pu

ap

ins

the ha

as it

the wh

sig

usi

pra

his pu

pe

qu

alt

on

th

th

be po

th fir

wl

ch

lo to pu

di

ar

wl

be

ch

th

no

th

fre

go

The Editor himself writes a paper on the reform of the syntax which should be interesting to schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. On July 13th, 1900, a ministerial decree was issued to the effect that in future people were not to say in French les folles amours but les fous amours, and that they might please themselves as between le Dieu des bonnes gens and le Dieu des gens bonnes. The object of this and other reforms is apparently to make French easier to foreigners, but M. Brunetière pleads for a little reciprocity. Let the English, he says, begin by making their spelling agree with their pronunciation, or, better still, their pronunciation with their spelling.

EUROPEAN LITERATURE.

M. Brunetière is industrious, for he has another article in the second September number-one on the somewhat large subject of European literature, which he is well advised in treating as a province of the still larger subject of comparative literature. The paper is an excel-lent example of the best and sanest French criticism, bearing the impress of a culture which is both wide and deep. M. Brunetière lays stress on the national element in all great writers. For example, in tracing the descent of Richardson's "Pamela" from the "Marianne" of Marivaux, we find that the modifications introduced by the later writer illustrate the differences of national psychology.

THE BEND OF THE NIGER.

M. Lebon, whose tenure of the French Colonial Office will be remembered in connection with the Dreyfus case, contributes a long and interesting paper on this much discussed portion of the African Continent. The ex-Colonial Minister writes from an ultra-patriotic standpoint. He does not attempt to disguise the fact that the activity of Lieutenant Bretonnet and his colleagues in 1896 and 1897 was deliberately planned in order to give France a better position in the negotiations which she had already begun with Great Britain. But if that part of the story is unpleasant for Frenchmen to read, the threatenings and vapourings of Mr. Chamberlain against France are equally offensive to sober Englishmen. Of course, M. Lebon is not altogether satisfied with the Anglo-French agreement of 1898, but it is evident that he sees it might easily have been very much worse for France. He adduces figures to show the steady expansion of the prosperity of the French West African colonies, but it is curious to find that he brings against French merchants and manufacturers the same charges of hide-bound routine and indolence as those which have been so often brought against the British manufacturer.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned an anonymous account of the French naval manœuvres; a study of the famous priest, Father Gratry, by M. Bellaigne; an anonymous letter from Rome which describes the political situation in Italy following upon the assassination of King Humbert; and an article on the racial conflicts between Greeks and Bulgarians in the tenth century.

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

"THE CANDIDATES OF CAIN" *: A HANDBOOK FOR THE GENERAL ELECTION.

THE only reason why I can call this the Book of the Month is because it is the only book which has been issued dealing with the subject which has monopolised public attention during the month. The General Election has been sprung upon the country in such haste that, with the exception of leaflets, the books which were in preparation, biographical and controversial, for the purpose of educating the electorate, have not made their appearance. The "Life of Mr. Chamberlain," for instance, which might have been regarded as the Book of the Month, if it had been published, is still in the printer's hands. "Lord Rosebery's Life" can hardly be regarded as a contribution to electoral literature, and hence it comes to pass that the only book which handles the topic of the month is "The Candidates of Cain," which I rushed out at top speed as soon as the signal was given for the General Election. It is not usual for authors to criticise their own books, but the practice is a good one, when the author does not disguise his identity.

AUTHOR AS CRITIC.

Speaking of this latest piece of my handiwork, I can say that, take it as a whole, it is a very useful publication which I can honestly commend to all those persons who wish to have a vade mecum to the vexed questions raised during the war. I published it because, although the Conciliation Committee has published well on for three-score pamphlets and leaflets, and the Stopher-War Committee has published about fifty or more, there was no publication in existence which contained between its two covers information upon all the points in controversy between the advocates and the opponents of the war. So knowing by my own experience the difficulty of being able to lay your finger immediately upon the extracts and quotations which were required, I set to work to construct this catechism for the constituencies.

A HANDY VADE MECUM.

It is a book of over 120 pages, containing 698 questions and answers. Any one who masters this longer catechism with proofs will be very well qualified to pass an examination upon the subject. It is not published for perusal in that fashion. It is rather a dictionary, a kind of pocket encyclopædia, which any one can turn, with the aid of the index, to whatever subject is under discussion, and find what can be said upon any particular point. Of course the catechism is primarily intended for those who are assailing the war, but those who are in its favour may also find it not without its value, if only because of the references to the Blue Books and other sources of information, extracts from speeches, and so forth, which will stand them in good stead in the making of their speeches and in the compiling of their articles.

1880 AND 1900.

It is twenty years since I published my first Electors' Catechism. That was in the year 1880, when I was at Darlington. We circulated, if I remember rightly, some 750,000 copies of that catechism, and although twenty years have gone by, I still find that catechism of 1880 the most convenient and the most accessible source of information upon all the questions which were in dispute between Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield. The present election has been so hurried that there is no chance of securing a similar widespread distribution for this pamphlet, or rather for the four-page broadsheet which was constructed of the essence of its contents; but for journalists and all who want to have their facts, and dates, and quotations, and extracts at their fingers' ends, this catechism may be recommended. There is at least nothing like it in the market. It holds the field.

SOME SHORTCOMINGS.

While speaking thus highly of my own production, I can speak not less candidly of its defects. It was too hurried in its production, and lack of time rendered it impossible to present it in quite the finished shape which I should have desired. Here and there there is a little repetition, and a day spent in recasting it would make it much more ship-shape. That is its chief defect as to the form. In matter it is weakest in the chapter which deals with the shortcomings of the Government in making war. It is possible that with many this is regarded as the most serious indictment of all, and they will naturally be disappointed on finding the way in which I have handled it. The fact is I am so horrified and so consumed with indignation and horror at the supreme infamy of the war itself, that I have little indignation left to spare for the clumsy way in which the crime has been perpetrated. The task of exposing the shortcomings of an army over which we spend so many millions every year may safely be left to other pens, who have their stock of indignation and scorn intact. I am also far from satisfied with the chapter upon "Hell Let Loose in South Africa." It is gruesome reading, no doubt, as it is; but it is not half so bad as it might have been made. Some day I hope a competent writer will carefully put together from private letters and other uncensured sources of information the first-hand evidence available as to the devil's work which we have been doing since we entered the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. At present we have but hints of the horrors perpetrated in our name, but when the full tale is told in the ears of a nation that has passed from its fit of drunken delirium, there is not an honest man or a decent woman in England that will not hang their head for shame.

WHY CANDIDATES OF CAIN?

The title "Candidates of Cain" explains itself to the English reader, and commends itself naturally to me as a sequel to the inquiry, "Shall I Slay my Brother Boer?" for now we have slain him, and his murderers are busily engaged in appealing for our suffrages to reward them for their bloody work. Against this I have in the Catechism entered the strongest protest that I could pen. I am, however, painfully aware of its inadequacy. No words can adequately express the shame and wrath that is kindled in the mind of any one who contemplates the result of the homicidal frenzy which has lately possessed rmin Roz's ondence of nothing but reform of coolmasters ministerial people were t les fous as between the bonnes. Soarently to Brunetière h, he says, eir pronun-

AX.

with their ther article somewhat he is well still larger an excelcriticism, wide and al element ne descent

ianne" of oduced by national ial Office yfus case, his much-The excic standt that the eagues in er to give as which in. But Frenchs of Mr.

ensive to lltogether 98, but it een very to show ench West he brings the same as those onymous ly of the gne; an political action of conflicts

ury.

XIIM

e British

&quot;The Candidates of Cain: A Catechism for the Constituencies."
London: Stop-the-War Committee. September 25th, 1900. Price Sixpence.

our people. Upon this subject I have expressed myself as follows in a "Foreword to the Reader":—

rest upon every elector who by voice or vote consents to share in the responsibility for the crime of Cain.

ELIJAH'S QUESTION.

"Hast thou killed and also taken possession?" was no doubt regarded by Ahab and Jezebel as a highly impertinent question to be addressed by a meddlesome prophet to a king of Israel. For, after all, was not the murder of Naboth a matter of ancient history? The man was not only stone dead, but buried. The question of the hour was not how and by whom he came to his death, but how his vineyard should be laid out for the greatest enjoyment of his murderers.

Nevertheless Elijah persisted in his interrogatory, and the electors, who share so much of the faith of the Hebrew prophet as to believe that cold-blooded conspiracy to slay one's neighbour in order to seize his vineyard or his gold-mine is not exactly the highest of Christian virtues, will do well, every one in his own constituency, to press this question home to the candidates who are appealing for their suffrages. They will have the less difficulty in so doing because our Naboth is still in the convulsions of the death-agony, his vineyard is a fire-blasted wilderness, and the bill for the bloody deed has still to be presented for payment.

SUPPOSE THAT I AM RIGHT?

There are many who will be scandalised at this attempt to describe in the plain and simple language of the common people the unspeakable infamies of which our rulers have been guilty in South Africa. But before flinging away this indictment as exaggerated and "much too strong," may I beg any such reader to read carefully the few pages devoted to an explanation of the part which Mr. Chamberlain played in the Jameson Conspiracy, before and after the Raid? Then let him ask, if he can bring himself to contemplate such a hypothesis, supposing that these things are the simple record of literal truth, can any language be too strong, any condemnation too severe for such treachery and crime?

But that which to the reader is an utterly incredible calumny is to me, alas! known only too well to be a plain statement of the absolute truth. And not to me only. There is not one member of the group of conspirators in or out of the administra-tion who does not know it also. And some day all the world will know it. Then everyone will marvel at the moderation of my language, and upbraid me not for the vehemence of my appeals, but for my failure to do justice to the unutterable anfamy of the crime for which the nation is now asked to accept the responsibility.

The Catechism is divided into four parts. The first dealing with the question, "What is the Issue?" the second describes "How the War was got up;" the third sets forth "What the War has taught us," and the fourth discusses "The Future of the Empire." I have endeavoured in the Catechism to put the question as directly as possible, and to make the answer so plain that no one can mistake it.

THE ISSUE BEFORE THE ELECTORS.

The question as to the issue before the Electors I have defined in the following extracts :-

I. Q. What is the supreme duty at this Election?

A. To repudiate by our vote any responsibility for the wickedest war that has been waged in our time.

2. Q. How can this be done?

A. By refusing to vote for any Candidate of Cain, and by doing the utmost in our power to secure the return of candidates who are opposed to murder for gain, or conquest for the sake of Empire.

A. The Candidates of Cain re those who defend, condone, justify or excuse the war with the South African Republics.

Q. What are the reasons for this urgency?

4. Q. What are the reasons for this urgency?

A. Because the blood of our brothers unjustly slain in a wanton war, unjustly forced upon them, cries, like the blood of righteous Abel, to Heaven for redress, and the curse of Cain will

5. Q. Then this is not a party pamphlet?
A. By no means. The Candidates of Cain are of both parties.
The issue at stake is wider and deeper than any party difference.

6. Q. What is that issue?

A. The issue which each elector must face is this—whether any man or nation can justify the slaughter of his fellow man until he has exhausted every possible means of avoiding so terrible an alternative.

7. Q. But do you mean to say that we did not do everything to avoid war in South Africa?

A. That is just what I do say, and what is more, I will prove it to the hilt. Instead of doing everything that could be done to avert war, it is as clear as day that we not only got up a dispute which need not have been raised, but that we obstinately refused, in face of the repeated entreaties of the other side, to adopt the peaceable means which were duly made and provided for settling the dispute amicably before a tribunal of justice and right.

A QUESTION OF MURDER.

8. Q. But if this is so, then all who approve and support the war are guilty of aiding and abetting murder on an Imperial scale ?

A. Precisely, excepting in so far as they have sinned in ignorance. Hitherto the electors have had no opportunity at the polls of repudiating or of accepting responsibility for this crime of Cain.

 Q. Then what will be the result of the Election?
 A. The result of the Election will be that every elector who puts a cross opposite the name of any candidate who approves and defends the war will stamp upon his own brow the bloody brand which blazed upon the forehead of the first murderer.

13. Q. But why go into ancient history?

A. Because in the first place it is not ancient, and, in the second place, because the events of the Past enable us to judge how men are likely to act in the Future. A General Election is a Day of Judgment as well as the choice of a new Parliament. Everyone would laugh at the plea of a murderer at the bar who protested against wasting the time of the judge and jury upon such "ancient" history as the details which proved his guilt.

14. Q. What is your contention?
A. In one word, this: that to insist on an appeal to the sword rather than an appeal to arbitration is a crime against civilisation and Christianity, the authors of which ought never to receive the vote of any civilised man. This broad issue overshadows all minor questions as to the merits of the dispute. A Government which defiantly refuses to refer a dispute to Arbitration in order to appeal to the Sword, is an Enemy of the Human Race, and all who support it are Candidates of Cain.

THE REFUSAL OF ARBITRATION.

The following chapter gives the details with reference in proof of the statement that President Kruger offered arbitration and that Mr. Chamberlain refused it :-

22. Q. But did President Kruger ever consent to refer the question to Arbitration? A. President Kruger not only consented, but passionately and repeatedly appealed to the Government of Great Britain to allow all outstanding disputes to be referred to Arbitration. He made this appeal repeatedly at the Bloemfontein Conference; he repeated it again and again, and even in the ultimatum, by which he is said to have forced us into war, he concluded by a direct and formal declaration of his readiness to submit all questions to Arbitration.

43. Q. What has our Government done about Arbitration?
A. They have professed great devotion to it in theory, but their practice has been to refuse haughtily and persistently any and every appeal to act consistently with their professions at the Hague. Instead of denouncing the arbitrament of the sword, they have persisted in appealing to it, and this war is the result. Hence they stand convicted of a crime against civilisation and humanity, and all who support them at the polls are partakers in their infamy. Upon those who vote for the Candidates of

Cain man

In

then sum com chap elec the falsi only the they thei som eith

2,00 hav cast mor poli

foll

mor

5

A thai Go in S gar the san wh ma

> suf WO dre CO Fi

sol

is,

res

kee

to en ch

to share

parties. fference. whether ow man iding so erything ll prove be done ot up a e obstie other ade and unal of mperial ned in inity at or this ort the or who proves bloody r.

in the judge ction is ament. r who y upon ilt.

sword isation ve the ws all nment order e, and rence ffered er the y and allow made ; he n, by by a it all n? , but v anv at the word. esult. and es of akers

Cain will deservedly rest the curse pronounced upon the first man who slew his brother man.

THE PRICE OF THE WAR.

In summing up the price of the war I had a great theme to deal with in a very few sentences. No one can sum up the price of the present war for many years to come; but as a brief statement of profit and loss the chapter may be commended to the attention of the electors. This war, which was deliberately chosen by the Government as their alternative to arbitration, has falsified their expectations in every particular, and its only result has been that they have proclaimed on paper the annexation of two Republics, in neither of which do they possess a shred of authority outside the range of their guns. The war has already cost 70,000,000 sterling in money, 10,000 British lives sacrificed outright, while some 50,000 British soldiers have fallen out of the ranks, either sick or wounded or invalided home. Of the Boers 2,000 have been killed and 6,000 wounded, while 15,000 have been taken prisoners-an unprecedented total of casualties for a fighting force which never numbered more than 40,000 men.

FIFTEEN TIMES WEAKER THAN BEFORE.

In return for all those sacrifices-vital, financial and political-what have we to show? I deal with this as follows :-

53. Q. But has not the war made our position in South Africa more secure?

A. It has, on the contrary, made it fifteen times less secure than it was before.

54. Q. How do you make that out?
A. The fact can be proved by the rule of three. When the late Government went out of office, British supremacy was maintained in South Africa without challenge and without difficulty by a garrison of 3,000 soldiers. (See Mr. Chamberlain's Address to the Electors at Birmingham.) As the result of the expenditure of 70 millions of money and the sacrifice of more than 40 thousand lives, Mr. Chamberlain told the House of Commons that when the war was over he believed that it would be necessary to maintain in South Africa a standing army of 30 thousand soldiers in barracks and 15 thousand military colonists. It is, therefore, as clear as two and two make four that the net result of the war is to compel us to maintain fifteen soldiers to skeep the flag flying where one soldier before the war was amply sufficient. The war, therefore, has put us into a fifteen times worse position in South Africa than we were in before we drew the sword.

THE WAR THE SEQUEL OF THE RAID.

The Catechism is, as might be expected, extremely controversial, and the chapters dealing with the Franchise Fraud and the Suzerainty Swindle, although dull enough to the casual reader, bristle with points for those who are engaged in studying the controversy that landed us in war. As to how the war was brought about, the Catechism sets forth the truth in blunt, unvarnished terms :-

60. Q. How did the war come about?

A. The war is simply the sequel of Jameson's Raid. Mr. Chamberlain at this ruinous expense of life and treasure has succeeded in achieving the object which he hoped to accomplish, when he gave his sanction, and attempted to direct the conspiracy which culminated in the Jameson Raid.

61. Q. What was the Jameson Raid? A. The Jameson Raid was the forerunner of the present war, but infinitely less criminal. Alike in its inception, in its preparation, and in its execution, it corresponds only too closely to the war which Mr. Chamberlain would have us believe has covered us with glory.

62. Q. Then you think the war is only a second edition of the Raid?

A. Yes. This is not only my opinion, but that of Mr.

Rhodes, who, when he was in England before the war broke out, remarked to a friend: "Three years ago I made a raid, and everybody said I was wrong; now the Queen's Government are preparing another Raid, and everybody says they are

63. Q. Who were in the Raid?
A. The Jameson Raid was the outcome of a conspiracy entered into by Mr. Rhodes, Prime Minister of the Cape Colony, with the connivance, approval and support of Mr. Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary; with the full knowledge of Sir Graham Bower, the Secretary of the High Commissioner, and of Mr. Newton, the British Magistrate on the frontier, for the purpose of promoting an insurrection on the part of the Englishmen resident in Johannesburg, who were believed to be suffering from such oppression that they would gladly rise in revolt against President Kruger, and establish a more Liberal Government.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S GUILT.

"The Guilt of Mr. Chamberlain" is the title of one of the chapters, in which the evidence proving his complicity in the Jameson Conspiracy is carefully marshalled and then summed up as follows :-

Mr. Chamberlain was guilty of aiding and abetting Mr. Rhodes in a conspiracy against a State living in peace and confidence with us, which was in friendly treaty relations with Her Majesty's Further, it would seem that he, Her Majesty's Government. Secretary of State, either directly or through one of his permanent under-Secretaries at the Colonial Office, did hold constant confidential communications with Mr. Rhodes' emissaries, who one and all were firmly convinced of the fact that he sympathised with the expected insurrection, and had given direct aid and support to it by making over to them the necessary instruments for encouraging it from the outside. Further, that he then attempted to change the character of the conspiracy from the upsetting of a corrupt Government by a bond fide insurrection into a felonious attempt to jump the Transvaal for England, and succeeded only far enough to wreck the scheme; that then, after having spoiled the original plan, messages from the Colonial Office hurried up Dr. Jameson and goaded him into making the precipitous Raid which Mr. Chamberlain at once disowned as soon as he discovered the mischievous effect of his incentives to precipitation. Further, it is clear that after communications from Mr. Hawksley and Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Chamberlain deliberately misled the House of Commons as to the share of Mr. Rhodes in the Jameson business; that he afterwards conspired to suppress vital evidence which would have brought out the whole truth of the matter and co-operated in the silencing of the one witness who could and would have told the truth in the witness-box. Finally, in order to secure his own whitewashing from the Select Committee, he consented to sign a statement, which he knew to be false, as to the way in which Mr. Rhodes had used the cablegrams from London, and then, apparently, having presumed too far upon the forbearance of his fellow-conspirator, he got up in the House of Commons and ate his own words in the humiliating fashion above narrated.

WHY MR. CHAMBERLAIN IS NOT IN GAOL.

There is a curious misplacement of quotations in the statement of Mr. Labouchere's charges against Mr. Chamberlain. The quotation in answer to question 127 is printed in answer to question 107 and vice versa. The following extract shows that I do not hesitate to deal faithfully with the Opposition as well as with the Ministers-it is indeed difficult to exaggerate the extent to which the Opposition has been paralysed by the fatal weakness of Sir W. Harcourt :-

155. Q. What, therefore, is the vital fact of the situation? A. That Mr. Chamberlain's complicity in the Jameson conspiracy governed the above bad business from first to last. It first rendered the Raid possible, and then prevented justice being done. It provoked the Boers to arm. It rendered all negotia-tions difficult when Mr. Chamberlain was the negotiator, and absolutely destroyed all confidence in England's good faith, without which friendly relations became impossible.

155A. O. But if this be so, why do the Opposition leaders not bring it home then ?

A. Because of the fatal mistake made by Sir W. Harcourt on the Select Committee, which whitewashed Mr. Chamberlain. Under his guidance the Liberal members of that Committee were led to whitewash an old colleague in order to strike a nasty blow at Mr. Rhodes. And from that time the official Liberals' mouth has been sealed, and they and we are now suffering from their absolutely incomprehensible refusal to allow the truth to come to light, and justice to be done.
155B. O. What would have happened if the Select Committee had done its duty?

A. Mr. Chamberlain would have disappeared from public life, possibly into the compulsory retirement of one of Her Majesty's prisons, the Boer armaments would have ceased, and we should not now be lamenting this horrible war in South Africa.

144. Q. Why was Mr. Rhodes not sent to gaol?

A. Because if he had been put in the dock he would not have stood alone, Mr. Chamberlain would have been standing by his side.

A. It convinced President Kruger, who at first had shown every disposition to trust to Mr. Chamberlain's good faith, that in the Colonial Secretary he had a bitter and unscrupulous foe who would seize the first opportunity of repeating on a large scale the treacherous attack that had failed under Jameson. Hence the Boers went on arming more than ever.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE ARMAMENTS.

Of the fact that the armaments of the Boers were the direct consequence of the Jameson Raid there is so much evidence that to prove it is almost as much a work of supererogation as to demonstrate the death of Queen Anne. But for the benefit of those readers who may still be under the delusion that the Boers had been arming for years long before the Jameson Raid, it may be well to quote the following extract from the secret memorandum issued by the War Office to the officers ordered to South Africa in June, 1899. The Intelligence Department in the course of its report on the strength

Of the enormous quantity of rifles now in possession of the S. A. Republic only some 13,500 Martini-Henry rifles were in the country before the Jameson Raid. The whole of the remainder have been purchased since that date in England, France, Germany, and Belgium. This enormous stock of rifles would suffice to arm more than double the number of the whole forces in the Transvaal.

In January, 1896, the strength of the Staats Artillery was nine officers and 100 men, though only seventy men were actually doing duty. Immediately after the Jameson Raid the corps was increased in strength to about 400, and in January last was stated by the Commandant-General to have an actual strength of 473 officers and men. This is exclusive of the reserve, which in the time of the Raid amounted only to fifty men, but may now be estimated at 200 or 300 at least.

WHY THEY WERE NOT STOPPED.

The consciousness of the Government that Mr. Chamberlain was in the Jameson conspiracy prevented them from protesting against the armaments of the Boers, which were made openly and were avowedly based upon the conviction of the Transvaal Government that Mr. Chamberlain was the active accomplice of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. It is seldom that the misdeed of an individual Minister brings retribution on his own head so directly and so speedily as has been the case in the present instance. Chamberlain, having joined in the conspiracy against President Kruger, it became impossible to punish Mr. Rhodes, and it even became necessary to whitewash him publicly. Thereupon Kruger declared that he must arm, because he had lost all confidence in Chamberlain, who he felt sure would renew the Raid at the first opportunity. Knowing the justice of Kruger's suspicion, Ministers dare not protest against his armaments. Hence, when Chamberlain made the second Raid, the Boers were ready for him with ample store of rifles and artillery that outranged our guns. Hence Stormberg, Magersfontein, Colenso, and Spion Kop. Nemesis for once seems to have travelled by autocar.

THE MAN OF MAJUBA.

Of Mr. Chamberlain the Catechism speaks with appreciation, as, for instance, in the following queries :-

598A. O. Who is Mr. Chamberlain?

A. The great Apostate of our time-the Strafford of the nineteenth century, who was the man of Majuba, and is the maker of this War.

598B. Q. Who was Strafford?

A. A statesman of the sixteenth century who began life as the friend of Hampden, Pym, and Cromwell, but who abjured his principles, betrayed his cause, and ended his life on the scaffold at Tower Hill.

598c. Q. What was Mr. Chamberlain's career?

A. He entered politics as a protégé of Mr. Morley. He had dealings with Mr. Parnell, and became a lieutenant of Mr. Gladstone. He is now the champion of every principle which he began by denouncing, and is the mainstay of the cause which in his better days he declared was fatal to the Empire.

THE "INEVITABLE" NONSENSE.

Separate chapters are devoted to the exposure of favourite fallacies, such as the refusal of Kruger to make concessions and the alleged inevitableness of the war. The latter chapter opens as follows :-

353. Q. Was the war inevitable?

A. As inevitable as was the Crucifixion when Pilate refused to save the innocent Victim of the Sanhedrim and the financiers of the Temple from death on the Cross, 354. Q. Who made it inevitable?

A. Sir Alfred Milner, Mr. Chamberlain and the press which clamoured for the shedding of innocent blood. 355. Q. Do you mean to assert that if they had worked for peace they could have averted the war?

A. Certainly. It took a great deal of trouble to force the Boers to fight. If they had endeavoured to soothe their suspicions, and had refrained from menace and chicane, there would have been no war.

IMPERIALISM TRUE AND FALSE.

But it would be a mistake to regard this Catechism as merely polemical or as solely confined to controversies about the present war. I attempt at least to lay down the principles which are essential for our Imperial salvation. The chapter "Imperialism True and False" begins as follows:

520. Q. What is the difference between true and false

Imperialism?
A. The difference between Responsibility and Aggrandise-

521. Q. What is false Imperialism properly called?

A. Jingoism, which mean Imperialism and gin. 522. How would you define true Imperialism?

A. Imperialism limited and controlled by common-sense and the Ten Commandments.

523. Q. What is the most fatal enemy of the Empire?
A. An inordinate lust for expansion, gluttony resulting in indigestion. 524. Q. What is the first duty of the true Imperialist at the present day? A. To oppose the further extension of the Empire. We have dined; the time has come to digest.

525. Q. Why should we stop now?

A. Because we have annexed everything that is lying round loose in the world worth annexing, and in so doing we have contracted responsibilities enormously in excess of our resources.

Th broug colon

A. counc tile to as the 560 the di

A. to cal Dutcl deper possil do no exped payer

Th

oppo

will 1

the C 161 A. greate than Down into v mino 176 A.

from railwa believ

pressi make lifted

the I

CLOSER UNION WITH THE COLONIES.

new the stice of inst his second store of

Hence Kop.

ith ap-

the ninemaker of fe as the ured his scaffold

He had

of Mr.

e which

e which

sure of make e war.

refused nanciers

s which

ked for rce the eir sus-, there ism as versies down perial False"

l false andise-

se and

ing in at the e have round

have urces.

car.

s :--

The question of the closer union with the Colonies brought about by this war is also discussed :-

559. Q. Then what will be the effect of introducing a larger colonial element into the administration of the empire?

A. To give the death-blow to Toryism by introducing into the councils of the empire a spirit that if as absolutely alien and hostile to privilege, hereditary legislation and sectarian ascendancy as the spirit of any American Republic, 560. O. Would the admission of the Colonies to a share in the direction of the policy of the Empire have its dangers?

A. Undoubtedly; because while the Colonies are very willing to call the tune, they have as yet, with the exception of the Cape Dutch, shown no great disposition to pay the piper. Finance depends upon policy, and it would be a dangerous, not to say impossible position, to allow representatives from the Colonies who do not contribute directly to imperial taxation to order wars or expeditions the whole cost of which would fall upon the taxpayers of these two islands.

THE LOYALTY OF THE CAPE DUTCH.

The curious advocates of Imperial union, who lose no opportunity of vilifying our fellow Colonists at the Cape, will not relish the tribute that is paid in the Catechism to the Cape Dutch :-

161. O. What evidence is there of their loyalty?

A. Before the war and during the war they showed a far greater devotion and obedience to the Imperial Government than any Canadian or Australian majority would display if any Downing Street representative dared to try to plunge their Colony into war with kindred states at the bidding of an Opposition 176. Q. What did the Cape Dutch do during the war?

A. They had done their best to avert the war, but they shrank from using their constitutional right to forbid the use of their railways and their territory for prosecuting a war which they believed to be unnecessary and unjust. They brought what pressure they could upon President Kruger to induce him to make concessions for peace; but when the war broke out they lifted no hand to help the Boers except in those districts where the British Government failing to protect them left them no option but to seek the protection of the Government in possession. Despite the enormous strain upon them, the Cape Dutch outside the invaded districts stood firm in their refusal to rise against the Empire.

THE ALTERNATIVE TO ANNEXATION.

The Catechism is, of course, in accord with Mr. Balfour in believing that the war being unjust and criminal, the stolen goods should be given up. I ask :-

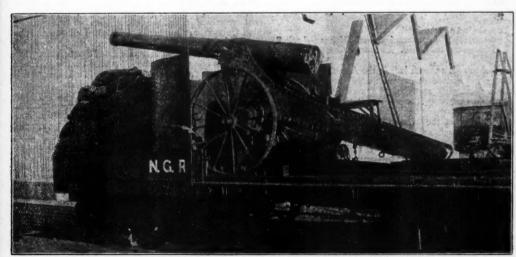

676. Q. What is the alternative to annexation?

A. The re-establishment of the Independence of the Re-publics under conditions which the Boers would loyally accept. 677. Q. What are these conditions?

A. If the Republics with their local flags were recognised as independent States, within a general South African Federation under the Union Jack, an arrangement might be arrived at on a federal basis, by which all the South African States agreed; (1) to disarm; (2) to leave their foreign relations in the hands of the Imperial Government; (3) to adopt a common policy as to the period of residence necessary for naturalization; (4) to allow the two languages to be used equally in legislature and administra-tion, and (5) to constitute a South African Supreme Court to which all differences between the different States should be referred for judicial decision.

Incorporation by consent, with right to retain their flags under the protection of the Union Jack from outside attack, is as wide as the poles apart from the annexation which is declared to be as "inevitable" as the war. The Catechism closes with an apposite quotation from Mr. Chamberlain's declaration in 1881:

As soon as it became manifest that to conciliate the Boers, any offer short of absolute independence was impossible, that the restoration of their independence was absolutely called for, with regard to our treaty engagements and the honour of our country to have continued to maintain the annexation would be an act which he could only describe in terms which had been applied by a high authority to a different subject, as an act of fraud, force, and folly. For his part he was not afraid or ashamed to appeal to the English people, to approve of their action in preferring justice to revenge, and in restoring to a brave people the independence of which they should not have been deprived.

A "Long Tom" as it was used after the occupation of Pretoria. This accounts to some extent for the rapidity with which the Boars moved their guns. The truck, it will be seen, was used originally on the Natal Government Railway.

Some Notable Books of the Month.

STORIES AND SKETCHES.

By MARK TWAIN.

MR. CLEMENS' collection of short stories and sketches published under the title of "The Man Who Corrupted Hadleybury" (Chatto and Windus. 6s.), covers a wide range of subjects, both grave and gay. Some of the sketches are purely humorous, but even these have a more serious purpose underlying them than merely to raise a laugh. Others are biographical; others again are contributions on topics of current interest. Several deal with Austrian affairs, and a large proportion of them were written in the Austrian capital. Mr. Clemens in many of these sketches does not simply make his readers laugh; he does more-he makes them think. Mark Twain's humour can be merciless, as in his examination of "Christian Science and the Book of Mrs. Eddy." It is a brilliant study. I make one quotation from it.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE AND THE CAT.

On the way to Vienna, Mark Twain relates, he fell over a cliff and broke "some arms, legs and one thing or another." In this broken and painful condition he is taken in hand by a Christian Scientist, who begins her cure by the following discourse :-

"One does not feel," she explained; "there is no such thing as feeling; therefore to speak of a non-existent thing as existent is a contradiction. Matter has no existence; nothing exists but mind; and mind cannot feel pain, it can only imagine it."

"But if it hurts just the same—"
"It doesn't. A thing which is unreal cannot exercise the nctions of reality. Pain is unreal; hence pain cannot functions of reality.

Just at that point the Stubenmadchen trod on the cat's tail, and the cat let fly a frenzy of cat-profanity. I asked with caution:

"Is a cat's opinion about pain valuable?"

"A cat has no opinion; opinions proceed from the mind only; the lower animals being externally perishable, have not been granted mind; without mind opinion is impossible."

"She merely imagined she felt a pain—the cat?"

"She cannot imagine a pain, for imagination is an effect of mind; without mind there is no imagination. A cat has no imagination,"

Then she had a real pain?"

"I have already told you there is no such thing as real pain." "It is strange and interesting. I wonder what was the matter

Another amusing sketch is "At the Appetite Cure." It is a plea for limited starvation as the best means of curing a debilitated appetite. "Travelling with a Reformer" is an amusing illustration of the vast possibilities of ingenious diplomacy backed up by a little judicious lying. The tale of the Man who Corrupted Hadleybury is instructive as well as amusing. It shows the power of gold to deprive a community which prides itself on its honesty.

HAM AND LEMONADE DIPLOMACY.

Mark Twain's ridicule is a keen weapon which unerringly finds out the weak places in human nature. It is a great deal more effective than many a solemn sermon. Laughter never bores; sermons sometimes do. The paper entitled "Diplomatic Pay and Clothes" is an excellent example of the use Mark Twain can make of humour to support his serious opinions. He believes that the representatives of the United States abroad should be paid an adequate salary and allowed to wear suitable clothes. After remarking that the representatives of the United States, owing to their being unprovided with house rent, have been accustomed to live in garrets and sometimes on the roof, he goes on to say that they do their best to return the hospitality they sio des vie

Ho

is lite spe

an

Re

ine

H

up

Be

th

nı

in

in

m

th

n

de

In return for champagne they furnished lemonade; in return for game they furnished ham; in return for whale they furnished sardines; in return for liquors they furnished condensed milk; in return for the battalion of liveried and powdered flunkeys they furnished the hired girl; in return for the fairy wilderness of sumptuous decorations they draped the stove with the American flag; in return for the orchestra they furnished zither and ballads by the family; in return for the ball-they didn't return the ball, except in cases where the United States lived on the roof and had room.

Mr. Clemens can be serious, as, for instance, when he discusses the problem of the Jews, and in his graphic description of the uproarous scenes in the Austrian Parliament. His account of his military campaign is the tale of one who had just a taste of war and then stepped out of the ranks permanently. "I know more about retreating," he says, "than the man who invented retreating." This latest book is a tribute to Mr. Clemens' many-sidedness and versatility.

COURTSHIP AFTER MARRIAGE.

IN "Charming Renée" (Hutchinson, 6s.) Arabella Kenealy has added novelty to an old theme by making the sorrows and joys of courtship and conquest succeed instead of precede the marriage ceremony. By this device it is charming Renée who gradually woos and wins the affections of her husband. The marriage was, however, only one in name and does not become reality until the closing pages of the book. Renée is a young girl who steps from a finishing school at Dresden into the opening chapter of the novel. Her only flaw is her perfect beauty, which is altogether out of keeping with the little suburban village in the environs of London where her widowed mother lives. She not unnaturally meets with a cold reception from the other girls of the village. Mrs. Quinton, her mother, a well-drawn character, is in despair as to her daughter's future. Renée, however, settles that question by marrying Lord Stratheldon. The marriage is one of sympathetic impulse on her part, and avowedly one of convenience on his. He tells the girl that he marries her for a purpose of his own, and on conditions. The most important stipulation is that the marriage shall merely be one in name, for the estate is to descend to his brother's son. Lord Stratheldon is a moody, eccentric man, lame of one foot, and the reputed murderer of his younger brother. The report is false, but has had a profound effect on his mind and spirits. He has vowed never to marry. He has been and is madly in love with his brother's wife, a society lady belonging to the "smart" set. Lord Stratheldon marries Renée in order to place a barrier between himself and his sister-in-law. Renée quickly discovers the truth. The struggle between the innocent schoolgirl and the woman of the world for the affections of the man they both love is very cleverly told. Renée triumphs. At first she gains her husband's mental respect and affection. It is not till the final chapter that her physical beauty rescues him from suicide and makes him hers.

TH.

epresentaig unproto live in on to say ality they in return furnished sed milk; I flunkeys wilderness with the hed zither tey didn't s lived on when he graphic Austrian paign is nd then I know han who ibute to rabella making succeed By this nd wins s, howirl who pening beauty, burban dowed ith a rillage. , is in wever, The rl that condimaris to is a puted false.

pirits. nd is lady arries

and ruth.

l the

they tion.

auty

At

WITH THE BOER FORCES.

A NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENT'S IMPRESSIONS.

We have already had scores of histories and impressions of the war as seen from the British side. Mr. Howard C. Hillegas is the first writer to give us a detailed description of the long campaign from the Boer point of view. His book "With the Boer Forces" (Methuen, 6s.) is a most interesting and valuable contribution to the literature of the war. Mr. Hillegas acted as war correspondent of the New York World with the Boer Army, and had every opportunity of following the fighting both in Natal and in the later battles in the territory of the Republics. His sympathies are altogether on the side of the burghers, but they are not so strong, he says, as to induce him to tell untruths in order to whiten the Boer character. Mr. Hillegas is indeed studiously impartial. He has confined himself to describing what he saw with his own eyes, and has carefully refrained from entering upon any discussion as to the politics of the war.

DR. JIM AS PATRON SAINT.

The most interesting chapters in the book are those which describe the composition and organisation of the Boer forces. As to their numbers Mr. Hillegas confesses that it was extremely difficult to obtain any accurate estimate. No record was kept by the authorities of the number of men in the commandoes. The foreign correspondents made strenuous efforts to secure accurate information upon this point. As a result of those inquiries Mr. Hillegas believes that the Boers never had more than 30,000 men in the field at one time, and that the average number was considerably under 25,000. The numbers fluctuated from time to time as the farmers deserted or returned to the laagers. No such fighting force has ever been seen before, nor probably will ever be seen again. It consisted actually of the entire male population of the two Republics. No condition or position was sufficient excuse to remain behind. University students, backwoodsmen, millionaires and farmers fought shoulder to shoulder. All were on a common footing. These men had no battle cry of revenge. Even the name of Jameson appears to have raised no bitter feeling. His name, says Mr. Hillegas, was frequently heard, but always in a manner which would have led one unacquainted with recent Transvaal history to believe that he was the patron saint of the Republic. The cry of "Remember Jameson" was not caused by the memory of the wrongs which he had committed, but was rather a plea to honour him for having placed the Republic on its guard against the dangers which threatened it from beyond its borders. The Boers had not only provided themselves with weapons of precision, but had at their service far superior maps to those supplied by our Government to its generals in the field. These maps had been prepared two years before the outbreak of the war by experts employed by the Transvaal Government.

A REPUBLICAN ARMY.

The Boer army, according to Mr. Hillegas's account, was one of the most remarkable fighting machines that has ever existed. How it ever accomplished anything is a mystery. There was no discipline, punishments could not be enforced, and obedience to orders was a purely voluntary matter. Burghers, it is true, could be compelled to go to the front, but no power on earth could compel them to fight if they did not choose to do so. It was a republican army, composed of republicans, and run on republican principles. All officers were elected by public vote, but beyond their personal influence they had no real authority. There were hundreds of men in the Natal laagers, says Mr. Hillegas, who never engaged in one battle, and never fired one shot in the first six months of the war. On all disputed questions the majority vote decided. A council of war, or krijgsraad, settled the plan of campaign and all other military questions. It was composed of every officer from corporal to commander-in-chief, and the corporal's vote had the same value as a general's:—

When there happened to be a deadlock in the balloting at a krijgsraad, it was more than once the case that the vote of the commandant-general counted for less than the voice of a burgher. In one of the minor krijgsraads in Natal there was a tie in the voting, which was ended when an old burgher called his corporal aside and influenced him to change his vote.

RELIGION WAS THEIR DISCIPLINE.

The decision of the Krijgsraad, however, was not binding. It could be, and frequently was, disregarded by individual commanders. In any case the officers could only call for volunteers to carry out the project resolved upon. They could not order their men to fight. If the burghers did not approve they did not volunteer. Mr. Hillegas mentions one instance. Several days after the Spion Kop battle, General Botha called for four hundred volunteers to assist in resisting an attack that it was feared would be made. There were almost 10,000 men in the environs of Ladysmith at that time, but it was with the utmost difficulty that the 400 men could be gathered. In Natal during the early part of the campaign the real fighting spirit was absent. It was not till after the capture of Cronje that the burghers polished up their rifles and fought with a will. What was it that kept this mass of undisciplined men together and made them so formidable? Mr. Hillegas replies that it was the deeply religious feeling which pervaded the whole of the commandoes. That, he believes, was the secret of their success : -

It was as much his religion as his ability to aim unerringly that made the Boer a good soldier. If the Boer army had been composed of an irreligious, undisciplined body of men instead of the psalming farmers, it would have been conquered by itself.

THE FOREIGN AUXILIARIES.

There has been a great deal of speculation as to the number of foreigners who served in the Boer ranks. On this subject Mr. Hillegas has some interesting things to say. He is of opinion that, including the 6,000 Afrikanders from the Cape Colony and Natal, the foreign allies of the Boers did not number more than 8,675. These recruits came from all over the world. Some were professional soldiers, others were attracted by the prospect of loot, but the greater number came to fight for a cause they believed to be just. France contributed 400, Holland 650, Russia 225, Germany 550, America 300, Italy 200, and Ireland 200. They arrived at the rate of about 400 a month. The Transvaal Government paid them no wages. It supplied them with a horse and equipment, and the foreigners received better food than the burghers. The Boers were glad to receive their aid, but firmly insisted that they should serve in the ranks. Many who had come out expecting to obtain commands were grievously disappointed. On the whole, the foreigners, except the professional soldiers, appear to have been of little real service to the Boers. The French rendered the most valuable service, for they were allowed the freest hand. The Hollander corps was practically annihilated at Elandslaagte, and the German organisation came to grief early in the war.

The religion of the Boers was their discipline.

THE DESOLATION OF CIVILISATION.

By Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, in his latest book. entitled "Thirteen Stories" (Heinemann, 6s.) has, after due hesitation, ventured—quoting his own phrase—to strip his soul stark naked to the public gaze. The stories for the most part deal with incidents connected with Mr. Graham's travels in early life before his soul was vexed with the meaning of man and his destiny. They are the ghosts which haunt his memory, for both people and scenes have long ago vanished from the face of the planet. The countries, he laments, are now-a-days "full of barbed-wire fences, advertisements and desolation," and the people also have disappeared, "being born unfit for progress." Their place has been filled by "worthy men who cheat to better purpose and more scientifically." In those early days Mr. Graham lived much on the confines of civilisation, in South America and in Africa. At that time he simply lived, he did not moralise. But years brought reflection, and reflection, as Mr. Graham says, has dressed the world in drab. So it happens that these thirteen stories express both the young man's joy in living and the more mature reflection that life is but vanity and vexation of spirit. Graham's recollections are liberally spiced with the meditations of his later years. He moralises in epigrams, and from his pages many a stinging phrase may be culled in which he mocks at "the desolation born of imperfect progress." Mr. Graham's sympathies are always with the failures, or what the world considers to be the failures. He abhors with his whole soul the people who have never tried to do anything at all but live, and having done that with considerable success, look upon failure as a sort of minor crime, to be atoned for by humility. Sin in its elementary state Mr. Graham can tolerate. Indeed, it has a certain attraction for him. But when it has been systematised and draped with the garment of cant it arouses his bitterest indignation. For modern civilisation he has no good word. It is rapidly hurrying us to destruction. Commerce is corrupting mankind, killing off the primitive races and destroying all the nobler virtues. It is reducing all men to the lowest common multiple. He defines it as "that vivifying force, that bond of union between all the basest instincts of the basest of mankind, that touch of lower human nature which makes all the lowest natures of mankind akin." Commerce, Imperialism, "the Nonconformist snuffle," and the sweating system, have between them completely changed the English nature-and not for the better. At home things are bad enough, but Mr. Graham's indignation grows most bitter when he contemplates the white man among his black and yellow brethren.

It needs nothing but the presence of the conquering white man, decked in his shoddy clothes, armed with his gas-pipe gun, his Bible in his hand, schemes of benevolence deep rooted in his heart, his merchandise (that is, his whisky, gin and cotton cloths) securely stored in his corrugated iron-roofed sheds, and he himself active and persevering as a beaver or red ant, to bring about a sickness which exterminates the people whom he came to benefit, to bless, to rescue from their savagery, and to make them wise, just, beautiful, and as apt to differentiate evil from good as even he himself. So it would seem, act as we like, our presence is a curse to all these people who have preserved the primeval instincts of our race. Curious, and yet apparently inevitable that our customs seem designed to carry death to all the so-called inferior races whom at a bound we force to bridge a period which it has taken us a thousand years to pass.

In destroying them, Mr. Graham mockingly remarks on another page, "we have proved ourselves wiser than the Creator, who wasted so much time creating beings whom we judged unfit to live, and then in mercy to ourselves and Him, destroyed, so that no evidence of His miscalculated plan should last to shame Him when He thought of His mistake." These are not the stories but their morals. The aim and object of each and all is to demonstrate the futility of life, and to illustrate the working out in human life of "the inexorable fate which mocks mankind, making all effort useless, whilst still urging us to strive." Not a very cheeful gospel certainly, nor one which will inspire man to better things. Yet Mr. Graham finds much solace in its propagation.

J. M. BARRIE AND HIS BOOKS.

ADMIRERS of the author of "The Little Minister" will find ample material to satisfy their curiosity as to the career of Mr. J. M. Barrie in the book which Mr. J. A. Hammerton has compiled with painstaking diligence. Mr. Hammerton has allowed Mr. Barrie largely to tell his own story. He has carefully collected those passages in Mr. Barrie's books and elsewhere which are of auto-biographical interest. There is, therefore, little that is new in the book, and readers of Mr. Barrie's stories and writings will recognise most of the passages. Mr. Hammerton has arranged them in chronological order and linked them together when necessary, so as to make a continuous narrative. He has brought to his task a great, although not a blind, admiration of Mr. Barrie, and does not hesitate to point out a small flaw in his hero now and again. Mr. Barrie's life has not been very eventful. Failure after all is more interesting than success, and Mr. Barrie has been uniformly successful. His college days in Edinburgh did not differ greatly from those of hundreds of his fellow-students. When his college course was finished, he became in 1883 a leader writer on the Nottingham Journal at a salary of three guineas a week. He obtained the situation through an advertisement which his sister had discovered in some newspaper. Mr. Barrie wrote on a wide range of subjects, and Mr. Hammerton, who has carefully gone through the files, reproduces a few of his early notes. The St. James's Gazette introduced him to London journalism, and for several years Mr. Barrie was a frequent contributor to that journal when it was under the editorship of Mr. Frederick Greenwood. Mr. Hammerton says that in the old files of the paper there is hidden away sufficient material from the pen of Mr. Barrie to make two or three volumes. Mr. Barrie, however, has wisely refused to rescue it from obscurity. In a few years Mr. Barrie had abandoned journalism for literature. His first book appeared in print in 1887, and was quickly followed by others, which made his reputation and his fortune. Mr. Hammerton has included several chapters dealing with various characteristics of Barrie and his books. There is also a useful bibliography appended. This latest contribution to the not very extensive Barriana bears the title of "J. M. Barrie and His Books," and is published by Horace Marshall and Son.

THE Centenary of the Rifle Brigade held last August leads Lieut.-Col. Verner to trace its history in Macmillan's through "A Century of Fighting." One hundred years ago only one regiment was wholly armed with the rifle, the rest of the army being provided with the "Brown Bess" musket.

TH
public widely been and v numb testify which Testa
Scrip

TH

your teach
"I us tiona An in this for go An . . . I ment

upon

New

of re

On

grea and stud com M men and All: T be lette boo

Hel

Tes

of n
In guide be necof ' thin Englibe
and
to ord vou
wit

with fear original the second

wit

the

the

ari

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT.

VOL. II.—THE PAULINE LETTERS.

THE first part of the above work has been before the public for the last two years. It has been warmly and widely appreciated, and more than 20,000 copies have been sold. The "Company" who have done the work and who hold the copyright, have received a very large number of letters from all parts of the world, almost all testifying to the great value of the work and to the help which ordinary readers as well as students of the New Testament have found in this attempt, which gives the Scriptures to the people in the language of the people.

One headmaster of a grammar school writes: "I hope your work will meet with the success it deserves. For teaching purposes it is invaluable." A minister says: "I use it regularly in my services, and find it of exceptional value.

eings

cy to ce of when tories

all is vhich still inly.

Yet

will

the nce.

tell ages uto-

it is

and

Mr.

rder

ake

k a rie,

law

has termly

ffer

nts.

883 ary

ion

lisa

as his

to rie

as od.

he

m ee

to ad

ok

Dy.

th

is le

Another writes: "I feel sure that the New Testament in this form cannot fail to make an increasing impression for good, and I hope soon to see the second part."

An American doctor says: "The work was necessary.... It is done with the best of taste, showing that refinement as well as scholarship has been brought to bear upon the translation. To read this Twentieth Century New Testament must be a revelation, or, rather, a series of revelations, to the unlearned."

An English clergyman writes: "I am reading with great interest your translation of the New Testament, and I shall endeavour to make it known to intelligent students of God's Word as a most valuable help and commentary.7

Many suggestions have, we understand, reached the members of the company, and it is hoped that in a new and complete edition many of these will be embodied. All are carefully considered and recorded for future use.

The second part is now in the printer's hands, and will be published in about a fortnight. It consists of the letters of St. Paul to the churches. The remaining books, viz., the so-called pastoral letters, together with Hebrews and the "Revelations," are in an advanced stage, and it is hoped that the whole of the New Testament will be ready for publication before the end of next year.

In the second part the same principles as have guided the revisers in the "Historical" portion will be adopted, but as the preface explains, it has been necessary to employ in many places somewhat more of "paraphrase." It is manifestly not quite the same thing to translate the language of "letters" into modern English, as that of simple narratives. A little more liberty has to be taken in the rearrangement of sentences and the rendering of peculiar words and phrases, so as to make the meaning of the writer intelligible to the ordinary reader. The translation as literal as is compatible with that object. Though critics may not always agree with the interpretation of certain passages, the revisers fearlessly appeal to those who are familiar with the original tongues to explain, if not always to justify to the critic's mind, the language used.

The fact that the translators belong to all sections of the Christian Church may be taken as a guarantee that no sectarian prejudices have been allowed to influence their work. Ordinary readers will find, as many have found with respect to the first part, that the greater part of these apostolic documents is perfectly intelligible without the use of commentaries, although, of course, commentaries have to be consulted when controversial points need to be considered. It is hoped that Sunday school teachers, and "lay" or "local" preachers especially, will find much help in studying this translation.

The translators have added a brief statement to each letter, giving the latest opinions as to the date and place of writing, and have also divided the text into a few general divisions under general heads.

THE PASSION PLAY AT OBERAMMERGAU.

THIS year numerous books have appeared which take the Passion Play in some form or another as a text. There are guide, text and descriptive books in almost every language. None, however, can compare either as a descriptive study or as a gift-book with "Oberammergau and its Passion Play," by Hermine Diemer (Carl Aug. Siegfried and Co., Munich). It is a retrospect of the history of Oberammergau and its Passion Play, together with a full description of the country and the manners and the customs of the people. It is profusely illustrated and very well got up. A mere list of the chapters contained in its 252 pages gives a fair idea of the contents. These are: A Modern Pilgrimage, The Village of the Passion Play and its Environs, History of the Village of Oberammergau, The Evolution of the Passion Play and Text, Three Heroes of the Passion Play, The Music of the Play, Actors of the Pass, Veterans of the Play, Oberammergau of To-day, "The Passion," Pictures of the Passion Play. The illustrations embrace everything and everybody of interest connected with the village and the play. One of its features is the photos of the players and scenes of this year. It would be hard to find a more suitable gift-book for those who are interested in this wonderful little village and its decennial Passion Play. The book will be supplied from this office on the receipt of 10s. Its size is demy 4to. (12 in. by 9 in.).

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY.

AN ILLUSTRATED BIOGRAPHY.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have published at the low price of 6s. a copiously illustrated, handsomely got-up biography of Lord Rosebery. It contains 175 pages, with no fewer than 75 illustrations. Jane T. Stoddart, the writer, has done her work with affectionate appreciation of her subject. She has illustrated her narrative with a multitude of excellent portraits, the last of which is particularly good. She does not aspire to be an authority upon politics, but her faith is apparently limited to a wholesale devotion to Lord Rosebery, and everything he says and does. She compares him to Waring, and declares that "already politicians of all shades are summoning our Waring back from his gulf of Triest." The following quotation is not inapt:—

"Contrive, contrive
To rouse us, Waring! Who's alive?
Our men scarce seem in earnest now.
Distinguished names? But 'tis somehow
As if they played at being names
Still more distinguished, like the games
Of children. Turn our sport to earnest,
With a visage of the sternest!
Bring the real times back, confessed Still better than our very best."

It is to be feared that Lord Rosebery will regard this as a somewhat bitter sarcasm. It is, however, quite unconscious on Miss Stoddart's part.

The only defect in this volume, from the point of view of the publisher and editor, is that there is no index. To publish such a book without an index is a sin.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | -          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------|
| BIOGRAPHY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |            | MISCELLANEOUS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |              |
| Hammerton, J. A. J. M. Barrie and His Books. 264 pp(Marshall and Son)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |            | Holt, Robt. B. In the Good Time Coming. cr. 8vo. 92 pp. (Sands)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 7/6          |
| (Marshall and Son) Hawkins, W. and E. T. Smith. Alfred the Great. cr. 8vo. 142 pp. (H. Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |            | Stainer, J. Hymn Tunes. l. cr. 8vo. 238 pp (Novello)Stodart-Walker, Archibald. The Struggle for Success. l. cr. 8vo. 308 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                      |              |
| Perkins, James B. Richelieu. cr. 8vo. 360 pp(Putnam's) Stockham, Alice B., M.D. Tolstoi. cr. 8vo. 140 pp. (Stockham, Chicago)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |            | (Richards) Thorogood, Stanley. The Manipulation of the Brush(Philip) net.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |              |
| Stoddart, Iane T. The Earl of Rosebery, Illustrated, cr. 4to.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |            | NEW EDITIONS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |              |
| 174 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |            | Buchanan, R. Father Anthony. Demy 8vo. 126 pp (J. Long)Christison, J. Sanderson. Brain in Relation to Mind. cr. 8vo. 142 pp.(Meng, Chicago)                                                                                                                                                                                   | 0/6          |
| ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 0,0        | Dickens, Charles. David Copperfield. (New Century Library) cap. 8vo. 920 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 2/0          |
| Haeckel, Ernst. The Riddle of the Universe; translated by Joseph                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |            | Macrae, David. Little Tiz, etc. 152 pp. Paper covers(Morrison Bros.)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 0/6          |
| McCabe. 398 pp. l. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |            | Macrae, D. George Gilfillan. 157 pp. Paper covers. (Morrison Bros.)  Thackeray, Wm. M. The Paris Sketch Book, The Irish Sketch Book,                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 0/6          |
| (Partridge) Lummis, Edward. The Speaker's Chair. 160 pp. cr. 8vo. (Unwin) Mitford, A. B. Freeman, C.B. The Attaché at Peking. 386 pp. cr. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |            | and From Cornhill to Cairo. (New Century Library, Vol. v.) cap. 8vo. 836 pp. (Nelson) net                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 2/0          |
| (Macmillan)Smada, Auguste. Rus Divinum, A Poem. 66 pp. cr. 8vo. (Unwin)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |            | REFERENCE BOOKS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |              |
| Line South Control of the Control of | 3/0        | Bailey's Annual Index of the Times. Roy. 8vo. 864 pp(Eyre and Spottiswoode)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
| FICTION.  Ackworth, John The Minder. 342 pp. l. cr. 8vo(H. Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 6/0        | Brown, G. E. Developers and Development. cr. 8vo. 132 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |              |
| Aitken, G. Adventures of Barnes the Book Canvasser, cr. 8vo. 82 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |            | med. 8vo. 366 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |              |
| Besant, Walter. The Fourth Generation. 346 pp. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |            | Official Handbook of the Presbyterian Church of England, 1900-1901.  1. cr. 8vo. 141 pp. 4. (Presbyterian Church of England)                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 0/6          |
| Braddon, M. E. The Infidel. 342 pp. cr. 8vo(Simpkin)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |            | Scott, Dunkinfield H. Studies in Fossil Botany. 151 illustrations. l, cr. 8vo. 534 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 7/6          |
| Brereton, J. Le Gay. Landlopers. cr. 8vo. 178 pp(Unwin)Buchan, John. The Half-Hearted, 376 pp. l. cr. 8vo(Isbister)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 3/66/o | RELIGIOUS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | OF.          |
| Crane, Stephen. Wounds in the Rain. 347 pp. cr. 8vo (Methuen)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |            | Gough, Fd. The Bible, True from the Beginning (Vol. VII.). med.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
| Davidson, Lillias C. For Lack of Love. 260 pp. l. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 3/6        | 8vo. 662 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |              |
| Dix, Gertrude. The Image Breakers. 284 pp. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 6/0        | Kheiralla, I. G., assisted by Howard MacNutt. Beha 'U'Llah. dy. 8vo. 298 pp (Kheiralla, Chicago)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 2/0          |
| (Thompson) Gerard, Morice, The Grip of the Wolf. 284 pp. l. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 3/6        | Little, Chas, Jos. Christianity and the Nineteenth Century, dv. 8vo.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 2/0          |
| (H. Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 3/6        | 96 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 6/0          |
| Graham, R. B. Cunninghame. Thirteen Stories. 8vo. 243 pp(Heinemann)Hocking, Silas K. To Pay the Price, 418 pp. l. cr. 8vo(Warne)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 6/0        | Two Version Holy Bible. Authorised Version with the differences of                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 3/6          |
| Hughes, E. A Twofold Silence. 316 pp. cr. 8vo (Arrowsmith) Hughes, E. By an Unseen Hand. 304 pp. cr. 8vo (Arrowsmith)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 3/63/6 | the Revised Version printed in the margins. Brevier 8vo. 1384 pp. (University Press)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |              |
| Kenealy, Arabella. Charming Renée. 352 pp. cr. 8vo(Hutchinson)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 6/0        | WAR LITERATURE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
| Lindsay, Harry. Mab. 322 pp. l. cr. 8vo(H. Marshall)Lord, M. L. An Obstinate Parish. cr. 8vo. Paper covers. 284 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 3/6        | Chaplains in Khaki. Edited by H. K. cr. 8vo. 344 pp (Kelly) Farrelly, M. J. The Settlement after the War in South Africa.                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 2/6          |
| Lucas, E. V. and E. What Shall We Do Now? 390 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 2/6        | dy. 8vo. 322 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
| Montgomery, Florence. Prejudged. 8vo. 288 pp(Macmillan)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 6/0        | 126 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 6/0          |
| Moore, Chas. K. A Case of Blackmail. 312 pp. cr. 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 3/6        | and map. cr. 8vo. 318 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 2/6          |
| Panting, G. Harwood. The Vicar's Atonement. 320 pp. 1, cr. 8vo. (H. Marshall)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 3/6        | Kidd Dudley Echoor from the Battlefields of South Africa or 8vo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |              |
| Price, Eleanor C. The Heiress of the Forest. 382 pp. 1. cr. 8vo. (Isbister)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 6/0        | 192 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 2/6          |
| Rivers, Hallie E. A Furnace of Earth. 240 pp. cr. 8vo. (Richards)Russell, Fox. From a Bachelor Uncle's Diary. Fcap. 8vo. 187 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 3/6        | 224 pp. (R.T.S.) Thomas, C. H. Origin of the Anglo-Boer Revealed. cr. 8vo. 216 pp. (Hodder and Stoughton)                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 3/6          |
| Paper covers                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1/0        | CHRISTMAS BOOKS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |              |
| (Sampson Low) Stephens, Robert N. Philip Winwood. 412 pp. cr. 8vo (Chatto) Twain, Mark. The Man who Corrupted Hadleyburg; etc. 414 pp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 6/0        | We have received from Mr. Grant Richards: "New Fables for and Girls," by W. G. Forster, 1s.; "A Frog He Would A-wooing 1s., and "Who Killed Cock Robin?" 1s., both illustrated by J. A. Sherd; "Piccalilli," by Edith Farmiloe, 6s.; "A Trip to Toyland, Henry Mayer, 6s.; No. V. of the Dumpy Book; "The Bountiful Laby Thomas Cobb. | BoysGo," |
| Wilkins, Mary E. The Heart's Highway. l. cr. 8vo. 308 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 6/0        | rs., and "Who Killed Cock Robin?" is., both illustrated by J. A. Sherd; "Piccalilli," by Edith Farmilee, 6s.; "A Trip to Toyland, Henry Mayor 6s. No. V. of the Dumpy Rock; "The Bountiful La                                                                                                                                         | by           |
| Zola, Émile. The Conquest of Plassaus. Edited by E. A. Vizetelly.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 6/c        | From Ward, Lock and Co.: "Three Little Maids," by Ethe                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |              |
| 328 pp. cr. 8vo(Chatto and Windus)                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 3/6        | Turner, 3s. 6d.:  From the R.T.S.: "Gold in the Furnace," by M. H. Cornwall Legh pages, 3s. 6d.; "Tom Wallis," by Louis Becke, 320 pages, 5s.                                                                                                                                                                                         |              |
| HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | . 10       | pages, 3s. od.; "Iom wains," by Louis Becke, 320 pages, 5s.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |              |
| Gardner, E. G. Florence, cap. 8vo. 436 pp                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 6/0        | Amongst "Books Received" last month the price of "Making ofBritish Colonies" was given as 8s. 6d., it should have been 2s. 6d.                                                                                                                                                                                                    | f the        |

402

cor son Yo Yo

LI

of t imag way men of it for a ful ima up t lang which grea imp and of p ther of of this own was hon whe its whi this lett pur goo him of fore cou woi cus inte En ser wit sto En syn res frie ter

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

MRS. C. P. SCOTT, in the course of a splendid address High School for Girls this summer, said: "One of the powers most potent in enriching the mind is imagination. Imagination may be cultivated in various ways, but always by the same methods-by opening the mental eyes to fresh sides of life, or by presenting in some of its manifold forms that beauty which has a message for all of us; and though we may not live amidst beautiful scenery or with ideally noble people, an active imagination requires very little to start it on a distant voyage. . . . . Just as the study of wild flowers may open up to you a whole world of vegetation among which you lived before with closed eyes, so the knowledge of a language opens to you the life of the nation to which it belongs, for language is one of the greatest achievements of a nation and bears the impress of national character and genius in its structure and refinements. Imagination is not only a great source of personal enjoyment, it is also the salt of social life, for there can be no sympathy without it. Wide differences of character and taste exist, and it is the refusal to see this and to recognise the right of each to his or her own individuality that causes irritation." Mrs. Scott was referring in this last sentence to the social life of the home and its surroundings, but the dogma is just as true when extended to the life of nations. Each nation has its own individuality and a right to that individuality, whilst a fruitful source of wars is the refusal to recognise this. Meantime we will hope that each of our band of letter-writers will use the fairy gift of imagination to good purpose and give his foreign "neighbour" the credit for good intentions or the excuses which he claims for

Here is a story of trouble caused in part by this want of imagination. A young Englishman travelling in a foreign country stays at the house of a friend. The country in question is one where the honour of its women is jealously guarded and where, partly from old customs, partly from recent misfortunes, every inquiry into its defences is as jealously forbidden. Our young Englishman ignores all this; kisses his friend's maidservant, and walks about the walls of the fortifications with interested looks, making inquiries and occasionally stopping to pick up something. He would do this in England; why not abroad too? Results: the maid's father and the town authorities have an equal want of sympathetic imagination! The one walks about with a knife swearing to kill the man who has shown such disrespect to his daughter; the others clap him into prison, whence he is rescued with some trouble; the unfortunate friend who lives in the place has to pay the price; and in that country-place Englishman and pig are synonymous Who can wonder?

LETTERS WHICH REQUIRE ANSWERS.

Dear Mr. Stead,—I am desirous of obtaining a couple of correspondents somewhere in Her Majesty's dominions. I hope some one in Scotland will find time to write to a lonely, far-off woman, and perhaps a second British person will also respond.

Yours truly.

W. B.

TORONTO.

Dear Sir,—Do you ever receive letters asking for Canadian correspondents. I would like to hear from England especially, or any part of Great Britain. I am sure such correspondence, even when the writers cannot expect to meet in this world, might be possible if each were able to imagine a straight talk which would only need a look up to see the other, supposing both were interested in the world around and those living in other CHARLES.

Moscow, September 21st.

Dear Sir,—Having again commenced studies after the Summer Holidays, and seeing that my pupils have not lost interest in the Foreign Correspondence introduced here through your kind aid two years ago, I hope my new request will not be rejected. The number, of aspirants for individual correspondence is not small, but, should there be a difficulty in finding English lads for all, may I propose class "correspondence?" That is, a class or form of so many of our boys of about the same age undertake to correspond with a similar form in an English school. Letters would be discussed by the whole school and would certainly give the greatest interest both to pupils and their masters. Our 7th class boys are aged from sixteen to eighteen; our 8th class from eighteen to twenty. Correspondence in English, French or Russian upon literature, geography, commerce, history, customs, theatre, etc. (bar politics).—Yours sincerely, W. J. H.

ITALY. Sir,-I am very fond of English language, and for so it is a long I study it lovely. But wanting to take practice I was very happy to have your respectable address by Mr. Professor, with whom long ago I was his study-companion. Whatsoever efforts I may do I see imperious necessity to converse by letter-writing. Pray to send me some particulars. I hope to accept with pleasure this first letter of mine. I must say without failing the most difficult undertakings are surmounted by the English people. May I solicit the favour of your order for my admission. I am a postal officer. S. DE N.

THE REPORT OF THE GERMAN BUREAU.

I have but short space for quoting from a most interesting report by Professor Hartmann. As some of our readers know, this gentleman-who, like M. Mieille, is renowned in his profession, and therefore has but scant leisure-has devoted himself to the task of thoroughly organising the German branch of the correspondence. In his hands the correspondence is an instrument to be brought to the finest possible perfection. In this we have not as yet been able to follow his example. Until our schoolmasters can see their way to a more general use of this educational help we shall always be compelled to send the names of those willing, not of those most able to profit. The number of German scholars placed in correspondence with foreigners since March 1897 is 6,120, adults numbering about 521. The proportions are roughly seven-tenths French, two-tenths from North America, and one-tenth British. It is somewhat strange to find so small a percentage of British lads, for in truth from our Saxon forefathers we have received like modes of thought, traditions, and qualities. I again repeat my earnest invitation to those who are in correspondence with Germans-whether scholars or adults-to send me details of anything they have found especially interesting

I must remind teachers that the next French list will be sent out on November 1st, names sent over then ensure an answer before the busy time of the first weeks

The School World of this month (Macmillan and Co., Charing Cross) publishes a splendid testimony to the value of the scholars' correspondence-written by Neville Ross, of Dover College.

nds) 1/6

pp. ds) 6/o

net. 4/0

ng) o/6

pp.
go) ry)
net 2/o

os.) o/6 os.) o/6 ok, v.)

de)

net 1/o

net 24/0

or. od) o/6

et 7/6

ed. ul) 16/0

et 2/0

y) 2/o of

n) 6/o

) 2/6

et 10/0

1) 1/c

6/0

.) 2/6

1) 10/6

) 2/6

3/6

Boys Go," Shep-d," by ady,"

h, 324

of the

11) 3/6

ello)

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. Sept.

Early English Craft Guilds, Illustrated, Concluded, Rev. J. Malet Lambert.

Art Journal.-H. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. Oct.

Etching by R. W. Macbeth :- "A Lullaby." R. W. Macbeth. Illustrated, A. L. Baldry. L'Art Nouveau, Illustrated, Lewis F. Day. Fulham Palace. Illustrated, Miss Beatrice Creighton.

Of Jewels; an Appreciation of Imitations. Illustrated. Mrs. Bruce Clarke.

The Museum of Tapestries at Florence. Illustrated. Prof. A. Melani.

Monro S. Orr. Illustrated. Wm. Sharp The Practice of Lettering. Illustrated. Edw. F. Strange.

Artist .- 9, RED LION COURT. 15. Sept.

J. F. Maréchal and K. Doudlet, Belgian Artists. Illustrated. Pol de Mont.

Illustrated. Interiors and Furniture at the Paris Exhibition. W. Fred.

Subject in English Painting. R. de La Sizeranne. Rye, Illustrated. G. Forrester Scott.
Young Birds. By C. H. C. Baldwin, Illustrated Designs by Arthur Wilcock, Illustrated, J. S. R.

Atlantic Monthly.-Sept.

Art Education for Men. C. N. Flagg.

Century Magazine .- Oct.

American Miniature-Painting. Illustrated. Pauline King.

Contemporary Review .- Oct.

Ruskin; the Servant of Art. R. Warwick Bond.

"More than any Englishman, more than Walpole or Burke or Reynolds or Walter Pater, he succeeded in bringing art home to a nation of phlegmatic, temper and practical bias that had always been somewhat slow to receive the finer influence."

Cosmopolitan.-Sept.

Portrait-Painting, and Some Early English Painters. Illustrated. F. Fowler.

Francis Gilbert Attwood; the Work of a Great Cartoonist. With Portrait and Illustrations. L. McK. Garrison.

Critic.-Sept.

Coloured Pictures in American Periodicals. J. B. Carrington. The Four Klumpke Sisters. Illustrated. Bessie Van Vorst.

Miss Anna Klumpke, the artist, is known as the friend and heiress of Rosa Bonheur. Her first work was done in the Luxembourg, where she copied "Le Labourage Nivernais," by Rosa Bonheur. Later she was a student at the Julian School, where she won the medal for drawing at the end of eighteen months. Marie Bashkirtseff, her companion, was her rival in many competitions. In 1885, Anna Klumpke received an honourable mention, and in 1880, she exhibited a portrait of her mother, which attracted the notice of Rosa Bonheur. But it was not till about two years ago that the young artist wrote to Rosa Bonheur asking for permission to paint her portrait, and with the favourable answer was included an invitation to Miss Klumpke to visit the Château de By, Rosa Bonheur's honourable sauddan close, and now Miss Klumpke's days are devoted to fulfilling Rosa Bonheur's wishes with regard to her belongings. Her studies, which are first to be exhibited in Paris, London, New York, and elsewhere, will finally be sold. A catalogue of them, as a monument to her friend, is being prepared by Miss Klumpke. It will include a preface and reproductions of the finest of her works. the finest of her works.

Harper's Monthly Magazine.-Oct.

Mortimer Menpes; the Man and His Methods. Illustrated. Chalmers Roberts.

House,-"QUEEN" OFFICE. 6d. Oct.

The House at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. Royalties in Pottery; Willett Collection. Illustrated. Bric-à-The Pope and Fontainebleau. Illustrated. Connoisseur.

Irish Rosary.-Oct.

Fra Angelico. Illustrated.

Lady's Realm .- Oct. Léon Malempré. Illustrated. Lady Antrobus.

Leisure Hour.-Oct.

James Maris and His Brothers. Illustrated. Miss Eleonore d'Esterre-Keeling.

Ludgate.-Oct.

The Art of Solomon J. Solomon, Illustrated, W. C. Purcell.

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 1s. 4d. Oct.

Frontispiece: "Trees Old and Young, sprouting a Shady Boon for Simple Sheep." After Edward Stott.

Mr. Edward Stott, Painter of the Field and of the Twilight, Illustrated. Laurence Housman.

Ightham Mote; a Home of a Vanished World. Illustrated.

Rev. S. Baring-Gould. George E. Wade, Sculptor, Illustrated, A. L. Baldry. The British Royal Pavilion at the Paris Exhibition, Illus. trated.

The Painting of Panoramas, Illustrated, W. Telbin, Thomas Faed. Illustrated.

Recent Acquisitions at the British Museum and at the National Portrait Gallery. Illustrated.

"Portraits of two great writers have been added to the collection (in the National Portrait Gallery); one of James Henry Leigh Hunt, the work of Margaret Gillies, has been given by Canon Ainger; and the other, of Robert Browning, has been acquired from Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Gosse. The latter is a life-size drawing in black chalks, executed at Rome in 1859 by Field Taffourd, and is the companion drawing to the portrait of Mrs. Browning, which has been in the gallery for some time past."

Monthly Review .- Oct.

Art before Giotto. Illustrated. R. E. Fry.

Nineteenth Century .- Oct.

Five New Pictures in the National Gallery. M. H. Witt.

Panel, an early work by Fra Bartolommeo; fresco by Giovanni Bellini from the choir of the church of Magre, pear Schio, at Vicenza (painted in 1481), presented by Lady Layard; portrait of a man and his wife, exhibited at the Old Masters in 1879, as a work of Quentin Matsys; "The Lesson," by Vermeer of Delft; and "King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid," by Sir by Vermeer of Delit; and "King Cophettia and the Beggar Maid," by Sir Edward Burne-Jones.

"It is not easy to guess why the Tate Gallery should not have the benefit of this picture (by Burne-Jones), considering that Madox Brown, Holman Hunt and Rossetti have been transferred there; and, indeed, it looks most ill at ease hanging between Turner and Landseer, and forming a pendant to Millais's portrait of Gladstone."

Pearson's Magazine.-Oct.

The Art of the Age. Illustrated. Continued.

Studio .- 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 13. Sept.

The Work of Arnesby Brown. Illustrated.

Sketches of the Paris Exhibition. By Tony Grubhofer. Illustrated.

A Palace of Dress at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. F. Lees

Bench-Ends. Illustrated. J. H. Blamey. A Decorative Painting by Sir J. D. Linton. Illustrated. The National Competition, 1900. Illustrated. Esther Wood. Supplements after Mrs. F. Lees, F. F. Foottet, and others.

Sunday Magazine.-Oct.

J. Eadie Reid; an English Church Artist. Illustrated. F. J. Crowest. Temple Bar.-Oct.

Pope as a Painter. B. Solomon.

Temple Magazine.-Oct.

A Chapter on Angels. Illustrated. E. B. Triscott.

404

Ains

Fifty Y

Roman

Trusts

Cattler A. B.

Civilisi

The E

The Se

Puber. Social

The F Pleast

Social

What

The C Hawa

What si A Cru Quive Mode

Politi The

Natu The

Repr

Note

٨

The

AD

Is S Tha

Phi

Pri Pro

Am Ind

Che Ha Th

The Res Of The Res

A

A

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Ainslee's Magazine.-INTERNATIONAL NEWS Co. 10 cents. Sept. AIMSIGE S MRARZEIHE,—INTERNATIONAL NEWS CO. 10 cents. Sept. Fifty Years of the Golden State (California). Illustrated. A. I. Street. Romances of the Immigrant Depôt. Illustrated. J. G. Speed. Trusts in Europe. C. C. Adams. Cattlemen and Sheepmen. Illustrated. Capt. J. H. McClintock. A. B. Stickney; a Unique Railroad President. Illustrated. W. S. Harwood.

Civilising the Natives of Alaska. Illustrated. Dr. W. T. Harris.

American Journal of Sociology.—Luzac. 35 cents. Sept.
The Ethics of the Competitive Process. W. W. Willoughby.
The Scope of Sociology. Continued. A. W. Small.
Crime among the Negroes of Chicago. M. N. Work.
Puberal Hygiene in relation to Pedagogy and Sociology. Dr. A. Marro.
Social Control. Continued. E. A. Ross.
The Fourteenth Amendment and the Race Question. M. West.
Pleasure as Ethical Standard. E. C. Moore.
Sociology and the Epic. A. G. Keller.

Anglo-American Magazine.—6o, Wall Street, New York.

25 cents. Sept.

What the Russians want, W. Durban.
The Canadian Royalty in the Yukon. W. H. Lynch.
Hawaii First. With Map. Dr. E. S. Goodhue.
What shall be the Status of the Natives of Our Insular Territorial Possessions? Hon. E. A. Belcher.
A Cruise in Canadian Gulf Waters. T. C. Evans.
Quivera. E. E. Blackman.
Modern Fiction. Continued. E. Ridley.

Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.—P. S. King. 1 dol. Sept.

Politics and Administration. H. J. Ford.
The Law of the Valus of Money. C. A. Conant.
Natural Rights. A. Inglis Clark.
The Ethical and Political Principles of Expansion. T. Williams.
Representation in Western State Legislatures. G. H. Haynes.

Antiquary.-Elliot Stock. 6d. Oct. The Ordinances of the Guild of Barber-Surgeons of Norwich. C. Williams, Notes on Some Stone Finds at Killucan, Co. Westmeath. Illustrated. Rev. W. Falkiner.

King Alfred as Man of Letters, Continued. W. H. Draper.

The Noblest Guild of Freemasons. Illustrated.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. 1s. Sept.
The White Star Offices, Liverpool. Illustrated.
The Great Mosque of the Omeiyades, Damascus. Illustrated. Continued.

R. Phané Spiers.
The Life and Work of Robert Adam. Illustrated. Concluded. Robert

Percy Fitzgerald,
The Survival of Gothic Architecture in Cyprus, Illustrated, G. Jeffery,
A Domestic Museum, G. L. Apperson,

Arena.-GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. Sept. Arena.—Gav and Bird. 25 cents. Sept.

Is Socialism an Element of Bryanism? Albert Watkins.
The Eight-Hour Day by Legislation. Edwin Maxey.
China's Defensive Strength. Johannes Hrolf Wisby.
Philosophic Basis of Chinese Conservatism. Rev. A. Kingsley Glover.
Our Asiatic Missionary Enterprise. J. M. Scanland.
Prince Hamlet of Peking. Charles Johnston.
Problems of Government in the Philippines. Prof. Paul S. Reinsch.
American Interests in Africa. Day Allen Willey.
India's Famine and Its Cause. William Brough.
Great Britain and the Trust Problem. T. Scanlon.
Growth of National Feeling in Germany. Carina Campbell Eaglesfield.
The Study and Needs of Sociology. Wm. Henry Van Ornum.

Argosy.—George Allen. 1s. Sept.
L:ttefs from the North. Illustrated. Continued. Charles W. Wood.

Litte's from the North. Illustrated. Continued. Charles W. Wood. Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated: Rev. C. M. Blagden. Henry Lawson; Prose Author. With Portrait. A. Maquarie. The "God Save the Queen" Myths. J. Cuthbert Hadden.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. Sept. Atlantic Monthly,—GAY AND BIRD. 18. Sept. The American Boss. Francis C. Lowell.
Russia's Interest in China. Brooks Adams.
James Martineau. Charles C. Everett.
Oklahoma. Helsn Churchill Candee.
The Ancient Feud between Philosophy and Art. Paul Elmer More.
Gleanings from an Old Southern Newspaper. W. P. Trent.
Two Philippine Sketches. H. Phelps Whitmarsh.
Gerhart Hauptmann. Margarethe Müller.
The Child. James Champlin Fernald.
The Press and Foreign News. Rollo Ogden.
Recent Books on Japan. Jukichi Inouye.
Ober-Ammergau in 1900. Canon H. D. Rawnsley.

Badminton Magazine.-HEINEMANN. 18. Oct. Prince Alfred and Big Game; Extracts from the Sporting Diary of the late Lieut.-Col. E. Thomson. Illustrated. Some Village Cricket. Illustrated. W. B. Thomas.
More Continental Sportsmen. Illustrated. D. B. Varé.
The Kennet and the Lambourne; Two Famous Trout Streams. Illustrated. D. Stafford. On the Rough Allotments. Illustrated. H. K. Horsfield. Riding to Hounds, Illustrated. F. L. W. Wedge.

Bankers' Magazine.-WATERLOW. 18. 6d. Oct. Variations in the Rate charged by the Bank of Belgium from 1851 to 1857, and by the Bank of Holland from 1844-1895.

Is the Industrial Tide on the Turn? W. R. Lawson.

Blackwood's Magazine,-Blackwood. 28. 6d. Oct

Almond's Nek. Linesman. Prince Charles Edward. rrince Charles Edward.
A Month in Ireland. S. Gwynn.
The Ecclesiastical Situation in Scotland.
Musings without Method.
The Military Policy of the Country.
The Dissolution of Parliament.

Bookman.—(AMERICA.) DODD, MEAD AND Co., New YORK.

Plagiarism—Real and Apparent. B. Samuel.

John Oliver Hobbes and Miss Mary Cholmondeley. Illustrated. J. E.

Hodder-Williams.

The Chinese Theatre in New York. Illustrated. E. W. Townsend.

The Manuscript of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Illustrated. E. Limedorfer.

Canadian Magazine.—Ontario Publishing Co., Toronto. 25 cents. Sept.

Canada at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. W. R. Stewart. Government Ownership of Railways. R. L. Richardson.

A Walk to the North and South Poles. Illustrated. Dr. F. A. Cook. The Roberts Family. With Portraits. Prof. A. B. de Mille. McKinley and Bryan. With Portraits. Prof. S. J. McLean. The Past and Present in China. With Map. A. H. U. Colquhoun.

Captain .- GEORGE NEWNES. 6d. Oct. Tele-Photography, Illustrated. A. Williams. The Story of Printing, Illustrated. W. Dexter. Concerning Cyclometers. Illustrated. H. Perry. Aerial Ships. Illustrated. A. Forbes.

Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. 6d. Oct. Cassell's Magazine.—Cassell. 6d. Oct.
Rustic Spots in London Parks. Illustrated. M. Randal Roberts.
A Visit to a Gun Factory. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.
Wild Animals on Board Ship. Illustrated. W. B. Robertson.
Penny Patriotism. Illustrated. R. Machray.
Mlle. Emma Calvé, Singer and Artist. Illustrated. Constance Beerbohm.
The Great Railway Stations of London. Illustrated.
Bird Acrobats. Illustrated. P. Brooklyn.

Cassier's Magazine.—33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Sept. American Ore Dock Machinery. Illustrated. A. C. Johnston. Electricity in Large Cities. W. S. Barstow. Sugar Engineering in Cuba. Illustrated. E. Sherman Gould. The World's Coal. B. Taylor. The Sloop-of-War Wampanoag. Illustrated. Continued. B. F. Isherwood. Gas Engine Fuels, Types, and Uses. Illustrated. Prof. C. V. Kerr. Castings for Hydraulic Service. R. P. Cunningham. James McKechnie. With Portrait. Cassier's Magazine.-33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Sept.

Century Magazine,—MacMillan. 18, 4d. Oct.
China's Holy Land; a Visit to the Tomb of Confucius. Illustrated.
E. von Hesse-Wartegg.
Memories of a Musical Life. Illustrated. Concluded, William Mason.
The Chinese as Business Men. S. P. Reid.
Oliver Cromwell. Illustrated. Concluded. John Morley.
Chinese Education. Illustrated. R. Hitchcock.
East London Types. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.
Chinese Traits and Western Blunders. Bishop H. C. Potter.
Civic Helpfulness. T. Roosevelt.
A Plea for Fair Treatment of the Chinese. Wu Ting Fang. A Plea for Fair Treatment of the Chinese. Wu Ting Fang.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 8d. Oct. The Employments of Women. Mrs. Isabella Fyvie Mayo. Cape Viticulture.

Electricity for Domestic Purposes. A. T. Stewart.

Mysterious Music. G. G. Thomas.

Forestry for Beauty and Use.

XUM

Eleonore

Purcell.

y Boon

wilight.

strated.

Illus.

ational

work of ther, of Gosse. in 1859 of Mrs.

Bellini

nted in hitited

by Sir brown, leed, it ming a

Illus-

F.

od.

7. J

Chautauquan, Chautauqua Press, Cleveland, Ohio. 20 cents.

An American Consulate in China, Illustrated, Mary H. Krout,
A Bit of Japan in America. Illustrated, Vincent Van Marter Beede.
The Songs of Freedom, L. Mead,
Madame de Sévigné; a Society Belle in the Reign of Louis XIV. J. A. Harrison.

The Art of the American Indian. Illustrated. C. H. Bartlett.

Church Missionary Intelligencer,—Church Missionary Seciety-6d. Oct. The Committee of the Church Missionary Society; a Retrospect. R. N.

Cust, Work for the Famine-Stricken in India; Recent Letters.

Conservative Review .- NEALE Co., WASHINGTON, D.C. 50 cents.

Autobiography of Col. Richard Maicolm Johnston. Continued.

Vecnomic Consolidation and Monopoly. P. A. Robinson.

The Confederate Congress. John Goode.

J. M. Kell's Recollections of a Naval Life. Lieut. J. R. Eggleston. Imperialism. W. Baird.
Elements of Unity in the Homeric Poems. Continued. Dr. E. Farquhar.

Contemporary Review. - Columbus Co. 2s. 6d. Oct.

Contemporary Review.—Columbus Co. 23. 6d. Oct.
The South African Settlement. J. B. Robinson.
A Colonist's Views on Army Reform. Dr. John M. Creed.
Our Future Policy in China. Dr. John Ross.
The Secret Springs of Russian Policy. A Russian Publicist.
The New French Idealism. Count de Soissons.
Pioneering on the Beira Railway. L. Orman Cooper.
The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation. Rev. W. W. Peyton.
Interpolation in Memory. Prof. Marcus Hartog.
The Proconsulate of Milner. J. A. Hobson.
Tike True Aim of Preventive Medicine. Arthur Shadwell.
Count von Waldersee in 1870. Col. Lonsdale Hale.

Cornhill Magazine .- SMITH, ELDER. 18. Oct.

Some Military Lessons of the War. A. Conan Doyle,
The Imperial Manchu Family, E. H. Parker,
More Humours of Irish Life.
Fighting a Privateer. Henry Senior.
Thomas Edwards; an Early Romanticist. Miss Clara Thomson.
The Girlhood of Queen Louisa. Dr. A. W. Ward.
Dogs That Earn Their Living. C. J. Cornish.
The Swiss in the Wars of the Empire; a Tribute of Blood. By William Westall. The Poetry of Chaucer. Urbanus Sylvan.

Cosmopolitan .- International News Co. 6d. Sept.

The African Boer. Illustrated. Olive Schreiner. China and the Powers. Illustrated. J. B. Walker. What China really is. Illustrated. J. B. Dane. Buffalo and Her Pan-American Exposition. Illustrated. S The Human Eye and How to care for It. Dr. H. O. Reik S. G. Blythe.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK. 20 cents. Sept. Mr. Stoddard at Seventy-five. With Portrait. J. B. Gilder. Omar Khayyam as a Bore. Andrew Lang. Maeterlinck and Mystery. William Archer, Critical Review .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 18. 6d. Sept. Murhead's "Aristotle's Ethics." Prof. J. Iverneh.

Thomas's "Nativity and Modern Historical Research." Rev. G. Milligan.
The Amshaspends and the "Uncertainties." Prof. L. H. Mills.
Nicoll's "The Expositor's Greek Testament," Vol. II. Prof. V. Bartlet.

'Dial.—315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Sept. A Question of Literary Conscience.

Economic Journal.-MACMILLAN. 55. Sept. Our Trade Prosperity and the Outlook. Sir R, Giffen, Agricultural Services. P. Vinogradoff.
Some Economic Consequences of the South African War. L. L. Price.
The Incidences of Urban Rates. Continued. Prof. F. Y. Edgeworth.
State Regulation of Railways in the United States. Prof. S. J. McLean.
A Seventeenth Century Trade Union. G. Unwin.
The Regulation of Wages by Guilds and Town Authorities. B. L. The Regulation of Wages by Guilds and Town Authorities.
Hutchins.
Dust-Women. Miss Emily Hobhouse.
Famine Administration in a Bengal District in 1836-7. R. W. Carlyle.

Educational Review .- J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. Sept. A Synthesis of Herbart and Froebel, J. Welton.
Münsterberg on the New Education. J. Moery.
The Milwaukee School System. D. Moery.
Economics in Secondary Education, R. T. Ely.
Field Work in Teaching Sociology. Elsie W. Clews.
Reform of Secondary Education in Germany. Ludwig Viereck.

Educational Times .- 89, FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. Oct.

A London Truant School. C. S. B. The State Simplification of French Syntax; Text of the Ministerial Engineering Magazine .- 222, STRAND. 18. Sept. The Crisis in China; Its Meaning for an Engineering Constituency. J. Barrett.

The Fourth Era of the Leadville Mining District. Illustrated. Thomas Tonge.

Heavy Motor Vehicles for Road Service. Illustrated.
Commercial Requirements of Water-Power Governing.
E. F. Cassel.
Electric Mining Machinery in the British Collieries.
The Continuous Recording of Steam-Engine Performance. Illustrat W. Ripper.
Locomotive Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. C. Rous-Marten.

Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. H. Diemer.

Engineering Times .- P. S. King. 6d. Sept. Common Knowledge of China. With Map.
The Engineer; the Master Spirit of the Age. C. Baillairge, Carburetted Water Gas. Illustrated. C. E. Brackenbury.
Paris Exhibition, 1900. Illustrated. Continued.
The Century's Progress in Iron and Steel Manufacture. Sir W. Roberts-Austen. Austen. Stoking in Central Stations. Illustrated. J. F. Hobart, English Illustrated Magazine.-198, STRAND. 6d. Oct. English Illustrated Magazine,—198, Strand. 6d. Oct.

How the Navy is fed. Illustrated. F. Dolman.

A Lady's Experience as an Organ-Grinder. Illustrated. Frances Bourne.

The Langen Single Line Railway: the Most Remarkable Railway in the World. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot.

The Story of the Duel. Continued. R. Machray.

Fish out of Water. Illustrated. W. M. Webb.

The Chinese Conquest of Central Asia. Illustrated. D. C. Boulger.

The late King of Italy and His Consort. Illustrated, Mary Spencer
Warren.

Etude.-T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. Sept. Music in American Colleges.
Music in the Library of Congress. M. L. Mason.
The Cremonese Masters. Illustrated. G. Lehmann.

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 6d. Oct. The Judaean Ministry of Jesus. Rev. T. D. Bernard. A New View of Deuteronomy. Professor G. G. Cameron. Harnack on the Nature of Christianity. Rev. W. Morgan.

Feilden's Magazine,-Temple Chambers. 18, Sept. The Utilisation of Tidal and Wave Action for the Protection of Foreshores.

Illustrated. R. G. Allanson-Winn.
Fast Cruisers. Illustrated. C. E. Canning.
Pneumatic Tools and Appliances. Illustrated, E. C. Amos.
The Central London Railway. W. M. Twelvetrees.

The Central London Railway. W. M. Twelvetrees.

Fortnightly Review.—Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. Oct.

The Burden of Empire. W. S. Lilly.
Socialism and Anarchism. Geoffrey Langtoft.
Our Military Prestige Abroad. Capt. J. W. Gambier.

The Kingdom of Matter. Maurice Maeterlinck.
Lord Russell of Killowen. Edward Dicey.
The Public Schools and the Public Services. J. C. Tarver.
Gordon's Campaign in China. By Himself.
Heroes of the War, and Others. Major Arthur Griffiths.
The Decay of the Chaperon. Lady Jeune.
The Struggle for Industrial Supremacy. Benjamin Taylor.
The Staturnalia and Kindred Festivals. J. G. Frazer.
Why not a Treaty with Russia?
Is Russia to preponderate in China? Demetrius C. Boulger.
Count Lamsdorff's First Failure. Diplomaticus.

Forum.—Gay And Bird. 2s. 6d. Sept.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Sept. FORUM.—GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Sept.
Anti-English Feeling among the Germans. Prof. F. Max Müller.
The Kansas City Financial Resolution. G. E. Roberts.
The Bureau of the American Republics. W. W. Rockhill.
A Plea for Consular Inspection. A. H. Washburn.
Work and Wages in France. W. B. Scaife.
A Plea for the New Cereal, the Cotton-Seed. E. L. Johnson.
The Constitutional Crisis in Austria. M. Baumfeld.
China against the World. P. S. Reinsch.
Japan's Attitude towards China. D. W. Stevens.
The Republican and Democratic Platforms compared. H. L. West.
The Campaign of 7000 from a Democratic Point of View. W. J. Stone.
American Census Methods. Prof. W. F. Willcox.
Mr. Frederic Harrison's New Essays. Prof. W. P. Trent.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. —141, FIFTH AVENUE, New YORK. Sept.

Lieut, Gillmore's Captivity. Illustrated. W. Walton.
The Chinese People. Hon. Wu Ting-fang.
In the Haunts of the Boxers. With Map and Illustrations. G. M. Walker.
Money for Everybody. Illustrated. M. E. Ailes.
Philadelphia-Lancaster Counterfeiting Conspiracy; Ten Millions or Ten Years. Illustrated. John E. Wilkie.
Recollections of Gen. Robert E. Lee. Illustrated. Continued. R. E. Lee, Jr.

Genealogical Magazine. -- Elliot Stock. 18. Oct. The Stafford Attainders. Concluded. A. C. Fox-Davies.
The Armorial Bearings of a Lady. Continued.
Royal Descents. Continued.
The Earldom of Menteith. W. M. G. Easton.
An Old Scottish Manuscript. Continued. C. S. Romanes.

Deaco: Nights Cipher A Wee The C The U French West Studie

The L

In the

II King an Throu New I Metho Nephe H

Furth.

Fossil Palæo

Chara My 1 B Queen Cleves On M A His The I

> Watts Remi Sunri Leo 2 Gre The l Fact

Jame

John The

Conce

Edito Sorti Doub Hom Flyin Big ( Plan A Ga

The Wat H

Patr Wh

Are Gen The Old Acr

The

10 nstituency. . Thomas

aynard Illustrated. C. Rous-

. Roberts-

Oct. Bourne. ay in the

er. Spencer

reshores.

YORK.

Valker. or Ten

ce, Jr.

Gentleman's Magazine, -Chatto and Windus. 18. Oct. Gentleman's Magazine.—Chatto and Windus.
The Last English Rebellion in 1817. John Hyde.
In the Woods of Roccamonfina. L. Wolffsohn.
Deacon Brodie; a Picturesque Rogue. F. Brock.
Nights in Lakeland. W. T. Palmer.
Ciphers. G. E. Moysey.
A Week in the West Country. F. H. Candy.
The Chaucer Garden. W. H. Thompson.
The Union of Poland and Lithuania. Gabrielle Festing.
French Prisons; Caged in France. Rev. P. H. Ditchfield.
West Pyrenean Marriages. A. R. Whiteway. Geographical Journal,-Edward Stanford. 28. Sept.

Geographical Journal, —Edward Stanford. 28. Sept. Studies in the Anthropogeography of British New Guinea. With Maps and Illustrations. Prof. A. C. Haddon. King Menelek's Dominions and the Country between Lake Gallop (Rudolf) and the Nile Valley. With Map. Capt. M. S. Wellby. Through Haiti. H. Prichard. New Light on Some Mediæval Maps. Illustrated. C. Raymond Beazley. Methods of Survey employed by the Chilsan Boundary Commissions in the Cordillera of the Andes. Prof. A. Bertrand.

* Geological Magazine.-Dulau. 18. 6d. Sept. eline-Syenite and Its Associates in the North-West of Scotland. J. J.

Nepheline-Syenize and its resocuted.

H. Teall.

Further Notes on Podophthalmous Crustaceans from Upper Cretaceous of British Columbia, etc. Illustrated. H. Woodward.

Fossil Mammalia from Egypt. Continued. C. W. Andrews.

Palscolithic Flint Implements from the Isle of Wight. S. H. Warren.

Glrl's Own Paper.—36, Paternoster Row. 6d. Sept.
Characteristic Church Towers of the Welsh Border. Illustrated.
My Museum of Eastern Curios. Illustrated. Continued. Mrs. E.
Brightwen.
Queen Hortense; a Royal Musician. Miss Eleonore d'Esterre-Keeling.

Girl's Realm.—10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 6d. Oct. Clever Daughters of Clever Parents. Illustrated. Ignota. On Mock Trials. Illustrated. Kathleen Waldron. A Highland Girl and Her Home. Illustrated. George Paston. The Pitman Metropolitan School. Illustrated. Miss Constance A, Barnicoat. Concerning Samplers. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symonds.

Good Words,—Isbister. 6d. Oct.

Watts and Wesley; a Contrast. Rev. H. M. B. Reid.

The Fare of a Country Mouse. Illustrated. The Author of "In Garden, Orchard, and Spinney."

Reminiscences of a Holiday in Basutoland. Illustrated. J. A. Macleod. The Underworld of London. Illustrated. L. W. Lillingston. Sunrise on the Crescent. Illustrated. E. Walter Maunder.

Leo XIII. Illustrated. G. Dalla Vecchia.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Oct. The late Lord Russell of Killowen. Illustrated. S. Davey.
Fact and Fiction in War; Interview with George Griffith. Illustrated.
R. Blathwayt. James Thomson; the Poet of the Seasons, Illustrated. Rev. R. P.

John Ceiriog Hughes; the Burns of Wales, Illustrated, T. R. Jones. The China Inland Mission; Interview with the Secretary. Illustrated.

R. Blathwayt. Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 34d. Sept. Harmsworth Magazine.—Harmsworth. 34d. Editorial Sanctums. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle. Sorting 3,000,000 Letters. Illustrated. B. Owen. Doubling the World's Harvest. Illustrated. W. S. Harwood. Home Life in China. Illustrated. P. Astor. Flying Six Thousand Pigeons. Illustrated. A. Birnage. Big Catches of Fish. Illustrated. R. B. Marston. Plants That eat Insects. Illustrated. A Game of Living Whist. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot.

Harper's Monthly Magazine. -45, Albemarle Street. 18. Oct.

Wei-Hai-Wei. Illustrated. Poultney Bigelow. The Nutritive Value of Alcohol. W. O. Atwater. The Chinese Resentment. H. H. Lowry. Waterways of America. Illustrated. A. H. Ford.

Harvard Graduates' Magazine.—6, Beacon Street, Boston. 75 cents. Sept.

Patriotism. W. Everett.
The University's New Buildings. Illustrated.

Home Magazine,-Nassau Street, New York. 10 cents. Sept.

What Shall be done with China? Illustrated. J. Sloat Fassett.
Are Chinese Missions worth while? Illustrated. H. L. Greetham.
General Adna R. Chaffee. Illustrated. Waldon Fawcett.
The Truth About the Tenements. Illustrated. C. M. M'Govern.
Old Yachting Yarns. Illustrated. W. Pocklington.
Across the Atlantic on a Freight Liner. Illustrated. D. A. Willey.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Sept. Christ as the Essence of the Preacher's Message. Dr. Joseph Parker. The Two Orthodoxies. Rev. C. S. A. Dwight. Presbyterianism and Infants. Dr. H. L. Singleton. Browning's Religion. Rev. A. T. Bannister. The Atonement. Prof. F. Johnson.

Humane Review .- ERNEST BELL. 13. Oct. Empire; in India and Elsewhere. E. Carpenter.
George Meredith's Writings; a Side-View on Democratic Tendency. S.
Olivier.

Olivier.

The Feather Fashion. W. H. Hudson.
The Schoolboy Ideal. Mary A. M. Marks.
Too-Roo: a Drama of Bird Life. W. J. Stillman.
Some Criminal Trials of the XVIIIth Century. Lex.
A Visit to Tolstoi. J. C. Kenworthy.
The Care of Animals in Warfare. L. W. Pike.
Jewish Slaughtering; a Much-Needed Reform. C. W. Forward.

Humanitarian-Duckworth. 6d. Oct.

On Heredity as a Factor in the Interpretation of Disease. Prof. D. J.

On Heredity as a Factor in the Interpretation of Disease.

Hamilton.

Would Homicide have been justifiable in Pekin? Princess Gagarine.

The Position of Chinese Women. English Resident in China.

The Social Work of the Young Men's Christian Association; Interview with Sir George Williams.

A Century of Legislation for Women and Children. Lady A. C. Royle.

Co-operative Kitchens. L. Austin.

The Treatment of Medicine in Fiction. Dr. Caroline W. Latimer.

Ideal Review .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. 3d. Sept.

Man; Spirit, Soul, and Body. Dr. H. K. Jones.
The Romanoffs as Reformers. Concluded. C. Johnston.
Forgiveness. Concluded. A. M. Crane.
The Making and Decaying of the Creed. Continued. Rev. H. Frank.

Indian Review .- G. A. NATESAN, MADRAS. 108. per ann. August. Some Celebrated Literary Forgeries. C. W. E. Cotton. Economics of Higher Education. A. D. Lalkaka. China; a Sketch of its History.

The Meaning of the Maratha Struggle. S. T. Dravid. Studies in China. J. Newman.

International Magazine.—A. T. H. Brower, Chicago, 10 cents.
Sept.
Glenwood Springs. Illustrated. Evelyn English.
Astride a Korean Pony. Illustrated, e. E. Rittenhouse.
Imperial Régimes in Mexico. Continued. Illustrated. H. M. Skinner.

International monthly.

The Expansion of Russia. A. Rambaud.
The Tendency in Trade Unionism. Adna F. Weber.
The Use of Bacteria in Our Food Products. H. W. Conn.
The American School of Historians. A. B. Hart.
The Conflict in China. E. Buckley.
Oct. International Monthly, -MACMILLAN, 18. Sept.

Oct.
The Expansion of Russia. A. Rambaud.
Primitive Objects of Worship. L. Marillier.
The New Italy. S. Cortesi.
Recent Progress in Geology. A. C. Lawson.
The Importance of Government by the Republican Party in the United States. G. F. Hoar.
The Significance of the Democratic Party in American Politics. A. D. Morse.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIN. 25. Sept.

Attrition. Rev. J. McCaffrey.
Sir Cahir O'Doherty's Rebellion. Bishop O'Doherty.
St. Saviour's Chapel, New Ross; a Forgotten Chantry.
J. B. Cullen.
The Modern Reign of Terror in France. Rev. C. M. O'Brien. Irish Monthly .- M. H. Gill, Dublin. 6d. Sept.

Irish Monthly,—M. H. Gill, Dublis, of The "Song of Roland" and Its Private Critics. In a Devonshire Lane. Madge Blundell. Smyrna, the Acropolis of Athens, Cairo, C. T. Waters, Oct. Lord Russell of Killowen a Mortuary Card.

Irish Rosary.—47, Little Britain. 3d. Oct. Celtic Crosses. Illustrated. Rev. M. McPolin.

Journal of the Board of Agriculture.-LAUGHTON. 18. Sept. Influence of Manures on the Botanical Composition of Grass Land. Dr. W. Somerville.

Sometyfile.
Small Ermine Moths.
Earnings of Agricultural Labourers.
Workman's Compensation Act, 1900.
Agricultural Returns of Great Britain, 1900.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. Oct.

Classical Teaching, Old and New.
A Revolution in French Grammar Teaching.
Professor Henry Sidgwick.
A Cry from a Training College. Alice M. Jackson.
Dorothea C. Erzleben; the First Lady Doctor of Medicine in Germany.
W. G. Field. A German School Journey. H. H. Quilter.

Journal of Geology.-Luzac. 50 cents. August. Gneous Rock Series and Mixed Igneous Rocks. A. Harker.
On the Habitat of the Early Vertebrates. T. C. Chamberlin.
The Biogenetic Law from the Standpoint of Paleontology. J. P. Smith.
The Local Origin of Glacial Drift. R. D. Salisbury.
Summaries of Current North American Pre-Cambrian Literature.
C. K. Leith. Summaries of (C. K. Leith.

Journal of Political Economy .- P. S. KING. 75 cents. Sept. The Income Tax and the National Revenues. M. West.
The Foreign Trade of the United States from 1820 to 1840. W. P. Sterns.
The Modern Condition of Agricultural Labour in Bohemia. Katharine B. Davis. Water Rights in the Arid West. R. P. Teele.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society. - JOHN MURRAY.

The York Meeting, 1900. Illustrated. Dr. W. Fream.
The Trials of Steam-Diggers at York. Illustrated. Prof. W. E. Dalby.
The Trials of Horse-Power Cultivators at York. Illustrated. C. W. Lister-Kaye.

The Trials of Milking-Machines at York. F. S. Courtney.

Miscellaneous Implements exhibited at York. Illustrated. T. Stirton.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900. S. B. L. Druce.

Sir John Bennet Lawes. With Portrait. Editor.

25. Sept. The fraining of Seamen. J. R. Thursfield. The Range Question. Major H. T. Crook.

Journal of the United Service Institution of India. — Government Central Printing Office, Simla. July.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution, - J. J. Keliher.

The Use of Light Railways in Indian Warfare. Capt. H. F. Thullier and Capt. G. Lubbock.

Tactical Studies from the Afghan War of 1878-80. Lieut.-Col. A. Keene.

Physical Training in the Native Army. Capt. F. C. Laing.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 6d. Oct. The Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein. Illustrated. Some More Royal Love-Stories. Illustrated. Minka von Drachenfels. Banquets, Ancient and Modern. Illustrated. Duchess of Somerset.

Land Magazine.—143, STRAND. 18, Sept.
Practical Forestry. W. B. Leys.
A German School of Forestry. Illustrated. A. Allsebrook.
Experiments by the Earl of Denbigh with Sugar Beet and New Cereals.

Experiments by the Earl of Denbigh with Sugar Beet and No. H. H. Cave.
The History of Guano as a Manure. J. E. R. S. Breeding Shorthorn Cattle. C. M. Richardson.
Geographical Distribution of the World's Grain Crops. H. S. T. Larch Disease. F. Story.
French Pasture Lands. E. Conner.

Leisure Hour,—56, PATERNOSTER ROW, 6d, Oct.
Montenegro; the Benjamin of Europe. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern.
The Soane Museum; a Forgotten Treasure House. Illustrated. M. E.
Palgrave. My Experience of Magpies and Their Relations. E. H. Barker. Where Poor Ladies can live in London. Illustrated. Miss Frances H.

Rural L'fe in Russia. Illustrated. Nitchevo.

Library Association Record, -HORACE MARSHALL. IS. Sept. Some of the Public Institutions of Bristol. L. A. Taylor, The Chetham Hospital and Library. A. Nicholson. Early Attempts at Paper-Making in England, 1495-1586. R. Jenkins.

Library Journal.-Kegan Paul. 25. August. Montreal Conference of Librarians; Report.

New England's Present Library Work. H. L. Koopman.

New England's Present Library Problem. Rev. G. A. Jackson.
Outline of the Literature of Libraries. Continued. F. J. Teggart.
Report on Work and Wages of Librarians in America.

Library World.—4, Ave Maria Lane, 6d, Sept. Some Cornish Libraries. J. D. Brown.
Open Shelves and Book-Theft. A. E. Bostwick.
Grievances of a Free Library Reader; Two Rejoinders.
Sequel Stories. Concluded. T. Aldred.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.-Lippincott, Philadelphia. Young America at the Gates of Literature. H. S. Pancoast.

Longman's Magazine.—Longmans, 6d. Oct. The Capture of Cape Town. George Paston. A Study in School Jokes. Miss E. M. Griffiths.

Ludgate .- 123, FLEET STREET. 6d. Oct. A Chat about Siberia. Illustrated. W. Le Queux. Experiments in Flying. Illustrated. O. Chanute. How Crowds are Fed. Illustrated. Austin Fryers.

McClure's Magazine .-- 10, Norfolk Street, Strand. 10 cents. The Training of Lions, Tigers, and other Great Cats. Illustrated. S. H.

Adams.
Adams.
A Prisoner among Filipinos. Illustrated. Concluded. James C. Gillmore.
An Historic Sale of United Statzs Bonds in England. Hon, G. S. Boutwell.
Building a German Ocean-Greyhound. Illustrated. Ray Stannard Baker.
The Life of the Master. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. John Watson.

Macmillan's Magazine.-Macmillan. is. Oct. Thomas Edward Brown. J. C. Tarver. Some Aspects of the Chinaman. F. Thorold Dickson. A Gang of Court Poisoners.

Impressions of Klondike. Continued. C. C. Osborne. A Solution of the Domestic Problem. A Grandmother. Social Life in Italy.
A Century of Fighting. Lieuta-Col. Verner.

Medical Magazine. -62, KING WILLIAM STREET. 15. Sept. The Progress of Medical Teaching. The Medical Schools.

Missionary Review of the World .- 44, FLEET STREET. 25 cents.

The Anti-Foreign Uprising in China. With Maps and Illustrations. Rev. H. P. Beach.

China: Past, Present, and Future. Illustrated. Rev. W. Ashmore. Mrs. Bishop on Missions in China. Dr. A. T. Pierson.

Modern Japan as a Mission Field. Illustrated. Rev. T. N. McNair. The Present Need of Mission Work in Japan. Rev. F. Matsunaga.

Monthly Review .- JOHN MURRAY. 25. 6d. Oct.

The Paradox of Imperialism. The Paradox of Imperialism.
After Pekin.
Parties and Principles.
Details of My Daily Life. Amir of Afghanistan.
Surgical Experiences in South Africa. A. A. Bowley.
War Training of Naval Officers. Lieut. Carlyon Bellairs.
Puzzles of the War. H. Spenser Wilkinson.
Recent Eclipses. Prof. H. H. Turner.
On the Influence of the Stage. Mrs. Hugh Bell.
T. E. Brown. A. T. Quiller-Couch.

T. E. Brown. A. T. Quiller-Couch.

Munsey's Magazino.—Horace Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street. 6d. Sept.

The Rulers of the Great American Railways. Illustrated.
Life-Saving at Sea. Illustrated. H. H. Lewis.

The Life and Work of John Wesley. Illustrated. Rev. J. Wesley Johnson.
At a Fashionable Finishing School. Illustrated. Irene Rowland.

The Education of the Pet Dog. Illustrated. E. S. Peffer.

Sheep-Ranching in Montana. Illustrated. H. I. Dodge.

The Crime of the Powers in China. F. Cunliffs-Owen.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD, 25, 6d. Oct. National Review.—Edward Arnold, 2s. 6d. Oct.
The German Dauger in the Far East. X.
Electors and the Navy. C. McL. McHardy.
A Plea for the Control of China. By Capt. F. E. Younghusband.
Vatican and Quirinal. Richard Bagot.
General Wolfe's Letters. Miss Godley.
The Oxford Undergraduate. H. Brodrick.
American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.
The Investor's Opportunity. W. R. Lawson.
The Roman Catholic Hierarchy in Australia. An English Catholic.
Greater Britain.

Greater Britain.

New England Magazine.—5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents
Sept.
The Worcester Music Festival, Mass. Illustrated, W. M. Lancaster.
Jacob Hemingway; the First Vale Student. Illustrated, B. J. Hendrick.
La Chapelle; a Village in Rural France. Illustrated. C. Johnson.
Our Country Towns. C. N. Hall.
The Cause of Indian Famines. J. T. Sunderland.
Oberlin College. Illustrated. G. F. Wright.
Methuen, Massachusetts. Illustrated. C. H. Oliphant.
The Natural History of a State (Massachusetts). R. L. Bridgman.

New Ireland Review .- Burns and Oates. 6d. Oct. An Irishman in Schleswig-Holstein, X.
Oliver Wendell Holmes; the "Elia" of America. R. M. Sillard.
Robert Louis Stevenson. E. J. Frazer-Hearne.
Agrarian Socialism. E. Vliebergh.
Religious Songs of Connacht. Continued. Dr. Douglas Hyde.

Reingious Songs of Connacht. Continued. Dr. Douglas Hyde,
New World.—GAV AND BIRD. 3s. Sept.
Recent Gifford Lectures and the Philosophy of Theism. James Seth.
Spanish Failures in the Philippines. Carlos G. Calkins.
The Supreme God of the Lowest Races. James Haughton Woods, Religious Life in Modern India. Bipin Chandra Pal.
What is Agnosticism? Alfred W. Benn.
Naturalism and Its Results. C. C. Everett.
The Synoptic Question, Orello Cone.
Professor Ladd's Theory of Reality. William Adams Brown.

Newfoundland Magazine.—Newfoundland Publishing Co., Sr. John's, Newfoundland, 20 cents. Sept. St. Pierre. Illustrated. P. T. McGrath.
The Wreck of the Scottish King. Illustrated.

Elliott.

Nineteenth Century.-Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. Oct. Nineteenth Century.—Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. Oct.

A Nation of Amateurs. Hon. George C. Brodrick.
Ritualism and the General Election. Lady Wimborne.
Concerning Petitions and Electioneering Pledges. Lady Sophia Palmer
Notes and Impressions from a Tour in China. Sir Henry Blake.
Taoism. Professor Max Müller.
The Working Man and the War Charges. Frederick Greenwood.
Nistzsche; an Appreciation. Oswald Crawfurd.
Extravagance and Economy in the London School Board. Sir Charles Elliott.

Elliott.
An American Presidential Campaign. James Boyle.
Administrative Reform in the Public Service. Sir Algernon West.
The Dutch-Belgians at Waterloo. C. Oman.
Wanted—a New War Poet. Mrs. Henry Birchenough.
The Breed of Man. Dr. Hely Hutchinson Almond.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Reid.

Imper The I Nihili The A Confu China Comm The F What

N

in The A Wollar The V A Day Trans

> The O Victor The C Hygie

On G

Drivin How Indigo Imperi The F Doctor Psycho The Co

A Univ Justice

Becque The Pr

The Kl The Pa Our Tr The Co Modern The Bo

Primit

Dr. Ch. Matthe Ruskin The Afi The We Gospel R. D. I The Ps: James I Stavens

A New tion The Eff Dur Visual I Mental A Type

Housing The Nee The Pre

North American Review .- Wm. Heinemann. 2s. 6d. Sept. North American Review,—WM. Heinemann. 2s. 6 Imperialism and Christianity. Dean Farrar. The Duty of the Gold Democrat. M. E. Ingalls. Nihilism and Anarchy. C. Johnston. The Assassination Mania. Dr. F. L. Oswald. Catholics and American Citizenship. Bishop J. A. McFaul. The Vain Hope of the Filipinos. M. Wilcox. The Art of Robert Louis Stevenson. G. W. T. Omond. Confucianism in the Nineteenth Century Prof. H. A. Giles. China; the Empire of the Dead. Rev. F. E. Clark. Commercial Aspect of the Yellow Perli. A. Ireland. The Root of the Chinese Troubls. J. Foord. What the Chimese think of Us. S. Bonsal.

**Non-Transfer Court.**—Kegan Paul. 6d. Sept.

On Greek Religion and Mythology. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.

The Propensity toward the Marvellous; Animism in Popular Thought and in Science. Dr. E. Mach.

The Associated Fists or Boxer Society. Illustrated. Rev. G. T. Candlin.

The School and Soc.ety. Illustrated.

Pall Mall Magazine.—18, Charing Cross Road. 28. Oct. Wollaton Hall. Illustrated, Lady Middleton. The Vale Press and the Modern Revival of Printing. Illustrated. H. C. Marillier.

A Day at Dartmoor. Illustrated. Major A. Griffiths.
The British Empire, 1803-1900. With Diagrams. J. Holt Schooling.
Transport and Supply in South Africa. Searchlight.

Parents' Review .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. Sept. The Object of a Girl's Education. Mrs. A. Butler. Victor Hugo. K. R. Hammond. The Concurrent Teaching of English and French History. A. Devinz. Hygiene of the Nursery. Dr. R. W. Wilson.

Pearson's Magazine.—C. A. Pearson. 6d. Oct. Driving in Russia. Illustrated. T. Morton. How Animals sleep. Illustrated. Dr. I. Robinson. Indigo-Planting in India. Illustrated. M. N. MacDonald. Imperial Sportsmen. Illustrated. H. Ryall. The First Traverse of Africa. Illustrated. H. C. Fyfe. Doctoring by Machinery. Illustrated. R. P. Lambert.

Philosophical Review .- MACMILLAN. 35. Sept. Some Stages of Logical Thought, Prof. J. Dewey.
Psychology as Science of Selves. Prof. Mary W. Calkins.
The Concept of Change. Dr. A. E. Davies.

Physical Review .- MACMILLAN. 50 cents. Sept. The Surface Tension of Water above 100 degrees C. C. T. Knipp.

Becquerel Rays. O. M. Stewart.

The Problem of the Stresses and Strains in a Long Elastic, Hollow Cylinder subjected to Internal and External Pressure and to Tension. W. S.

A Universal Apparatus for the Photometry of Glow Lamps. C. H. Sharp. Positivist Review .- WM. REEVES. 3d. Sept. Comte's Attitude to Socialism. A. H. Haggard, Justice. C. G. Higginson.

The Khaki Election. E. Spencer Beesly.
The Paris Meeting. J. H. Bridges.
Our Treatment of Weaker Races. F. S. Marvin.
True and False Catholicism. Frederic Harrison.

Practical Teacher,—33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Oct.
The Congrès International de l'Enseignement Secondaire. P. Misille.
C. F. Hayward. Illustrated.
Mod:rn Language Holiday Courses. Illustrated.
The Borough; London's Most Ancient Highway.

Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.—48, Aldersgate Street. 28. Oct.

Dr. Charles Albert Berry. H. Owen.
Some Uses of Biography. J. Lindsay.
Matthew Arnold's "Empedoles on Etna." H. J. Forster.
Ruskin's Aesthetic and Social Thought. J. Ritson.
The Afrikander Bond and the War. John Forster.
The World's Christian Endeavour Convention.
Gospel Problems. A. S. Peake.
R. D. Blackmore; the Man and His Works. M. Johnson.
The Psychology of Religion. J. T. Horne.
James Martineau. W. D. Judson.
Stevens's "Theology of the New Testament." F. Richardson.

Psychological Review.-MACMILLAN. 38. Sept. A New Determination of the Minimum Visible and Its Bearing on Localiza-tion and Binocular Depths. Prof. G. M. Stratton.

The Effect of Imperceptible Shadows on the Judgment of Distance. Knight Dunlay.
Visual Perception during Eye Movement. R. Dodge.
Mental Fatigue. E. Thorndike.
A Type of Pendulum Chronoscope and Apparatus. J. A. Bergström.

Public Health .- 129, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. Sept. Housing of the Working Classes. Dr. T. O. Dudfield.

The Need of a State Department of Public Health. J. Highst.

The Prevalence of Enteric Fever in War ington during 1899. A. G. Gornall.

Public School Magazine. - 131, TEMPLE CHAMBER 6d. Sept. Merchant Taylors' School. Illustrated. The Schools at Lord's, Illustrated,

Quiver.-CASSELL. 6d. Oct. The Home of the Pilgrim Fathers. Illustrated. An American Clergyman. Hymn Tunes with a History. Illustrated. J. Cuthbert Hadden, Dean Vaughan as I knew Him. Illustrated. One of His Old Boys, Diligent in Business; Some Famous Market Halls. Illustrated. E. H.

Railway Magazine .- 30, FETTER LANE. 6d. Sept. H. J. Pryce, Locomotive Superintendent, North London Railway; Interview. Illustrated.
The Horse Department of a Railway. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Paddington Station, Illustrated. R. H. Cocks.
Tourist Travel in North Staffordshire. Illustrated. W. H. Bracewell.
The Whitby and Pickering Railway. Illustrated. Continued. G. W. J.

The Whitby and Francisco Potter.

An Arctic Railway. Illustrated. E. W. Lowry.

An Arctic Railway. Illustrated. E. W. Lowry.

William Stroudley, Locomotive Engineer. Illustrated. M. Reynolds. Train-Running; Summer of 1900. W. J. Scott.

A High-Speed Electric Railway. Illustrated.

The American and Canadian Railway Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. ] 25 cents. Oct.

Trusts in England. Robert Donald.
New Light on the Problem of Trusts.
Mr. Stevenson; the Democratic Candidate for Vice-President.
Bryan's Financial Policy; a Democratic View. C. B. Spohr.
Bryan's Financial Policy, G. E. Roberts.
Trusts in case of Bryan's Election. Prof. J. L. Laughlin.
Mr. Bryan and the Trusts; an Anti-Trust View. F. S. Monnett.
The Practical Bryan Policy for the Philippines. Edward M. Shepard.
Golf. Price Collier.

Review of Reviews.—(Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne.
od. August.
Why the Englishman succeeds. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.
The Fighting of the Month in China and in the Transvaal. Dr. W. H.
Fitchett.
The War in South Africa; Side-Lights on the Battlefield.
How Federation was won in Western Australia. H. Irwin Blake.
The Revolt of the Yellow Man.
Tzse Hsi, Empress of China.
Count Mouravieff.
A Perished Navy. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 4d. Oct. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Cont'nued. R. Grey.
Private John Chinaman; the Pigtails of the British Army. Illustrated. H.
Grainger.
The Wolf as a Family Friend. Illustrated. Margaret Collinson.
Pictures in Hair. Illustrated. C. M. McGovern.
An Ingenious Bullet-Proof Shield. Illustrated. R. Maingay.
Can we prolong Our Lives? Illustrated. Dr. C. Edson.
How Jack is clothed. Illustrated. A. S. Hurd.
An Artist's Wedding in Brittany. Illustrated. Kathleen Schlesinger and Paul Geniaux.

School Board Gazette. - Benrose. 18. Sept. The Work of the London School Board. Continued. Higher Education.

Oxford University Day Training College.
Wolverhampton Pupil Teachers' Centre.

School World.—MACMILLAN. 6d. Oct.
The Law relating to the Teachers' Tenure of Office. T. A. Organ.
International Educational Congresses at the Paris Exhibition. Special Correspondent. What is Technical Education? International Correspondence as an Aid to Language-Teaching. N. W.

Scottish Geographical Magazine.—Edward Stanford. 15. 6d

S:pt.

The Siamese Malay States. Illustrated. N. Annandale.
An Indo-European Highway. With Maps. S. H. F. Capenny.
Spitzbergen, 1895 and 1895; Voyages with the Prince of Monaco. With Map and Illustrations. W. S. Bruce.

Scribner's Magazine.—Sampson Low. 1s. Oct. Russia of To-day; the Two Capitals. Illustrated. H. Norman. The Last Days of Pretoria. Illustrated. R. H. Davis. With Arctic Highlanders. Illustrated. Concluded. W. A. Wyckoff. The Slave-Trade in America. Illustrated. Continued. J. R. Spears. The Sherman-Johnston Convention. J. D. Cox.

Strand Magazine.-George Newnes. 6d. Oct. The Rank and File of the British Navy. Illustrated. Lord Charles Beresford, Formation. Illustrated, G, A. Best.
Which is the Finest Building in the World? Illustrated, F. Dolman.
Tug-of-War on Horseback. Illustrated. Meta Henn.
An Extraordinary Swimming Race. Illustrated. A. M. Broadwell.

Sept. 25 cents.

ons. Rev. re. Vair.

, FLEET y Johnson.

lic.

ct.

s cents Hendrick. on.

an. ct. 1.

Seth.

ds.

Co., ST.

ct. Palmer

Sir Charles

st.

Sunday at Home.—56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Oct.
The Christian Endeavour Society. Rev. W. Justin Evans and Old Sunday-School Man.
Alexandria. Illustrated. Continued. Ella E. Overton.
Ludgate to Temple Bar. Illustrated. Mrs. Isabella Fyvie Mayo.
Handwriting of Rev. John Wesley Illustrated. Dr. A. B. GrosarA Mission to the Taverns. G. Holden Pike.

Sunday Magazine.—ISBISTER. 6d. Oct. f Islam. Illustrated, Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett. The Monks of Islam. The Monks of Islam.

A Lady Water-Finder.

Trap-door Spiders in England. Rev. T. Wood.

The Mercitul Ministry of the Winds.

The Religious Element in the Poets.

Bishop Boyd Carpenter.

Sunday Strand.-George Newnes. 6d. Oct. The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Continued. Ian Maclaren.
The Trail of the War. Illustrated. Concluded. May Bateman.
The Grave of Manning's Wife. Illustrated. H. M. Walbrook.
Rome in Holy Year. Illustrated. Mary Spencer Warren.
Waifs and Strays; Interview with Rev. E. de M. Rudolf. Illustrated.

Sunday on a Man-o'-War. Illustrated. F. Dolman. Refining the Hooligan. Illustrated. J. A. Hammerton. The Malays at Home. Illustrated. J. Cassidy.

Temple Bar, —MACMILLAN. 18. Oct. The Poems of Ben Jonson. H. M. Sanders. Waltham Abbey and Its Associations. W. S. Durrant. Volterra. Alicia C. Taylor.

Temple Magazine.—Horace Marshall. 6d. Ocf.
Peers Who preach. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Music in the Sanctuary; Choir and Organ. Rev. H. R. Haweis.
Lesser Known Paris. Illustrated. Clive Holland.
The Wesleyan Missionary Society. Illustrated. S. Stapleton.
An Englishwoman in China; a Talk with Mrs. Bishop. Illustrated. Sybil C. Mitford.

Theosophical Review .- 3, Langham Place. 18. Sept. Forgotten English Mystics. Dr. A. A. Wells.
The Mission of Theosophy. G. H. Liander.
Human Evolwement. A. Fullerton.
The "Wisdom" Tradition in the Italian Renaissance. Concluded. Mrs.

The "Wisdom" Tradition in the Italian Remaissance. Concluded.
Cooper-Oakley.
The Bardic Ascent of Man. Mrs. Hooper.
Ancient and Modern Science. Mrs. Annie Besant.
New England Dawn and Keltic Twilight. Mrs. Duncan.
Some Misconceptions about Death. Concluded. C. W. Leadbeater.

Travel.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Sept. A Visit to Baghchiserai; the Capital of the Crimean Khans. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. H. Lansdell. Corfu and Its Folk-Songs, Illustrated. Mrs. E. M. Lynch. Cycling in the Famine Districts of Gujerat, India. Illustrated. Fanny B.

Workman.

Montenegro. Illustrated. S. Wells.

A Fortnight in Pekin and Tientsin. Illustrated. W. Churchill.

United Service Magazine.-W. CLOWES. 2s. Oct. United Service Magazine, —W. Clowes. 28. Oct.
Notes on the Evolution of Cavalry. Continued, Lieut.-Col. F. N. Maude.
The Education of Naval Officers. Naval Instructor.
Field Engineering for Home Defence, Capt. R. S. Sorsbie.
Frederick the Great. William O'Connor Morris.
Gen. N. B. Forrest; a Rupert from the South. Percy Cross Standing.
La Nouvelle Bataille de Dorking. Major H. de Missy.
Compulsory Service made easy. George Nugent Banks.
Army Medical Organisation in War. Brigade-Surgeon Col. W. Hill-Climo. Reorganisation of the Royal Engineers. Ubique, Adm. Sir George Brydges Rodney, Lord Rodney, William Grey. The Chinese Defence. E. H. Parker.

Werner's Magazine .- 43, East 19TH STREET, NEW YORK. 25 cents. Sept.
William Cullen Bryant. Illustrated, Stanley Scholl.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.—CHARLES KELLY. 6d. Sept. Charles Wesley and Alfred Tennyson. Illustrated. T. M'Cullagh. Bunyan's Library. B. Ellacombe.

Some Aspects of Settlement Life. W. H. Hunt.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 25. 6d. Oct. Westminster Review,—F. Warne. 2s, 6d. G. Wage-Earners and the South African War. E. B. Husband. The War in South Africa. C. Waterer.
Army Reform. F. W. Tugman.
The Development of the Jingo. Frances Heath Freshfield Anti-Sweating in Victoria. J. Hoatson.
Education and Sectarian Interference. James Dowman.
Jachin and Boaz. G. St. Clair.
The Staging of Shakespeare. A. Dillon.
A Study in Ethics. C. C. Dove.
Science and Religion. A. Burnell.
The Mission of Empire. E. D. Bell.
American Feeling toward England. P. A. Bruce.

Wide World Magazine.-George Newnes. 6d. Oct. Wilde World magazine.—George Newnes. od. Oct.

A Climatic Miracle in California. Illustrated. C. F. Holder.

A Lady Missionary in China. Illustrated. Rachel Clemson.

The Hot-Water Ordeal of the Shintos. Illustrated. Vei Theodora Oz.kà.

Pioneers of the Year on the Matterhorn. Illustrated. G. D. Abraham.

My Journey to the Holy City of Meshed. Illustrated. J. A. Lee.

A Big-Game Trip to Somaliland. Illustrated. Sir Edmund Lechmere.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 6d. Oct. Windsor Magazine.—Ward, Lock. 6d. Oct.

The India Office. Illustrated. R. Machray.
Archery, Ancient and Modern. Illustrated. Lilias Dawson.
The Telephone of the Future. Illustrated. G. A. Raper.
Renowned Duels of Modern Times. Illustrated. A. de Burgh.
The Future of Africa. Illustrated. E. E. Williams.
"The Baltie": Its History and Work. Illustrated, W. C. Mackenzie.
Art and Letters in a Surrey Town. Illustrated. C. T. Bateman.

Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Oct. Ford Roberts's Early Career. Illustrated. An Officer. The Women of the West. Illustrated. H. A. Vachell. The Domestic Servant Question; Symposium. Illustrated.

Womanhood .- 5, AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. Oct. Slavery as It exists in China, Illustrated. Lotus, Rome the Eternal, Illustrated. Dowager Countess de la Warr.

Yale Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 75 cents. Aug. United Australia, J. H. Symon. Italian Expansion and Colonies, A. G. Keller. The Sugar Situation in the British West Indies. J. F. Crowell.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL, 3d. Oct. Leaders of Thought and Action in Canada. Illustrated. Arthur Mee, The Making of Sherlock Holmes. With Portraits. A. M. Earthquakes. F. Ballard. The Business Man in the Making at the Metropolitan School. Illustrated. E. J.

Young Woman.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Oct. Adelina Patti at Home. Illustrated. The Princesses of Europe. With Portraits.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger and Co., Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. Sept. Mont Blanc Illustrated. Prof. F. W. Sprecher.
Paris and the Exhibition. Illustrated. G. Baumberger.
Oberammergau and the Passion Play. Illustrated. F. Lienbard.
Rome in the Jubilee Year. Illustrated. Eremos.

Dahelm.—V Bod.

Merchant Ships in War. Illustrated. F. F. Fresident Porfirio Diaz of Mexico. Illustrated. P. Grabein.

On Board with the German Troops for China. Illustrated.

Sept. 22.

Costman Troops. Continued. Illustrated. Dahelm.—Velhagen and Klasing, Leipzig. 20 Pf. Sept. 8 Merchant Ships in War. Illustrated. F. Freiherr von Dincklage-Cam

Deutscher Hausschatz,-F. PUSTET, REGENSBURG. 40 Pf. Heft 17. Wallenstein at Altdorf. Illustrated. N. Heller. The Talmud. Dr. Poertner. The New Klausen Road in Switzerland. Illustrated. O. Hirt. King Stephen of Hungary. A. Hofmann

Deutsche Revue. -- Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

Deutsche Revue, —Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

6 Mks. per qr. Sept.

Graf Otto von Bray-Steinburg. Continued.

Methodical Treatment of Deafness. Prof. Urbantschitsch.

Conversations with Herr von Stremayr. B. Minz.

The Attacks on the Old Testament. Concluded. Prof. A. Kamphausen.

"Wayland the Smith." Karl Blind. The Chinese War. Vice-Adm. Werner. Jesuits Past and Present. J. Langen. National Education in the 20th Century. Prof. H. Schiller.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gerbrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per gr. Sept.

Sept.
Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach. W. Bülsche.
The Life of Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach. A. Bettelheim.
The Siberian Railway. E. Zabel.
Art at the Paris Exhibition. Continued.
Prussia and Russia in the First Quarter of the 19th Century. P. Bailleu-Karl Werder. F. Laban.
The Chinese Question, M. von Brandt.

Gartenlauba.-ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 10-Chinese Civilisation 100 Years Ago. A. Freiherr von Gleichen-Russwurm. The Moon. C. Falkanhorst.

The Paris Exhibition, Continued. Illustrated, J.-C. Heer.

The New Bavarian National Museum at Munich. Ill Illustrated.

Gesellschaft.—J. C. C. Bruns, Minden. Pl. Sept. 1 Socialism in Great Britain. Concluded. A. Hamon<sup>Th</sup> Austrian Fiction. H. H. Houben. Sept. 15.

A Ce Germ Germ Pekir

Paris Absen Rom

Germ Insu K Arts

Andr

Cath Arts Ne The

Reca

Garm

Fifty

Wom Gern The Social Nord Ludy

Afgh Geor Wha Augu The Mete

Flyin

Spuri

Ann Property The The

Ass Unifi The ! Bil

Push Col. o "Da C

The I Antiq Frenc YORK. Sept.

zh.

er ra Oz.ka. e. mere.

kenzie. Oct.

Maa. lustrated per gr.

illeu. ft to wurm.

d. G

Granzboten: -F. W. GRUNOW, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Sept. 6. A Century Ago. R. Günther. German Colonies. Continued, M. Laenger. German Colonies, Concluded, M. Laenger, Pekin. Ibsen. Sept. 20.

Paris Letters of 179, Ibsen. Continued. Roman Antiqu ties. O. Kaemmel.

Kultur.-Jos. Roth, Vienna. 8 Mks. 50 Pf. per ann. Sept. Andreas Hofer and Hormayr. Dr. J. Hirn.
Modern Visws of Primitive Religion. Prof. J. Mausbach.
German Nawspapers in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Max Beyer. Insurance of Workmen on French Railways.

Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Sept. Arts and Crafts at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Continued.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig.

1 Mk. 25 Pf. Sept.

Fifty Years of Home Missions. M. von Nathu-ius.
Russia and England in Asia To-day. C. von Zepelin.
Catholic Questions of the Hour. Dr. Riveks.

Arts and Carfs in Munich. H. Lobedan.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau, -S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. Sept.

The Few and the Many. Ellen Key. Liszt's Letters to Fürstin Wittgenstein. Continued. A. von Schorn. Recent Fiction. A. Closser.

. Neue Zeit .- J. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 25 Pf. Sept. 15. German Science and the German Workman. Rosa Luxemburg. Woman Labour and Its Influence on Crime and Morals. George S.

Wolfan Labour and its Influence on Crimic and Morals. George S. Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach. D. Bach.
Sept. 22,
German Science and the German Workman. Continued. Rosa Luxemburg.
The Agrarian Problem of Austrian Social Democracy. K. Kautsky.
Socialism in Sweden. E. Brunte.

Nord und Süd.-Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Ml Sept.

Ludwig Jacobowski. With Portrait. Karl Bienenstein.
Naples under the Bourbons, 1816-1860. M. Bernardi.
Afghanistan and England's Danger in India. Karl Blind.
Georg Christoph Lichtenberg. G. Glück.
What do We owe to Persia? P. Horn.

August Strindberg.

Stein der Weisen .- A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf. Heft 4. Stein der Weisen, A. Hartleber, Head.
The Humour as a National Psychological Element.
Meteorology. Illustrated. Prof. H. Hartl.
Heft 5.
Flying Machines. Illustrated. M. Blümelhuber.
Heft 6.

The Codex Flateyensis. S.
The Utilisation of the Nile. Illustrated. J. Krakauer.
The Panhard and Levassor Motors. Illustrated. Stern.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per ann. Sept. Spurious Works of Art. S. Beissel,

The, "Free Societies" of the Future from a North American Point of View, S. von Dunin-Borkowski, Linhoff. Continued. O. Pfulf. The Victoria Regia. J. Rompel.

Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

1 Mk. Heft 2.

Madonna della Corona. Illustrated. B. Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Dr. S. Epstein.

The Gera. Illustrated. B. Denninghoff.

Naval Pictures. Continued. Illustrated. R. Schneider.

Gabriel Max. Illustrated. F. von Ostini.

L'ineberg. Illustrated. H. Amberg.

Vom Fols zum Moor.—UNION-DZUTSCHE-VERLAGS-GESELLSCHAFT, STU-TGART. 75 Pf. Heft 26. Schloss Solitude, near Stuttgart. Illustrated. The Early History of Othelic. Prof. C. A. Levi.

Dia Zeit .- Genthergasse 1, Vienna IX./3. 50 Pf. Sept. 8. The New Régine in Italy. Dr. N. Colajanni.
The Czech Parties. Prof. T. G. Masaryk.
The British Workman. E. Bernstein.
The Religious Question in China and—in Europe. J. Lippert.
Art at the Paris Exhibition. R. Muther.

The Casch Parties. Continued. Prof. T. G. Masaryk.
Anti-Senitism in the Light of Christianity. Count von Hoensbroech.
The Conflict in Roumania and Bulgaria. Dr. B. Minzès.
The All-German Movement. T. Sept. 22.
The United States of Australia. A. Charpentier.
Women as Doctors and Chemists. Prof. M. Gruber.
The Zeppelin Balloon. H. H. Hoernes.

On the Eve of the General Election in England. E. Bernstein.
The Transport of Troops by Sea. 'Armiger.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 26 Mks. per annum. Sept.
Biltic Picture Collections. Illustrated.
French Sculpture in 1900. Illustrated. W. Gensel.

Zeitschrift für Bucherfreunde,—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig.

24 Mks. per ann. Aug.—Sept.
Coloured Paper and Its Use in Bookbindings. Illustrated. P. Kersten.
Kleist and "Die Schroffenstein Familie." Concluded. E. Wolff.
The Literature of the Battle of Lepunto. Dr. B. Stübel.
The Collection of Heinrich Lempertz, Senr. Illustrated. J. Schnorren-

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft.-Breitkopp UND HARRTEL, LEIFZIG. 10 Mks. per ann. Sept. Opera in Russia. N. Findeisen. Music in England. C. Maclean.

Zukunft .- MAXIMILIAN HARDEN, BERLIN. 50 Pf. Sept. 1. School Reform. K. Jentsch. The Old and the New. Julius Hart. Friedrich Nietzsche. K. Breysig. Dr. A. Tille on England To-day. K. Brumm.

German Constitutional History. H. F. Helmolt. Home and Foreign Missions. K. Jentsch. England To-day. D. A. Tille.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales des Sciences Politiques.—108, Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. Sept. The Pelloux Cabinet, 1838-1950. M. Caudel.

The Pelloux Cabinet, 1838-1500. M. Caudel.
Proportional Representation in Belgium and the General Election, 1900.
Continued. E. van Der Smissen.
The Hague Conference. Continued. C. Dupuis.
The Government of Louis XVI. before the Legislative Assembly. F. Maury.

Association Catholique .- 3, Rue DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 fcs. Sept. Unification of the Working Day, E. Rivière. The Seventh Congress of Master Printers at Paris. E. Rivière.

Bibliothèque Universelle, -18, King William Street, Strand, 208. pe. annum. Sept.

Pushkin and French Poetry. L. Leger.
Col. de Villebois-Mareuil. Concluded. A. Veuglaire.
The Paris Exposition. Continued. H. de Varigny.
"David Harum." Concluded. Mary Bigot.
The Boers of South Africa. Continued. J. Villarais.

Correspondant .- 31, RUE SAINT-GUILLAUME, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. Sept. 10. The Chinese Blue-Book. Bon. Denys Cochin.
The Military Organisation of the Commune. Gen. Bourelly.
The Republican Pa in France and the Labour Question. Concluded.
F. Engerand.
Antiquities at the Paris Exposition. A. Baudrillart.
French Fiction in the Nineteenth Century. H. Chantavoine. Sept. 15.

Journal of Mgr. Dupanloup. The Evacuation of Pekin and the Safety of Foreigners in China. F. Mury. The Italian Navy. Catinat. E. de Broglie.

Humanité Nouvello.-15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c.

Sept.
China and European Policy. Eli-ée Reclus.
The Italian Elections. G. Pinardi.
Curious Musical Instruments at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. Continued. Ed. Bailly.
Antisemitism and Zionism.

Journal des Économistes,-14, Rue Richelieu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c-

The Inequality of Production and Accumulation. Maurice Block. Co-operative Societies. G. de Nouvion. Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. Sept.

Marguerite in Goethe's "Faust." Continued. A. Boutarel. Mercure de France.-15. Rue de l'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris.

2 frs. Sept. Zola and the Experimental Novel. L. R. Richárd.
The Intellectual Movement in Hung up and France. Zrinyi Janos
Botticelli and the Divine Comedy. A. Germain. Monde Moderne. -5, Rue St. Benoit, Paris. 1 f. 50 c. Sept. The Banquet to the Gardes du Corps at Versailles, 1789. Illustrated.

Manguerite of Austria and the Church of Brou. Illustrated. R. Peyre. Madagascar Types. Illustrated. Fontoynont, Dress in Holland. Illustrated. M. Feuillet. The Gates of Paris. Illustrated. Malatesta. Photography at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. F. Dillaye. The French Colonies at the Exposition. Illustrated. G. R. Wehrli.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand.
55 frs. per annum. Sept. 1.

The South African War. Captain Gilbert.
Villiers de l'Isle Adam. L. Tiercelin.
A Russian among the Chinese Sectavians. M. Delines
Some Thoughts on War. H. Depasse.
The Dealers in Hope. J. Bois.
What remains of Port Royal.

The Nomination of the Pope.
The South African War. Captain Gilbert.
From Watteau to Rodin. R. Bouyer. Russia at the French Exhibition. A. R. R. The Berlin Museum. Count de Mouy. In the Country of the Monks. F. André The Poetry of Hungary. B. Khaller. F. André.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale,—23, Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. August 15.

England in Egypt. Marie L. Rattazzi. Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mme. Rattazzi. China and Europe. P. Denis. The Poetry of Love. F. Richard. Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mme. Rattazzi.
The Smaller Palace of Art. Marie Letizia de Rute.

Questions Diplomatiques et Coloniales. -- 16, Rue Cassette, Paris.

The Portuguese Colonies. H. Hauser.
Europeans and the Chinese Language. F. Farjenel.
Algeria. G. Mandeville and V. Demontès.
Sept. 15.
Manual Labour in the Colonies. A. Bernard.
The Tartar Conquest of China. Baron A. d'Avril.

Réforme Sociale.—54, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS, I fr. Sept. I. Public Intervention and the Housing Question. E. Rostand Paul Bourget and the English People. U. Guérin. The Belgian Census of Industries and Professions. A. Julin, Revue de l'Art .- 28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris. 7 frs. 50 c. Sept. 10.

The French School of Painting at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated.
Continued. L. de Fourcaud.
Sculpture at the Exposition. Illustrated. L. Bénédite.
Porcelain at the Exposition. Illustrated, Continued. Ed. Garnier.
Retrospective French Art at the Exposition. Illustrated. Concluded. G.

Revue Blanche. -23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr. Sept. 1.

Patriotism and Government. Leo Tolstoy. Religious Education. L. Tolstoy. Friedrich Nietzsche, M. Arnauld.

Revue Bleue.-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. Sept. 1.

The Revolution of 1830 in Paris. Comte Fleury. French Emigration and French Influence Abroad. Piola. Contemporary Spain. Chasle Pavie. Sept. 8.
Nietzsche in France and the Psychology of Atheism. E. Schuré.

Marz, Matilde Serao. Diego Angeli.
The Revolution of 1830 in Paris. Continued. Comte Tieurs.
Sept. 15.

Maréchal de Catinat. H. Buffenoir. La Chalotais and the Jesuits. L. Séché. Sept. 22.

The Socialist Movement in France in the 19th Century. J. Bourdeau. Albert Samain. G. Grappe.

Sept. 23.
Turgot and the Pantheon. Joseph Fabre.
The Socialist Movement in France, 1852-1900. J. Bourdeau.

Revue Chrétienne,—11, AVENUE DE L'OBSERVATOIRE, PARIS. 6 frs. per ann. Sept.

The Cabal of the Holy Sacrament, 1627-1655. R. Allier.
The French in the Vaudois Valleys of Pizdmont. P. Melon.

Revue des Deux Mondes .- 18, King William Street, Strand. 62 frs. per annum. Sept 1.

Father Gatry. C. Bellaigue.

Extracts from the Correspondence (1737-1802) of General John Hardy.
The Reform of French Syntax. F. Brunetière.
The French Naval Maneuvres.
Some Scottish Impressions. F. Roz.

S. pt. 15.
The Dawn of a Reign; a Roman Lewer.
The Literature of Europs. F. Brunetière.
The Niger (1856-1858). A. Lebon.
A Tour in Japan. A. Bellesort.
Greeks and Bulgarians in the Xth Century. A. Rambaud.

Revue Encyclopédique.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. Revue Encyclopedique,—19, KING WILLIAM 75. per qr. Sept. 1. Byzantine Society. Illustrated. Charles Diehl. Secret Societies in China. Illustrated. Ch. Saglio.

Sept. 8.
Franz Grillparzer Illustrated. H. Lichtenberger.
Spectacles at the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. G. Geffroy.
French Parliamentary Orators, 1848-1700. Illustrated. F. Loliée.

Sept. 15.
The Flora and the Fauna of L'Ile de la Réunion. Illustrated. The History of the Cannon, Illustrated. G. Charvet.

Sept. 22. Foreign Art, 1890-1900. Illustrated. A. Marguillier.

Sept. 29. Artillery. Illustrated. G. Charvet.

Revus Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies.—32, Rue de LA Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. Sept.

Aff.irs in China. A. Nogues.
The Franco-Spanish African Convention. With Maps. A. Montell.

Revue Générale. -- 16, Rue Treurenberg Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. Sept.

Ballanche and Lamennais. G. Legrand. Church History. J. Petit.
The Sixth International Congress of Penology. I. Maus. Italian Immigrants in Spain

Revue Internationale de Sociologie,—16, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS.
18 frs per ann. August-Sept.

The Federation of Europe. J. Novicow. Guyau's Sociology. A. Lambert. The Sociological Origin of Penology. R. de La Grasserie.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. r fr. 50 c. Sept. 5. Three Months at Mahé, India. Continued. G. L. d'Hébécourt.

Sept. 20. Rudyard Kipling and H. G. Wells. M. Ti Mahé. Concluded. G. L. de Hébécourt. Malmaison. Continued. G. Chantepleure.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.-5, Rue de Mézières, PARIS. 3 frs. August. The International Congress of Philosophy. Report

Revue du Monde Cathollqua, —75, RUE DES SAINTS-PÈRES, PARIS... If, 50 c. Sept r.
Lamennais, 1806-15. Continued. A. Roussel.
The Army of the Revolution in France. Bonnal de Ganges.
Bess and Honey in the Bible. Dom Rabory.
The Agricultural Crisis in France. A. Nicolle.

Sept. 15.

France and China. H. J. Leroy. Freethought and Its Methods. J. Fèvre. Lamennais. Continued. A. Roussel. Jeanne de Lestonnac. L. C. Berry.

Revue de Morale Sociale.—Place du Port 1, Geneva. 2 frs. 75 c.

The Part of Women in the Education of Boys. Marguerite de Schlumberger.
The Spanish Law relating to the Work of Women and Children. A. Posada.
The College Libre des Sciences Sociales at Paris. L. Ferrière.

Revue de Paris.—Acher, 13, Bedword Street, Strand. 60 frs. per andum. Sept. 1.

Europe in China. Europe in China.

A Century of Art. M. Hamel,
The Sports of Old France. Continued. J. J. Jusseraud.
British Public Opinion and the War. Continued. A. Chevrillon.
A. Rimbaud. A. Beaunier. Sept. 15.

Letters to Baron P. de Bourgoing (1866-68).
The Commercial Supremacy of Germany. Continued. P. de Rousiers.
Gluck and the Leading Motive.
British Public Opinion and the War. A. Chevrillon.
North and South (France). C. Julian.
The Legendary Waterloo. H. F. Gevaert

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
3 frs. Sept. 10.

Democracy and the Army in France. J. Charmont.
People's Universities. A. Rivaud.
The Influence of Money on Prices. R. Laburthe.
The Increase in the German Navy. L. Jadot.
The Parliament of Paris under Louis XVI. Continued. E. Glasson.

Ravue The Psy National Unpublis Art in B The Free Recent I Telegrap The Doo

The Psy Testar Albert S Discover The Pre The Pos

Davelop Vauban.

Civili The Pol Hypnot Concilia

alus It

The Ins Cardina Machin Cosmo The "T Monsig Historic

Japan a Emil Fa Russia Resigna Voices A Repl

The Tr An Ur Catalog

Cit

The Yo The Pa

Istor A Vov Dubna Recoll A Mili

Compe

George Vladin Transf From ! STRAND

. RUE DE

tell. 2 frs. per

OT, PARIS

PARIS.

ÉZIÈRES. . PARIS.

frs. 75 C. Schlum

A. Posada. ND.

reiere

, PARIS,

Rayue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 1 fr. Sept. 1. The Psychology of the African Boers. Olive Schreiner.

National Illusions. J. Novicow.

Unpublished Journal of Marie Bashkirtseff. Continued. Illustrated. Art in Book-Illustration. G. Mourey.

The French Academy and the University. Aug. Renard.

Recent Progress in Telegraphy and Telephony. Illustrated. G. Cay Telegraphic Writing. G. Roux.

The Doctrine of Suggestion and Its Consequences. H. Bernheim.

The French Colonies in the Pacific. Illustrated. Jules Durand. The Psychology of the African Boers. Concluded. Olive Schreiner. "Testament d'un Poète." Sully Prudhomme. Albert Samain. A. Beaunier. Discovery of a Fifth Gospel. Illustrated. Dr. L. Touche-Tréville. The Prehistoric Sahara. Illustrated. Dr. A. Chipault. Sir Wm. Crookes and His Discoveries. Illustrated. Dr. C. Schmidt. The Positivist Movement. Dr. Cancalon.

Revue Scientifique.-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. Sept. 1. Developments of the Graphic Method by Chronophotography. J. Marey. Vauban. A. de Rochas.

Sapt. 8. Diverse Forms of Phosphorescence. G. Le l Worship of the Dead in China. P. d'Enjoy. G. La Bon.

Chemical Industry. L. Guillet. Phosphorescence. Continued. G. Le Bon. Sept. 22.

Psychology, 1883-1900. T. Ribot. Psychological Methods. G. Villa.

Revue Socialiste .- 27, Rue de Richelieu, Paris. 2 fr. 50 c. Sept. The Philosophy of History. Continued. C. Rappoport. The Socialistic Idea of the State. P. Dramas. Wilhelm Liebknecht. E. Milhaud. The Congress of 1900. G. Rouanet.

Université Catholique. -Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per ann. Sept.

Maurice Barrès. Abbé Delfour. Epictetus. J. P. Gonnet. Dante. P. Fontaine. The Book of "Esther." D. de Fontmagne.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.—Via di Ripetta 246, Rome. 25 frs. per annum.

Sept r.
The Political Awakening of the Yellow Races.
Cardinal Sforza Pollavicino and the Republic of Venice.
Hypnotism and Telepathy.
Conciliation with the Quirinal neither possible nor desirable. Sept. 15.

Salus Italiæ Pontifex. Salus Italiæ Pontifær.
The Inscriptions on the Stels in the Forum. Continued.
The Blunders of Liberals.
Cardinal Consalvi at Paris. Continued.
Machinery at the Paris Exhibition.

Cosmos Catholicus.-VIA STA. CHIARA 20, ROME. 30 frs. per aunum.

Flegres.-PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. August 20.

Japan and Her Conservative Policy. F. Cerone. Emil Faguer's "Politiciens et Moralistes." Th. Neal. Russia and England in Japan. G. M. Fiamingo. Sept. 5.

The "Triumph" of St. Thomas Aquinas, Illustrated. T. Coppi.

Monsignor Ajuti Nunzio at Lisbon, Illustrated. N. T.

Historical Notes on the "Agnus Dei," Illustrated. Don B. Armati.

Resignation. L. Capuane.
Voices of the Night. E. Corradini.
A Reply to Georges Goyau. Duca di Andria Carafa.

Nuova Antologia,-Via S. Vitale 7, Rome. 46 frs. per annum. Sept. 1.

The Constitutional Character of the Reign of Humbert I. Prof. D.

The Constitutional Character of the Keign of Humbert Zanichelli.

After the Death of the King. Prof. E. Vidari.

Proportional Representation in Belgium. Prof. Wilmottz.

The Historical Antecedents of Christianity. Prof. Mariani.

The War in Manchuria. With Map. General L. dal Verms.

Certain Sonnets by G. Parini. G. Carducci.
The Historical Antecedents of Christianity. Continued. Prof. Mariani.
Human Character P. Mantegazza.
The Passion Play at Oberammergau. Illustrated, G. Franciosi.
F. Nietzsche at Turin. With Portrait. Quid Agendum? Sidney Sonnino.

Riforma Sociale. - PIAZZA SOLFERINO, TURIN. August 15. Socialism and Social Reform. Professor C. Ferraris. Land Taxation. Luigi Einandi.

Rivista Popolare. - Rome. August 30.

Liberty still in Danger. The Editor. William Liebknecht. G. Paratore. Tuberculosis and Crime. Dr. Sapigni.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios.—Real Monasterio del Escorial, Madrid, 20 pesetas per annum. Sept. 5. The Transvaal War. Restituto del Valle Ruiz. An Unpublished Religious Manuscript of the Time of the Visigoths.

G. Antolin. Catalogue of Augustinian Writers. B. del Moral. España Moderna. —Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum. Sept.

España mouerna. — Cuesta de Santo Domingo io, M do pesetas per annum. Sept. Chinese Pleasures. General Tacheng-Ki-Tong. The Youth and Education of Cervantes. Ramon Leon Mainez. The Spanish-American Theatre. Juan Perez de Guzman.

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid. 2 pesetas. August 30. The Paris Exhibition. L. Garcia-Ramon.

Recent Reforms in Philosophy and Letters, E. H. del Villar. The Victims of Electricity. A. Witz. The Armouries of Lorca, F. Caceres Pla.

The Country and the Maritime League. Arturo Llopis. The London Zionist Congress. J. Garcia Acuna. The Victims of Electricity. Continued. A. Witz.

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 15 frs. per annum. No. 35.

The Islands of the Atlantic. Valentim Fernandes.
The Cultivation of the Olive, Julio Henriques.
The Expedition to Mataca against the King of Nyassa. A. Terry.

THE RUSSIAN MAGAZINES.

Istoritcheski Vyestnik .-- St. Petersburg. A. S. Suvorin. Sept. A Voyege in Manchuria. M. Grulef.
Dubna: an Historical Sketch. K. P. Botchkaref.
Sketches of American Activity. Concluded. E. Pravdin.
Recollections of M. S. Stchepkin. M. A. Stchepkin.
A Military Hospital in 1877-78.

Mir Bozhi.-St. Petersburg. Ligovka, 25. Sept. Competition in Modern Economic Life, Prof. M. Soloviof George Sand and Her Time, Continued, E. Degen, Anthropological Sketches, A. F. Brandt.
China and the Chinese, T. Bagdanovitch.
Vladimir Soloviof. P. S.
Transformism and Darwinism. Ernst Haeckel.

kusski Vyestnik.-Moscow. Malaya Dmitrofka, 29. August. From Chita to the Amour. P. S. Alexeief.

Giacomo Leopardi. V. F. Savodnik.
Religion as a Social Phenomenon. Concluded. Prof. A. J. Vredensky.
Autocracy and Parliamentarism. Concluded. Prince Tsertelef. Giacomo Leopardi. Continued. V. F. Savodnik.

Russkoe Bogatstvo. - St. Petersburg. Spasskava i Bakavava. August.

Co-operative Production in the West, Concluded, J. K.
Literary Factors of the American Revolution, Concluded, P. G.
Mizhuef.

Types of Capitalist and Agrarian Evolution, Continued, V. M.
Emigrang Farmers in New York

Emigrant Farmers in North America. V. Kuznetzof. The Problem of Markets. P. B. Evolution of Parties in France. N. Kud. in.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Meandschrift.—Luzac and Co., 46, Grear Russell Streef. 1s. 8d. Sept. A Bicycle Ride in Russia. Illustrated. Chr. van Niftrik. A Glimpse of Batavia. Illustrated. M. C. K.—V. Z.

De Gids .- LUZAC AND Co. 38. Sept. Beato Angelica; Extracts from a Traveller's Note Book. Henri Borel.
Paul Hervieu's Reception at the Académie Française. Prof. A. G. van Hamel. Dutch Critics of Shakespeare. Dr. Byvanck. Molière's "Malade Imaginaire." The Church. Jul. J. C. de Boer.

Vragen des Tijds .- LUZAC AND Co. 18. 6d. Sept. Modern Criminology. Dr. L. S. Meijer. How Bills are treated in Our Second Chamber. K. Cruseman.

Woord en Beeld .- ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum Sept. J. W. H. Rutgers van Rozenburg. With Portrait. J. A. Levy.

The Royal Stables. Illustrated. H. M. Krabbe. Silverstin. Illustrated, F. Smit Kleine.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- OLAF NORLI, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per quarter. August 13. Rothenburg-on-the-Tauber, Illustrated.

Sept. 15. The Racial Question in Norway. Dr. A. M. Hansen. Solar Heat. S. A. Ramsvig.

Nordisk Tidskrift.—P. A. Norstedt and Sons, Stockholm. 10 kr. per annum. No. 5. Gustaf Upmark. With Portrait. Georg Göthe. Canada for Scandinavian Emigrants. Konni Zilliacus.

Art-Impressions from Paris. Georg Nordensvan. Wireless Telegraphy. Illustrated. Otto Gallander.

Ord och Bild.-ILLUSTRATED. STOCKHOLM. 12 kr. per annum. No. 6, Peter Paul Rubens, Georg Göthe. La Fronde. Harold Gote.

Tilskueren.-Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Sept. Art-Industries at the Paris Exhibition. Pixtro Krohn.
The Presidential Election in America. M. Salmonsen.
Wilhelm Liebknecht. Nina Bang.
A Sojourn in Flensburg and Schleswig in 1850. Johannes Fibiger.

A Child's Baedeker.

"WHAT shall we do now?" is a frequent question on children's lips. E. V. Lucas and E. Lucas have supplied the answer in an admirable book which is sure to find a hearty welcome in every home where there are children. In the future no nursery will be complete without it. Parents and all those who have charge of children will find it an invaluable and indispensable assistance in helping the little ones to amuse themselves. The book is filled with suggestions for games and amusement of every sort and for all occasions. They are divided into chapters, and excellently arranged, so that any game can be found at once and without trouble. There are games indoors and outdoors, in the country and at the seaside, in the garden and even in bed. There are hints on what to do at picnics, when out for a walk, and when travelling in the train. There are suggestions about how to make things, about cooking, gardening and the keeping of pets. In short, the two hundred games cover almost every conceivable description of pastime. There is also a very carefully compiled chapter on the best books for children, which will be found to be most helpful and useful. The book is published by Grant Richards (6s.).

The Novel Readers' Handbook.

MR. WILLIAM ROBERTSON, the author of the "Kipling Handbook," has published a small book entitled "The Novel Readers' Handbook." Its object, as stated in the preface, is to afford the masses of toilers a guide-book as to the best work of recent novelists. Mr. Robertson has put together, in the space of less than 200 pages, notes concerning the novels of a variety of writers, beginning with Grant Allen, and ending with Mrs. Henry Wood. Of course there are endless points for criticism in such a book. The first and most obvious observation which occurs to the reader is that the book has no index, a sad fault in such a volume. In this elementary book Miss Yonge is relegated to four lines at the end of an addendum. The addendum occupies four pages, and in it he disposes of Merriman, Harold Frederick, Morley Roberts, Francillon, Farjeon, Hitchens, and others. Nevertheless, notwithstanding-a certain lack of proportion and the absence of index, the book may be useful to those who want to choose stories to suit their taste from modern English fiction.

Bailey's Annual Index to the "Times" (Vol. 1, 1899).

I WOULD congratulate Miss Bailey upon the production of her first Annual Volume, which contains a complete index to the Times newspaper for last year. It is an octavo volume of 864 pages, with double columns. It is the handiest index published to any daily newspaper, and it is an indispensable guide to the wilderness of printed matter issued every year from Printing-house Square. Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode are the publishers of this index, which, I believe, owes its origin largely to the enterprise and initiative of the indexer-general, Miss Bailey. It is, of course, open to the obvious objection that the index for the year ending December 31st, 1899, can only be published in September, 1900, nine months after date. This objection, however, is completely met by the fact that Miss Bailey issues her index in monthly parts, which are supplied to all subscribers. The monthly parts are for ephemeral use during the year, but the bound volume can take its place on the library bookshelves. I again congratulate Miss Bailey upon the marvellous industry and indomitable perseverance with which she devotes herself to the task of furnishing the journalist, the politician and the public generally with a key to the Times. Miss Bailey is well known as the official indexer of Hansard. It is to be hoped that the new Parliament will see that her position is recognised, and that the indexer of the Parliamentary debates is not left absolutely at the mercy of the contractors who from time to time undertake the duty of preserving the eloquence of British legislators.

The Songs of Sir Philip Sidney.

MR. THOMAS BURLEIGH publishes an illustrated edition at.7s. 6d. of the "Sonnets and Songs of Sir Philip Sidney," which Philip Sidney, R.R.H.S., edits, and to which he contributes a memorial introduction. Of these sonnets it is sufficient to quote Ruskin's saying: "If you don't like these love-songs, you either have never been in love, or you don't know good writing from bad." book is illustrated with a portrait of Sir Henry and Sir Philip Sidney, with two portraits of the Countess of Pembroke, Philip Sidney's sister, and a photograph of Penshurst Place.

annum.

am. No. 6,

num. Sept.

er.

1, 1899).

oduction complete It is an is. It is super, and f printed Square. s of this y to the all, Miss tion that 899, can the after it by the typer it by the typer in the y parts, monthly but the yy book-pon the ce with the years, the typer is the typer is to the years, the typer is th edition lip Sido which ese son-'If you been in 'The and Sir of Pemof Pens-

ng the

Elliott and Fry.]

Mr. George Wyndham.

Chief Secretary for Ireland,

Hon. St. John Brodrick.
Secretary of State for War.

Elliott and Fry.]

Lord Selborne.

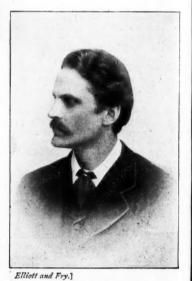

First Lord of the Admiralty.

Russe?!.]

Lord Londonderry.

President of the Board of Agriculture.

Mr. Gerald Balfour.

President of the Board of Trade.

FIVE NEW CABINET MINISTERS.

I si for of late fear spr ado mai may of the fess que

the prog

and did of m letter rank the to-da be of Both life Both thing kind

One stead these try to our r

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Nov. 1st, 1900.

Progress ?

Progress whitherward? Beginning my chronicle this month for the last time but one in the closing century, I am compelled to ask myself whether

I should keep up the heading in which I have persisted for the last eleven years when I begin the chronique of the events of the new century. I see that the latest of the many magazines which bear trace in their features of the parent idea from which they have sprung, heads its chronique "The March of Events." There is a good deal to be said in favour of the adoption of the more neutral title. Events may march anywhere, backwards or forwards, or the march itself may be suspended for a time, and we may merely mark time; but the title "The Progress of the World" postulates an optimist conception of the universe. It is in itself almost a theistic confession of faith, and that is what makes so terrible the question which I am discussing. Can we, in face of the events now transpiring, talk reasonably of the progress of the world?

Judgments.

I am the more disposed to ask this question because of two letters which I received in the course of last month. They were private letters, and I cannot quote the names of the writers. If I did they would be recognised everywhere as those of men of the first rank in English law and English letters-men who fifty years ago were foremost in the ranks of those who regarded the march of events and the progress of the world as synonymous terms. But to-day, in reply to a suggestion that something might be done to curb the mad tendency of these evil times, they write in terms of almost hopeless despair. Both are old men, and each looks back over a long life spent in ceaseless exertion for the public good. Both agreed in regarding the present state of things as justifying grave doubts as to whether mankind was not retrogressing rather than progressing. One roundly asserted that the race was now marching steadily towards barbarism and slavery. Clearly, if these two eminent authorities be right, then we should try to find some less hopeful formula for describing our monthly chronicle of the world.

The Welcome to the C.I.V.'s It is not surprising that the hearts of men should fail them for fear. It is not the first time in our rough island story, when, in the formula of the Anglo-Saxon chronicler, things seemed to go so ill with the children of men that it was commonly reported that God and His saints were dead. But it is somewhat discouraging that these gloomy forebodings should creep over our spirits at the end of this wonderful century, within a very few years of the time when the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee in London and the opening of the Peace Conference at the Hague had filled the minds of English-speaking men with so vast and confident a hope. But who is there who witnessed the culminating orgy in which the London populace cried "Hail! All Hail"! to the C.I.V.'s, without feeling that the progress which humanity has made from the days when dragons wallowed in their primal slime, is but a narrow span capable of being overleaped in an hour, when, to quote Byron's lines once more, a nation "gets drunk with blood to vomit crime."

The Decadence of England. Everything combined in that Gargantuan revelry to rivet it upon the imagination of mankind as a supreme illustration of the decadence of England. There was, to begin with, the extravagant overlaudation of the exploits of a single regiment of City youths, who, acting under no matter what high motive of patriotism or imperial pride, had merely served at so much a day for less than a twelvemonth in a campaign in which they only lost ten of their number Yet their heroism, their prowess, their valour, were lauded in the Press and acclaimed by the populace as if they had been the survivors of the fight single-handed against the Persian myriads at Marathon, or had fought in the van in the battle of Morgarten or at Sempach. Wellington returning from Waterloo, where he had laid the great World-Victor low, was accorded no such overwhelming demonstration of popular enthusiasm as that which London accorded to the C.I.V.'s. All that followed was in only too faithful accord with the false note thus struck of exaggeration and bombast. Although warned on Saturday, by an unintended rehearsal, of the exact nature of the problem with which they had to deal, the authorities responsible for the maintenance of order afforded the capital an illustration at its own doors of the ineptitude and want of intelligent foresight which has characterised the whole of our proceedings at the seat of war. Instead of preserving order, the authorities utterly failed to preserve even the narrowest of lanes for the returning heroes to march through the heart of the capital. The mob, unchecked, poured down from every side upon the central thoroughfares, filling them with a seething maelstrom of excited humanity, from which, when the flood passed by, the ambulances gathered up 1,100 bruised and mangled victims. Like Samson at the close of his career, the C.I.V.'s may boast that the destruction which they wrought among their enemies in the field was nothing to the havoc which they dealt among the citizens who came forth with songs of triumph to bid them welcome home.

But the darkest and foulest chapter The Blear-eyed Silenus in this day of shame has still to be written. When the sun set, and the the Slums. C.I.V.'s were gathered to their banqueting hall in the Artillery Grounds at Finsbury, then the lights of London looked down upon a scene the like of which had never before in the course of this century been witnessed in the City. Ladysmith night was bad, and Mafeking night was worse; but on Ladysmith night the mob had only begun to taste blood, and at Mafeking the orgy was celebrated in the mild light of a summer eve. Far other was it when the swarming myriads of London proceeded to celebrate the return of the C.I.V.'s after a day in which they had set the police at simple defiance, and when the attractiveness of the festival was enhanced by the illuminations that blazed on every Then the brute latent in every human beast asserted himself with the supreme disregard of all the conventions with which centuries of civilisation have draped his nether limbs. Silenus and his saturs do not form very edifying groups, even when they disport themselves beneath the greenwood tree; but imagine Silenus of the Slums, squalid and blear-eyed, leading his rabble rout from the beer-shop and the gin-palace. Imagine what is still more terrible, this lewd and noisome crowd reinforced by an equal number of drunken Mænads, Bacchantes with garish ostrich feathers in place of the curling vine leaves of the ancient myth, staggering drunken amid the crowd, not naked indeed, but very much unashamed.

The scenes that were witnessed, the The Satyrs sounds that were heard in the long hours between sunset and midnight, the Streets. have been hinted at by many scandalised beholders, but no publication would reproduce, whether with the aid of phonograph or photograph, the foulness that reigned supreme. "A daughter," says Mr. Walkley, "was torn shrieking from her father's arms, and kissed in succession by half a dozen ruffians who stood waiting for their prey." Any good-looking girl without an escort was seized and kissed and passed from hand to hand for similar treatment, utterly regardless of her protests. Protests, indeed, were inaudible, for squeakers and rattles and horns, and every variety of instrument that could be pressed into service for creating a barbaric row, were in full blast. One observer philosophically says, speaking of the hopelessness of any vocal remonstrance on the part of the victims of the rough horse-play of the mob, a hundred pigs might have been stuck without a sound of their death-cries being heard above the din. It was a vulgar and brutal Saturnalia, which was so far removed from everything that has hitherto been witnessed in London on occasions of popular rejoicings that it created more amazement and stupefied disgust than would have been excited in more emotional latitudes if the revellers in their frenzy had absolutely followed the ancient custom and romped stark naked through the streets.

Such is London civilisation at the end of the 10th century! Such are

The Natural Child of the citizens whom our proud demo-Jingoism. cracy breeds in the heart of the The crowd was goodempire, and is still breeding. humoured; the claws of the tiger were closely drawn within their sheath; but those who watched our barbarians in their drunken frolic shuddered at the thought of what might be if instead of the well-filled paunch, the stomach of Demos was bitten with hunger and the face of him fiery with anger against a Government which, while capable of exciting his passions and ministering to his pride, had lost nerve to keep him within bounds or the intelligence to minister to his wants. Even the luckless Phaethon who drives the chariot of the Daily Mail was constrained to turn his eyes away, appalled by the spectacle of the result which had followed the course which he had taken. Affrighted, he raises the cry of Hooliganism. Formerly when the same mob had been engaged in the still more brutal pastime of breaking up peace meetings and mobbing the advocates of conciliation, he contemplated the scene with complacent approval. The Man in the Street, lately deified as if he were the incarnation of the virtues of Jesus Christ and the military genius of Julius Cæsar, is naturally amazed when his flatterers dub him Hooligan for giving free course to his God-given instincts.

in ] sole can WOL fulfi Pag phil at a app page

to

havi

atte

Gen

bl

Fr

be thi

rui

ful

sol

the eve

ins

the ise

fuls

ıma

ret

lus

ver

tur

upor of th polls

Cam triun Hooliganism Rampant.

ograph,

r," says father's ruffians

ooking passed utterly

, were

s, and pressed ere in speak-

strance

se-play stuck

heard ırnalia,

at has ions of zement excited

n their custom

at the ich are demo-

of the s good-drawn

d our

at the ll-filled

with against ing his nerve nce to aethon

s con-

ectacle

he had anism.

ged in peace liation, proval. e were nd the mazed

ng free

Hooliganism, no doubt, spread itself in Fleet Street and the Strand at the end of October, but a far more malignant and far more dangerous

Hooliganism has been spreading itself to far more bloody purpose in the last few months in the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. Possibly having touched the very Nadir of national degradation, we may now be about to begin a penitential march towards better things. The cry of derision and of scorn which has rung through every capital in Europe at this disgraceful spectacle may perhaps bring some of the more sober of our lingoes to a sense of the madness of their recent policy. The aboriginal brute, all red in tooth and claw, still lurks in the lair of every human form. If our mentors and our instructors in the Press and in the pulpit devote themselves for twelve months to glorifying organised murder, if we intoxicate our masses with fulsome adulation, and accustom them to batten in imagination upon scenes of bloodshed and of outrage, we are preparing for ourselves a terrible Those who have pandered to the retribution. lusts of the devil within may be the first to feel his vengeance when, disappointed and chagrined, he turns in hungry but drunken fury to rend and slay.

The Silence the Church. The scene on Saturday night was a full-dress (or undressed) rehearsal of the orgy of Monday night. Between the two orgies every Christian teacher in London had at least two opportunities of uttering solemn words of warning to his flock as to the significance of this unchaining of the lusts of man. It would be interesting to ascertain how many of them fulfilled what, to the uninstructed mind of an average Pagan, would seem to be the first duty of a philsopher or a moralist. So far as the Church figures at all in the whole sad panorama of shame and crime, it appears only when, as the central feature in the sorry pageant, twelve hundred youths mustered in St. Paul's to give solemn thanks to the Prince of Peace for having enabled them to return unscathed from the attempt to slay their brothers on the yeldt.

Such episodes, however shocking at 1 The Result distasteful they may be, are neverthe-General Election, less instructive and suggestive. They portray in rude but vivid colours upon a huge canvas the inward and visible meaning of the choice which the nation has just made at the polls. The Dissolution of Despair was followed by a Campaign of Falsehood which was crowned by the triumph of Mr. Chamberlain. It is true that the triumph was by no means so complete as he had hoped. The Dissolution, snatched on the stale register at a time it was possible for a bold liar to pretend that a victory at the polls would be followed by an immediate submission of the Boers, was ordered in the hope that it would strengthen the Ministerial majority. Instead of doing this, the Ministers, a though using to the very uttermost every ignoble artifice which an unscrupulous electioneerer could suggest, failed to restore the majority o that at which it had stood at the beginning of the last Parliament. When Lord Salisbury took office, he had a majority of 152; when he dissolved, his majority had sunk to 128. When the roll of the new Parliament was made up, his majority stood at 134. The net gain of three seats was due entirely to the Scotch. In England-the predominant partner-the result of the Dissolution of Despair had been to reduce rather than to increase the Ministerial strength.

be deciding.

In order to produce a deep impression A Six to Five upon the world in general and upon Majority. the Boers in particular, the Ministerialists, under the leadership of Mr. Chamberlain as their fugleman, proclaimed that every seat won by the Liberals was a seat sold to the Boers. Every one who voted for a Liberat candidate was declared to be a Boer or a traitor. Candidates who had themselves fought in the field against the Boers, and whose sons had tallen in Mr. Chamberlain's war, were represented in cartoon and in placard strenuously aiding Mr. Kruger in attempt to haul down the British flag. Yet. notwithstanding all this, the Liberals polled up so well that if the representation in Parliament had been justly proportioned to the balance of voting strength in the constituencies, the Ministerial majority, instead of standing at 134, would have dwindled down to less than half that number. For every six patriots and Imperialists, five "Boers" or "traitors" went to the poll. And this on a stale register, with a hurried election, in which there was not even time to cover the constituencies or to distribute informatica upon the questions on which the electors were supposed to

The most melancholy feature of the The Libera 'Leaders!" election, and one which illustrates most sadly the decadence of our people, was the fatuous imbecility displayed by the Liberal Leaders. Never did any collective body of men charged with the conduct and direction of Her Majesty's Opposition fail so signally at a time of crisis. Although they were, or professed to be, absolutely agreed as to the folly and ineptitude displayed by the Ministers in the diplomacy which preceded the war, and in the preparations afterwards entered into for its prosecution, they could not, in the face of a common enemy, agree upon a common formula, which would have afforded the electors a clear is ue upon which to vote. The fumes of the Jingo de auch seemed to have dazed the brains of the whole self-styled Imperialist wing. Men like Sir Henry Fow er, Sir Edward Grey and others of that ilk, seemed more anxious to denounce President Krugera work of supererogation surely-than to attempt to restrain within reasonable limits the excited patriotism of their own countrymen. They wished, they said, to disassociate themselves from the pro-Boers, to make it quite clear that they were willing to support the Government in waging the war to the bitter end. It was with a somewhat malignant Schadenfreude that philosophical observers noted the complete and humiliating failure of their tactics. Every one of them was branded by Mr. Chamberlain as being a Boer and a traitor just as much as if they had written the letters of Dr. Clark and applauded the amateur diplomacy of Mr. Labouchere. In the presence of such recreants and in the absence of any strong and courageous lead on the part of their nominal chiefs, it is astonishing that the rank and file of Liberals were not more utterly confounded. It is, indeed, true that Her Majesty's Opposition have not been judged according to their sins or rewarded according to their iniquities.

Features the Fight.

There were very few features of the Election, but some stand out conspicuous. The first was the fact that, so far as Ministerialists were concerned, it was Mr. Chamberlain's battle. He made speeches every night, and sent telegrams every day. No other Minister was audible. At a later stage, when it was seen that Mr. Chamberlain's outrageous -conduct had revolted many even in the Conservative ranks, Mr. Balfour was put up to endeavour to explain away and render somewhat presentable the naked indecencies of his colleague's exhibition. But with that exception the rest of the Ministry might as well have been in their graves. On the Liberal side Sir Henry Campbell - Bannerman made a halfhearted speech in London, which hardly touched upon any of the real questions at issue. Mr. Morley was hors de combat on a sick bed in Hampshire. Sir William Harcourt, still impenitent of the great sin by which he more than any living man rendered possible the dictatorship of Mr. Chamberlain, was fighting down in Wales, while as for Sir Edward Grev and Mr. Asquith, the utmost that they could do in the way of platform oratory was utterly inadequate to undo the mischief done by their previous utterances in support of the war. With the exception of Mr. Burns, Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Philip Stanhope, hardly any of the rank and file of the Liberal candidates made their voices heard above the din.

Some Notable

It was a hugger-mugger election, rushed through amid yells of "pro-Boer" and "traitor," a vast confused mêlee in which the rank and file of the Opposition, practically leaderless and overwhelmed with the foulest abuse, fought gallantly and well. When the battle was over, and parties began to estimate their gains and losses, it was found that, with the exception of Mr. Stuart and Mr. Philip Stanhope, no conspicuous member of the opponents of the war in England who had fought the matter out with his constituents had gone to the wall. Mr. Burns, Mr. Channing, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. C. S. Scott, had all retained their seats. In Scotland they were less fortunate, but one of these seats was not so much lost as abandoned, when Dr. Clark decided not to face the music in his own constituency. Besides the friends of peace who were re-elected by their old constituencies, there were two conspicuous advocates of peace who took a leading part in the Peace Crusade. who achieved victories which astounded every one. Mr. Corrie Grant's victory at Rugby was won from a sick bed, in the face of the personal intervention of Mr. Chamberlain, while Mr. W. R. Cremer, the indefatigable advocate of arbitration, achieved the unique honour of being the only Liberal who won an enemy's seat in Northern London. Everything goes to show that if the old Liberal Party had but fought upon the lines which Mr. Gladstone would certainly have laid down, had he lived, the result of the Election would have been very different.

When the polling opened, the result for the first two days was indecisive, Losses and Gains. but on the third day—a black Thursday, indeed-the Jingoes almost swept the board. It was the one day on which Mr. Chamberlain achieved a semblance of success. When the counties came to the poll, the result of the Jingo victories was one by one wiped out, until on the last day of the polling it appeared probable that the General Election would not have altered the Ministerial majority by a single unit. Two seats, however, were lost, and a fortnight later the belated polling in

D

H M A

De De De La Du

Yo

Wi Ra Co Glo Wa Ch

Inv

Lin

ma as Lib

an ı exc Edward buld do dequate erances of Mr. anhope, anhope, candilection, f "proonfused file of helmed d well. gan to d that, Philip ponents matter e wall. e, Mr. etained rtunate, lost as to face es the old concates of rusade, ry one. from a ntion of ne indeunique enemy's e result lecisive, Thursalmost ch Mr. When e Jingo the last hat the

: Minis-

owever,

olling in to show

pon the ve laid the Orkney and Shetland Isles transferred a third seat to the Unionists. The following list of the seats gained and lost by the two parties will show the varying fortunes of the fight:—

| •                                              |                                                                                |
|------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| OPPOS:TION GAINS, Oct. 1. Hartlepool 1 Oct. 2. | MINISTERIAL GAINS.                                                             |
| Oct. I.                                        | Oct. I.                                                                        |
| Hartlepool I                                   | Plymouth                                                                       |
| Oct. 2.                                        | Oldham                                                                         |
| Gloucester 1                                   | Galway City                                                                    |
| Grantham I                                     | Oct. 2.                                                                        |
| Hastings                                       | Leicester                                                                      |
| Northampton , . I                              | Middlesbrough                                                                  |
| Wolverhampton, South . 1                       | Stockton                                                                       |
| Swansea Town I                                 | Oct. 3.                                                                        |
| Oct. 3.                                        | Shetheld                                                                       |
| Derby                                          | Sunderland 1                                                                   |
| Walsall 1                                      | Oct. 4.                                                                        |
| Dublin, St. Stephen's                          | Bethnal Green, S.W 1                                                           |
| Green 1                                        | Hoxton 1                                                                       |
| Oct. 4.                                        | Stepney 1                                                                      |
| Camberwell, N 1                                | Burnley                                                                        |
| Haggerston                                     | Hanley                                                                         |
| Oct. 5.Northants, Mid                      | Leeds, East                                                                    |
| Northants, Mid                                 | Newcastle-under-Lyme 1                                                         |
| Maidstone I                                    | Portsmouth 2                                                                   |
| Oct. 6.                                        | Southampton 1                                                                  |
| Appleby 1                                      | Southampton 1Glasgow, Blackfriars 1                                        |
| Oct. 8.                                        | " Bridgeton I                                                                  |
| Lancashire, Radcliffe 1                        | Edinburgh, S                                                                   |
| Carmarthen District I                          | Oct. 5.                                                                        |
| 0-4 0                                          | Londonderry 1                                                                  |
| Derby, High Peak 1                             | Cockermouth                                                                    |
| Devon, Torquay 1                               | Oct. 9. Staffs, Burton I Lancashire, Middleton I Oct. 10.  Monmouth District I |
| Oct. 10.                                       | Staffs, Burton 1                                                               |
| Cambs, Wisbech 1                               | Lancashire, Middleton I                                                        |
| Devon, Barnstaple 1                            | Oct. 10,                                                                       |
| Lancashire, Lancaster 1                        | Monmouth District 1                                                            |
| Dublin, Co., South 1                           | Dumfriesshire                                                                  |
| Cardiff                                        | Dumfriesshire 1Oct. 11.                                                    |
| Yorkshire, Otley 1                             | Tyneside                                                                       |
| Oct. 11.                                       | Sutherlandshire ILancs., Southport I                                       |
| Wilts, Westbury 1                              | Lancs., Southport                                                              |
|                                                | Oct. 12.                                                                       |
| Radnorshire I                                  | Cumberland, Eskdale 1                                                          |
| Cornwall, Camborne 1                           | Devon, Tavistock 1                                                             |
| Gloucester, Stroud 1                           | Durham, S.E                                                                    |
| Warwick, Rugby I                               | Essex, Walthamstow I                                                           |
| Oct. 13.                                       | Oct. 13.                                                                       |
| Cheshire, Crewe 1                              | Lincoln, Gainsborough 1                                                        |
| Lincoln, Spalding                              | Oct. 15.                                                                       |
| Yorkshire, Skipton                             | Aberdeenshire, E 1                                                             |
| Inverness-shire                                | Oct 16                                                                         |
| thverness-since                                | Wick Burghs 1                                                                  |
| 35                                             | O.t. 30.                                                                       |
| 35                                             | Orkney and Shetland 1                                                          |
|                                                | orane, and one claim 1                                                         |
|                                                | -8                                                                             |

The vote by Nations.

The result of the appeal to the people varied considerably in the different national sections which make up the United Kingdom.

Scotland for the first time since 1832 returned a Tory majority, although many of the Tories were disguised as Liberal Unionists. The figures are—Tories 18, Liberal Unionists 19, Liberals 35. Ireland returned an unbroken phalanx of Nationalists in every division, excepting North-east Ulster. In England the Tory majority remained intact. Wales alone contributed to retrieve the fortunes of the Liberals. At the Dissolution, gallant little Wales returned 22 Liberals and 8 Conservatives. When the election was over the Liberal majority in Wales had risen from 14 to 22.

Mr. Cook of the Daily News, who has for fifteen years occupied the the Vote Went. undisputed position of first electoral statistician, has made some attempt to estimate the exact balance of electoral attempt to estimate the exact balance of electoral strength, after making allowance for the votes in the unpolled constituencies. His theory is that it is just to allow the party holding an uncontested seat two votes for each one that would have been polled for his opponent if there had been a contest. This calculation is made on the assumption that 75 per cent. of the electorate go to the poll. On this basis the total electoral strength of the Government in the constituencies is 2,466,935, and that of the Opposition is 2,049,064. If the seats were allotted in strict proportion to the amount of support each party possesses in the constituencies, the Conservative majority would stand at 61.

The Reconstruction of the Ministry.

When the Election was over, and Ministers, according to their own showing, had received a triumphant renewal of their mandate from the people, they began at once a process of reconstruction which illustrates better than anything else how hollow was the contention that the popular vote was in any sense a vote of confidence. Lord Salisbury at the beginning of the Election was reported to have declared that he would regard a renewal of his majority as a declaration that the country approved of the Cabinet as it was, and in that case he would not dream of making any material change in his Cabinet: especially he would not surrender the dual office which he had held for so long. No sooner, however, was the Election over than a change came over the spirit of his dream. Rumour, which in this case is believed to be well founded, asserts that the change was due to the direct intervention of no less a deus ex machina than Her Majesty the Queen.

The Intervention reigns but does not govern has seldom received a more remarkable refutation than the fact that she was able, at the very moment when Lord Salisbury had received a renewal of the popular verdict, to compel him to do the one thing which he most hated to do, and to persuade him to surrender the seals of the Foreign Office. Her Majesty, who is sincerely attached to Lord Salisbury, and who naturally dreads the prospect of being left face to face with Mr. Chamberlain as his possible successor, had no difficulty in finding cogent arguments to convince the septuagenarian Prime Minister that regard for her and for his own health necessitated the transfer of the Foreign Office to a younger man. Lord Salisbury reluctantly bowed to the inevitable, and began the reconstruction of his Cabinet.

The New Foreign Minister. His first step was to dismay and confound the more vehement of his supporters by selecting for Foreign Minister the very man whom they had almost with unanimity condemned as the weakest and most unsuccessful member of the Ministry. Lord Lansdowne as Secretary for War had worked hard, and if the election had really been what it had been made out to be—a triumphant endersement by the nation of the war in South Africa—he might fairly claim a leading share in the honours of the day. But those who were most emphatic in asserting that the electors had endorsed the war, were almost equally vehement in asserting that the country would be bitterly disappointed if the Minister responsible for its conduct were not immediately relegated to private life. Instead of this result following, they were horrified to discover that the much abused War Minister was chosen for the first post in the Cabinet, and had received from Lord Salisbury the seals of the Foreign Office. A roar of savage dissatisfaction arose from the Ministerial organs, their chagrin being one of the few consolations enjoyed by the discomfited Liberals.

The Marquis of Lansdowne.
(New Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.)

The work of reconstruction now The proceeded apace. Five members Retiring Cabinet Ministers, of the old Cabinet resigned. Lord Cadogan has been superseded as Viceroy of Ireland; Sir Matthew White-Ridley, who has achieved a record in giving us a Home Secretary whose administration is remembered neither for good nor for evil, has left the Home Office; Mr. Henry Chaplin, the typical country squire, retired on an Old Age Pension from the Local Government Board; and Mr. Goschen, who had refused to appeal for re-election, resigned his headship of the Admiralty. Of the retiring five, no one calls for a special remark excepting Mr. Goschen, whose administration of the Navy has been characterised throughout by an energetic devotion to the great Service upon whose efficiency the existence of the Empire depends.

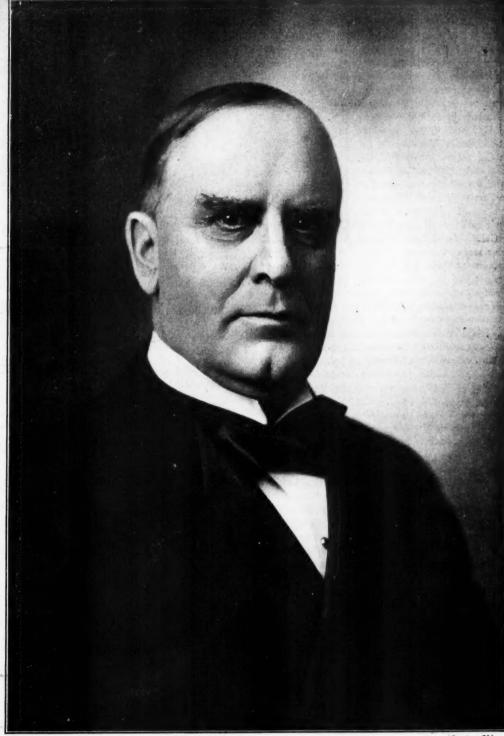

The New Cabinet Ministers. very circumscribed area. The first and the only significant selection was that which transferred Mr. Brodrick from the Secretaryship at the Foreign Office to the War Office. Lord Lansdowne's successor is amiable but rather wooden-headed, industrious in his office, without imagination, without tact, and without any of the driving energy which is one of the first essentials if he is to be a War Minister at the present crisis. His. selection gave a quietus to all the hopes of those who imagined that we were on the eve of a great era of military reform. The choice of Lord Selborne as Mr. Goschen's successor took no one by surprise. Lord. Selborne married Lord Salisbury's daughter, and for the last five years he has been Mr. Chamberlain's undersecretary at the Colonial Office. He also is an amiable: person, efficient in office routine, but hitherto he has not succeeded in impressing his friends with the idea that ours of atic in r, were ountry responegated g, they d War abinet, of the n arose g one mfited now mbers igned. super-Whiteus a mem-Home quire, Local had heado one schen, actergreat of the folios, thin a first in was Secre-Office. rather ithout of the ials if His who era of me as

Lord or the inderniable: as not a that

Courtney.]

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

President of the United States.

Canton, Ohio.

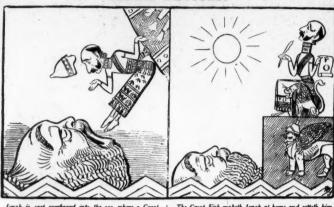

he has any of the qualities that should belong to a man chosen to rule the Queen's Navy. Lord Londonderry, one of the North Country Conservative Peers, who have not distinguished themselves particularly by their devotion to the Government, has been admitted within the portals of the Cabinet as Secretary of the, Board of Agriculture. Mr. George Wyndham, whose appointment to the Secretaryship of War would have raised great expectations, has been transferred to the post of Chief Secretary for Ireland, with a seat in the Cabinet. The appointment was not a bad one. It will either make Mr. Wyndham or break him, for the Irish are once more united and constitute by far the most formidable section of Her Majesty's Opposition. Mr. Gerald Balfour, whose administration of Ireland has been marked by much courage and ability, leaves Dublin for the Board of Trade.

Still much remains to be done in the shape of a general shuffle of the old cards. Sir M. White-Ridley was succeeded at the Home Office by Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Long left the Board of Agriculture to succeed Mr. Chaplin at the Local Government Board. Mr. Hanbury reluctantly consented to become Postmaster-General, and vacated thereby the Secretar ship of the Treasury, which was handed over to Mr. Austen Chamberlain. The Viceroyship of Ireland is likely to be given to Lord Zetland, or to Lord Dudley, who is said to have distinguished himself in South Africa more than the other rival for the post, the Duke of Marlborough, remains the Under-Secretaryship for Foreign Affairs, and the report is that Lord Salisbury will confer this upon his eldest son, Lord Cranbourne, who in that case will be the one outsider brought into the reconstituted Administration. The net effect of these changes has been to leave the Ministry very much as it was. Some old men have gone out, and some younger ones have come in, but with the exception of Mr. Wyndham there are none of the new Cabinet Ministers who have shown any trace of possessing the personality of men who will leave their mark on the history of their country.

JONAH-REVISED.

Fish is hindly prepared to receive him.

Westminster Gazette.

Lord Lansdowne goes from the War Office to the Foreign Office.

The Net Effect of the Changes.

Abroad the changes have been noted with comparative indifference. As long as Mr. Chamberlain was not made Foreign Secretary, it did not matter much to other Powers what nominee of Lord Salisbury's was selected to carry out the Prime Minister's policy. The new Administration is not much rejuvenated. Ministers, wearied with five years of collar work, are not likely to display much energy because the portfolio which they hold has been changed. It is alleged that one reason why Lord Salisbury was persuaded or compelled to leave the Foreign Office was in order that he might, as Prime Minister, exercise more control over the African settlement and the details of Army reform. There will not be much Army reform; and as for Lord Salisbury's subjecting Mr. Chamberlain to more effectual control after the Election than he did before, they may tell that to the marines.

The War in South Africa. The war in South Africa continues to rage as fiercely as ever. Already even the dullest patriot who voted khaki in reliance upon the impudent lie told him by the Ministerial candidates, that if the Election went against the Liberals the war would instantly come to an end, can realise how shamefully he has been duped. Every one knows perfectly well that the burghers are governed in their operations by far other considerations than the rise and fall of party majorities at Westminster. They are fighting as it is to be hoped Englishmen and Scotchmen would fight for their country if it were overrun by a foreign force which refused all terms save the absolute extinction of

Elliott and Fry.]
Sir Charles Tupper.
(Leader of the Opposition in Canada.)

their national existence. Even if the burghers were not, as experience has shown them to be, among the bravest and stubbornest of men, it is difficult to conceive what motive they could have for laying down their arms. Those under De Wet, who are seizing mail trains, blowing up bridges, and surprising British outposts, are broken men, whose homes we have burned, whose property we have confiscated, whose sons we have carried off to exile in Ceylon, and who have nothing in this world to hope for. The farce of reducing the garrison is going on somewhat in the following fashion: - In one week some 1,300 C.I.V.'s are sent home with great flourish of trumpets to afford ocular demonstration to the multitude that the war is over. The same week 2,000 regular soldiers are shipped to replace them. The net result of the supposed reduction is thus an increase of nearly 1,000 men. Note, by the way, that the whole of the C.I.V.'s refused the offer to enter for another year. When Ministers brought in their last financial estimate, it was estimated that half the army of occupation would be withdrawn before September. We are now in November, and the army of occupation is as busily engaged as ever in the work of "pacification." Lord Roberts's departure, frequently announced, is postponed from time to time, while the unfortunate Outlander refugees at Capetown find themselves once more heart-sick with hope deferred by the steady refusal of the Government to allow them to return to Johannesburg.

The Reversion to Savagery. It is evident that the British military authorities in Africa are becoming desperate and in their desperation are resorting to a policy which recalls the dark days of the Thirty Years' War. Stories of the ravaging of the Palatinate or the desolation which Hyder Ali created in the Carnatic are recalled by the stories from Africa of the methods now being resorted to by our troops in the vain effort o crush the resistance of a handful of burghers. British generals march through districts spreading on every side a broad swathe of destruction. Unable to out march, out-general or capture the indomitable commandoes which hang upon their flanks, they take a sullen revenge in giving to the flames every homestead that they meet with in their march. A broad belt of smoking ruins marks the trail of the army. We now understand how it is that the Turk used to boast that grass never grew where his horse's hoof had trod. Lord Kitchener would be a proud man if he could make that boast, for devastation is the order of the day. Whole districts are denuded of every scrap of forage, every sack of grain. Women and children are turned homeless, defenceless, penniless, into the veldt, to be the prey of the lusts of the Kaffirs, or of the less violent, but not less cruel, vice of our own camps. We are deliberately creating a famine in the territory which we have over-run, but which we cannot govern. To this day our authority in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State extends just so far as the range of the rifles of our garrison, and when these garrisons are transferred from place to place our authority disappears as the foam track dies away in the wake of a ship at sea. 'Meanwhile, with all this devil's work going on unchecked, with the rules of war trampled cynically under foot, there is no voice either of Christianity or humanity raised in all England to protest against deeds which might bring the blush to the cheek of Abdul the Damned. Progress of the world indeed! There is a march of events, no doubt, but a march tending steadily to the nethermost Hell.

ready voted udent if the vould efully well as by party it is fight force on of noted

s not

d not

Lord

Prime

s not years

nergy

inged.

y was

Office

nister.

ement ot be sub-ontrol

y tell inues

As

The Dutch Warship "Gelderland," which is conveying President Kruger to Europe.

Mr. Kruger in Europe. After many delays Mr. Kruger has at last got safely on board the Dutch man-of-war, the Gelderland, and will probably arrive at Marseilles before these pages see the light. The stories that he was carrying with him enormous sums of gold have turned out to be as untrustworthy as ninety-nine out of every hundred of the lies with which the British public has been stuffed by people who have made it their business to bring about this war. The French have been considerably exercised lest the natural sympathy felt by every civilised human being outside our Islands for the victim of British aggression should find vent in manifestations that would endanger the good relations between the two countries. Hotel-keepers of the Riviera, who are just preparing to receive their English customers, are foremost in demanding that an extinguisher should be placed upon any manifestation of popular feeling on behalf of the old President. The fears of the French are a painful commentary upon the extent to which our reputation for sang froid and indifference to Continental doings has suffered of late years. But we are living in an age when Mr. Chamberlain felt himself justified in threatening France with war if she did not mend the manners of her caricaturists, and therefore the French being peaceably disposed not unnaturally feel it is well to strain a point rather than provoke a paroxysm of fury on behalf of those who they feel for the moment are little better than irresponsible madmen. If, however, popular feeling should defy restraint by the authorities and the hotel-keepers, the consequences may be more serious. Considering the riotous exuberance of the popular welcome which Englishmen have from time to time extended to Kossuth and Garibaldi, to say nothing of the other kind of demonstration which they accorded to Marshal Haynau, it is not a little humiliating to find Englishmen exulting in the thought that their displeasure may have the effect of preventing any widespread demonstration of enthusiasm on behalf of President Kruger. Our own experience ought to have taught us that nothing intensifies popular feeling so much as forbidding its legitimate mode of expression.

th

fri

th

br

C

M

re

E

E

CC

de

th

ar

VI

ha

pa

A Peace Pilgrimage to Paris.

A propos of the anxiety of the French to remain at peace with England, I am glad to note the brilliant success which attended the peace mission of Mr. W. R. Cremer, M.P., and the deputation of the leading trade-unionists of this country, who, on the last Sunday in October, met at the Bourse du Travail, in Paris, the representatives of

Sir Ernest Satow. (New British Minister at Pekin.)

a which a little in the ffect of enthuir own nothing ling its

of the with te the ed the ed, and of this met at ves of the French working-men, and assured them of the friendly and fraternal feeling which prevailed among the workers on this side of the Channel towards their brothers in France. The President of the Trade-Union Congress, and Mr. Bell, the newly-elected Liberal Member for Derby, were among the deputation. M. Jaurès, the Socialist leader, with the most respected representatives of French trade-unionism, received the English deputation with enthusiasm, and vociferously applauded the uncompromising address in which the English workers denounced the Yellow Press of both countries as the enemies of civilisation, and maintained, despite all the efforts of these children of the Devil, the firm resolve of the workmen to live in peace and amity with their brothers in France. If six drunken costermongers or music-hall rowdies had made a vulgar row in the boulevards, their escapade would have received more attention than our English newspapers have bestowed upon this effort for international re-union between French and English workmen. But then the children of the Devil naturally chronicle with more appreciation the vulgar exploits of men of their own kidney than they do the efforts of the peacemakers, of whom it is written, "They shall be called the children of God."

The Situation in China.

Peacemakers, indeed, are very much at a discount at present. Russia has declared her determination to abstain from any act of war against

China, and has withdrawn her troops from Pekin. Thereupon the sapient instructors of our public see in this anxiety to avoid war a clear proof of some deep-hidden design for the purpose of injuring this country. The Allies, minus Russia and the United States, continue under Count Waldersee to indulge in abortive expeditions, which so far have happily failed to provoke the Chinese to fight. Peace negotiations are carried on intermittently, but the list of the proscribed officials whose heads are demanded as a forfeit for the attack upon the Legations grows longer daily, Count von Bülow.

New German Imperial Chancellor.

(Taken specially for the "Woche" on the 20th October, the day after his appointment.)

Freiherr von Richthofen.

New German Minister for Foreign Aff.irs.

(By courtesy of the proprietors of the "Woche.") and as each of these men marked for slaughter holds a position of influence in the Chinese Court, it is difficult to see how peace is to be re-established, unless we can suppose that they are capable of the most heroic act of self-sacrifice for the good of their country. Germany is in a false position, having sent out Count Waldersee, who has not had anything to do corresponding to the dignity of his rank or the fanfaronade which heralded his appointment. It is very much to be feared that, in order to justify the Waldersee mission, Germany will insist upon terms which render the continuance of the war inevitable.

The Anglo-German Agreement.

Meanwhile at home a sorry farce has been played by the German and English Governments—no one can exactly say for what purpose. I refer to the Anglo-German Agreement, which was produced with a great flourish of trumpets, but which upon examination turns out to leave things exactly as they were before. As soon as the troubles in China broke out the Russian Government formally notified all the Powers of the principles upon which it intended to base its action, These principles were the maintenance of the territorial status quo in China, and the maintenance of the treaty status quo, which means the Open Door. Now the English and German Governments draw up an agreement by which they declare themselves in favour of the territorial status quo, and of the treaty status quo, that is of the open door, which was secured by the existing treaties. They then proceed to say that they will ask the adhesion of all the other Powers to this declaration of principle, a proposal which, to the Russian Government, at least, seems almost to be an impertinence. There is a further clause in this marvellous Agreement which says that in case either of the Powers disregard it. England and Germany reserve to themselves the right to say what they shall do under the circumstances. Unless there is a secret treaty behind this formal Agreement, nobody seems to be able to understand why it was ever drawn up or published. Possibly it was drawn up in order to be published, but what good the publication would do either to England or to Germany does not yet appear. The only other suggestion that has been made which seems to throw any light upon the subject is that made by "Diplomaticus" in the Westminster Gazette, when he insists that by the recognition of all existing treaties England has surrendered to Germany the right to use the railways in Shantung for the purpose of favouring German trade. This Shantung treaty we had hitherto never recognised, and it was declared that we should never do so unless we secured corresponding liberty of action in the Yang-tse Valley. Now this treaty is officially recognised as binding, but when we are asked what quid pro quo we have received for abandoning this right to the open door in Shantung, we look in vain for an answer.

The chief political event on the Count von Bülow's Continent this last month has been the retirement of Count Hohenlohe, and the appointment of Count von Bülow as his successor as Chancellor of the German Empire. Count Hohenlohe is an old man, who needed all his years and all his experience in order to keep the Kaiser somewhat within bounds. Count von Bülow, his successor as Foreign Minister, has attained considerable reputation. He is a brisk, energetic, genial man, who speaks English excellently, and who makes very good friends with all those people with whom he has to do. German policy is not much affected by the personal idiosyncrasies of German Ministers, and in Count von Bülow we have a straightforward, energetic, clear-headed man of bus

Ex ow the

in

....

Prince Hohenlohe.

Who has resigned his position as Imperial Chancellor.

(From a snapshot taken when hunting. By courtesy of the proprietors of the " A oche.") business who will, at any rate, tell us his mind with frankness and precision.

The Close of the Exhibition.

The French Exhibition closes its doors on the 12th November. It is by universal consent the greatest Exhibition that has ever been held in the world. Possibly it is one of the greatest Exhibitions that will ever be held in any time. Yet, owing to the insane policy of some of our newspapers, thousands of English men and women have abstained from visiting the World's Fair, which is on a scale of beauty and magnificence they never dreamed of. The French Government and French people may well be congratulated on the greatest achievement in this particular line that stands to the credit of the human race. The boycotting of the Exhibition by the Prince of Wales, by the representatives of English society, and by many middle-class people who were led by the newspapers to think that English would not be civilly treated in Paris, and that the Exhibition was a failure, has been among the minor discreditable episodes which disgraced our history in the past year. Fortunately the French have been able to hold their Exhibition without our help. It is sad to think that such a collection of buildings and palaces must disappear, to say nothing of a collection of the chefs d'œuvre of human industry which is to be dispersed never to be reassembled. But many permanent glories will remain, and not the least will be the memory of the admirable self-control and good temper displayed by the French Government and people during the whole of this eventful nciples us quo status English ent by ritorial of the reaties.

Queen Wilhelmina of Holland and her prospective Consort arriving at the Hague.

01010101010101010101010

ement regard es the ircumd this ole to lished. ed, but agland other throw ts that nd has ilways erman never never ty of aty is e are d for ntung,

n the s been nlohe, nt von erman , who Count r, has brisk, ently, those licy is order

have in of

DIARY FOR OCTOBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

Oct. z. Three thousand shoemakers at Marseilles strike for an advance in wages.

An International Maritime Conference opens in Paris

Paris.
The Shah arrives at Constantinople.
A new branch of the underground electric railway is opened in Paris from the Place de l'Étoile to the Trocadero.
At a sitting of the International Peace Congress the refusal of the British Government to agree to arbitration in its dispute with the

to agree to arbitration in its dispute with the Transvaal is condemned as calculated to retard the pacific evolution of humanity.

3. Rain in India reported abundant by the Viceroy.

4. The Budget Committee in Paris reduces the navy estimates by nearly 4,000,000 francs, but agrees to the scheme for coast defences. The International Peace Congress condemns the pillage of Peking and the proposal to give no quarter to the Chinese as contrary to the decisions of the Hague Conference.

gave no quarter to the Chinese as countary to the decisions of the Hague Conf.rence.

5. The Paloutnotchnie Canal, situated at the mouth of the Danube in Russian territory, is officially opened; the first Russian steamer omerany opened; the first Russian steamer passes through. The memorial presented to the French Govern-ment by the Prince of Cambodia is published in Paris.

A deputation of Bristol merchants to foster the development of trade with Jamaica arrives at Kingston.

6. Small-pox breaks out among the native soldiers and carriers in Ashanti.

The Berlin newspapers chronicle five trials for lêze-majesté, the most important being that of Herr Maximilian Harden, editor of the

A direct line of steamers between Jamaica and

A direct line of steamers between Jamaica and Bristoli se stablished.

Lord Ranfurly, Governor of New Zealand, lands at Rarotonga, and at the request of the chiefs annexes the Cook Islands.

Eo. An Old-Age Pension Bill is read for the first time in the Legislative Assembly at Sydney.

Sir John Forest, Premier of Western Australia, makes his Budget statement.

Ex. Ex-President Harri-on publishes his views on the approaching election in the United States.

the approaching election in the United States.

The Spinish riceipts from taxation show an increase of 10,000,000 pesetas as compared with the same period of 1839.

The Indian Viceroy's Executive Council hold a sitting to consider military expenditure.

The Senior Ts-anite Khomba, attached to the Chaliff of the Chaliff

he Senior 15-anite Khompa, attached to the Dalai Lama of Tibet, is presented to the Tsar in the Palace of Livadia.

Lightermen's Stilke commences in the port of London in which a thousand men are involved.

14 The Miners' Convention of America adopts a ne Miners Convention of America adopts a resolution unanimously to accept the em-ployers' so per cent. advance in wages if it is continued till April 1, 1901, and other grievances are to be submitted to arbitration. 15. The Vintage Festival takes place in the Paris

15. He Vininger resurts take plane Exhibition grounds.
 6. Lord and Lady Minto complete a journey through Western Canada.
 The Queen of Holland announces her betrothal to Duke Henry of MecklenburgCatanada.

Schwerin.
M. Ballot Beaupré is installed as President of the United Chambers of the Court of Cassa-

Mr. Bryan arrives in New York. The General Election ends, with the exception of Orkney and Shetland.

7. The resignation of Prince Hohenlohe as Chancellor of the German Empire is announced.

correspondence is published between Mr. Chamberlain and the Premier of South Australia regarding the salaries of Australian Governors

The coal strike in America ends, on the companies agreeing to the 10 per cent. advance till April 1, 1901, and the suspension of the eliding scale. 18. Count von Bülow is appointed Chancellor of the German Empire.

Mr. McLean, Premier of Victoria, announces the policy of the Government in view of the

A new Japanese Ministry is formed by the

A new Japanese Ministry is formed by the Marquis Ito,
In the New Zealand House of Representatives the Premier, Mr. Seddon, moves that the Imperial Government be requested to sanction the incorporation of Fiji as an integral part of New Zealand.

oronsequence of the appointment of General Weyler as Captain-General of Madrid, the Ministers of the Interior and of Agriculture

The Sugar Bounties Conference takes place at Paris.
21. Signor Silvela and the entire Spanish Ministry resign. 22. A new Spanish Ministry is arranged under the Premiership of General Azcarraga.

Pnotograph by] [Russell.

Lord Alverstone.

(New Lord Chief Justice.)

The Russian Budget of 1839 passes the State Comptroller with a surplus of 186,000,000 roubles.

President McKinley goes to Canton (Ohio) till after the election.

after the election.

Count von Bülow presides over a meeting of the Prussian Ministry on his appointment as Imperial Chaucellor and Minister-President.

Baron von Richthofen is appointed Foreign Secretary in succession to Count von Bülow. The German Emp-ror confers on Herr Krupp of Essen the rank of P.ivy Countlor and title of Excellency.

25. There is a conflict amongst the strikers at Valley Field, Canada; the Militia sent to maintain order. 26. The Miners' Federation of Great Britain closes its conference.

The lad Sipido is arrested at Billancourt, near

The Viceroy of India visits Karachi.

great demonstration in favour of peace, organised by the Labour Party of France, takes places in Paris, Mr. Pickles, English trade unionist, presiding.

 The C.I.V.s artive and march through London. A flightful fire and explosion takes place at New York, 38 persons killed and over 100 injured.

19. Pre b 20. Sir 22. Sha

24. Mr. be

25. The

26. The N

27. Gen

29. The for

Oct. 2.

G

ag of The

th The fre

Lo

The

of The fro

Li H The Ch Only

Gene

II. The

tro in and 12. The the

The The the An ex Li H

the Sir E Chi

joir kin The !

mae of t

fere

add Mir

Li Hu

requ

tsin

A Cal Chi A thou of th

It is o on Gree Sir E.

Aus The I

raily

17. The Tsu

Favo di

of The injured.

30. An earthquake takes place in Caracas, 25 persons are killed and many injured.

It is reported that Lord Salisbury will hold only the position of Prime Minister in the new Cabinet, and that Lord Lansdowne is to be the new Secretary for Forzign Affairs.

31. The un on of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches takes place.

The War in South Africa.

Oct. 1. The Austrian Lloyd steamer Styrie sails from Lorenzo Marques with 400 refuzees from the Transvaal, including Italians, Americans, and Frenchmen.

General Baden-Powell arrives in Pretoria to take over the command of 12,000 police for the Transvaal and Orange River Colony.

De Wet goes towards Heilbron.

The Hospital Commission opens at Kimberley.

Lord Roberts issues an appeal to employers of labour in Cape Colony and Natal asking for extension of leave for the Volunteers. Lord Roberts inspects the City Imperial Volunteers at Pretoria, previous to their departure for England.

for England. The conditions for service in the New South African police force are published. Lord Roberts issues a proclamation stating that the provisional government of the Transvaal is under General Maxwell.

The Hospital Commission concludes its investigations in Africa.

vestigations in Africa.
7. Colonel de Lisle's force has three days' fighting with the Boers under De Wet. Small patrols of Boers are abroad in Lady Brand District.

8. General Buller and his Staff arrive at Pretoria on their way to England.

The Natal Volunteers return to their homes with the exception of 300 who remain as border-guard.

One hundred and eighty-nine Boer prisoners arrive at St. Helena.

A train accident occurs on the Kaap River; 3 men are killed and 15 injured. The British reoccupy Rouxville, Wepener and Dwetsdorp.

An engine with truck on the line to Kaap River is captured by the Boers: thac suaties, I officer and private killed, 7 severely wounded, and 70 taken prisoners.

Mr. Rhodes opens the annual Congress of the

Mr. Rhodes opens the annual congress of the South African League.

Sir Alfred Milner issues a not'ce to refugees to the effect that able-bodied British are liable to military service in the districts in which they sattle.

The Concession Commission holds its first

1 ne Concession Commission notes 4.5 n. 3s sitting at Pretoria. 12. The Naval Brigade under Captain B.a-croft a rives at Simons Town en route for England. Sir A. Milner leaves Cape Town for Bloemfontein.

Mr. Rhodes at the Congress of the South African League opposes the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa.

At the suggestion of Mr. Rhodes all resolutions adverse to the use of the Dutch language are abandoned.

The British surprise a Boer laager near Frank-

A patrol of New South Wales Bushmen have

A patrol of New South Wales Bushmen have a skirmish with the Boers near Mafsking.
Mr. Rhodes is re-elected president of the South African Leagus.
The Cape Parliament is formally prorogued.
General Mahon has an engagement with the Boers near Heidelberg in which the British n Army Order announces that General S'r R:dvers Buller relinquishes the command of the Natal Field Force.

16. The Cheshirz, North Staffordshire and East Lancashire Volunteers leave for England.
17. General Sir R. Buller is presented with a sword of honour at Pietermaritzburg.

19. President Kruger leaves Lorenzo Marques on board the Dutch warship Gelderland for board the Dutch warship Getaerrana for Europe.

20. Sir Redvers Buller embarks from Durban for England on board the Hawarden Castle.
22. Sharp fighting takes place between the Boers and General French and Lord Methuen, with seventy British casualties.
24. Mr. Schreiner places his resignation as Member for Malmesbury in the hands of his election committee.

ondon. ace at er roo

35, 25

hold

in the terian sails

s from

Ameri-

ria to ce for erley.

ers of

g for olun-arture South Lord that ts in-

fight-Small

Brand

etoria

in as oners er; 3 r and

Kaap sual-e.e.y

f the igees are ricis

first croft oem-outh on of tions

uage ankhave the

d. the itish Si

d of East

ord

election committee.

25. The ceremony of proclaiming the annexation of the Transval takes place at Pretoria.

The Boers attack Jacobsdal; a detachment of the Cape Town Highlanders are cut up, losing 34 men out of 52.

26. The Boers make their appearance in Northern Natal.

27. General Knox obliges De Wet to retire, and captures two of his guns and some wagons.
29. The Boers blow up the main line near Jagersfontein

The Crisis in China.

Oct. 2. A telegram addressed by the Emperor of China to the German Emperor, and the German Emperor's reply, are published.
3. Favourable news reaches Washington from the different Foreign Offices indicating complete agreement with regard to China on the basis of Mr. Hay's Note of July 3rd.

The forts at Shan-hai-kwan are evacuated by

The forts at Shan-hai-kwan are evacuated by the Chinese.

The German Foreign Sccretary addresses a fresh Circular Note to the Embassies in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Washington and Rome.

The Russians occupy Mukden.

The Rench Foreign Office publishes the text of M. Delcasse's Note to the Powers.

The Germans commence building a branch line from Tang-ho to Ching-wan-tao.

Li Hung Chang leaves Tien-tsin for Peking.

The October instalment of interest on the Chinese 1858 loan is paid in full.

Only one company of Russian troops remains in Peking.

Only one company of Russian troops remains in Peking.

8. General Chaffee reports that all the American troops except the Legation Guard will be out of China within a fortnight. It is announced in the British brigade orders at Tien-tsin that Count Waldersee assumed the chief command on September 27.

11. The German telegraph line between Tien-tsin and Peking is completed.

12. The reformer, Sun-Yat-Sen, unfurls his flag at the town of Wei Chau, on the East River.

The Imperial Court is removed to Si-ngan-fu.

The Imperial Court is removed to Si-ngan-fu.
The Russians restore the Summer Palace to the Chinese.

An expedition of the Allied forces leaves Tienan expedition of the Amed forces leaves 11.5-tsin for Pao-ting-fu.

Li Hung Chang visits the various Ministers of the Powers at Peking, 13. Sir Ernest Satow, the new British Minister to China, arrives at Tien-tsin.
14. The Russian Southern and Northern armies

join hands at Ti-h-ling, north of Mukden.

The Emperor of China sends a letter from Shen-si to thank President McKinley for his

Shen-si to thank President McKinley for his kindness to China.

15. The foreign representatives in Peking have a meeting in which they formulate the demands of the Powers to China.

17. The Allied Powers hand back to China the Tsung-li-Yamên buildings as a place of conference. Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang address a Circular Note to the Foreign Ministers formulating proposals on the support address a Circular Note to the Foreign Ministers formulating proposals on the subject of the negotiations for peace.

Count von Waldersee arrives at Peking.

18. Li Hung Chang telegraphs to St. Petersburg requesting the return to P.king of M. de Giers, who consequently starts from Tientsin for P.king.

19. A Cabinet Meeting in Washington accepts the Chinese basis for commencing negotiations.
A thousand French troops take Teh-chau, north of the Yellow River.

20. It is officially announced that an exchange of Notes regarding Chinese affairs took place on the 16th between the Governments of Great Britain and Germany.

Sir E. Satow arrives at Peking escorted by the

Sir E. Satow arrives at Peking escorted by the Australian contingent.

The French troops at Pao-ting-fu hold the railway station and the railway line.

The rebellion against the present dynasty is proceeding in the Southern Provinces successfully.
 The Allies occupy Pao-ting-fu without oppositions of the Allies occupy Pao-ting-fu without oppositions.

24. The death of Kang Yi is announced.
25. Mr. Conger is authorised to begin negotiations with the Chinese at once. Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang ask the Foreign Ministers to state explicitly what officials descrive punishment and what degree of punishment the deserve.

Sir Claude MacDonald leaves Peking.

The Diplomatic body at Peking hold a conference to consider the form which the negotiations should take

SPEECHES.

Oct. z. Sir W. Harcourt, at Abertillery, in defence of Labour members. Mr. Balfour, at Manchester, on the divisions among Liberals.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Coventry, on the Opposi-

Photograph by

[Elliott and Fry.

The Late Prof. Max Müller.

 Sir W. Harcourt, at Blaina, on Mr. Chamber-lain and the British Nation.
 Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at South Queens-ferry, on the Army.
 Mr. Chamberlain, at Warwick, on the War in "South Africa. South Africa.

Mr. Balfour, at Droylsden, on the War in South Africa. Mr. Philip Stanhope, at Burnley, on the Jameson Raid.

3. Sir W. Harcourt, at New Tredegar, on the

3. SIF W. Harcourt, at New Tredegar, on the Government.
Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Broughty Ferry, on Scotch Liberalism.
Mr. Balfour, at Glasgow, on the Opposition.
Lord Hopetoun, in London, on the Commonwealth of Australia.

4. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Dunfermline, on the true and falsa Imperialism.

on the true and false Imperialism.

Sir W. Harcourt, at Ebbw Vale, on the Liberal Party and the Colonies.

Sir W. J. Lyne, in the Legislative Assembly, Sydney, on the financial condition of New South Wales.

Mr. Balfour, at Kilmarnock, on the South African Settlement.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Burton-on-Trent, on the South African Settlement.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Culross, on foreign opinion and the war.

Mr. Stead, in Paris, on the work and methods the Inte national Peace Party should adopt. M. Milleraud, at Arras, on strikes and labour legislation.

8. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Dumbarton, on Mr. Chamberlain and the Election.
Mr. Balfour, at West Calder, on the effects of the Election.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Chose Town, on the War

Mr. Chamberlain, at Chose Town, on the War in South Africa.

9. Mr. Merriman, in the Cape Colony House of Assembly, on the publication of his letter to Mr. De Wet without his consent.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Stirling, on Mr. Chamberlain's mis-statements.

Mr. Balfour, at Bingley, on Imperialism and Radicals

ro. Mr. Cecil Rhodes, at Cape Town, on the policy of the South African League. Sir W. Harcourt, at Cwm, in Ebbw Vale, on Mr. Chamberlain's speeches.

Mr. Asquith, at Rugby, on the injustice of the Parliamentary Register. Mr. Herbert Gladstone, at Walthamstow, on Labour Representation. Mr. Balfour, at Ches-terfield, on British re-sponsibilities and resources. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Kilmarnock, on Mr. Chemberlain and the Settlement in South Af. ica.

12. Mr. Herbert Gladstone, at Runcorn, on

Mr. Herbert Gladstone, at Runcorn, on Unionist tactics during this Election.
 M. Paul Deschanel, near Chartres, on the advartages derived from co-operation in increasing agricultural prosperity in France.
 Sir Philip Magnus, on Technical Education.
 Sir John Madden, at Melbourne, on Im-perialism.

19. Lord Curzon, at Simla, on the Indian famine.
23. Mr. Pickard, at Saliburn-by-Sea, on Labour representation in Parliament and the present Election.

24. Mr. Chamberl: in, in the City, on the Empire.
26. Lord Rossbery, at Holborn, on the Borough

Elections. The Bishop of Hereford, at Aberystwith, on University Education. Mr. Roosevelt, at New York, on the Republican policy.

27. Mr. Burns, in Lendon, on the Union of Democratic forces. Mr. Bryan, at New York, on the Democratic

Mr. Bryan, at New York, on the Democratic policy.

28. M. Waldeck-Rousseau, at Toulouse, on the work of the present French Ministry.

30. The complete returns of the General Election come in. The Government has a majority of 134. At the Dissolution their majority was 128.

OBITUARY.

Oct. 2. Rev. James Porter, D.D., Master of Peter-house, Camb.idge. Dr. Arthur de Noë Walker, 80. Reur-Admiral Montgomery Sicard (United

Rear-Admiral Mon'gomery Sicard (United States Navy), 64.
General John A. McClernaud (Illinois, U.S.A.), 89.
Mr. W. Beatty Kingston (journalist), 63.
Mr. J. F. Frame, F.R.C.S., 62.
The Marquis of Bute, 53.
M. Adolphe Hatzfeld.
Mr. Thomas Gaskell Sherman (New York).
M. Adolphe Cochery, 81.
Lord Hamilton of Dalzell, 71.
His Excellency W. G. von Kusserow, Sir Henry Acland (Professor of Medicine, Oxford), 85.
Mr. W. L. Thomas (illustrative journalist), 70.
Baron von Neukerch.n.-Nyvenbeim.
Archdeacon Nevill, 78.
Colonel F. C. Maude, V.C., C.B., 72.
Mr. Charles Garrett, 77.
Rev. Charles Garrett, 77.

Mr. Charles Garrett., 74.
Rev. Charles Garrett., 74.
Mr. John Sherman (Washington, U.S.A.), 77.
Mr. W. Philp (East Cornwall Times), 93.
The Rev. Professor Shuttleworth, 50.
Captain the Hon. Foley Vereker, R.N., F.R.G.S., 50.

F. K. G. S., 50. Sims Resves, 82. Sir John Cowan, 86 Rev. Canon Maddock, 55. Professor Max-Muller, 77. Baron de Renzis di Mononnaro, 64. Prince Christian Victor (at Pretoria), 33.

CHARACTER SKETCH.

MR. BRYAN, THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER, IN 1900.

By CHARLES B. SPAHR.

FIRST met Mr. Bryan in the spring of 1894, and in a few hours I knew him well. It was an illustration of how quickly and strongly men are bound together by holding in common an unpopular belief.

When I was called to Washington in the spring of 1894, I took pleasure in sending him my card at the door of the House of Representatives. It was the morning that the Coxey procession was about to enter the Capitol grounds, and Mr. Bryan and I stood together on one of the terraces of the Capitol to watch the event. That which surprised me then I have since found to be a fundamental characteristic of the man. I had expected him, as the representative of a Western district, where Populists were a majority among his constituents, to be in sympathy with the Coxey propaganda. But I found that he took no stock in it whatever. The people for whom he stood were the men who were trying to work at their homes, and not the adventurers called together for a theatrical pro-cession; and the method of increasing the currency for which he stood was one which was under the control of the National Government, or which automatically secured a constant expansion upon which business could safely be conducted. His whole position towards the currency was not that of a Radical who believed in the dogma, "the more money the more prosperity," but of a Conservative who agreed with the classic economists, that the quantity of the currency should be regulated so as to secure business stability as well as business activity.

HOW HE BECAME A BIMETALLIST.

That evening Mr. Bryan dined with me at my hotel. and after dinner we had a long talk together. In the course of it he had occasion to tell me of the way in which he came to believe in bimetallism. When he was first elected to Congress, he said, he knew practically nothing about the question; but as his Republican opponent believed in the free coinage of silver, and his own sympathies were with the farmers in their demand for this measure, the issue was never referred to during the cam-

When he paign. reached Washington, he said, he told his wife that he believed the silver issue was going to grow in importance: and they two, who had been in college at the same time, who both had studied law, the wife that she might be with her husband in his work, even though she took no part in it. devoted their leisure during the winter in Washington to studying the silver question together. In speaking of the books which had most profoundly influenced them, he put first and foremost De Laveleye's "Bimetallism." This book, I happened to know. had not been translated from the French, and the chance remark showed that his reading had not been confined to the English works. But the charm of his story had no relation to the thoroughness of the scholarship which it evinced. It lay entirely in the rewhich it lation showed between

Ge ba

me

life one

Co

at !

Mr

sph

reli lov

ma

tha

free

priv

turi

stat

how life

peo

tion

of t

bee

The Hon. William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska.

himself and his wife. Heine once remarked that a German, even when married, continued to live "a bachelor life of the intellect." Mr. Bryan seemed to me to illustrate that in America, more and more man and wife share together the same intellectual life as well as the same social life. In speaking of one of his colleagues, who died during that session of Congress, Mr. Bryan said that "he found his inspiration at his fireside." This seemed to me to be equally true of Mr. Bryan himself; and the purity of the moral atmosphere about him, together with the strength of his religious faith, both seemed to me counterparts of that love of wife and home which were the most strongly marked features of his private character.

It is not, however, of Mr. Bryan's private character that I wish in this article to speak. That has been frequently enough eulogised; and private character and private devotion to religion have too often been used to turn public attention from the public principles for which statesmen stand. My personal knowledge of the man, however, makes complete my conviction that his whole life was moored in what is best in the life of the American people, and that from instinct, more than from deliberation, he was likely to voice the conscience and the heart of the nation.

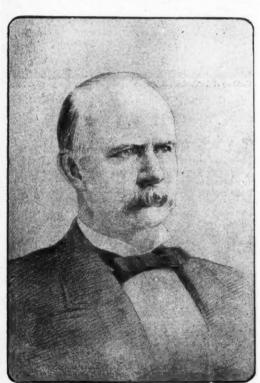

THE DEFEAT OF 1894.

I next met Mr. Bryan in New York, after his party had been so overwhelmingly defeated in the Congressional elections of 1894. In 1894, in the section west of the Alleghanies and north of the Ohio, the Democratic party had been crushingly defeated. In many States its vote was less than that of the Populists. Prior to 1896 the cities had been the stronghold of the Democratic party, and the rural districts the stronghold of the Republicans. In 1896 the situation was reversed. Prior to 1896 the immigrant voters had been, as a rule, on the side of the Democrats, and the American-born voters on the side of the Republicans. In 1896 this, too, was changed. It is safe to say that, of the three million votes cast for Mr. Bryan in 1896 west of the Alleghanies and north of the Ohio, much less than one half had voted the Democratic ticket in 1894. It was a new party, numerically stronger than the old, and infinitely surpassing it in the moral enthusiasm which came out of the contest.

THE CHICAGO PLATFORM.

In 1896 Mr. Bryan was represented in the cities, and even on the farms, in the East as the representative of destructive radicalism. Every plank in the platform was caricatured, and its defenders could get no hearing, because the daily press was almost a unit against them. The plank declaring for the free coinage of silver was represented as a declaration in favour of a 50-cent dollar, though the whole argument for free coinage was that the restoration of silver to the currency would certainly double the demand for silver bullion and almost certainly double its price.

Mr. Adlai E. Stevenson.
(Democratic Nominee for Vice-President.)

Courtesy of the Outlook, N.Y.]

William J. Bryan.

iness

notel.

ay in was cally

op-

own

r this cam-

n he hinge told

t he silver ng to ance;

, who

ollege

time, had the night huswork, she in it, eisure vinter n to silver ether. of the had lly inn, he foreleye's sm." k, I know, transthe nark not ed to works. rm of d no the of the which It lay ne rech it ween

Courtesy of the Outlook, N.Y.]

William McKinley.

The other planks in the Chicago platform met with misrepresentation hardly more justifiable. The plank condemning government by injunction was not a condemnation of equity proceedings; and the demand for an income tax was only a renewal of the demand made by the Republican party in its early days, and made to-day by every Liberal party in Western Europe, that a part of the burdens of taxation should rest upon what men own rather than what they need.

MR. BRYAN AN INDIVIDUALIST.

The first and less important of the new questions that have forced their way to the front during the past four years is that of the trusts. Upon this question Mr. Bryan's attitude is conspicuously that of a Conservative. Because it is so, he has lost the support of a few irreconcilable Radicals who voted for him in 1896. One of the best thinkers among these remarked to the writer: "Why should I support Bryan? He is at heart an individualist." This is pre-eminently true. Mr. Bryan is at heart an individualist. He believes, it is true, in the municipal ownership of public franchises; but that is because these municipal franchises are inevitably monopolies, and he agrees with the principle of our common law that a private monopoly is essentially hostile to the welfare of a community. The fact, too, that these municipal monopolies must be managed under the oversight of the ordinary voters intensifies his faith that

th

Co an co de

Courtesy of the Outlook, N.Y.]

Colonel Theodore Roosevelt.

(Republican Nominee for Vice-President.)

this is a Democratic measure. But his advocacy of municipal ownership of municipal monopolies does not give to him the slightest sympathy with the socialist and capitalist programme, that all sorts of manufacturing and other businesses must be allowed to pass into the hands of private monopolies. He does not believe, with the Socialists, that for the citizens to permit themselves to come under the control of private monopolies is a promising way for them to get the private monopolies under their control; and he does not believe, with the capitalists, that private monopoly secures the welfare either of the public or the employees under its power. Even on the economic side, he knows the inertia which private monopoly has always produced, the restriction of production which monopoly prices have always brought to the industry controlled, and the sluggishness in making improvements which lack of competition has always engendered. But even did he believe the absurd economic claims put forward in every age by the partisans of monopoly, it would still be hateful to him because of its depressing influence upon the independence, the selfreliance, the manhood of its employees. A nation of irresponsible workmen under the direction of private monopolies is as hateful to his sentiments as a nation of irresponsible subjects under the control of rulers. Indeed, it would be more hateful; for he believes that our republican institutions are, in large measure, the result of the economic independence of the mass of our people. To destroy this independence and individual responsibility would be to destroy the best element in our national character. He is, as my Socialist friend said, at heart an individualist; and he therefore would put an end to the protection of trusts by the tariff, and would use all the power of the Government to prevent the contracts by which combinations keep their patrons from buying of competitors, and the secret rebates by which they secure cheaper access to markets.

RAILWAY REGULATION.

He has never, to my knowledge, declared himself in favour of aggressive action regarding the ownership of railroads; but not long ago he sent me, with evident indorsement, an address recently made by Interstate Commerce Commissioner Prouty regarding the proposed amendment of the Interstate Commerce Act, so that the commission shall not only have its present power to declare certain rates unjust, but also have the power originally intended to specify what rates are reasonable. One of the passages in the Republican commissioner's address read as follows:—

It is urged by the railways that no commission can deal with N.Y. Journal.

not

nd

nd

nds

the

to

a ies

the

are er.

ich

of ght

ing

ays

nos of its elf-

ion

pri-

sa

trol

for

in

Colonel Roose alt's Methods.

Mr. Bryan, of Mexico, comes to Town.

these rate situations. The idea seems to be that nobody not specially ordained can deal with a freight rate, and that the right of ordination consists in putting a party on the pay-roll of a railway company. . . To-day the railway is the sole judge between itself and the public of the rate which it makes. Some tribunal should be devised to which the public can appeal, and from which the public can obtain relief.

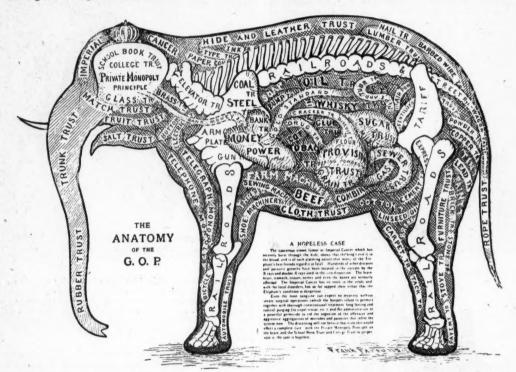

The Cullom bill, to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to give the public relief,-subject, of course, to an appeal to the higher courts,-Mr. Bryan would undoubtedly support; and with the support of the President, this bill, already demanded by many boards of trade as well as farm organisations, could be made law. With the Interstate Commerce Commission authorised to fix what rates are reasonable, the destruction of the small firms in the small towns by reason of the discriminations in favour of their competitors in the cities could in a large measure be stopped, and by requiring complete publicity for the transactions of railroads the secret concessions granted to powerful individuals and to trusts could in a large measure be prevented. These are not the remedies of a Radical, but the remedies of a Conservative, who would restore to the rural districts and to the industry of small manufacturers and merchants the rights which are naturally theirs. If the artificial advantages to the trusts were removed, and if the combinations of manufacturers in different States to form a monopoly were as effectively prohibited as the combinations of national banks in different towns now are, the menace of the trusts would be largely removed.

THE SUPREME ISSUE.

But the supreme issue in the approaching campaign will not be the trusts. It will not be an economic issue at all. Mr. Bryan typifies the American people in the fact that to him moral issues are of supreme importance, and that the principles of liberty for which this country has always stood are the supreme expressions of the national conscience. He warmly supported the war for the emancipation of Cuba, because he believed that our duty as a neighbour, and our principle that all men have the right of self-government, demanded that we should test undertaken for the sake of humanity degenerates into a war of conquest, we shall find it difficult to meet the charge of having added hypocrisy to greed. . . . If others turn to thoughts of aggrandizement and yield allegiance to those who clothe land-covetousness in the garb of national destiny, the people of Nebraska will, if I mistake not their sentiments, plant themselves upon the disclaimer entered by Congress, and insist that good faith shall characterise the making of peace, as it did the beginning of war.

Four months later, immediately after the signing of the treaty of peace with Spain, Mr. Bryan resigned his commission as colonel of his regiment. In an interview then

True Inwardness of the Republican Elephant.

An "Inti-Trust" Diagram Employed by the National Democratic Committee.

(This drawing—the work of Professor Frank Parsons—was printed on the back of one million copies of Mr. Bryan's anti-trust address, and has also been extensively circulated in poster form.)

put an end to the slaughter which was going on at our doors. But when the war for Cuban independence first threatened to turn into a war for the subjugation of the Philippines, Mr. Bryan sounded the note of warning. On June 14, 1898, when the first intimations were received that our government did not sympathise with the independence of the Philippines, but was negotiating for their annexation, Mr. Bryan spoke as follows at the trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha:—

History will vindicate the position taken by the United States in the war with Spain. In saying this I assume that the principles which were invoked in the inauguration of the war will be observed in its prosecution and conclusion. If, however, a con-published, he stated his reasons for resigning, as follows: "Now that the Treaty of Peace has been concluded, I believe I can be more useful to my country as a civilian than as a soldier. I may be in error, but in my judgment our nation is in greater danger just now than Cuba. Our people defended Cuba against foreign arms; now they must defend themselves and their country against a foreign idea—the colonial idea of European nations. Our nation must give up any idea of entering upon a colonial policy such as is now pursued by European powers, or it must abandon the doctrine that governments obtain their just powers from the consent of the governed." From that time to cea sho whi Dec whi dec eno that MR. A the unce

the

Eng that shou refus Mr. Linc mak can clear state atter will

Cop.rig

Car

past

the present, Mr. Bryan has been unceasing in his demand that the nation should remain true to the principles which Jefferson formulated in the Declaration of Independence, and which Lincoln reformulated when he declared that "no man is good enough to govern another without that other's consent."

war

ing

nd-

of

Ves

boo the

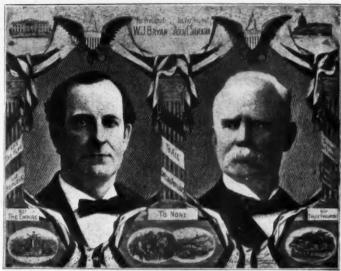

the

mnen

MR. BRYAN'S CHOICE OF POSITION.

At the time that he resigned from the army, Mr. Bryan took one position which has brought down upon him unceasing criticism from one New England anti-imperialist who believed that the annexation of the Philippines should be prevented by the Senate's refusal to ratify the Treaty of Peace. Mr. Bryan's reason for following Lincoln's maxim, that "friends can make laws . . . easier than aliens can make treaties," was at the time clearly stated by himself; but his statement has not received the attention which it deserves. "It will be easier," he said, "to end the Portrait Poster Circulated by the Democratic National Committee.

Copingat, 1,00

[by Perry S. Heath,

The Most Popular Poster Issued by the Republicans.

(Mr. McKinley is shown holding in his hand a poster of the 1896 Campaign, the burden of which is upheld by the events of the past four years.)
Original size 48 by 344 inches.

war at once by ratifying the treaty, and then deal with the subject in our own way. The issue can be presented directly by a resolution of Congress declaring the policy of the nation upon this subject. The President, in his message, says that our only purpose in taking possession of Cuba is to establish a stable government, and then turn that government over to Cuba. Congress could re-affirm this purpose in regard to Cuba, and assert the same purpose in regard to the Philippines and Porto Rico. Such a resolution would make a clear-cut issue between the doctrine of self-government and the doctrine of imperialism." Such a resolution was offered in the Senate, and was only defeated by the casting vote of the Vice-President. The defeat of this resolution laid upon the administration the responsibility of continuing the war.

THE COST OF THE WAR.

The arguments which Mr. Bryan has been making in all parts of the country in favour of treating the Philippines as we are pledged to treat Cuba have been, in the main, arguments addressed to the nation's sense of honour and duty. He has, however, shown the baselessness of the claim that we should continue the war because of the commercial advantages to be secured. The Spanish islands, he has pointed out, are already more densely peopled than our own territory, and cannot, like our expansion toward the West, possibly furnish a field of opportunity for American labour. The plain people of America, who demanded the annexation of Louisiana when the aristocratic class opposed it, are being guided by the same true instinct when they oppose the annexation of the Philippines, which the capitalist class demands. American labour cannot be benefited by the conquest of tropical islands more densely peopled than our own Eastern States. It cannot go there. The only opening that can be made is for American capital; and even this opening can be better secured if we retain the friendship of the people, as we have

ows :

ed, I ilian udguba.

now nst a ions.

ering sued

the wers ne to

N.Y. Journal.]

Mr. Bryan speaking at Madison Square Gardens.

that of the Medicans and Japanese, by respecting their aspirations for independence. It is the height of absurdity, he points out, for the same Administration to insist that we should "have an English financial system in order to bring European capital into the States, and also an English colonial policy for the purpose of taking American capital out." Even if the war in the Orient did give additional profit to American capital taken from our own country, these profits would not come to the people who pay the taxes to support the war. To the plain people of the country, upon whom the mass of these taxes would fall, the policy of militarism means nothing but loss; and Mr. Bryan appeals to all who would keep this nation free from militarism to resist the colonial policy, whose first-fruits in legislation was the Administration's illtimed advocacy of the Bill for the permanent quadrupling of the standing army.

AMERICA'S MISSION.

But Mr. Bryan's principal arguments have never been addressed to the nation's sense of its own economic welfare-not even to its sense of the economic welfare of its poorer classes. The question to him has been one of the nation's duty to remain true to those principles of liberty which have been the very life of our own democracy and of the century's struggles for democracy all over the globe. He believes, more profoundly than any of the Imperialists, in the greatness of America's mission; for he believes that that mission has been of transcendent importance during the century that is past. In an address delivered upon Washington's Birthday, last year, when speaking of the love of human liberty which this nation has cherished, Mr. Bryan said :-

This sentiment was well-nigh universal until a year ago. It was to this sentiment

Plain Dealer.]

The Golden Chariot of the Republicans.

[Cleveland.

that which Spain that Revo swore not o

they If I spurr

For Duri

N.Y. Journal.

A Man of Mark. (Mark Hanna being the Republican Organizer.)

that the Cuban insurgents appealed. It was this sentiment which impelled our people to enter into the war with Spain. Have the people so changed in a few short months that they are now willing to apologise for the War of the Revolution, and force upon the Filipinos the same system of government against which the colonists protested with fire and sword? The hour of temptation has come, but temptations do not destroy: they merely test the strength of individuals and nations; they are either stumbling-blocks or stepping-stones; they lead to infamy or fame, according to the use made of them. If I mistake not the sentiment of the American people, they will spurn the bribe of imperialism, and by resisting temptation, win such a victory as has not been won since the battle of Yorktown. For over ten decades our nation has been a world-power. During its brief existence it has exerted upon the human race an influence more potent for good than all the other nations of the earth combined, and it has exerted that influence without the use of sword or Gatling gun. Mexico and the republics of South and Central America testify to the benign influence of our institutions, while Europe and Asia give evidence of the working of the leaven of self-government. Standing upon the vantage ground already gained, the American people can aspire to a grander destiny than has opened before any other race. Anglo-Saxon civilisation has taught the individual to protect his own rights. American civilisation will teach him to respect the rights of others, Anglo-Saxon civilisation has taught the individual to take care of himself; American civilisation, proclaiming the equality of all before the law, will teach him that his own highest good requires the observance of the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Such is the appeal made by the leader of the new democracy to the conscience and heart of the American people. He goes before the people appealing to their profoundest patriotic and religious sentiments. He demands that we shall stop the war in the Philippines by treating those islands as we promised to treat Cuba, and as in the past we have treated all the nations of Spanish America. The fundamental principle of our democracy, he affirms, demands that we shall give to the people of the Philippines the government of their choice. The fundamental law of our religion demands that we shall treat them as we ourselves would be treated. In 1900 under Mr. Bryan, as in 1860 under Mr. Lincoln, the party which would lift up the manhood of the poor makes the foundations of the platform the Declaration of Independence and the Golden Rule.

Croker and His Monkey. (Playing up to the Working Man.)

New York

rican vould

t the n the rism

o all resist ts in s illding

nents ion's -not lfare n to ty to berty own ggles He y of s of that dent at is upon when berty Mr.

versal ment

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND OTHERS.

Special Offer for the First Year of the New Century.

THE WAY TO MAKE A PICTURE GALLERY.

OUR good friends the newsagents find it difficult to supply our Masterpiece Portfolios of pictures owing to the amount of space which they occupy, and the difficulty of securing their delivery without creasing. In large towns, of course, this difficulty does not occur, for there the portfolios can be sent down in the ordinary news parcels, but many of our friends and subscribers have written complaining much of the difficulty, not to say impossibility, of securing the portfolios in country villages, and still more in the remoter parts of the Empire in which the REVIEW OF REVIEWS has always had a remarkable circulation. This difficulty, which is felt in the case of the shilling portfolio, is experienced to a still greater extent when we come to deal with large pictures measuring anything from two to three feet in length.

TO THOSE WHO LIVE IN OUT-OF-THE-WAY PLACES.

Almost the only method by which these pictures can be sent without injury is through the post, and it has occurred to me that it might be possible, without interfering in any way with the existing arrangements for supplying the public with magazines through the trade, to suggest a special arrangement for the supply of pictures, together with the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, to those persons who live remote from the convenient news stall. The matter is one of considerable difficulty, and one which can only be solved by an experiment. But the approaching close of our twenty-second annual volume affords an opportunity for putting it to a test. If it should be successful, it will be advantageous all round. It will meet the wishes of those who desire to obtain pictures, but who live in places where portfolios can only be procured through the post, and at the same time it will link together more closely than ever that combination between the distribution of the world's ideas in the monthly compendium of the periodical literature found in the pages of this REVIEW with the dissemination over the widest possible area of the reproductions of the Masterpieces of Ancient and Modern Art.

The experiment now submitted to our readers is an adaptation of the system which has been found to work so well in the United States-namely, that of offering pictures, or sets of pictures, as a premium for prepaid subscriptions to the magazine. The heavy rates of postage still charged upon monthly as distinguished from weekly publications is no doubt a great obstacle; but it may be overcome in the following manner:-

ALL FOR HALF-A-GUINEA.

Any of our friends who will, after the date of this announcement, pay either on their own account, or on that of some friend or acquaintance, a Special Half-Guinea Subscription to the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, instead of the usual subscription of 8s. 6d., will receive the magazine post free for twelve months, and as a premium he will also receive, on receipt of his order, four beautiful reproductions of famous pictures executed in the best modern style, and honestly worth the half-guinea paid for the subscription to the magazine. The pictures included in this offer are the following:-

THE FIGHTING TEMERAIRE. By J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Size, 25 in. x 20 in.

BRITANNIA'S REALM. By John Brett, A.R.A. Size, 23 in. × 11 in.

MAY BLOSSOMS. By Albert Moore. Size about 18 in.

× 7 in. THE CHERUE CHOIR. By Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Size, 16 in.  $\times$  13½ in.

All these pictures are suitable for framing, and are worth framing well. They would grace the walls of any house in the land. The selling price of these pictures to those who prefer to have them direct without subscribing for the REVIEW is 2s. 6d. each, and they can only be had at that price. They are made from photographs specially taken for the REVIEW OF REVIEWS. We have already shown what can be done in the presentation pictures which accompany the shilling Masterpiece Portfolios. The large 2s. 6d. reproductions are executed with the same perfection of finish and with much greater effect, owing to the larger size at which it is possible to produce them. Of course, reproductions of coloured pictures must necessarily lack the charm of colour of the original. But, in the opinion of a'l tho e to whom we have submitted the reproductions, which we are now offering as a premium for the half-guinea subscription to the REVIEW OF REVIEWS for 1901, the fidelity with which all the distinctive features of outline and of shading have been transferred to the paper is extraordinary. until recently was quite impossible; but owing to the perfection to which the process has been brought it is now possible for any one to possess pictures which will convey to the million the charm of the masterpieces of the world's art.

DOMESTIC ART GALLERIES.

Hence, instead of obtaining at long intervals a few minutes' or hours' inspection of the paintings which adorn our public galleries, it is possible for the citizen at home or the colonist abroad to have a far more exact and faithful reproduction of the pictures themselves as constant daily companions in their living rooms. Nor is it only the pictures in the public galleries which are placed under contribution. Sir Edward Burne-Jones's Golden Stairs," the first presentation plate of our Portfolio series, which has been so universally popular, is happily in the hands of a patron of art, who kindly permitted us to render accessible to the multitude what had hitherto been the exclusive enjoyment of a private owner and his friends.

The reader is here reminded that the annual subscription to the REVIEW OF REVIEWS remains 8s. 6d. for any pa the ma scripti this do bicture any pa land w scriber The Master picture the pop influen and do houses faded : graphs Englis to-day with ac million which ! our eff apprec are no numbe

But ! before of cour may ne who a neighb our off village, experin shape e village magazi sale of fold. secured

The as an il way of for peri the tro the imp take th teacher gregati field for same p of picti no way apparei of pictu

I the any dis who wil SUBSCR send m Post O upon re any part of the world, if the subscriber desires to have the magazine alone; and it is only for the special subscription of half-a-guinea for new orders sent in after this date that we offer to send the set of four beautiful pictures mentioned above. They will be sent by post to any part of the world, so that the subscriber in a foreign land will be served in exactly the same way as a subscriber nearer home.

The steady demand for and great popularity of the Masterpiece Portfolios shows that the publication of these pictures has corresponded to an awakening on the part of the popular mind to the humanising, restful and inspiring influence of good pictures. No one who travels much up and down the country and visits either hotels or private houses can fail to have been painfully impressed with the faded and commonplace paintings, chromos, and litho-graphs which do duty for the decoration of the walls of English interiors. In times past this was unavoidable, but to-day it is inexcusable. The best pictures, reproduced with admirable fidelity, are available for the walls of the million, and I am happy to recognise from the letters which have reached me from all parts of the world that our efforts in this direction have met with immense appreciation. I hope that the new departure which we are now announcing will multiply a hundredfold the number of domestic art galleries.

HOW TO GET ONE FOR NOTHING.

But this is not the only proposal which I have to lay before my readers. My second suggestion, which cannot of course be taken advantage of so widely as the first, may nevertheless prove very acceptable to many persons who are in a position to persuade their friends and neighbours to join with them in availing themselves of our offer. Many years ago in a small north country village, in which there was no newsagent's shop, an experiment was made as to what could be done in the shape of a systematic canvass by the manager of a little village library in securing orders for the monthly magazines. As the result of a very few hours' labour the sale of magazines in that village was multiplied twentyfold. The magazines were obtained through the newsagent in the neighbouring town, and the orders thus secured were repeated year after year.

The memory of this has always remained in my mind as an illustration of the extent to which people out of the way of newsagents and booksellers will gladly subscribe for periodicals if any one of their neighbours would take the trouble to collect their orders and interest them in the importance of good reading. It is not necessary to take the village as the unit. Any circle of friends, or teachers in a Sunday-school, or the members of a congregation, would supply an equally accessible and useful field for securing subscriptions. I do not see why the same principles should not be applied to the distribution of pictures, more especially as in this case it would in no way interfere with the interests of the newsagents who apparently do not wish to be troubled with the handling of pictures.

TEN PICTURES AS A PREMIUM.

I therefore make the following offer to any person in any district, whether at home or abroad:—Any person who will take the trouble to enlist FIVE NEW ANNUAL SUBSCRIBERS to this magazine at 8s. 6d. each, and will send me their full postal addresses together with a Post Office money order for Two GUINEAS, will thereupon receive by post, as a free gift, the following collection of ten pictures, which if purchased elsewhere would cost about a pound :---

THE FIGHTING TEMERAIRE. By J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Size, 25 in. x 20 in.

BRITANNIA'S REALM. By John Brett, A.R.A. Size, 23 in. × 11 in.

THE STREAM IN SUMMER TIME. By B. W. Leader,

R.A. Size, 25 in. × 20 in.

MAY BLOSSOMS. By Albert Moore. Size about 18 in.
× 7 in.

À SUMMER SHOWER. By C. E. Perugini. Size, 25 in. × 20 in.

THE CHERUB CHOIR. By Sir Joshua Reynolds. Size, 16 in. x 13½ in.

THE GOLDEN STAIRS. By Sir Edward Burne-Jones. Size, 19 in. × 9 in.

THE DRESDEN MADONNA. By Raphael. Size, 12 in. x 10 in.

VENICE. By J. M. W. Turrer, R.A. Size, 14 in.  $\times$   $8\frac{1}{2}$  in.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES. By Edward Hughes. Size, 15 in.  $\times$  10 $\frac{1}{2}$  in.

The first six named are large-sized pictures, every one of which, if properly framed, would grace any room in any house. The others are the presentation pictures which have already appeared in connection with our Portfolios; but as already stated, the set of ten will be sent post free to any one, in any part of the world, who will collect five new subscriptions and send us the two guineas so collected when transmitting the addresses of the subscribers. He may thus set up at no cost to himself an art gallery in his own home, or in that of any of his friends to whom he wishes to make a handsome Christmas or New Year's present. For those who do not wish to undertake the collection of five subscriptions to the magazine we will send the same set of ten pictures, post free, for twenty shillings.

TRADESMEN AND ART.

I "may further mention, as illustrating the efforts which are being made to disseminate good pictures among the people, that I have prepared this month, as a presentation portfolio for Messrs. Jno. Williams and Co., Limited, the well-known firm of grocers in Manchester, a portfolio containing reproductions of Turner's "Venice," and six other pictures, which will be given away by Messrs. Williams and Co. to their customers this Christmas. By this means the thousands of customers of this enterprising firm will obtain this year seven excellent reproductions of the beautiful creations of English artists. The Portfolio contains "The Village Choir," by Thomas Webster, R.A.; "Gathering Seaweed," by F. R. Lee, R.A.; "Rustic Civility," by W. Collins, R.A.; "The Old Shephere.'s Chief Mourner," by Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A.; "Uncle Toby and Widow Wadman," by C. R. Leslie, R.A.; and "Salisbury Cathedral," by J. Constable, R.A. I cannot commend too highly the enterprise and good taste which have led Messrs. J. Williams and Co. thus to become pioneers in the dissemination of high-class pictures as a feature of their Christmas sales. I shall be very glad to receive communications from other tradesmen who may feel disposed to follow so good an example. It is, of course, impossible for all tradesmen to display similar munificence, but the principle is capable of almost infinite development, and perhaps (who knows?) the time may come when it may be quite a normal thing for tradesmen to offer some really excellent picture as a Christmas gift to all their customers.

s as for is a are nes's Portir, is indly what ivate

. for

nium

utiful

best

d for uded

R.A.

Size,

8 in.

olds.

are any es to bing

y be noto-

EWS.

prester-

are nuch

sible

ured

f the n we now

n to hich

have

This

the

it is

will es of few nome

and

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

WHAT WILL THEY DO WITH IT?

THE GENERAL ELECTION has brought into existence a new House of Commons in which 402 members are ready to vote black is white at bid-ding of the Ministerial Whips. Lord Salisbury has had placed in his hand, for a nominal term of seven years, an instrument mechanically capable of giving effect to any decision at which he may arrive. The Opposition lies in ruin before him, shattered by the explosion of personal jealousies and political apostasy. The Nationalists, now once more a compact and united phalanx, constitute the only fraction that is formidable. It is round the Nationalists rather than round any of the other sections of the party that the Opposition of the future will have to rally. In the near future they will put Mr. George Wyndham to a rude test, from which it will be well if he should emerge with undishevelled locks. This, however, by the way. The inquiry is not what the Opposition will do in their impotence and adversity, but what will Ministers do in their omnipotence?

LORD SALISBURY'S POSITION.

Contemplate the position! Here is Lord Salisbury, the Nestor of European statesmen, commanding the confidence of his Sovereign, the devotion of the House of Lords, and the machine-like obedience of a newly-elected House of Commons. He has reconstituted his Cabinet. His party practically monopolise the London Press. No Conservative paper is so useful to him as the Daily News and Daily Chronicle. Nowhere in Parliament or in country is there any one to say him nay. No Russian autocrat, no military dictator at the zenith of his glory, ever occupied a position of more absolute authority. What will he do with it? It is a great opportunity. King Demos has created him Dictator, and the King's business requires haste.

ON THE BRIDGE OF THE SHIP OF STATE.

In the present posture of our affairs both at home and abroad, we need a resolute hand at the helm. The electorate has at least secured for the man at the wheel undisputed authority to navigate the ship as he seems best. That at least is an element of safety, or rather it eliminates a possible element of danger. Let us for a moment stand with Lord Salisbury on the bridge, and endeavour to make out through the November fog the salient landmarks of the intricate channel through which he must steer the ship of State.

SHOALING WATERS.

First and foremost we note there is less water under our keel than there was this time last year. There is a manifest slackening of the wheels of industry in various districts, and cries of warning that with the present price of coal many establishments will have to close their doors. The pressure of the shilling income tax is just beginning to be felt. The Treasury is short of money, to meet the steady drain of warlike expenditure. New taxes will be necessary, and more loans. The water is shoaling, our financial prosperity is no longer fathoms deep beneath our keel. We are approaching shallow waters, with their inevitable concomitants of tight money, depressed trade, and the wail of the unemployed.

THE COMING STRUGGLE.

This drift to the quicksands of financial difficulty is accelerated by two great causes. The first is the closing of the African and the Chinese markets by war and the impoverishment of our Indian customer by famine. The last famine, Lord Curzon reports, killed 5,000,000 customers and reduced the purchasing power of survivors by £70,000,000. The second is the steady and in some cases alarming growth of American competition. do not think I am far wrong in saying," wrote Professor Huxley in 1887, "that we are entering, indeed have already entered, upon the most serious struggle for existence to which this country has ever been committed. The latter years of this century promise to see us embarked on an industrial war of far more serious import than the military wars of its closing years. To those who remember the cotton famine and reflect how much worse a customer famine would be the situation appears very grave." Every month brings us fresh warning as to the reality of the danger. According to the census returns just published, the United States now contains a population of seventy-six millions, an increase of thirteen millions since last census. Uncle Sam has therefore outstripped John Bull, and is now striding ahead with seven-leagued boots. But the increase in population is a small thing compared with the increase in cheap productivity of the American mill and the American mine.

AMERICAN COMPETITION.

One of the items of the news last month was a casual statement that an ocean coal ferry service is to be established by the Coal and Iron Kings of Pennsylvania to supply Cardiff with American coal. In iron and steel the supremacy of the American is now so well established that no surprise was excited by the report that a Sheffield firm, employing three thousand hands, was preparing to transfer its operations to the other side of the Atlantic. In South Africa the American walks off with order after order, until it would seem that the net effect of the war is that the British spend their taxes in destroying property while the Americans make fortunes in replacing it. The delusion that you can secure markets by murder is responsible for much bloodshed. But when it is now the law that you may only open a market by cannon on condition the door is left open to everybody, the man who pays for the powder finds himself badly handicapped in competition with his less heavily-weighted rivals, to whom he has been but as the cat whom the monkey used to pull the chestnuts from the fire.

THE SAVAGES OF THE SLUMS

If the outlook be correct and we are going to have bad times, great depression, and sharp distress, it is certain that there will be breakers ahead in the shape of internal disorder that will put the nerve of the Ministry to a rude test. Hooliganism is no mere passing portent of the frenzy of the hour. We have been steadily breeding Hooligans of both sexes in the styes of Slumdom for years past. Nine hundred thousand human beings this night will kennel in rooms in this metropolis which swarm with vermin, reek with filth, and are fetid with the breath of a brutalised 'herd which, in the heart of civilisation, has not even the decent privacy for the performance of the necessary animal functions which are enjoyed by swine. Again, to quote from Professor Huxley, this is to this day only too faithful a description of the environment in multiply

"Alle of squalic with still a stream dull apa imaginati ending in traffic of of the Ci forth in plunder thang a fee even for what

Had a wise. O Among way of to proper a into the and to to apply the home now who with to answeresults to burst into the control of the contro

The or

African early ter burghers St. Hele number hungry : with exe to the wa torch mo it peace. employed women a lying in protectin of the why this in the 1 by recrui De Wet have but destroyed of the six that Brit Such re principle nations 1

In Chi so grave full of int Man, bei last. W of worldwords the grouping conspicue the Unite ment in which Hooligans develop as naturally as mites multiply in cheese:—

"Alleys nine or ten feet wide, I suppose, with tall houses full of squalid, drunken men and women, and the pavement strewed with still more squalid children. The place of air was taken by a stream of filthy exhalations, and the only relief to the general dull apathy was a roar of words—filthy and brutal beyond imagination—between the closely packed neighbours occasionally ending in a general row. All this almost within hearing of the traffic of the Strand, within easy reach of the wealth and plenty of the City. I used to wonder why these people did not sally forth in mass and get a few hours' eating and drinking and plunder to their hearts' content before the police could stop or hang a few of them. But the poor wretches have not the heart even for that."

WHAT WE HAVE TAUGHT THE MAN IN THE SLUM.

Had not then, no doubt. But to-day it may be otherwise. Of late we have been teaching them many things. Among others, that if a corrupt oligarchy stands in the way of the wishes of the Man in the Street, the right and proper and truly Christian thing is to carry fire and sword into the estates of that said oligarchy, to burn and to slay and to take possession. If the Man in the Slum should apply the Gospel of the Man in the Street a little nearer home no one can be surprised. Neither can any of those who witnessed the pitiable breakdown of those who have to answer for order on the C.I.V. night contemplate the results that would ensue if the subterranean savage strata burst into volcanic activity under our careless feet.

THE STRUGGLE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The outlook abroad is not less disquieting. The South African war drags on. Nor is there any prospect of an early termination of hostilities. Nearly twenty thousand burghers are being boarded and lodged at our expense in St. Helena and in Ceylon. More than five times that number of Outlander Refugees waxing desperate and hungry at Cape Town pursue the High Commissioner with execrations because he will not allow them to return to the war-blasted region in which our generals, using the torch more than the sword, have made a solitude and call it peace. The flower, nay the whole British Army, is employed in plundering desolate farmsteads, in turning women and children out homeless upon the veldt, or in lying in culverts and tunnels for the purpose of protecting the railway from the ever-present menace of the ubiquitous De Wct. There is no reason why this should go on for ever. A certain wastage in the Boer remounts will be more than made up by recruits from regions outside the area of hostilities, De Wet and his men have nothing more to lose. We have burnt their farms, confiscated their property, and destroyed their nation. They will fight us as the Dutch of the sixteenth century fought us. Nor is it impossible that Britain may in the long run share the fate of Spain. Such reward have they who forget the fundamental principles of morality, and believe that in the affairs of nations Might is omnipotent over Right.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.

In China the situation, if not for the moment making so grave a demand upon the resources of the Empire, is full of infinitely more alarming possibilities. The Yellow Man, being roughly handled once too often, is awake at last. What that means, what immeasurable possibilities of world-wide catastrophe, Sir Robert Hart explains in words that might well make the boldest tremble. In the grouping of the Powers, only one thing stands out conspicuous. Germany is pressing forward, Russia and the United States are hanging back, and we are backing

Germany. This may be "inevitable" and all the rest of it, but think for a moment what possibilities it A good understanding, a cordial working agreement with Russia, is the sine qua non of the tranquillity of Asia. There is no trace of any such understanding. Russia is making up to China, the one solid permanent factor in the situation, whereas we are coquetting with the Germans, who hardly conceal their desire to seize the present opportunity for the purpose of settling scores with the Chinese. In this imbroglio those whom we would fain regard as our natural allies take no part. France and, it may be—if the Japanese Premier Ito be correctly reported—Japan also will oppose any attempt to press matters to extremities with China. But what kind of a grouping of the Powers is it which leaves us on one side alone with Germany, Austria, and Italy, while on the other stand China, Russia, the United States, France and Japan?

OUR VANISHED PRESTIGE.

When we turn nearer home, one thing is conspicuous. Never were we more hated, never were we less feared. Read what every observer reports who has had any opportunity of hearing what soldiers of the Continent really think of our military condition. Every one with doleful unanimity repeats the same story. Our navy, of course, saves us from destruction, but so far as the army is concerned, its prestige has perished. Mr. Chamberlain pitted the whole British army against a population, men, women, and children, all told not exceeding the inhabitants of Birmingham. And the British army after twelve months' desperate endeavour has not yet succeeded in putting through its bloody job. Of course this may be very unjust, and the foreigner might find out his mistake if he tried it on, and all the rest of it. But the difficulty of the present situation is that he does not think so. Nay, that he thinks he is warranted by all that has happened in South Africa and in London in regarding the British Army as a kind of scarecrow, fit only to march to the music of Offenbach. To such a depth of humiliation has our war for prestige brought the victors of Crecy, Agincourt and Waterloo.

CHAMBERLAINISM.

With our military credit exhausted, it would seem to be an inauspicious moment to embark upon any policy calculated to excite still more against us the suspicion and the hatred of our neighbours. Unfortunately the nation by giving a new lease of life to Chamberlainism has rendered it impossible to adopt a conciliatory course. The Continent can no more be brought to believe that Mr. Chamberlain means peace than could Mr. Kruger fifteen months ago. His presence in the Ministry, his dominance in the Cabinet appear to each and all the statesmen of Europe as a plain and unmistakable danger signal. It is not his policy they dread. Heaven alone knows if in European affairs Mr. Chamberlain has got even a glimmering of an idea as to what his policy should be. It is the temper of the man, the explosive impulsiveness of which makes European rulers feel about English policy, so long as he is in command, very much as the owners of a porcelain warehouse would feel if they saw an irascible bull in fly time standing in the midst of their most valuable crockery. He may not even be moving his tail at this moment, but the potentiality of mischief in the dangerous creature is incalculable. Mr. Chamberlain's ascendancy destroys any reserve fund of confidence upon which we might have drawn now that our military credit has been destroyed by our South African escapades.

famine, coo,coo rvivors n some n. "I cofessor already ence to e latter l on an an the e who much appears g as to returns populanillions tripped

eagued

1 thing

of the

was a vice is ngs of al. In can is excited ploying ransfer tlantic. order effect xes in ortunes narkets t when rket by ybody, badly eighted om the ve bad certain nternal a rude of the eeding om for gs this swarm breath breath sation, nce of red by this is nviron-

VIIM

Such is the situation that confronts Lord Salisbury at home and abroad. He has been given a great majority in order that he may see to it that the Commonwealth takes no harm. What will he do with it?

AN IMPOTENT DICTATOR.

It is mere guesswork to try to answer this question. The probability is that he will do nothing with it. The stream of events is just now running too swiftly for even a Minister with a brand-new majority to materially deflect its course. Nothing that Lord Salisbury can do can prevent depression in trade, the steady increase of foreign competition, the growth of taxation. Neither can be control the forces which threaten to convulse the Far East with war. So far from being a deus ex machina, he probably feels himself a mere fly upon the wheel of Destiny. He might lighten his burden if at the eleventh hour he were to modify his ruthless policy in South Africa. But the pride and arrogance which drove us into the war bar the door against our retreat. No doubt if Mr. Chamberlain could be translated to the heights of Olympus, a great and perceptible relief would be experienced. But there is no Eagle to bear the British Ganymede to the knees of the gods. Not even the new majority can help to get rid of Mr. Chamberlain. What then remains to be done?

NO SOCIAL REFORMS.

In home affairs there is nothing in the shape of any kind of reform that entails any kind of expenditure. The necessities of the Treasury are such that it is doubtful whether the Government can renew its doles. It certainly will not be in a position to do more than tinker with the question of Old Age Pensions. We are face to face not with the question of making our old veterans of industry more comfortable, but of averting a catastrophe which would leave even the ablest bodied amongst us without our daily bread.

INSURANCE AGAINST CHAMBERLAINISM.

As the nation has chosen its Chamberlain, it has now to insure itself against the risks of Chamberlainism. As the nation has condoned the military expedition which has wrecked the army, there is nothing to be done but to sweep up the pieces and start anew. But it is just this starting anew which will afford Lord Salisbury his chance of proving whether he has any adequate appreciation of the gravity of the crisis and the necessity for making a clean sweep. At present the appointment of Mr. Brodrick to the post of War Secretary does not augur well for any very drastic dealing with the army. If Lord Roberts is ever able to escape from South Africa he will probably sanction a very cautious tinkering policy, the only practical result of which will be the addition of millions to the war estimates. The presumption is therefore that Lord Salisbury will not do much with his brand-new majority, but muddle on in the same old way until some terrible catastrophe compels even the most obstinate optimist to see facts as they are.

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE?

If Lord Salisbury were capable of rising to the height of his great opportunity there are certain things which he could do, and which will have to be done sooner or later by some one or other. The first thing to be done is to appoint a competent Commission of the best experts available, military, naval, and economists, to consider whether the lesson of the war in the Transvaal is not to demonstrate the substantial truth of M. Bloch's famous paradox, that war on any great scale between equally matched foes has practically become impossible.

The war, if it has demonstrated nothing else, has proved the enormous difficulty and costliness of making war under modern conditions. If it cost £100,000,000 and required 250,000 men for twelve months to overcome the resistance of 40,000 untrained farmers, how much would it cost, and what sacrifices would it entail to wage war against a great Power? The whole question of big versus little armies is involved in the answer. There was a time when the practice of continually increasing the weight of armour had to be abandoned, for the development of the system had reached a point when it defeated its own ends. The knight's horse could no longer move beneath the mountain of armour heaped upon his back. The problem for discussion is whether we have not reached a similar point in relation to our gigantic armaments. Have modern armies not become so unwieldy as to be unmanageable, and ruinously expensive? Can any nation fight a war to a firmsh under modern conditions? Would not economic difficulties involve both combatants in inextricable ruin long before the military problem could be fought out on the field?

OUR FOOD SUPPLY.

This brings us to another question of vital importance What about our food supply in time of war? We have found it difficult enough to supply rations for our troops although we had undisputed command of the sea, and they were after all but a handful of men. What would be our position if, say, London were in the position of Ladysmith, and the army of the invader had paralysed all internal communication and severed the arteries of our complex civilisation? It is idle saying that this has been considered. It has never even been seriously examined since we lost the command of the swiftest steamers on the ocean highways. The provisioning of England in war time, what is the irreducible minimum of food which we should have in reserve, what the indispensable strength of the navy necessary to protect the myriad ships which bring our food from over sea? It is no use blinking the consideration of these things. If Chamberlainism is to rule the roost, then some form of protection, some system of bounty or corn law that would foster the production of the indispensable supply of our daily bread becomes inevitable. This may spell ruin for our manufactures. But in what other way can we rely upon averting the horrible catastrophe of our island fortress being reduced to submission by sheer starvation, not of the garrison so much as of the unemployed millions of the civil population?

After these questions had been discussed, not in the leisurely way of our Royal Commissions, but with the desperate and unremitting earnestness of those Councils over which Napoleon would sometimes preside for eightand ten hours a day, the ground would be cleared for framing proposals for the new Army.

DEPLUTOCRATISE,--

The first indispensable foundation of the new system should be to strike a deadly blow at the plutocratic cancer which at present makes the Army the plaything of the well-to-do. In the Army of the Future if any officer were to be found living beyond his pay, he should be cashiered. If the Army is to be democratised, there must be no golden barrier between the private and the commissioned ranks. Soldiering should be recognised as a workaday profession, and officers should stick to their work like doctors, or solicitors, or the slaughterers of the shambles. The social glamour which surrounds the epaulets should be warred against as fatal to efficiency. The officer should be worked like a allo streemus of to gene bad agai objecto no merce that super misc.

Colo

coun

Ge

So

the

as I afte

But

pre

Th purpo taken gent profes This half-a numb this w been o a time fightin ordina strong supplie destru sariat toward

It wireducir will need is nonshuge an Africa, policy, Bolicy, Bolicy, A settle within a it would Government.

There all our p the cost German and kept up to his mark by perpetual exercise. The hopeless and hideous breakdown of our Army in South Africa in every department—a breakdown of which the C.I.V.'s tell some strange tales,—ought to be regarded as marking the end of the old régime. It has persisted after the abolition of purchase down to the present day. But the Army will never be democratised until the present rule of the rich is killed out root and branch.

has aking

0,000

come much wage of big

e was g the velop-

eated

move back.

e not arma-dy as n any tions?

atants

oblem

rtance or our ie sea,

What

osition

alysed

of our s been mined

on the

in war

ich we rength

which

ing the n is to system

tion of ecomes ctures.

ng the

educed

ison so e civil

in the

ith the ouncils or eight

red for system

tocratic thing of officer

ould be

l. there

and the ognised

d stick or the r which as fatal like a

COLONIALIZE-

In the second place, all parts of the Empire should be allowed an equal share, according to their numerical strength, in the reconstituted Army. The "mere Colonial" must share equally with the scions of our aristocracy or of the plutocrats of Park Lane in the command and general direction of the Army. The Colonial has had a bad experience of the result of the other system. Never again will Canadians and Australians regard it as an object of pride to serve in an Army whose chiefs can show no more intelligent appreciation of the future, no more resourceful adaptation of the means of the present, than that which has been displayed in the present war. The superciliousness of the society-bred officer has done mischief enough already. In the future the "mere Colonial" must rank by right with the best of the old country.

---AND RAISE STANDARD OF EFFICIENCY.

Thirdly, while the total sum available for military purposes must not be increased, more pains must be taken to make the individual fighting unit more intelligent and more efficient. We do not want a large professional army. We want a thoroughly capable one. This may mean that we shall have to pay our soldiers half-a-crown or even five shillings a day. With smaller numbers we could afford higher pay. The evidence which this war has afforded us of the extent to which India has been over garrisoned should not be forgotten. If, in such a time as this, we can safely deplete India of 20,000 fighting men, it seems to afford a presumption that in ordinary seasons the army of India is at least 20,000 too A small highly-trained professional army, supplied with the latest and most efficient weapons of destruction, with an adequate artillery and a commissariat department always ready for action, is the ideal towards which most men's eyes are turning.

EVACUATE THE TRANSVAAL.

It will here be objected that it is nonsense to talk of reducing the numbers of our regulars while South Africa will necessitate their increase. To which I reply that it is nonsense imagining that we are going to maintain a huge army in South Africa. This war has lost us South Africa, unless we promptly retrace our steps, reverse our policy, and make it up with the Datch on the basis of British rule at Durban, Cape Town, Kimberley, and, if needs be, at Johannesburg, but never a trace of the direct Imperial factor anywhere from Table Bay to the Zambesi. A settlement that permitted us to set up British rule within a ring-fence on the Rand would not be ideal; but it would at least be possible. And the system which the Government is now aiming at is simply impossible.

COMPULSORY SERVICE?

There remains the larger question of the training of all our people in arms. If Chamberlainism is to prevail, the cost of adequate insurance will necessarily include conscription in one form or another. Possibly the Swiss system, or some modification of the Swiss system, might be devised and adapted for our insular circumstances and our great civic population. No one can hate conscription more than I do, but it is a grave question whether, in the absence of any system of direct taxation which makes the man in the street feel immediately the pressure of the cost of war, there is any other expedient left than that which would render every mother's son of us liable to be drafted for foreign service whenever our Government involved us in war. If by some supreme exercise of the national common sense it could be enacted that no war should ever be made until a majority of the adults had paid half a crown per head into the Treasury there would be an end to all such wars as those which are now afflicting us. But as no Government will propose the adoption of so effective a check upon the liberty of making war, we may have to fall back upon the other resource—that of direct personal liability to be sent to the front. We might not all be called out. But the fact that the moment war was declared every household might find one of its most cherished members called out for service would probably do much to abate the fool-fury of our music-halls and the criminal incitement to war on the part of our press.

A BETTER WAY.

Personal service would at least do something to bring a sense of personal responsibility home to the average citizen. Of course it is much preferable that the nation should meet its difficulties in another way, and that, abjuring Jingoism and all its evil ways, the Government should deliberately set itself to the cultivation of international friendship and the rendering of helpful service to its neighbours, rather than to perpetually provoking their suspicion and alarm. But of that there is no chance. Ephraim is for the moment wedded to his idols, and we must leave him alone, or, rather, we must endeavour as best we can to shield him from the consequences of his idolatry.

PHYSICAL TRAINING FOR ALL.

Even if there were no danger of having to fight for our lives, even if all armies were relegated to limbo, and no man were ever again to lift his hand against his brother man, it is a question for the gravest consideration of all of us whether the time has not come when, in the interest of the physical development of our people, statutory provision should not be made for compelling every youth, male or female, to undergo every year a certain period of athletic training in the open air. It need not, and, I hope, will never be, of a military character. But as we regard it essential to see to it that every English child has an irreducible minimum of school learning to enable him to hold his own in the world, is it not equally our duty to see to it that the human body, that Temple of God, does not deteriorate, but has at least an irreducible minimum opportunity of retaining or cf regaining the Divine Image? Physical education intelligently directed and universally enforced would do wonders in arresting the decadence now, alas, only too visible in many of our manufacturing towns and in the streets of the capital.

But we are wandering into Utopia. Let me then return to prosaic realism, and, in reply to the question, What will they do with their majority?—make the only answer that seems probably correct, and say—Nothing.

COMPUESORI SERVICE.

PUBLIC HOUSES AS PUBLIC TRUSTS.

A PRACTICAL SCHEME OF TEMPERANCE REFORM.

No thinking man can reflect with complacency upon the position in which the General Election has left the temperance question. It is not only the defeat of Sir Wilfrid Lawson which has reduced the temperance reformers to the verge of despair. They have other reasons which go much deeper. There are grave misgivings as to whether they must modify their plan of campaign.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCHES.

In this matter of temperance the action of the Churchusing the term in its broadest sense—has been often even more disappointing than that of the politicians. Whether we regard it as the duty of the Church to see that the thirsty are supplied with innocent means of quenching their thirst, or whether we take the view that the Church's first duty is to dry up the thirst, the result is equally unsatisfactory. It has divided its force into two armies, one of which has fought the long battle for thirty years in favour of obtaining statutory powers to close the houses licensed to sell intoxicants; the other section, not so much from any love of the publican, but from a keen appreciation of the votes which he can command, entered into an alliance with Bung and Boniface, by which the united spiritual and spirituous forces of modern society were able easily to vanquish the phalanx of their foes. Thus it came to pass that beer and Bible became the watchword of the victorious Unionists, while the reformers who fought under the banner of local option found themselves hopelessly discomfited. The net result, therefore, of the Church's action on the drink question can hardly be said to redound to its credit as a tendency making for righteousness among the children of man.

LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS.

At this point, however, gleams of light are discernible on the horizon. There are signs that the lessons of experience are converting even the extreme tee-totalers to a perception of the fact that they have been on the wrong tack. I hear, for instance, that in Elswick, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, in a working class district, from which every public-house has been banished as effectively as if the Permissive Bill were in operation, our temperance friends have been appalled to discover that the only result was the immediate establishment of drinking clubs, in which boozing went on to the early hours of the morning without let or hindrance. One such club was quite capable of doing more mischief than a dozen strictly regulated public-houses. But much the most hopeful sign has been the effective and practical fashion in which the proposed municipalisation of the public-houses has been taken up by the Bishop of Chester and Lord Grey. The Bishop of Chester has long been famous as the advocate of a modified Gothenburg system; but it is to him, together with Lord Grey, the Lord Lieutenant of Northumberland, that we owe the first daring attempt to give practical shape to the new idea. Lord Grey has founded an association which has undertaken to open and to manage any public-houses for which licences may be needed in the county of Northumberland, the fundamental idea of this association being that the profits accruing from such licences should revert to the community as a whole, instead of going to swell the purse of private speculators.

PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

Lord Grey hopes that early in the session of the new Parliament it will be possible to secure the adoption of a resolution in both Houses of Parliament expressing the opinion of the Legislature that in all cases where new licences are applied for, preference should be given for associations created for the purpose of enabling the community to secure the profits of the business. with this resolution the Northumberland Association, and other associations which it is hoped will be formed in various counties, will appear at every Brewster Sessions and apply for any licences which may be asked for on the part of any district within their county. If the association is adequately supported in capital, and its directors are men of probity and standing, it is expected that the licences will in every case be entrusted to them. And thereupon, without any legislation, the creation of new vested interests in the shape of fresh licences held by private persons will cease. For every new licensed house will then be in the hands of a public company which will administer them, not for the purpose of private gain, but for promoting the comfort without impairing the morals The managers would have no of the community. personal interest in promoting the sale of drinks, they would probably be given a percentage on the sale of nonintoxicants. At the end of the year, when the profits came up for division, after the payment of the stipulated maximum percentage to the shareholders, the remainder would be available for distribution for public purposes.

int

of t bes

and lite

per wri

lett

any nar

Sir

doe

be i abo

whi

spea

eart

Box

hav

a auth

Rob to h

trea

adop

from doing

Chinable.

result

ever 1

stipul Wá

the m are al

you w starte

farthe

Th

ideas intro

famo

Robe

the be be was sugges side in offerin patriot

the sta

The

W

HOW THE SCHEME WOULD BE WORKED.

Lord Grey, faithful to the ideal of the Civic Church, boldly proposes to give the right of allocating the profits on the sale of drink to a body on which the heads of the various churches in Northumberland would sit side by side with the Mayor of Newcastle and the Chairman of the County Council. Here, indeed, is a proposal calculated to make people think. At a time when Sir Wilfrid Lawson is hors de combat, and Lord Salisbury has disdainfully turned his back up on the report of his own Commission, this project of Lord Grey's deserves the serious consideration of all who wish to see something done in coping with one of the greatest evils of our time. I would earnestly appeal to those of my readers who may be interested in this matter, or who may be able and willing to assist in organising public action in their own locality on similar lines, to place themselves in communication with Lord Grey, whose permanent address is Howick, Northumberland.

THE BISHOP OF CHESTER'S CIRCULAR.

The Bishop of Chester has issued a circular letter to announce the formation of a new company to extend the work of the People's Refreshment House Association (Limited). The People's Refreshment House Association, the Bishop goes on to say, is a modest pioneer enterprise, started a few years ago, which now has twelve houses under its management, and which might have had many more had not its operations been designedly tentative and cautious. success of the association has thus far been very eh-It has therefore been determined to form, under the leadership of the association, strengthened by public-spirited men of large business experience, a new company built on larger lines, which will be able to act as the centre of operations throughout the country. The central association also looks forward to the formation of local associations, with which it will co-operate. One such has already been set on foot in Northumberland.

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE IN CHINA.

BY THE BEST AUTHORITY IN THE WORLD.

SIR ROBERT HART, who for forty-five years has been intimately connected with China, and for the latter part of that period has been recognised by everybody as the best authority upon all questions relating to the Chinese and their government, contributes a truly alarming article to the Fortnightly Review. Sir Robert Hart is not a literary man, and his essay manifestly proceeds from a pen more accustomed to framing official reports than to writing magazine articles. Notwithstanding its quaint division into some score sections, each under a separate letter of the alphabet, from A to Q, the article is better worth reading than anything that has been written by anybody during the whole of this crisis. Dr. Morrison's narrative of the incidents of the siege may surpass Sir Robert Hart's account of the same episode in contemporary history; but the importance of the article does not lie in its description of the siege—it is to be found in his diagnosis of the causes which brought about the siege, and his prediction as to the results which may confidently be anticipated in the future from the forces now at work in the Chinese Empire. Briefly speaking, Sir Robert Hart's opinion is that no power on earth can prevent the sentiment which produced the Boxers dominating China and defying Europe. Never have the exponents of the Yellow Danger had so weighty a declaration in their favour from so eminent an authority.

OURSELVES TO BLAME.

And what makes it all the worse to bear is that Sir Robert Hart is quite certain that we have only ourselves to blame for all that has happened. First of all we treat the Chinese unjustly, and then prod them into adopting the very tactics which will end in our expulsion from China. He says:—

What has happened has been the logical effect of previous doings. Europe has not been ungenerous in her treatment of China, but, even so, has wounded her: a more tactful, reasonable, and consistent course might possibly have produced better results, but in no case could foreigners expect to maintain for ever their extra-territorialised status and the various commercial stipulations China had conceded to force.

Wên Hsiang, the celebrated Prime Minister of China during the minority of Tung Chih in the early sixties, often said, "You are all too anxious to awake us and start us on a new road, and you will do it; but you will all regret it, for, once awaking and started, we shall go fast and far—farther than you think—much farther than you want!" His words are very true.

THE BOXERS A VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The Chinese were very slow to assimilate European ideas, but by our persistent pressure we succeeded in introducing into the Chinese mind that it would be a famous piece of statecraft to invent the Boxers. Sir Robert says:—

The teaching thus received began gradually to crystallise in the belief that a huge standing army on European lines would be wasteful and dangerous and that a volunteer association—as suggested by the way all China ranged itself on the Government side in the Franco-Chinese affair—covering the whole Empire, offering an outlet for restless spirits and fostering a united and patriotic feeling, would be more reliable and effective, an idea which seemed to receive immediate confirmation from without in the stand a handful of burghers were making in the Transvaal:

hence the Boxer Association, patriotic in origin, justifiable in its fundamental idea, and in point of fact the outcome of either foreign advice or the study of foreign methods.

The Boxer Association, therefore, in the opinion of this expert observer, corresponds very closely to the outburst of patriotic sentiment which forty years ago produced our Volunteer movement.

BUT POSSESSED OF-HYPNOTIC ?-POWERS.

He mentions, however, that the Boxers either possess, or lay claim to possess, supernatural powers to which our Volunteers never aspired. He says:—

Something akin to hypnotism or mesmerism seems connected with Boxer initiation and action: the members bow to the south-east, recite certain mystical sentences, and then, with closed eyes, fall on their backs; after this they arise, eyes glazed and staring, possessed of the strength and agility of maniacs, mount trees and walls and wield swords and spears in a way they are unable to at other times; semi-initiation is said to render the body-impervious to cut or thrust, while the fullyinitiated fear neither shot nor shell; the various sub-chiefs are, of course, fully initiated, but the supreme chief is described as more gifted still-he sits in his hall, orders the doors to be opened, and while remaining there in the body, is said to be elsewhere in spirit, directing, controlling, suggesting and achieving. One of the best shots, in a Legation guard, relates how he fired seven shots at one of the chiefs on the Northern Bridge, less than two hundred yards off: the chief stood there contemptuously, pompously waving his swords and as if thereby causing the bullets to pass him to right or left at will: he then calmly and proudly stalked away unhit, much to the astonishment of the sharpshooter! Though professing to know nothing beyond the domain of sense, the Chinaman is really an extravagant believer in the supernatural, and so he readily credits the Boxer with all the powers he claims.

PARTITION, CONVERSION, OR THE WHIRLWIND.

The Boxers being therefore the legitimate and inevitable outcome of the grafting of Western European ideas upon Chinese patriotic sentiment, we have to face the certainty of the fact that the movement in its essence will not die out, but will increase and spread until it assumes proportions which will defy us. Sir Robert Hart says:—

Twenty millions or more of Boxers armed, drilled, disciplined, and animated by patriotic—if mistaken—motives, will make residence in China impossible for foreigners, will take back from foreigners everything foreigners have taken from China, will pay off old grudges with interest, and will carry the Chinese flag and Chinese arms into many a place that even fancy will not suggest to-day, thus preparing for the future upheavals and disasters never even dreamt of. In fifty years' time there will be millions of Boxers in serried ranks and war's panoply at the call of the Chinese Government; there is not the slightest doubt of that! And if the Chinese Government continues to exist, it will encourage-and it will be quite right to encourage, uphold, and develope this national Chinese movement; it bodes no good for the rest of the world, but China will be acting within its right and will carry through the national programme! Nothing but partition—a difficult and unlikely international settlement, or a miraculous spread of Christianity in its best form—a not impossible, but scarcely to be hoped for, religious triumph, will defer, will avert this result; is either the one or the other within the limits of practical politics or practical propagandism? I fear not! And if not, what? Then the lawlessness of the present uprising must be condoned and the Manchoo dynasty supported: to this end it will be made to "lose face" as little as possible-but trade in arms will not cease and our sons and grandsons will reap the whirlwind.

447

ssing e new en for comrmed ation, ed in or on f the hd its ected them. on of eld by house h will n, but norals e no they nonprofits plated inder es.

orofits ads of d sit Chairoposal en Sir isbury of his serves o see c evils of my r who public place whose

Asso-House nodest which , and opera-The form, hened a new act as

tion of e such MEANTIME, PATCHING UP.

As to the immediate question what should be done, he says:—

The first question now to be settled by the Treaty Powers is how to make peace—for China is at war with all, and what conditions to impose to safeguard the future—for the stipulations of the past have been set at defiance and obliterated. There would seem to be a choice between three courses—partition, change of dynasty, or patching up the Manchoo rule.

Of these three courses he decides that the last is the only one open to us, and although he goes on to talk about compensation and punishment the logic of his article points unmistakably to our accepting whatever terms we can get from the Chinese, and making the best of them, knowing that if we go further we shall fare worse. It is to be hoped that the German Emperor will read Sir Robert Hart's article, and readjust his policy to the facts to which this supreme expert bears unimpeachable testimony.

A SIGNIFICANT RUSSIAN DECLARATION.

In immediate connection with Sir Robert Hart's paper it is well to read the short article which Professor Martens, the well-known Chief Justice of Christendom, has contributed to the Monthly Review on the subject of the Hague Conference and China. In this paper Professor Martens, whose authority on International law cannot be disputed by any, declares himself in most unqualified fashion against any attempt to utilise the present crisis for the purpose of still further increasing the domination of Europe over the Chinese. After setting forth the admitted facts as to the privileges which we have extracted by force from the Chinese, he continues:—

Therefore I maintain that the civilised Powers, in settling their account with China, should not endeavour either to increase the privileges of their countrymen in China, or favour, by the exaction of new immunities, the propagation of the Christian religion among the Chinese, or undermine the authority and the prestige of the Chinese Government, or increase in the hearts of the Chinese people their hatred and animosity against all foreigners.

We cannot recognise any right whatever belonging to the Christian nations of imposing upon the Chinese an unscrupulous exploitation of their natural riches; we are unable to concede to Protestant and Catholic missionaries the right of propaganda at the expense of the strength of the Chinese State; we recognise absolutely no legal title justifying the systematic poisoning of the Chinese by opium, the importation of which is imposed by force upon China; lastly, we express in all sincerity our conviction that the Chinese have the same right to insist that "China should belong to Chinamen" as the Russians or English that their country should belong to them.

It would be difficult to put into shorter compass a policy more absolutely antagonistic to that which the German Emperor appears to be pursuing in China at the present moment.

THE BOXERS MIRACLE-WORKERS.

The Rev. Roland Allen, of the Church of England Mission, Peking, contributes to Cornhill for November a most instructive paper on "Some of the causes which led to the siege of the foreign legations at Pekin." First he cites the force of hunger, for ever since the coup d'état North China has suffered from drought: and the people attributed the calamity to the anger of Heaven caused either by the Empress' highhanded action or by the presence of foreigners. As the Boxers advanced, the rain fell, as though to encourage the belief that Heaven was on their side. The second cause was the force of religion. The Boxers were religious enthusiasts. They were believed to be attended by "divine soldiers" in untold thousands:—

The Boxers professed and the people believed that they were supported in their warfare by divine powers, and that with the aid of these gods they could in a short time—a few days or months—drive every foreigner out of China. The Boxers professed and the people commonly believed that they could work miracles to prove their divine mission. Not only in the country but in the streets of Peking they performed tricks which were almost universally accepted as miraculous. They cut themselves with their swords without drawing blood; they lifted millstones by a single thread; they drove their spears through bricks and withdrew them, leaving no hole; they balanced a large stone attached to a short stick upon the top of a Chinese wine cup so that it could not be made to fall; in dining they had but one pot of food, yet however many of their number came to share in its contents all had enough.

"THE FOREIGNERS KNOW NO RIGHT."

The third cause of the rising was a rankling sense of foreign injustice. The news of foreign encroachments spread with a rapidity unknown in former times, thanks chiefly to the advance of Christian missions!

As a Chinese put it one day to me, a few years ago you could travel 500 li without finding a Christian; now you cannot go fifty without finding a church. And where the missionary goes there goes information, and an increasing desire for information and a growing interest in the condition of the State. . . . Truly or falsely the Boxer preachers protested and the people believed that in the Lisotung peninsula the Russians used forced labour, that in Chiao Chou Germans broke into the houses of honest men and submitted their women to the vilest usage, under threats of fearful vengeance if any resistance was offered. One of our own teachers reported to me the gist of a speech which he heard a Boxer deliver at a street corner in Peking. Summed up in a word it was this: treacherous seizure of the land, forced labour, rape. Chinese Christians would come to me to ask if these charges were true. They were in every one's mouth. "The foreigners knew no right." . . . True or false, the people believed these stories, and many, very many, of them had their own instances to cite of friends or relations who had been deprived of justice in the courts by priestly interference.

The writer suggests that the rulers of China supported the Boxers as a refuge of despair. "They preferred a momentary vengeance and annihilation to slavery."

JUSTICE, OR JUDGMENT?

Mr. A. Edmund Spender raises in the Westminster Review "a plea for justice." He contends that the Allies have no right to exploit China for their own selfish purposes. "China is a debtor to no man," and simply desires to be left alone. But if we disregard the claims of justice, Mr. Spender draws a grim picture of the Nemesis that awaits us. He says:—

The same reason that makes us envious of the yellow labourer in our colonies will give us cause to repent of our haste to develop a hitherto exclusive country. Compared to our thousands or hundreds in the competition, China will raise up her millions. Quick as the Japanese to adapt themselves to new circumstances, they will learn of us new trades and then will oust us from their marts. They will be our keenest commercial competitors; not even the shoddy markets from the Fatherland will be able to undersell them. Wherever they go they take the first rank in business. As bankers in the Straits we may see them any day driving about in their carriage and pair; as managers in Japan we find them set over the heads of Japanese to keep the business on a sound financial basis. Out of the torrent of the Fraser River they are picking up a fortune out of the gold-washing from the silt in their baskets with a patience that would make a Canadian bankrupt.

THE "QUARTERLY'S" COUNSEL.

The Quarterly Review analyses the situation thus:— Great Britain, so far, stands alone, with the Triple Alliance facing her; and her hope lies in the defection, partial or complete, of Germany from that alliance, or in the enunciation of a policy The to the questic Great eighte those Such a of Jaj oppose friend the ris would The in ma give p

Mr. view policy proxit direct positi and is she I advis relative quest.

The Russia

make the Eu is reno continu cost; cannot tenanc a poin relatio expane meet a in whi strugg

Mr

missio

" Mis for O out th to the great in reg does Russi thing Port . Japar The regar no te colon popul popul

Mr. lining ney were

ense of hments thanks

ry goes rmation Truly labour. honest under hich he med up forced ask if mouth. se, the f them inster t the selfish imply laims of the ported red a bourer ste to o our ise up ves to l then comn the ey go Straits

vith a liance

ortune

with the days or Boxers ey could y in the ks which hey cut i; they spears ; they top of fall; in of their u could mot go

no had ice.

e and ads of Out

comof a policy which may win her the support of Japan and the United States

The interests of three Great Powers are directly opposed to the open declaration of partition. When, therefore, the question arises of the future status of the Chinese Empire, let Great Britain declare that her policy is the preservation of the eighteen provinces in their integrity, and demand throughout those provinces international freedom, customs, and tariffs. Such a policy, if firmly announced, would meet with the support of Japan and the United States, and could not be openly opposed by Russia, which is for ever posing as the disinterested friend of China, and which, moreover, must regard with distrust the rise of a Greater Germany on her flank. Such a declaration would clear the situation at once. .

The alternative is plain. If the Powers refuse to support us in maintaining the integrity of the eighteen provinces, and to give practical demonstration of that support by sacrificing their exclusive spheres, then we too must adopt a sphere, and we must make it plain that we are determined to go just as far in the protection of our sphere as any other power.

RUSSIAN AND AMERICAN IN CHINA.

Mr. Josiah Quincy writes in the North American Review on China and Russia. He thinks that Russia's policy in regard to China is based upon her territorial proximity and the dread that China may, under the direction of Japan, become an aggressive Power. Russia's position in regard to China is now a predominant one, and is largely strengthened by the fact that, like Japan, she has no missionaries in the country. Mr. Quincy advises that American statesmen should preserve good relations with Russia in the settlement of the Chinese question :-

The natural and legitimate character of the expansion of Russia to the Pacific, the fact that she has a real civilising mission in Asia, however her own civilisation may fall below the European standard in some respects; the service which she is rendering to the future commerce of the world by the great continental railroad which she is building at such an enormous cost; the pacific character of her policy—these are points which cannot be treated within the limits of this article. The maintenance of friendly relations with Russia should be as cardinal a point in our diplomatic policy as the cultivation of similar relations with us is in her own programme. Each nation has expanded across a continent, from one ocean to another; we meet as friends upon the shores of the Pacific-the great arena in which, perhaps, is to be fought out, in war or in peace, the struggle for political or commercial supremacy.

A JAPANESE VIEW OF RUSSIA.

Mr. Y. Ozaki contributes an excellent article on "Misunderstood Japan" to the North American Review for October. The chief object of his article is to point out the disadvantage under which Japan has lain owing to the failure of Europeans to understand her; but its greatest interest lies in his definition of Japanese policy in regard to Russia, China, and Corea. Mr. Ozaki wisely does not believe in the inevitableness of a conflict with Russia. He points out that neither country has anything to gain from such a struggle. Russia's advance to Port · Arthur, he says, was inevitable, and responsible Japanese feel no vindictiveness over the events of 1895. The acquisition of Corea by Russia would, however, be regarded as a menace. Mr. Ozaki says that Japan needs no territory on the Asiatic continent for the purposes of The Island of Yezo is still sparsely colonisation. populated and, if developed, could maintain a large population.

ANGLO-AMERICAN ENTENTE.

Mr. Maurice Low in the National Review, after outlining the effect produced by the United States on the course of the Chinese negotiations, adds this assurance :-

It may be added, as a matter o' interest to English readers no less than American, that from the outset of the disorders in China up to the present time the Foreign Office in London and the State Department in Washington have been working in complete accord, and that no step has been taken by either Government without the other having been promptly consulted and its views ascertained.

"ENGLAND FIRST; THE REST NOWHERE."

Writing in Blackwood on "the rival Foreign Devils," Colonel Knollys holds that, in comparison with the interests of other Powers in China, "England is first, and the rest nowhere." He offers several proofs of this conclusion. He refers to pidgin English ("pidgin" being Chinese pronunciation of "business"):—

There is not a vestige of French, or German, or Italian Pidgin. Persons of those nationalities are compelled to transact their business with the inhabitants by English Pidgin. European languages proper, I seldom found them of avail in any of the numerous localities in China which I visited, saving in Portuguese Macao. This universality of the English language, Fortuguese macao. This universality of the English manganger, corrupted though it be, is surely irrefragable evidence of the overwhelming preponderance of English influence, English interests, and English rights.

He compares the brisk and thriving energy and popular administration of English Shanghai with the backward condition of French and German Shanghai and of Portuguese Macao.

MISSIONARIES INEXPUGNABLE.

In the October Forum Mr. Charles Denby writes on "The Future of China and of the Missionaries." missionaries, he says, cannot be got out of China, for the Catholic organisations have taken too deep a root, and if the Catholics remain the Protestants must do so also. Mr. Denby says :-

Whether or not missionary work should be circumscribed in its extent must be left to the great societies which have it in charge. From my experience I would advise that care and prudence be exercised in selecting locations for missionaries. In many localities there would not, probably, for a generation to come be any danger of destruction. In others the danger is patent. It is impossible for our Government to station soldiersall over China to protect its people. It can only demand redress when wrongs are perpetrated, and that it has always faithfully The spirit of adventure which takes no account except of the letter of the Scriptural injunction, should be restrained. In some cases missionaries have defied the advice of consuls, and have gone into the most dangerous localities. There should be reason in all things. Riots occur and pass like summer clouds, and all races are eminently recuperative. A few years will obliterate the marks of the recent outrages; but let not the patient, gentle, persistent labours of decades be brought to naught.

BUDDHISM is the "Great Religion of the World" dealt with by Professor Rhys Davids in the North American Review for October. On the whole, he thinks that Buddhism is likely to increase its influence in the world as a religious force :-

It is not probable that any considerable number of people, either in Europe or America, will ever range themselves openly on the side of Buddhism, as a profession of faith. But it cannot be denied that there are certain points in the Buddhist view of life that are likely to influence, and to influence widely, with increasing intensity, the views of life, of philosophy, of ethics, as held now in the West. And not only the view of life, the method also, the system of self-training in ethical culture, has certain points which the practical Western mind is not likely, when it comes to know it, to ignore.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

DR. ALBERT SHAW'S SUMMING UP.

THE first place in the Contemporary Review is given to a weighty article by Dr. Albert Shaw on the American Presidential Election. Dr. Shaw maintains that there has never been a time when the Presidential Election excited less strong feeling on the part of the American electorate. The old issues which used to divide and distract the citizens have practically disappeared. If it were not that there are two standing armies of politicians, continually on the warpath, who must fight at each election or lose their raison d'ttre, there need not have been a contest this year at all. But although the contest had to be joined, Dr. Shaw thinks there has never been a time when the re-election of the out-going President would be acquiesced in so generally as on the present occasion.

DEAD ISSUES.

Dr. Shaw devotes considerable space to setting forth how it was that the negro question has ceased to divide parties. The Republicans no longer consider it their duty as superior persons to protect the rights of their coloured fellow-citizens in the Southern States, and the white population no longer feels that it is necessary to be Democratic in order to defend the rule of the white man against the negroes. majority of Southern States they have effectually succeeded in disfranchising the negroes by enforcing restrictions upon illiterate voting, which Dr. Shaw evidently regards as legitimate and necessary. There is therefore no longer a negro question. Neither is there any longer a tariff question. Dr. Shaw quotes a prophecy which he made twelve years ago, that protection was the shortest cut to Free Trade, and that if McKinley had been allowed to have full and uninterrupted possession of the tariff, we might reasonably have expected the establishment of Free Trade to come in with the new century. As it is, the Democratic agitation against the high tariff postponed the realisation of this ideal, but Dr. Shaw evidently is of opinion that in a very few years the American tariff for protective purposes will be dispensed with, as builders discard scaffolding when the building is finished. The third issue which has practically disappeared, although it still forms a plank in the programme of the opposing parties, is the question of currency. This is so far a dead issue that Dr. Shaw thinks it is evident that the majority of the delegates at the Democratic Convention at Kansas City would have preferred to drop the Silver question, but as this could not be done with dropping Bryan, they accepted Bryan, even although he was weighted with his previous declarations on the subject of the importance of the Silver currency.

INCONSEQUENT ANTI-IMPERIALISM.

There are then two issues, that of Imperialism and that of Trusts. Dr. Shaw expresses himself very strongly as to the inconsequence and inconsistency of Mr. Bryan's policy in relation to the Philippine Islands. To judge from his general declarations you would think that they led irresistibly to the conclusion that the United States ought to confess that it was wrong in trying to coerce the Filipinos, that it ought to admit their independence, and base a treaty of peace upon such an admission, and then to withdraw from the islands exactly on the analogy of the British withdrawal from America in 1783. Mr. Bryan draws no such conclusions. First, he would have the United States retain possession, in the fullest sense, of an important Philippine seaport and coaling station, which, being interpreted, means that he would hold Manila as owner and sovereign for ever. Further, Mr. Bryan proposes that the United States should continue to exercise authority throughout the Philippine Islands until it had established there a stable government. Finally, Mr. Bryan holds that after the Americans had withdrawn, they should continue to maintain a protectorate over the whole Archipelago. Against this most lame and illogical conclusion of Mr. Bryan's, the Republicans simply say that it is their duty to discover and develop a capacity for local self-government among the Filipinos. Meanwhile, they are bound by treaty to assert their authority and to resist all efforts to expel the soldiers from the islands. If Mr. Bryan were to be elected this November Mr. McKinley would still go on endeavouring to suppress the Philippine insurrection until the 4th of March. then Dr. Shaw doubts whether Mr. Bryan could in any case induce the Democratic Congress to relinquish the sovereignty of the United States. The Democratic sovereignty of the United States. majority must come from the South, where public senti-ment is in favour of American commercial and political expansion in every direction. The Democratic South is no more ready than the North to haul down the flag.

TRICTE

The question of Trusts, Dr. Shaw says, has brought Mr. Bryan more support than his inconsistent attitude on the subject of the Philippine War. A great labour vote will be polled for him in the spirit of general antagonism towards rich men and great corporations. Dr. Shaw expresses no opinion as to how the German vote will go, though he says that a great effort is being made to capture the German vote for the Democrats by labelling McKinley as the friend of England and the enemy of the Boer Republics. Dr. Shaw finishes his paper as he began by declaring that the coherence of the two great parties is due not so much to an intelligent division of public opinion upon great questions as to the keen competition of two great rival armies of politicians seeking office under the guise of allegiance to one party or the other.

UNDER WHICH REPUBLIC?

Mr. J. Lowry Whittle contributes to the Fortnightly Review for November a lucidly written exposition of the importance of the issues at stake in the contest in the States. He calls his article "Bryan and McKinley: the Parting of the Ways." He does not think that Mr. Bryan's defeat is quite so certain as do Mr. McKinley's friends, but he believes that he will be defeated. He says:—

It seems likely to have much more permanent consequences than the overthrow of the Silver Ring in 1896. It will be the last struggle of the Democrats to maintain their old traditions as a federation of gigantic parishes independent of, and morally superior to, all the rest of the world.

The insignificance of the part played by the Silver question at the recent election is well illustrated in the following paragraph:—

At Chicago, out of a political creed of twenty-nine paragraphs, the first seventeen were devoted to silver coinage and kindred economic questions. In the Kansas City manifesto silver is not mentioned until the nineteenth paragraph.

The real issue upon which the election has turned has been whether the Republic of Jefferson has to be superseded by the Republic of Hamilton:—

The fact on which Colonel Bryan has seized is that the successes of the Union in the war of 1898 have raised many questions that the public did not anticipate. But the reader who would judge the full import of the present struggle in the United

M pora news beyo open mitti polli

again

Ame

sider

State expr

stitu polit

mate

decla our ( again says I trave convi were the sh begin politi work return Amer Bryan the se of six Planare al party. crats a Englis Mr.

Mi

but t judge

immo to sil is har real n
"Brya under not Imper will b cludes

Who able to Ameri a mark the wa

The policy subject with t overeign c United throughablished

Bryan on, they over the illogical aply say capacity

over the illogical iply say capacity Meanuthority rom the ovember suppress Even in any uish the nocratic ic sentipolitical South is lag.

brought itude on our vote agonism . Shaw will go, nade to abelling yy of the as he o great ision of en com-seeking y or the tnightly

of the t in the Kinley: nk that Kinley's
ed. He equences

I be the litions as morally

Silver
I in the agraphs, kindred er is not ned has super-

that the ed many der who e United States must recollect that the democratic principles of Jefferson expressed in the Declaration of Independence, latent in the Constitution of 1789, did for at least eighty years constitute the political atmosphere of the nation, that this influence was not materially shaken by the Civil War, and that now the people are suddenly called on to decide between the political creed honoured for five generations, and the brilliant visions of a combative nationality, conceived by Hamilton, stimulated by the economic growth of the country, but little discussed since Hamilton's death in 1804.

"THE FIRST AMERICAN RADICAL."

Mr. Sydney Brooks writes on Bryanism in the Contemporary Review. He warmly protests against accepting our news and views from New York, which "never looks beyond the Hudson." He deplores Lord Salisbury's openly taking sides with the Republican party and committing England to what may, by the fortunes of the polling-booth, be one day the losing side. He warns us against taking too seriously the exaggerations of American politics. He observes shrewdly that "a Presidential election is America's one national sport," but declares it to be conducted with greater orderliness than our General Election. He writes to vindicate Bryanism against the hyberbolic attacks made upon it. He says:—

I went through the campaign of 1896 from start to finish, travelling widely over the country, and so far from being convinced that the Bryanites were the abandoned party they were painted in New York, the conclusion I came to was that the sharp curve they took at the Chicago Convention marked the beginning of a new movement and a new force in American politics, having for their ultimate aims the emancip: ton of the working classes from the oppression of organised wealth and a return to a broader and more equitable democracy. . . . Americans are anything but Radicals in their politics. Mr. Bryan is the first American Radical, and his programme shocked the sense of the country as Free Trade shocked the Tory squires of sixty years ago. But Free Trade triumphed.

Mr. Brocks declares that, apart from the excusable but too open threat to pack the Supreme Court with judges favourable to income tax, the Bryanite programme contained little out of line with Liberal principles. He save:—

Plant the average English Liberal in the States and the odds are almost anything in favour of his joining the Democratic party. He would recognise broadly that the American Democrats are fighting the very battle for individual liberty which the English Liberals have fought and largely won.

Mr. Bryan's demand for Free Silver was no more immoral than the agitation to reopen the Indian mints to silver. Free coinage of silver rupee or silver dollar is hardly a breach of the Ten Commandments. The real meaning of the Silver agitation is thus tersely put: "Bryanism was a sort of Chartist movement fighting under an economic banner." No doubt the Bryanites do not spare Great Britain in their crusade against Imperialism. But a lower tariff, if not Free Trade itself, will be hastened by the Democrats. Mr. Brooks concludes:—

When Bryanism is purged of its economic heresies, we may be able to look not uncharitably on a movement that aims at making America almost as democratic as we are ourselves. And finally, a marked bias for either of the two great American parties is not the way to improve our relations with the country as a whole.

WHY SOUTHERNERS ARE DEMOCRATS.

The North American Review for October carries its policy of grouping together contributions on the same subject to the extreme. No less than eleven articles deal with the Presidential Election, five of the contributors being in favour of Mr. Bryan and six in favour of Mr. McKinley. The first is by Mr. A. E. Stevenson, Democratic Candidate for the Vice-Presidency, who defines "Imperialism" as the chief issue. Imperialism finds its inspiration in "corporate greed," and threatens despotism.

Mr. B. R. Tillman describes the "Causes of Southern Opposition to Imperialism." The explanation is simple; the southerners have a race question of their own, and object to incorporating any more coloured men in the body politic:—

We dread the reflex action, the example, the familiarising of our people with despotic methods. We do not want to add to the perplexities involved in the Race Question in the South the greater danger involved in the conquest and government of the Philippine Islands, outside of and contrary to the Constitution. All other issues are dwarfed, therefore, by this issue, in our minds.

MR. RICHARD CROKER'S VIEW.

Mr. Richard Croker deals with "The Interest of the First Voter." As might be expected, Mr. Croker is firmly convinced that the young American votes according to his interests and not according to his principles. Mr. Croker says that the Democratic party is the young man's party:—

In the year 1864, at the age of twenty-one, I cast my first ballot. I felt then that the Democratic party was the young man's party; that the young blood of the nation must naturally be drawn toward Democracy, which made a ready place for the new-comers, and welcomed them to a share in the management of the affairs, even in the councils, of the nation. Nor, in the thirty-six years since I cast a ballot for George B. McClellan, have I seen any good cause for changing my views on this subject. It is, indeed, my deliberate opinion that the Democratic party is the only party which offers an even chance to the first voter, not only in the political contest, but in the battle of life as well.

THE RESULTS OF MCKINLEYISM.

Mr. Erving Winslow defines the "Anti-Imperialist Position." The results of McKinleyism he sums up as follows:—

In Cuba, a population on the verge of revolution; a broken and bitter subject race in Porto Rico; in the Philippines, a defiant and persistent enemy. Corruption in the Administration, horrible licensed vice in Manila, the outrages of an irregular contest leyond even the cruel laws of war and the chartered savagery of barbarous allies, the treatment of Catholic Christians as heathens, the desecration of churches, rapine, ravishing, and murder; in what a horrible propaganda of wickedness the United States has been engaged for months, which are now gathering up their dread account into years. This explains the censorship which keeps the truth from America. While all these horrors are going on, because they do not come within reach of the senses, the defenders of the Administration rely upon the comfort and prosperity which are as yet superficially apparent in domestic affairs to dull the ears and steel the hearts of the American people. It is the old Imperial idea that nothing matters while there is plenty of bread and circuses. It is impossible that we should long remain thus callous; but, even should we otherwise do so, there is reason to expect that the inflation of a vastly expanded currency is about to collapse, and that wages, which have not now the purchasing power of four years ago, will be reduced or cut off, and that bad times will arroad.

Mr. E. M. Shepard writes on "Support of Mr. Bryan by Sound Money Democrats." But every road in American electioneering leads to the Imperialist problem, and Mr. Shepard's article is chiefly a protest against McKinleyist Expansion.

THE OUESTION OF PROSPERITY.

After Mr. Winslow, the Republicans have their innings. Postmaster-General C. E. Smith writes on the "Vital Issues of the Campaign." In Imperialism he sees merely a red herring; the real question is whether the present high level of prosperity is to be maintained ;-

In 1896, we had already suffered four years of hard times and low prices. Widespread bankruptcy, universal depression and a general fall of values had brought us down toward the silver level. We should have dropped, but dropped from a low plane. On the other hand, if we fall now we shall fall from a loftier height with more disastrous results. Prices, values, securities, wages are all far higher than they were in 1896. They are on the recognised and accepted gold level, with the buoyancy of unprecedented prosperity, and a fall to the silver level would produce an immeasurable shock. The sudden realisation of such a possibility through Mr. Bryan's election would immediately shatter confidence, and cause the greatest financial convulsion the country has ever seen. Our markets are more closely connected with those of Europe than ever before. With our present splendid financial standing we have become a creditor nation. The Powers of Europe are coming to us for large loans. The upheaval of our markets by the threat of the silver standard would convulse the Bourses of London, Paris and Berlin, which would react here, and the sweeping extent of the financial, business and industrial calamity would be beyond calculation.

OTHER VOICES AGAINST MR. BRYAN.

Mr. G. F. Hoar writes at more length than most of the other contributors. The treatment of the negroes by the Southern Democrats is, he says, the best proof of their incapacity to do justice to the Philippines :-

I do not believe that Mr. Bryan or his associates will do better for ten million people of another race in the Philippine Islands than they have done and mean to do for ten million American citizens in the United States.

Mr. T. C. Platt prophesies disaster in case Mr. Bryan should be elected :-

A vote for Bryan is a vote to haul down the gold standard and hoist the white flag; to sail out of the path of international prosperity into the dead waters of isolation; to call down the noblest aspirations of patriotism and to proclaim our country a coward and a shirk in the family of nations!

Mr. W. M. Stuart might have been a lieutenant of Mr. Chamberlain, for he applies Mr. Chamberlain's arguments to America's conditions with skill. The Filipinos are all watching the American elections as the Boers watched ours :

Mr. Bryan seems utterly heedless of the consequences of the aid and comfort he is extending to rebels in arms. He pays ro-attention to the accumulation of evidence that the guerilla warfare in Luzon is prolonged in anticipation of immediate independence in case of his election. The shooting of American soldiers and the murder and robbery of natives friendly to the United States, in order to keep up a show of resistance until the Democratic candidate becomes President, count for nothing when weighed in the balance against Mr. Bryan's ambition.

MR. CARNEGIE'S PRONOUNCEMENT.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, writing on "The Presidential Election-Our Duty," gives the following reasons for his opposition to Mr. Bryan :-

We find many dangers ahead in Mr. Bryan's success. First, that of License instead of Law at home, in our very midst, through political denunciation of judicial decisions. Second, not Gold and Silver, but Silver alone, since an inferior drives out a superior currency. This means defrauding Labour to the extent of one-half of its earnings under the gold standard, and the loss to the people of one-half of their savings in banks, since these savings, which are now repayable in gold, would then be repaid in silver. Third, a Tax upon the Incomes of citizens, inaugurating an un-American system of espionage demoralising to the national character.

THE GOLD DEMOCRATS.

Mr. James H. Eckels tells the Gold Democrats "What They Ought to Do " :-

The Democrat who really wishes to serve his country best will serve it and his party by voting for President McKinley's re-election. He will not do so as a Republican advocate of Republican principles, but as a Democratic protestor against Bryanistic heresies. There is no half-way house, nor is any good to be accomplished by refraining from voting. It is a case where the surgeon must cut, and cut deeply. When Mr. Bryan is driven from power the patriotic Democrat can go back into a full fellowship with his party; for, when that time comes, the Democratic party will stand for something with the advocacy of which the patriotic Democrat will be glad to be associated. As long, however, as the present status is maintained, he can have neither have part nor lot with those who map out the policies of the Democratic party and control its act.

THE PARAMOUNT ISSUE

In the Forum for October Senator J. P. Dolliver describes "The Paramount Issues of the Campaign." The greatest of all issues is the prosperity which has been attained under the present administration and which, Mr. Dolliver says, is now jeopardised :-

The question is whether the fortunate and happy condition which now surrounds the American people shall be deliberately voted down. That question concerns every business in the United States, enters into the homes of the whole community, and must be answered upon the judgment and conscience of all. It is not a party question. Four years ago we saw in the United States a victory won for sound principles, in which men of all political parties had a share. That victory had a moral significance hard to over-estimate. It was a notice served upon agitators, mischief makers, demagogues, and political leaders of all trades, that whoever attacks the integrity of American business must settle his account, not with a political party, but with the national character of America. It ought to have taught political managers also that they will not be permitted to conceal their motives, hide their purposes, and cover their plans by the invention of imaginary issues, made paramount only by the distraction and confusion of party counsels. If the blind lead the blind the Scriptures teach us to expect them both to fall into the ditch; but if the blind undertake to lead those of us who can see, it is not too much to expect that most of us will have sense enough to avoid pitfalls which have grown familiar in the glare of experience.

The Leisure Hour.

THE most striking piece of writing in the November Leisure Hour is a story by Louis Becke, "The Man in the Buffalo Hide," a narrative of the atrocious cruelty of Li Hung Chang to a prisoner whom he had sworn to the English Government to spare. The period is that of the Taeping Rebellion, and the writer absolutely vouches for the truth of the hideous tale. "The Siege of Shanghai" in 1853 is also graphically described by one who was present. In some ways it seems to have been curiously like the siege of the legations in Pekin. The recent talk of a French invasion finds a somewhat belated echo in an article "The Alarm Bell of the Century," on Buonaparte's contemplated conquest of England; and also in a paper on "French Invasion of the Isle of Wight." Mr. M. Morrison writes on "The Awakening of Russia." We are reminded of the extraordinary interest excited by the Transvaal War by an article on, with photograph of, the Norfolk Islanders, who volunteered for South Africa, travelling 800 miles to Sydney, and paying their passage money in order to go to the front.

TH patri Impe anotl of en expos toppl prost pro appro

Me

the .

many readi E. C have Salis defen paint he s withi 150,0 To c and o and i any would with Britis the S come wire

the o

aboa

TI If transp the sv the sr empty mind seizin inmat migh many thous while awak possil alread

To set o use mobi catio plans test i corps qua T

So Mr. 1

pionage

try best Cinley's cate of against is any a case Bryan ck into es, the vocacy ciated he can ut the olliver aign." h has ndition erately in the nunity, of all. h men moral upon ders of erican y, but ted to plans nly by blind oth to e of us s will miliar mber an in lty of o the of the es for ghai " was y like alk of n an arte's

er on rison nded War

ders, es to o go

What

THE November magazines supply ugly reading for the patriot. Hoarse, may be, with cheering Birmingham Imperialism and with shouting "Rule Britannia!" he finds, to his horror, as he takes up one magazine after another, that our command of the sea-the naval bond of empire-nay, the very heart of Empire itself-are exposed to mortal menace. He is shown the nation toppling on the edge of perdition. These appalling prospects are held out to him, not by disappointed pro-Boers" or by Liberals desperate with defeat, but by approved organs of unimpeachable "patriotism."

IS BRITAIN ON THE BRINK OF RUIN?

SUICIDAL UNREADINESS.

THE FRENCH DASH ON LONDON.

Most strenuous in its warning of impending doom is the National Review. Many a man, and still more many a woman, will sleep less soundly at nights after reading "the invasion problem" as stated by Captain W. E. Cairnes. The writer reiterates the fact to which we have repeatedly called attention, and which Lord Salisbury proclaimed aloud some months ago,-the defencelessness of London against a sudden raid. He paints the peril in vivid hues. Under normal conditions, he says, there are quartered in the North of France, within an hour or so by rail of the sea, at least 150,000 men: 100,000 would be needed for the raid. To convey that number across the Channel with artillery and cycles would require only shipping of 150,000 tons, and more than two-thirds of that tonnage is to be found any day in French channel ports. The force named would, the writer supposes, be largely cyclist infantry, and with them would go the new quick-firing field-guns. The British fleet would be lured, as in Fashoda days, towards the Spanish coast. When the night of the dash had come, French agents in South England would cut every wire and cable connecting the coast with London and the chief centres; the raiding force would be rushed aboard and over sea.

THE METROPOLIS SURPRISED.

The writer proceeds :-

I find no difficulty in picturing to myself a great fleet of transports, herded by torpedo craft and warships, closing with the British coast in the dark hours of the morning. I can see the swift launches towing boats crammed with infantry through the smooth water into the shadow of the cliffs, and then returning empty to the transports for fresh loads. I can follow, in my mind's eye, the infantry as they quickly push a little way inland, seizing the nearest farms and cottages, placing the terrified inmates under guard, and pouncing upon any wayfarer who might give the alarm. Ere the sun was well over the horizon many thousand men and many guns would be on shore, thousands more would be following them with the utmost speed, while London, the heart of the Empire, would be slowly awakening from its slumbers to find every telegraph wire cut, possibly many railways blocked, unconscious of the enemy already firmly established on British territory.

To prevent this sudden blow, the writer urges a special set of underground wires to be laid for naval and military use alone, which would be effective for purposes of mobilisation when ordinary wires were cut. The fortifications planned ten years ago should be carried out; plans prepared for rapid concentration of regular troops; test mobilisations rehearsed; and full use made of cyclecorps. The strengthening of our fleet is also a sine qua non.

THE GENERAL OPINION IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

So far Captain Cairnes. In the Nineteenth Century, Mr. H. Somers Somerset reports what he saw at the French

Army manœuvres at Chartres. It may be consoling to read that the French discarded both strategy and scouting; that no signalling was employed; that every care was taken to make the conditions as unreal as possible. The troops advanced in column and erect into the zone of fire, and stood there exposed to a frontal fire from a whole division safely ensconced behind admirable cover! Mr. Somerset, fresh from South Africa, concludes with the confident hope that "if ever there comes an invasion, when the invading force puts into practice the lessons learnt at Chartres," " our military prestige will be restored." Nevertheless, he reports that if half what is claimed for it be true their quick-firing field-gun is "immeasurably superior to ours." He also bears this

It was my good fortune to have an opportunity for considerable conversation with a young and distinguished officer, and I was much struck by the quiet contempt with which he spoke of the recent achievements of the British arms, and by the eminent opinions which he quoted as his authorities. "Your navy is strong, but your army—you have no army," he would say, and then hasten back to praises of the fleet to cover the unguarded utterance. His opinion of the course of any future war between England and France was not without interest. They would draw away the fleet from the Channel and if they could keep the sea clear for forty-eight hours, a hundred thousand men might land in England. The war would then be over. "The English! I know the English," he would say. "We should kill a few, we should march on London and kill a few more, and when they saw that, the others would stop fighting and pay. We know the English. Look at their surrenders in Africa! It is all arranged. But I hope there will never be a war. It would be a pity. I like the English very well myself. Oh yes, it would be a flying column, but what of that! There would be very little danger, and we should make our ammunition at Woolwich. And then you have no army." This appears to be the general opinion, and an utter want of comprehension of the difficulties of the South African campaign has completely shattered our military prestige.

"OUR BELATED BATTLESHIPS."

"Your navy is strong," said the Frenchman; but according to Mr. Archibald S. Hurd in the same Nineteenth Century, our navy, relatively to our combined rivals, is painfully weak. Mr. Hurd says :-

For the first time in the past ten or eleven years the Two-Power Standard has been abandoned, and we are face to face with an unexampled situation. . . . Hitherto contractors have been able to meet the demands of the Admiralty, and consequently Imperial interests have not suffered. For three years past, however, the naval authorities have had to lament the delay in the completion of Government work, while the ships in hand for foreign Powers have been completed within their contract dates. The programmes of the Admiralty could have been carried out had it not been for the pressure of outside work crowding the workshops and shipyards.

OUR NAVY LEFT BEHIND IN THE RACE.

It is an ugly record of delay which Mr. Hurd summarises :-

The impasse of the past three years has produced the following results :

(1) Shipbuilding is in arrears to the extent of £3,000,000. (2) If war occurred this month (November) the Fleet-in-Being would lack the following ships which should now be ready for sea; six battleships, the Albion, Glory, and Vengeance, each of 12,950 tons displacement, and the Formidable, Irresistible, and Implacable, of 15,000 tons displacement; the two cruisers, Spartiate and Pandora; and about half a dozen torpedo-boat destroyers, besides some sloops and gunboats.

(3) Other ships begun at later dates are so greatly in arrears that they could not readily be completed for sea in case of emergency to take the place of ships placed out of action. Of the twenty battleships authorised by Parliament since the present Government came into office five years ago only three have been

Mr. Hurd suggests that in place of annual programmes "a Naval Defence Act covering a definite number of years would solve the present difficulty.

"A SEDAN AHEAD FOR US."

"Reconstruction or Catastrophe?" is the challenge which "an Englishman" puts at the head of his paper in the National Review. The sexagenarian incapables in the Cabinet "must go." Mr. Goschen "has left our Navy in a most perilous condition." In the Far East our battle squadron is outnumbered by the German, and is barely half the Franco-Russian fighting strength. The writer quotes "an able and instructed American writer, Mr. Brooks Adams," who says:—

War is the last and most crucial test of a nation's energy, and from the days of Cressy to those of Trafalgar the English yielded to none in ferocity and obstinacy on the field of battle. The South African campaign has, on the contrary, throughout been marked by inertia and feebleness.

He then himself proceeds :-

Those who look at history in the large way and who have studied the rise and fall of nations, will find it difficult to repress the belief that unless there is a radical change a Sedan lies ahead for us. South Africa has been our Mexico. And if we go down, it will be because we deliberately closed our eyes and ears to the truth.

England has no war-chest of gold ready for the cash payments inevitable on the outbreak of war. The writer insists on an Imperial tariff to raise the sums requisite for Imperial defence.

"THE REINCARNATION OF NAPOLEON."

He goes on to estimate our foreign perils :

At present the greatest external danger to England arises from Germany. It is impossible not to admire the courage, energy, and foresight of the Kaiser and the group of instructed men who direct German policy, but it is also impossible for Englishmen not to feel the deepest apprehension as to the trend of that policy. The Kaiser is a reincarnation of Napoleon. In Europe he represents a Continental coalition against what is still the greatest maritime Power of the world. He intends to displace us, with or without a struggle, and for that end is rapidly forging the means. Compared with the danger from Germany that from France or Russia is small, though still serious. France lacks the force, vitality, and union of Germany; Russia is without the profound knowledge which is the stock equipment of the Teuton. But both France and Russia may be used against us by Germany. The Kaiser has for years been carefully conciliating France and Russia.

COLLISION WITH GERMANY INEVITABLE.

Germany is working against us, says the writer, as she worked against France before 1870. He estimates that she will not have the ships and men ready before 1915, or at the earliest conceivable by 1910 :-

In the United States Mr. Brooks Adams sees that a struggle between German Imperialism and Anglo-Saxendom is becoming yearly more inevitable. The curves of the policies of the two Empires can be plotted, and it is seen that they must collide. If, for any reason, Germany should decide to precipitate the contest, and should succeed in forming a coalition with Russia and France, nothing could now arrest our fall. To prevent such a contingency we must have a foreign policy equal to the occasion and directed by men who both know their own minds and understand the enemy.

The writer suggests as one Minister in place of the old gang, "Sir A. Milner, could he only be spared from South Africa," who would be "invaluable." He also insists on enacting the "principle that it is the first duty of every able-bodied Englishman to defend his country.

THE UPSHOT OF THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

MR. PATRICK GEDDES in the Contemporary Review attempts a tremendous feat. The Paris Exhibition is the epitome of the modern world; Mr. Geddes sets himself to epitomise this epitome in fifteen pages. We dare not venture on a third epitome, to extract, as it were, the cube root of this latest world-show.

THE GERM OF AN INTERNATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

We may however select two instances, with which he concludes, of its contribution to general progress. He

A year ago at the Dover and Boulogne meetings of the British and French associations, the long-talked-of International Association for the Advancement of Science . . . began to take form in large general committees, which soon became definitely constituted in London and Paris, and thence extended to America, Belgium, Switzerland, and later to Russia and Germany—in all countries with encouragingly large university and public support. Hospitably received by the Exposition authorities, and headed by the leaders of French education, this first Assembly of the Association versity and public support. has continued throughout the summer, in its four languages, the work of interpretation and guidance to the Exposition in many of its departments. Even in these days of University Extension it was something that the venerable Rector of the Sorbonne should take his turn among younger teachers. Here, then, has been in actual operation in the Exposition, throughout the greater part of its duration, a living germ, at least, of an international university-university in the antique sense, open to all who gladly learn and teach. Beside this interpretative function, beginnings have been made towards the record and the diffusion of some of the best features of the Exposition, and the bringing of its manifold results, and its perhaps even richer suggestiveness to bear upon the many points where these may be of use, here in education, there in science or in art. As the links which are thus becoming established among the members of so many congresses and professions, of so many universities in all parts of the world, of so many regional scientific societies, develop into a network, new possibilities become apparent; and these, like the Exposition itself, both as regards special advance and general culture. At the coming International Exposition of Glasgow, which will open with next summer, the interpretative and critical functions will be easier, and the constructive ones more possible; as regards future exhibitions, of course, increasingly so.

A MILLIONFOLD WITNESS TO INTERNATIONAL AMITY.

Most important of all-"the essential matter" in short Mr. Geddes takes to be "the general tone and temper of the Exposition." He says :-

That this, by far the vastest and the most representative gathering of men and of things, of all kindreds, kingdoms, nations and languages in the entire course of history, should have come and gone almost without accident, without disorder, without any evil fairy at the feast, is much; that it should have brought together some representation of well-nigh all the forces of material, intellectual, and even moral, progress is more; that it should have so multiplied personal relations, so strengthened general good-feeling and international amity, is most of all. That France and Germany, for central instance, should have had more amicable relations of every kind during the past six months than in the whole previous generation is itself no small result—itself in the opinion of many best qualified to judge on both sides of the Vosges and Rhine, worth all the trouble and cost of making the Exposition . . . It is much that there should be henceforth in our generation these millionfold witnesses to the essential and organic unity, the true internationalism, of civilisation and progress.

THE Humanitarian publishes the paper read at the Newcastle Church Congress by the Rev. J. W. Horsley on the Housing of the Poor.

Mr. J Revier the si journa reader union flock. Gazeti his be himsel has ex task w convin cility No on which ing us service war we fatuous duty, v the Bo that, fi to def peace. and me into th to wit, that or by the Libera althous the Bo the Bo second be put avoid h in which ming. section throw a

UN

Mr. but it tion of Liberal Opposi a zeal Like th and Gi word in tracted imagin lingo p who re lain, w proceed Party althoug very b fact th opposed to the 1

measur

ON THE GENERAL ELECTION.

MR. J. A. SPENDER'S REFLECTIONS.

UNDER the title of "The Patriotic Election-and After," Mr. J. A. Spender contributes to the Contemporary Review a thoughtful, carefully weighed appreciation of the situation, from the point of view of the Liberal journalist who alone among the multitude of faction readers has never ceased to keep on ingeminating union, union upon the distracted bell-wethers of the Liberal flock. Mr. Spender, in his comments in the Westminster Gazette on the various phases of the struggle, has done his best to hold the candle to the devil without getting himself singed. It is a surprising feat, and one which he has executed with no small degree of dexterity. His task was a difficult one. No one is more thoroughly convinced than Mr. Spender of the utter imbe-cility with which this war was brought about. No one has exposed more mercilessly the methods by which Mr. Chamberlain and his Press succeeded in forcing us into the war, nor has any one done more useful service than he in proving that their preparations for war were as absurd as their negotiations for peace were Nevertheless, Mr. Spender considered it his duty, when this unnecessary war had been forced upon the Boers by our pushful Colonial Secretary, to maintain that, fighting once having begun, we must do our best to defeat the people whom we ought to have left in peace. From this view, of course, I profoundly dissent, and most of those who took it developed in a short time into the most absolutely hopeless form of lingoesto wit, Sir Henry Fowler, Sir Edward Grey, and others of that order, extracts from whose speeches were relied upon by the Tories as the most effective weapons for defeating Liberal candidates all over the country. Mr. Spender, although he acquiesced in the iniquity of the slaying of the Boer, justified himself on the ground that, first of all, the Boer was by no means a righteous Stephen, and, secondly, that as the job had been begun, it had better be put through. He, however, contrived on the whole to avoid being drawn into the vortex of confusion and folly in which we see the Greys, Fowlers, and Perkses swimming. He saw clearly that the attempt to label one section of the Party as Liberal Imperialists in order to throw a slur upon the other section, as if they were not true to the Empire, was treason which demanded the sternest measures of correction at the disposal of a party leader.

IN DEFAULT OF A PARTY LEADER,

Mr. Spender did his best to supply it in the Press, but it still needs to be applied by persons in a posi-tion of greater power and responsibility. For the sake of Liberal unity and for the coherence of the organised Opposition, Mr. Spender has preached and laboured with zeal worthy of a better cause, and with what result? Like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ears, the Haldanes and Greys and Roseberys refused to utter an articulate word in condemnation of the Perksite frenzy which distracted the Opposition, and for a time led the electors to imagine that the Liberals had ceased to be an anti-The only ally which Mr. Spender found who rendered the least service to him was Mr. Chamberlain, who, with characteristic adroitness and assiduity, proceeded to demonstrate the indivisibility of the Liberal Party by branding every Liberal as a Boer. This, although painful indeed to the heart of Mr. Spender, who relished no such ally, was nevertheless the very best thing that could have happened. The fact that the Pharisaic Liberal Imperialists were opposed everywhere by the Jingoes as traitors and Boers, equally with those who followed Mr. Labouchere, was the best education which the election supplied. All this Mr. Spender sets forth with due detail, omitting, of course, the part which he has played in the matter, in the article on "The Patriotic Election and After."

A PATHETIC APPEAL.

The chief interest in the article is to be found in his attempt to rouse the Liberal leaders, even at the eleventh hour, to realise in plain English what mighty fools they have made of themselves, and in particular to convince Lord Rosebery that he has betrayed the confidence of his friends and justified the worst hopes of his enemies. There is something plaintive in the spectacle of this gentle shepherd taking up his crook and admonishing the wayward wethers of his undisciplined flock, and adjuring them to be wise. "My pretty dears, be wise in time." Pathetic indeed is his adjuration to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman to lay aside the Christian virtues of humility and self-abnegation for a little season in order to assert himself as the leader of a party which, being an Opposition, means to oppose. It is a heroic task but a bootless one, at least until the Fowlers and Greys and Perkses have been disciplined by fire and have learned that, if they do not mean to oppose the Government, they have no business to sit on any Opposition benches, let alone on the front Opposition bench, which is supposed to direct the organised forces of Her Majesty's Opposition.

ON WHICH SIDE?

If they want to support the Government policy in South Africa let them go and sit on the Government benches. What is wanted is not so much discipline among a heterogeneous combination of men who have not made up their minds about anything, but a general agreement among all ranks that the first business of an Opposition is to oppose, and that in the present crisis the best service they can render to the policy upon which they have set their hearts is to offer an uncompromising and resolute opposition to the policy of the Government in South Africa. We have had twelve months of a policy of supporting the Government, and in a pretty mess it has landed us; but as long as we have groups which consider it their duty to be false to the first business of an Opposition, so long must anarchy continue, and Mr. Spender will go on plaintively piping to heedless ears.

THE "QUARTERLY" LECTURES JOSEPH.

The Quarterly Review considers that the political record of the opposing parties counted for almost everything in the recent elections, and that consequently the battle was lost almost before it was begun. The reviewer warmly reprobates the "savage and senseless rancour" of the attacks on Mr. Chamberlain: "not during the past half century has a like intensity of personal rancour been displayed in political conflict." Nevertheless the writer thinks Mr. Chamberlain should have "induced his immediate relatives so to arrange their business investments" as to make charges of sordid material interest in the conduct of war impossible even to his enemies. The reviewer goes further, and says:—

Mr. Chamberlain could well have afforded to conduct the election campaign with more self-control and a less overbearing demeanour towards the Radicals than he has actually displayed. It is a rule of invariable application in our domestic politics never to treat any considerable body of Englishmen as being consciously indifferent to the interests and honour of their country. Mr. Chamberlain, unfortunately, did not remember that rule. . . . He unfortunately appeared to charge against the Opposition not merely a present inability to form and to carry through sound collective judgments as to the requirements of o take initely ed to and uniy the rs of ciation eview

is the mself

e not e, the h he

He

of the tional v.

ays of Rector chers. sition, m, at ntique e this ds the of the and its points four

o the nce or olished , of so gional bilities , both oming h next easier, future

short mper

doms.

should order, d have forces ; that hened of all. have ast six small lge on e and should ses to em, of

t the

Imperial conditions, but a disposition to treat the interests of their country as of subordinate account. It is a want of intelligence, a political short-sightedness, not a want of morality or patriotism, that we lay to their charge; and that a prominent statesman should suggest the latter alternative constituted a gratuitous aggravation, both internal and external, of the inherent drawbacks of a national situation already sufficiently unfortunate.

THE "QUARTERLY'S" PROGRAMME.

As to the results of their victory at the polls, Ministers are warned against regarding that victory as a condonation of "Ministerial errors and weaknesses of which there have been too many." Pledged to thorough military reform, they must not neglect the task of securing "absolute security at sea—which we no longer enjoy," and which is "the first requisite." The reviewer urges that the offices of Premier and Foreign Secretary should be henceforth separate. Opposition gains in the counties lead him to remark:—

It will be necessary for the Unionist Government to clear themselves of all liability to reproach for indifference on such questions as temperance, the housing of the poor, and educational reorganisation . . . Probably in no election in recent times have so few domestic questions been raised, or so few domestic pledges given by either side, as in that of 1900; but Unionist leaders would be wofully deceived if they persuaded themselves that no attention need be paid to domestic affairs on that account.

"THE WHOLE MANDATE OF THE COUNTRY."

The Edinburgh Review says: "Who is to govern the country? was the question every elector put to himself." And, there being practically no other Party save the one in office, the verdict was for the Unionists. The writer holds that the imputation of personal corruption against Mr. Chamberlain was a slander that recoiled:—

On the other hand, the preposterous absurdity of charging Englishmen who condemned the South African war, or who disbelieved in the policy of annexation of the Republics, with disloyalty to their own country, though it might tickle the ears of party groundlings and draw thoughtless cheers from party mobs, brought no real strength to the Unionist cause, and served only to exasperate political opponents.

The reviewer has little doubt as to the meaning of the General Election:—

Lord Salisbury's Government is to carry out the arrangements in South Africa consequent upon the war, it is to continue to conduct our foreign affairs so as to safeguard Imperial interests all over the world, and it is to strengthen the military and naval defences of the United Kingdom so as to render those interests as secure as possible against attack. This is the whole mandate of the country to the new Parliament,

The writer declares that conditions do not now exist for the reconstruction of a strong Opposition, and are not likely to arise until Liberals repudiate the Irish Alliance and Home Rule.

A VINDICATION OF DEMOCRACY!

The articles in the Fortnightly Review on the General Election do not call for any particular notice. An anonymous writer declares that "the suspension of the swing of the pendulum is a vindication of democracy." But the writer thinks that the pendulum would resume its swing if Mr. Chamberlain were not to be recognised as the real master of the Cabinet. Mr. Chamberlain has now attained the pinnacle of national influence, and if he remains at the Colonial Office he cannot be prevented from making the Colonial Office the most conspicuous institution in the Empire. All vindications of democracy which rest upon so narrow a base as the suspension due to the temporary ascendency of Mr. Chamberlain are very egg-shelly. In fact, as the writer himself points out:-

The party which can only return between one-third and onefourth of the House of Commons can still poll nearly half the country. If it could convert five out of every hundred electors it would sweep the constituencies.

THE INTERMENT OF LIBERALISM.

Mr. Edward Dicey, writing on the downfall of Liberalism, is not, as might be expected from his title, engaged in executing a war dance over the defeated party in the recent election. What he endeavours to do is to prove that Liberalism perished as far back as 1885. In that year it became extinct, having exhausted its mandate. Mr. Gladstone's adoption of Home Rule was the only alternative to escape this immediate peril, and everything that has happened since has only confirmed Mr. Dicey in the belief that Liberalism is dead. If it revives again it will probably appear in Radical-Socialistic guise.

In the Forum for October Mr. H. W. Lucy describes "The British General Election." The article, which deals with matters known to all English readers, does not require detailed notice.

THE AMATEUR v. THE PROFESSIONAL.

We often despise American politics, but in some respects apparently they have much to teach us. Mr. Maurice Low in the National Review contrasts our amateurishness with American professionalism. He says:—

Perhaps due to the American love of following a certain routine, or perhaps due to the habit of political thought which prevails in a Republic, a seat in Congress comes as a reward to a man who has served his political novitiate and who is deemed worthy of higher honours. It would be practically impossible in the United States for a distinguished novelist or journalist or anybody else who had taken no active part in politics to go to a constituency a few weeks before election and offer himself as their candidate. He would be laughed to scorn. In the first place, a candidate for Congress must be a resident of the State which he represents, and must live in the district from which he hopes to be elected; and although there is no law to prevent a man from living in one district and running in another, here again the unwritten law makes itself felt, and in now more than twenty years I can recall but a single instance where it was ignored. No; the man who aspires to come to Congress was ignored. No; the man who aspires to come to Congress must train himself for it, much as he would for any other serious business of life. He will commence in what is known as "local politics"; he will perhaps hold a municipal office, he will later go to the State Legislature, to the Lower House first and afterwards to the Upper, and then if he has established his reputation he may lay his wires to receive the Congressional nomination.

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated sketch of Dunrobin Castle by Lord Ronald Sutherland-Gower is the chief paper in the Pall Mall Magazine for November. Tighe Hopkins recalls several recreations of prison-life which have become famous. Imprisonment in the Bastille, we are told, was once held to be the making of a rising littérateur. "Searchlight," continuing to inform us how to popularise our army, says that soldiering has never been more popular than now in all the annals of our military history. Among other reforms he suggests permission to wear plain clothes. Tommy would then only be recognised when on duty and dutiful; his private escapades would cease to bring dishonour to his uniform. Captain A. H. Bagot in his second article on Hunting outlines the duties of the master, servants and hounds.

the ' for 1 then fices exist whic. inclu weal hand new its w differ befor when his fa I quit Salv Engli remot immo expres revere

deifi

It s months faith.
what j articles
Cecil ment provok
of the
that he but w provol was s believ

in creed plaster-on order and Af British powerfu Godless world w more the Bibles, in the fi world.

"It is that we years or what cu convicti prepared tinctive religion races. indictme an apprehis very

THE EVOLUTION OF A NEW GOD.

THE APOTHEOSIS OF MR. JOHN BULL.

In the dictionary "apotheosis" is defined as "the deification of a human being; the elevation to the rank of the 'gods' of a person who was remarkable for virtue, for heroism, or even for audacious vice. Temples were then built to the new divinity, priests appointed, sacrifices offered, and probably festivals instituted. It still exists in India and other pagan countries." Among which pagan countries, to wit, we may now assuredly include the British Empire and its Australian Commonwealth. For evidence increases and multiplies on every hand that the new Imperial spirit is rapidly evolving a new god, and that the apotheosis of John Bull is well on its way to completion. Mr. Rhodes summed up the difference between the old faith, which is withering away before the new, in his famous remark to General Booth when, after listening to the Salvationist's exposition of his faith, he exclaimed, "You are quite right, Mr. Booth; I quite agree with you in everything, only where you say 'Salvation' I say 'Empire.'" But this tendency of the English to become gods of their own idolatry had a remoter origin, for was it not Milton who used the immortal phrase about "God's Englishmen"?—the expression which in his mouth was compatible with the reverent recognition of the humility of the instrument, but which embodied the sentiment that in vulgar souls provoked the famous saying that no race in the world was so hated as the English, because every Englishman believed that God made the English and somebody else the other peoples.

THE ANNEXATION OF PROVIDENCE.

It so happens that the periodicals on our table this month afford curious testimony to the increasing consciousness of the change that is passing over the popular faith. The question is discussed for instance in somewhat pompous fashion in the Monthly Review in two articles, the one on National Character, the other on Cecil Rhodes. The two articles complete and complement each other. The writer of the first is much provoked by Michael Davitt's description of the religion of the English, and quotes the following passage to show that he does well to be angry:—

Christian by profession only, materialistic in practice, agnostic in creed, the English have reduced God to a Scriptural entity of plaster-of-Paris disposition that can be manipulated as required m order to impart Divine sanction to Imperial missions in Asia and Africa. Providence, in fact, has been annexed to the British Empire, and this is why it has grown so great and powerful in the hands of the Chosen People of the Gentiles. Godless themselves, they are persuaded, nevertheless, that the world will become more "Godly," be better and happier, the more their Godless rule is spread by wars, conquests, capital, Bibles, missionaries, and gin, and all the other things that follow in the footsteps of English commercial civilisation round the world.

MR. RHODES AS DIVINE INSTRUMENT.

"It is not true," says the Monthly Review. "Is it likely that we should be Godless who have for over a thousand years owed our life and our safety to the sea?" A somewhat curious observation which will not carry immediate conviction to the mind of the general reader, who is not prepared to accept the doctrine that Godliness is a distinctive note of all maritime peoples. Piracy rather than religion has been the characteristic of many sea-born races. But as if to confirm the accuracy of Mr. Davitt's indictment, the editor publishes immediately afterwards an appreciation of Mr. Rhodes, in which he discusses this very question of the new religion. He says:—

"Vindex" observes that Mr. Rhodes's "devotion to the Mother country is in a sense his religion." Patriotism is indeed a religion, if religion, in its widest sense, means a conception, or devotion to an object, which binds men together, and kindles enthusiasm, and makes them act. It was the real religion of old Rome, whose citizens, under whatever forms their deity might hide, adored the Genius of Rome. It is a power which raises men above their narrower selves. It inspires devotion and self-sacrifice.

And then, while rightly discriminating between the religion of General Gordon and that of Cecil Rhodes, he declares: "We believe that Mr. Rhodes is himself an instrument of the Divine Will."

AN ELOQUENT PROPHET OF THE NEW FAITH.

But for a whole-hearted exposition of the merits of the latest born of all the deities we must turn to the Review of Reviews for Australasia, in which my esteemed colleague Mr. Fitchett indulges himself in amazing fashion in vaunting the divine virtues of the new god. Mr. Fitchett has been struggling in vain to explain to the citizens of the new born Commonwealth of Australasia how it is that Englishmen succeed. He does not answer it as Carlyle would have done, by saying that as the hell of the English consisted in not getting on, they concentrated their energies on the avoidance of that hell with a concentration which brings with it its own reward. By no means. Mr. Fitchett, who is a most religious man, a minister of one of the strictest forms of the religion still held even by Jingoes, can only see in this marvellous, unprecedented, and unspeakable success of the English all over the world the manifest evidence of an almost superhuman origin and providential destiny. In short, no Roman orator chosen to explain the elevation of a defunct Cæsar to the heights of Olympus could have outdone Mr. Fitchett in the fervour of his eulogy.

THE WORLD'S BEST BEST.

Emerson's "English Traits" supply Mr. Fitchett with the substance of a good deal of his eulogium, but Emerson did at least say that the English were not immaculately conceived, nor at their birth was the black drop of original sin squeezed from their heart as was the case with Mahomet. Therefore it was necessary for Mr. Fitchett to touch up Emerson's picture of "God's Englishmen" until they became radiant as Apollo, refulgent with the glory of deity. That this is hardly an exaggeration our readers may judge from the following extracts from this remarkable article:—

Who wants to explain the Englishman can do nothing better than say that he comes of the best human stock; that Providence meant him to play a great part in human affairs; that geography, climate and history have been for him divinely appointed school-masters; that his religion has been one of the great factors in his education. . . . A dozen races have yielded their finest qualities to make the modern Englishman. In substance he is a Saxon, but Scandinavian and Celt, Dane and Norman, have combined to enrich the primal stock with a hundred fine qualities which are not native to it, giving it hardness, edge, quickness, vision, imagination. . . . The Englishman, by virtue of his race, is strong-bodied, patient, practical, hard, well-balanced, not given to effervescence of any kind.

Mr. Fitchett, it would appear, has never seen the conjugation of the verb to "Maffick":—

The Englishman, too, by virtue of his blood, is practical. His enemies say he is slow-brained and unimaginative.

This only means that he has an overpowering veneration for facts. He thinks much of substance, and little of form. Utility is, for him, the final logic . . . . The race is rich in great men; but, what is much more important, the general standard of brain-power is high. Take a hundred Englishmen anywhere, and points and one-electors

all of s title, l party lo is to s manwas the il, and afirmed If it Socialscribes which s, does

s some s. Mr. sts our . He at which ward to deemed possible nalist or go to a mself as the first he State which he revent a ner, here where it Congress ny other s known office, he ouse first tablished ressional n Castle paper in Hopkins have beare told, térateur. opularise en more tary his-ission to e recogscapades Captain outlines amongst them will be found men who could plant a colony, administer a city, organise a great business.

THE DIRECT GIFT OF GOD.

But all these pre-eminent qualities fail, in Mr. Fitchett's opinion, to account for the success of the English, for that could be attributed to nothing else than Deity itself. Mr. Fitchett says:—

Some of the facts which explain British history are themselves incapable of explanation. They cannot be analysed; they are primal, and must be accepted. It is a fact that, somehow—whether by virtue of race or of history, or as the direct gift of God—the English-speaking people has a pre-eminent endowment of brain-power.

In case anyone should question this conclusion, Mr. Fitchett sums up by invoking the authority of Captain Mahan, an appropriate prophet of the new religion. Speaking of the history of the English—

a history which, taken humanly, seems planless, a mere distracted tangle of accidents—but which yet has somehow ended in the appearance of a mighty, ordered, and majestic empire, Mr. Fitchett says it is curious to note that Mahan is driven back to find the secret of it all in a divine purpose. "One marvels," he says, "at such a history. It cannot be an unplanned result, with no presiding mind behind it. Is it not," he asks, "simply the exhibition of a Personal Will, acting through all time, with purpose deliberate and consecutive, to ends not yet discerned?" In the last analysis surely this is the secret of why the Englishman succeeds.

Very fine this, no doubt, and in a certain sense it may be quite true. But we cannot be more a chosen people than Israel of old, and their divine mission did not save them from plunging into irretrievable ruin when they exalted their horn on high, and forgot the God who alone had made them great. "Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall."

AN ESTIMATE OF MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

MR. H. WHATES writes on Mr. Chamberlain in the Fornightly Review. He discusses the prospect of Mr. Chamberlain's Premiership in view of the light thrown upon his character and his capacity by his administration of the Colonial Office. Mr. Whates writes dispassionately, but he winces at the prospect of seeing the man who made the war with President Kruger placed in a position where he would have to conduct delicate negotiations with great empires. Speaking of Mr. Chamberlain's responsibility for the war, Mr. Whates says:—

If the Prime Minister had asserted himself and had insisted upon the Raid Conspiracy being probed to the bottom, upon the prosecution of Mr. Rhodes and others as well as of Dr. Jameson and his officers, and if he had prevented the compact between the two Front Benches in defence of the partial and inconclusive report of the Select Committee, the Boers would have had no excuse for their disbelief in the honesty and good faith of the British Government. These things were left to Mr. Chamber-lain, with the result that Mr. Chamberlain's discussions with Mr. Kruger were ineffective, and that we have had a year of war, and that, having repossessed ourselves of the territories of the two Republics, we shall have to keep a large permanent garrison in South Africa. These are the immediate fruits of Mr. Chamberlain's talents as negotiator with Mr. Kruger, who, at the outside, did not have an army of more than 60,000 men at his back. They did not easily reconcile one to the thought that Mr. Chamberlain possesses the diplomatic gifts which are essential to a statesman who has to deal with Powers which can arrange combinations of fleets and count their armies by the hundred

After referring to Mr. Chamberlain's various indiscretions, such as the Long Spoon and Leicester speeches, Mr. Whates says:—

They suggest a regret that his energies cannot be absorbed in War Office reorganisation, or in some purely administrative duties where the worst results of refusal to conform to his wishes would be the resignation of easily replaceable officials.

The rest of the paper is interesting chiefly for the account that it gives of Mr. Chamberlain's administration of the Crown Colonies. His masterfulness is well illustrated in the following extract from Mr. Whates' narratice of Mr. Chamberlain's policy in Jamaica:

To prevent bankruptcy the Imperial Government had to come forward with monetary help. Mr. Chamberlain criticised the island politicians with some asperity. With the object of putting things straight he instructed the Governor, Sir A. W. L. Hemming, to carry through a new Tariff Bill. The elective members, being in a majority, hindered the Bill from passing. Mr. Chamberlain insisted upon its passage, and had additional members nominated to out-vote them. There was a furious outcry. "Let it be clearly understood," telegraphed Mr. Chamberlain, "that it is my instruction that Government measures when fully considered and judged of paramount importance must be passed." Thus imperiously did he override the Electives. The Bill was passed; and the Governor now works under an explicit instruction from Mr. Chamberlain to retain the nominated members, and use their votes as he—meaning Mr. Chamberlain—wishes. The Elective members are powerless to thwart the Colonial Secretary's will.

Ingenuous Electioneering.

"ELECTIONEERING Women: an American Appreciation," is the title of an amusing paper by Elizabeth Banks in the Nineteenth Century. The purpose of it is apparently to express horror at the way English ladies go into public-houses and hob-nob with besotted electors in quest of votes. But first, to heighten the effect by contrast, she tells of the ladylike way American women go canvassing. Incidentally she described what British law would condemn as bribery, but it is so delicately administered. The device was hit upon for the sake of the foreign women whose husbands had votes:—

It was desired to explain to these ignorant housewives that if Bryan were elected the purchasing power of money would be less than it would be if McKinley were elected, so the "Republican Girls" took with them, besides tracts, baskets of potatoes and apples. They would spread them on the floor or the table, and say to the foreign housekeeper:

"See! here are ten potatoes. If McKinley is elected you can buy that many for five cents. Then here are seven potatoes. If Bryan is elected, you can buy only that many for five cents! Now, would you rather buy ten potatoes for five cents or only seven?"

If the woman could not talk English, up would go her ten fingers to denote that she would, of course, prefer to purchase the largest amount of goods for the smallest amount of money. Then the political kindergartners would smile and say: "That's it, of course. Now, you explain it that way to your husband when he comes home to-night, and tell him to read these papers, and be sure to vote for McKinley."

As they turned to the door, the housewife would perhaps remind them that they had forgotten to take their "buildingblocks" from the table, and in an unconcerned, off-hand sort of way they would answer, "Oh! never mind. Just keep the potatoes."

Certainly there was no use carrying the same potatoes or the same apples about all day, when the "Republican Girls" had plenty of pocket-money and could buy a fresh supply for each "demonstration."

Miss Banks suggests that the bribery practised by British dames is only more insidious and not less corrupting. the tree ment Chief exclusion office based the p the c for worgan our s prope corps divising the f years

LI

this l

Cent

estim

he gr

Bettin the discoveran be organia

answe

our l sugge fire m in effi heavy there. to retro of the eye to But—

of all

and u manoe

Sur If w certain one pa shortco should enemy far as I ha

armies reprod in figh gave, o existing army t is as cl effete o

Mr. this t

ARMY REORGANISATION.

"SUGGESTIONS FROM THE FRONT."

LIEUT. COLONEL CHARLES À COURT contributes under this heading his "lessons of the war" to the Nineteenth Century. The Intelligence Department had correctly estimated the numbers and armaments of the Boer; but, he grants, there was a miscalculation of the magnitude of the task imposed by the general South African environ-ment. This miscalculation arose from the lack of a Chief of Staff's office or branch of the War Office exclusively concerned with preparation for war. Such an office is needed to work out schemes of Imperial defence based on our own responsibilities and the fixed points in the policy of the Great Powers. We have failed, "not in the conduct of the war, but in the antecedent preparation for war." The writer holds that "so far as regards organisation, the war has in the main amply vindicated our system of reserves, our plan of mobilisation, and the proportion of the three arms in the larger units." Army corps organisation fell through and gave place to divisional and brigade commands. The writer advocates the formation of a reserve of officers available seven years after their leaving the army. Moreover :-

Better means of rewarding good N.C.O.s who have done well in the field must be found; and above all it is necessary to discover some means by which the middle classes of the country can be given a career in the army—a point in which our military organisation is most seriously deficient.

THE TOTALLY NEW FEATURE.

He wants for our divisional artillery a battery of guns answering to the Vickers-Maxims of the Boers, and for our Horse Artillery quick-firers without delay. He suggests that the great range of modern rifle and artillery fire makes cavalry less useful than mounted infantry and in effect obsolete. He mentions the strange fact that heavy artillery fire on the Boer trenches kept the enemy there. Safe there, they dare not stir out of shelter even to retreat! He remarks on the extraordinary clearness of the South African atmosphere which enables the naked eye to scan a distance of one hundred and sixty miles. But—

The invisibility of the foe was certainly the most disconcerting of all the conditions of the war, since this invisibility was novel and unexpected, and has never been reproduced in any peace manœuvres at home or abroad.

MANŒUVRES IN PEACE AND WAR.

Surveying his general experience, he says :-

If we wanted practical manœuvres on a large scale, we have certainly had them with a vengeance: no enemy could make one pay more dearly than the Boers for tactical errors and for shortcomings in the services of information and security. We should probably have had less difficulty to contend with if our enemy had consisted of double the number of regular troops: so far as I can recall, we only once met a foreign commando, and not one of them escaped.

I have seen the peace manœuvres of most of the European armies, and I can truly say not only that I have never seen reproduced, even in the barest outline, the conditions we found in fighting the Boers, but that these peace manœuvres themselves gave, one and all, an unfaithful picture of modern warfare under existing conditions, and will certainly result in the ruin of any army that attempts to carry them out in the field, if the enemy is as clever a fighter as the Boer, and as little trammelled by effete commanders and superannuated traditions.

Mr. Somers Somerset in the same magazine bears out this testimony in regard to the French manœuvres at Chartres.

LORD ROBERTS FIRST WAR LORD.

Lord Thring pleads in the Nineteenth Century for less of the machine and more of the self-reliant man in the training of our officers, as well as for a reduction in the compulsory expenditure of officers. His main advice runs as follows:—

Place the War Office in commission, with Lord Roberts as first War Lord, give the new Board a free hand, and it will work out its own reform. Adopt the principle of decentralisation, let the higher military officers, each within his area of administration, have power to regulate the discipline and training of his men, and hold him accountable if he does not do his duty. Above all, and beyond all, train up the officer in the way in which he should go; teach him that soldiering is a profession to be studied and not trifled with, encourage him to learn to distinguish the different capacities of a country for military purposes . . . . Impress on him the necessity of circumspection and caution.

A RIFLE RANGE IN EVERY PARISH.

In the Monthly Review of November Mr. Ralph Neville, Q.C., writes a paper on "National Defence," in which he makes various suggestions, only one of which however calls for notice here. He suggests that every one should be taught how to play his part in the defence of his country, and makes the following suggestion:—

Every parish council might be required to keep a register of the men between the ages determined upon, say from seventeen to thirty, not serving or having served in the regular or auxiliary forces. A return of this register should be made to the district council, and by the district to the county council. Each parish council should be required to provide a Morris-tube range and an armoury for the rifles, each district council the use of a long range within the district. Every man on the register should be required to produce yearly for a certain number of years a certificate of efficiency at the range. The men from each parish should select their commanders from among themselves, or any resident in the parish; while these might themselves elect a commander for the district. The only uniform required would be a bandolier and a cap or hat bearing a distinctive number or badge. The different commands should be mustered once or oftener in the year by a military officer, either in the separate parishes, in the district, or in the county. The places selected should be, in turn, all the defensible positions in the county, and the commanders should have pointed out to them how such positions ought to be entrenched and held.

FINING THE MAN WHO WILL NOT SERVE.

The first place in Blackwood is given to proposals for "Army Reorganisation." These include the formation in every county and large town of a permanent committee, with Lord Lieutenant or Mayor at its head, to encourage recruiting, which must go on at the rate of 80,000 a year for the regular army and as many for the militia. Exsoldiers should have berths secured for them. Volunteers should be limited in numbers. A more contentious proposal runs:—

Every one, in a county, who may be unwilling to serve either in the Militia or the Volunteers of that county, should be made to contribute to the funds needed locally for the maintenance of these forces; and a levy should be made, under county authority, to meet this service.

These are only a very few items in a very elaborate scheme. One sentence touching the regular army is significant: "Promotions to be made as at present."

"OUR OWN MANDARINS."

Under this title Dr. Macguire in the United Service Magazine for November holds up our fossilised authorities to hearty ridicule. Mandarins of the War Office, mandarins of the Treasury, he has no mercy on them,—poor "antediluvian officials and statesmen" as he calls them.

eeches, orbed in istrative s wishes indis-

for the tration I illustratice to come sed the putting ... Hemembers, Chammembers outcry. berlain, en fully bassed." Bill was instrucembers, wishes.

Colonial

precia-Banks arently go into ors in ect by women British licately sake of s that if ould be Repuboctatoes e table, ted you her ten ourchase money. 'That's otatoes.

perhaps uildingind sort eep the nusband

s or the ls" had for each sed by

SOUTH AFRICAN PROBLEMS.

THE Quarterly Review, treating of Federation in South Africa, holds out a very dim and distant prospect of its realisation. First must end the period of martial law; next must come government of the Crown Colony type; then responsible or full Parliamentary self-government. This third stage should, argues the reviewer, be postponed until Anglo-Saxons form a majority of the white population in the South African Colonies :-

In plain words, the present preponderance, or even equality, of the Dutch population in South Africa would alone constitute a sufficient reason for postponing the creation of a Federal South Africa. . . . It is more than probable that municipal selfgovernment will be granted to the Randt and to other urban districts in the Transvaal so soon as the exigencies of the military situation permit. When the time comes to grant responsible government to the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies, it may be possible to make the acquisition of these privileges by the inhabitants of the former Republics simultaneous with the creation of the Federal Constitution.

But "the impulse to federate must come from within and not from without."

A GOOD WORD FOR THE BOERS.

The Edinburgh Review, though supporting the Government, has never been bitten with the Khaki fever like the rest, and in its latest survey of the War in South Africa is not afraid to speak as follows :-

The Boer war will not rank among the great achievements of the British army. The immense disproportion between the numerical forces and the material resources of the combatants, the grave initial mistakes, and the too frequent "regrettable incidents" combine to rob it of the glamour which attaches to military success.

The writer even dares to say a good word for the Boers:-In their dogged tenacity of purpose there is something which the British people cannot fail to admire. Irregular forces, not wholly amenable to discipline, not even commanded in the sense understood in all professional armies, and containing in their ranks selections from the scum of Europe, would inevitably commit acts contrary to the usages of war, and calculated to arouse bitter resentment. On the other hand, such leaders as Joubert, Louis Botha, and De Wet, as well as some of the rank and file, have proved chivalrous foes. When calm judgment has supplanted political rancour, the popular estimate of the character of the Boers will probably undergo favourable modification. Only a people imbued with the spirit of true patriotism would have so strenuously upheld their independence.

POINTS CONCERNING SETTLERS.

Mr. Arnold White utters in the Contemporary some wise words of warning "concerning South African Settlers," whom many well-meaning persons propose to shoot into our new possessions in order to outweigh the Dutch. He calls attention to one formidable consideration: "Alone among the civilised white communities of the world the Cape Colony dispenses with excise." Brandy is only ninepence a bottle in Capetown. As the writer urges, "White immigration to a land saturated with bad alcohol is heavily handicapped." He argues that it will be necessary either to impose excise in the Colony, or exclude alcohol from the new settlements. His next point is that the presence of black labour is pretty certain to make the white labourer "uppish." Another serious consideration advanced from "the careful study of all the colonising experiments that have ever been made" is that "Anglo-Saxons have never consented under any circumstances or in any climate to settle down on a particular plot of land with the tools, implements, and other provisions originally granted."

As it would be undesirable to plant all our settlers in the cities, leaving the Dutch as monopoly of the country, the veldt must be made habitable by English families. This means that engineers must first have created an irrigation system as an insurance agent against the failure of crops. Mr. White adds the further precondition of light railways. From all which it seems some time will elapse before British immigration will overbalance the Dutch population. Mr. White does, how-ever, recall with satisfaction the Government's despatch of 4,000 settlers to South Africa in 1820, and the planting of the German Legion there after the Crimean

"AN EMPIRE ADRIFT."

UNDER this alarming title Mr. Vaughan Nash gives to the Contemporary his impressions and suggestions concerning the state of India. He presents a gloomy report.

I spent eleven weeks in the famine districts in the hot weather, as correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, trying to ascertain the bearing of our administration on these life and death problems. I had the advantage of hearing the opinions of a large number of British officials and native gentlemen, and whenever I had an opportunity I got into talk with the villagers about their farms, debts, means of living, and general position. From all I saw and heard, the conclusion was irresistible that India is drifting on the rocks, that her wealth is not increasing-the traders and moneylenders were never, indeed, so rich as they are to-day, but the cultivators are growing poorer—that the dissolu-tion of village institutions and the growing power of the moneylender, who is swallowing up India in enormous mouthfuls, are the signs of a social and economic break-up, for which no benefits that we may confer can compensate. Railways and moneylenders have taken away the surpluses which used to form the reserves for bad years. The landlord institution that we planted has been a failure, if not a curse; the indebtedness of the cultivators is piling up faster than the public debt; in a word, the symptoms point to a state of exhaustion—exhaustion which, at the touch of famine, becomes collapse.

THE CURSE OF THE MANCHESTER SCHOOL.

Mr. Nash refers this dismal state of things to what the Germans call Smithianismus, and we the Manchester School. He says :-

The West did not foresee that the East would crumble into powder under the spells of its individualistic maxims, its doctrines of personal aggrandisement, private property and free competition. The early Anglo-Indians had to go exploring and governing at the same moment; they had no notion that their pocket editions of Adam Smith were tins of dynamite, destined one day to blow the village community into helpless atoms and hurl the ryot from his field.

REMEDIES.

Mr. Nash's remedies are more sober than his rhetoric. He advocates :-

(i.) Elasticity of revenue demand-by the introduction of a fluctuating system based on the year's actual crops, such as obtains in parts of the Punjaub;

(ii.) Reversion to the old order of things, under which land could not be alienated outside the tribe; and (iii.) The power to go behind the bond, or, better still, administrative rather than júdicial settlement of debt disputes.

He asks for a comprehensive fiscal survey for the readjustment of Imperial and Indian burdens, and more particularly of the incidence of the latter. found more than one official in India who hold most strongly that some method of representation is indispensable. "It seems conceivable," he says, "that district councils of village representatives might be formed without endangering what is called our hold in India."

IN has a private afloat public that h himsel illustra most c Kruge

Who Kruge ment has "T "That Presid certair He th at Rus go thre papers the Pi accura uttered a singl tions, Kruger strong appare the co agains those v the use

> To bear n never a him, a vaal C sion. distinc was br it ; Kru write fo Mr.

extrem insists new-far hours, and da and th relation the feu He is altoget on relig shared liberal fetters theolog often b

Mrs. her hus

PRESIDENT KRUGER IN PRIVATE LIFE.

In the October Revue des Revues Mr. Alfred Stead has a chatty and amusing article on President Kruger in private life. Although many anecdotes have been set afloat concerning Kruger, he is still known rather in his public than in his private capacity. The writer tells us that he has only used information collected personally by himself or from friends of the President. The article is illustrated with original photographs, and some of the most celebrated English and Continental caricatures of Kruger. We quote some of the most striking anecdotes.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE PRESS.

Whenever an important official message has to be sent Kruger dictates it; and when he reads it to the Government he frequently interrupts himself with such remarks as "That's not expressive enough," "That's too strong," "That passage is not clear enough." During the last Presidential election Kruger took it into his head that certain papers did not reproduce his speeches correctly. He therefore commanded the reporters, during his stay at Rustenberg, to submit their copy to him that he might go through it before allowing them to send it on to their papers. One of these journalists observed that he thought the President had an absolutely marvellous faculty for accurately remembering every word and sentence he had uttered, adding that the shrewd old man would not allow a single word said by him to be capable of two constructions, or to be replaced by another word. Although Kruger sometimes has the papers read to him, he has strong objections to the Press as a whole, and thinks it apparently somewhat a waste of time to spend long over the columns of a newspaper. "The papers which are against me," he says, "prove that I do nothing good; those which support me prove the contrary, so what is the use of reading them?"

KRUGER AS A LETTER-WRITER.

To the President's epistolary powers it is difficult to bear much testimony. Mr. Alfred Stead says he could never actually hear of more than one genuine letter from him, addressed to Mr. Montagu White, formerly Transvaal Consul-General in London, and still in his possession. The writing is not very clear, and the spelling distinctly phonetic. A dyke on the Presidential farm was broken, and workmen were urgently needed to repair it; Kruger, being alone, had therefore no choice but to write for them.

HIS OLD-FASHIONED HABITS.

Mr. Alfred Stead has several anecdotes showing the extremely conservative nature of the President. He insists upon having the old Dutch cooking, and not any new-fangled sort; he takes his meals at very primitive hours, and at midday is generally served before his wife and daughters. He rules his family with a rod of iron, and thunders at them when they displease him. His relations with the men working on his farm date back to the feudal system; they respect but can hardly love him. He is strongly attached to his wife, but treats her as altogether an inferior being. His strict "Dopper" views on religion are well known, but, it would seem, not always shared by his retrograde grandchildren, whose very liberal education has made them inclined to break the fetters of the old faith. The President's powers of theological argument and his intolerance of doubt have often been described.

THE PRESIDENT'S WIFE.

Mrs. Kruger, it seems, is content to be in subjection to her husband. An excellent housekeeper and mother, she knows nothing of the outer world, and less, if possible, of politics. But, on the other hand, she is a walking medical encyclopædia, with a remedy for every ailment; ever on the look-out for one more recipe to add to an already enormous collection. It may be doubted, however, whether she is quite so ignorant either as her husband would wish or as the outside world believes. She was very popular with the Boers, chiefly because of her unfailing sympathy with suffering. But she is hardly more progressive than her husband, and even refused to be present at the opening of the Pretoria railway. "I have lived till now without seeing these things," she said; "and I can do so still."

KRUGER IN LONDON.

It is hard now to imagine Kruger in London in a fashionable hotel like the Albemarle. Yet so he was some few years ago. Everywhere he preserved his characteristic habits, whether in a West End London hotel or on his stoep at Pretoria; there he was holding his Bible in one hand and his pipe in the other, reading and re-reading the prophecies of Isaiah.

DOES LOVE ENDURE?

In the November Lady's Realm various writers discuss this painful question, without, however, getting much nearer to its solution, perhaps because the preliminary question—what is meant by love?—does not seem to be

THE ANSWERS.

The Hon. Mary Cavendish thinks that it does endure; and she takes the word in so wide a sense as to cover most forms of human affection. The Hon. Stuart Erskine, as might be expected of a man, sorrowfully remarks that—

The philosophy of love—of which so much is spoken and written—is simply that it soon endeth. However much we may seek to disguise and conceal the unpalatable fact, it remains that, do what we may and will, love dies and hearts grow old. And of all those things which pay homage to the tyrant triumvirate of change, decay, and death, sexual love is probably the most servile subscriber to this iron-bound régime. Of all the passions agitating the human soul, love is, in my opinion, the hurt which is the soonest ended and the soonest mended.

In this death of love he finds "the saddest and most shocking of all the moral phenomena that surround us." The time has come, he thinks, for us to band together to form a new passion, "a kind of halfway house between love and platonic friendship," both of which he considers to have been weighed in the balance and found grievously wanting.

The Countess Puliga—"Give it oil"—strikes the wisest and most hopeful note. "If you wish to keep the lamp of love burning, give it oil." Love will endure if cared for, if cultivated; but untended, like a plant, it withers and dies. She adds:—

A great deal of thought ought to be bestowed on the best ways of loving; trivial and humble they may sometimes appear, and yet potent in their power for binding hearts.

and yet potent in their power for binding hearts.

The worship of self, the exaggerated respect of the I am I, is exceedingly contrary to the endurance of love: selfish sway can have but a time.

Plain words to be understood of all, which add far more to the solution of an ever-present problem than impossible suggestions for the creation of a new passion, or the allegorical musing of Lady Mary Milbanke, the only other contributor to the discussion.

espatch ad the rimean

s con-

tlers in ountry,

milies.

ted an ist the r pre-seems ll overs, how-

veather, scertain death a large enever I out their om all I India is ng—the

they are dissolumoneyiuls, are iich no ys and to form that we mess of t; in a naustion ole into ms, its nd free ing and at their lestined

ms and etoric.

such as ch land er still,

or the l more le has l most spenslistrict ormed ia."

"DEMOCRACY A SORRY FARCE."

THE writer of "Musings without Method" in the November Blackwood rejoices to conclude, from reflection on the recent elections, that "Democracy is a sorry farce." He says that once in seven years or oftener democracy must be taken into confidence by the rulers of the country:—

It is an accepted tragedy that the people must be flattered and cajoled, and the parliamentary candidate commonly arrives upon the scene of action with his mouth full of promises and compliments. . . . The real work of catching votes is performed by an ingenious process called canvassing, and he who has never canvassed cannot understand the splendid farce of the British democracy.

After a vivid description of what canvassing is, and the sporting instinct it arouses, the writer records the reflection left after the declaration of the poll:—

The silly paradox of those who believe that the greatest wisdom lies in the greatest number of fools has been covered with ridicule. Universal suffrage is happily a sham. No member obeys the orders of his constituents; no member goes to Westminster to carry out the wishes of others. He goes there for his own ambition, to support his own friends, or to expound the theories which he keeps near his heart. And as democracy is a deceit from the point of view of the elect, so it is a sham from the point of view of the elector. Every citizen may vote—that is true. But he may not vote for whom he will. No man can be nominated if he lack money or support.

The net effect on the nation is then summed up :-

The strangest truth of all is, that the extension of the franchise has had no appreciable effect upon the House of Commons. Our government is to-day what it has always been, an oligarchy hedged about with safeguards. Nothing has changed save the form of election. The People sends to Westminster the same sort of men as in the old days were nominated by the great landowners.

The inveterate Toryism of Blackwood consoles itself amid all democratic changes by simply making fun of them. It exultantly exclaims:—"So the democracy has proved a sham, and its failure is the country's triumph." Nevertheless, "though its chief merit lies in its lack of success, a free form of government has its uses":—

It stops the mouths of political agitators, or rather it permits their mouths to open at infrequent intervals, and by a pretence of confidence weakens the force of opposition.

Then follows another jibe :-

Nobody can be trusted to govern us unless he has first passed through a fiery ordeal. What that ordeal is matters little enough. The power to stand many hours upon one leg, the toss of a coin, a fearless capacity to "out-roar the lion-throated seas"—any of these artifices would be as just and logical as election by a free and enlightened democracy. But England, above all other countries, has got on without logic.

Liberal and Radical associations, wishing to rouse the fighting blood of their members, might print these "musings without method" and circulate among their adherents. There is enough truth in the ridicule to make it a wholesome stimulant.

Blackwood for November has three outstanding articles noticed elsewhere; a linesman's panegyric on our soldiers under fire: "musings without method" in scorn of the "farce" of democracy: and its scheme of army reorganisation. It recommends that "after annexation" we should endeavour to break up the Boers' organisation by altering their boundaries and redistributing the districts within. It pleads that Lord Kitchener be assigned an important part in reconstructing our Services.

WORK OF THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

DR. MACNAMARA'S REVIEW.

DR. MACNAMARA sends a very interesting and useful paper to the Fortnightly Review entitled "Three Years' Progressivism at the London School Board." Macnamara bewails the fact that the production of a new Drury Lane pantomime probably interests many more people than the statement of policy by the newly elected School Board. He regards the unconcern and even contempt of the work of the School Board as viewed by the majority of the citizens as a lamentable instance of Little Englandism of the most dangerous kind. Mr. Macnamara has a very good account to give concerning the result of dethroning Mr. Diggle. In 1891 Mr. Diggle had a majority of 35 out of a board of 55; only mustered a party of 23. The new board summarily put a stop to all wrangling about religious matters with which Mr. Diggle's party had wasted their time for years and applied themselves to their proper business. Mr. Macnamara in describing the result of their work gives the first place to the inquiry which they instituted into the incidents of the cost of educating the children of London. Seventy per cent. of the cost of education in London comes upon the rates, a much larger proportion than that of any other town. The Board abolished the weekly fee formerly exacted from pupils at evening continuation schools and thereby sacrificed some £5,000 a year, and raised the average attendance from 19,712 to 28,189. Sixteen commercial evening schools have been established, at which some 30,000 pupils have been enrolled. £100,000 has been employed for the purpose of improving old schools. Swimming baths have been provided in two schools distant from any public baths, and a gymnasium is henceforth to be part of the equipment of every higher standard school. They have raised the standard for full time exemption for purposes of labour from the for full time exemption for purposes of labour from the sixth to the seventh. Their efforts to increase the average attendance by greater severity in hunting up absentees has only been partially successful, because of the way in which London magistrates openly and intentionally bring the law into ridicule. They have also examined carefully the extent to which children are compelled to toil in out-of-school hours; but nothing practical has been done in the direction of mitigating the evil. They have also made elaborate inquiries as to the extent to which scholars are underfed, but so far without producing much result. In the three years the rate has gone up on an average ½d. a year. The rate was 12½d., it is now 14d. average ½d. a year. The previous Board with a Moderate majority raised the rate by 2d. The increase of rate, indeed, is automatic and inevitable. Mr. Macnamara concludes his paper by an earnest appeal to the ratepayers of London to give a second term of office to the Progressives, and so show their appreciation of the fact that it is absolutely necessary to educate our people if we are to hold our own against the ever-increasing competition of the European and American continents.

IN a spirited narrative of Sarsfield, the hero of Limerick, and the darling of Ireland, Mr. R. Barry O'Brien tells in Cornhill this incident of the Battle of the Boyne:—

Flying from the Hill of Donore, James did not draw rein until he reached Dublin Castle. "The Irish ran," he said to Lady Tyrconnel, who met him on the threshold. "Your Majesty seems to have won the race."

bei bri bei ma wit mo I life a fi cheaming this T serv dish not mai

cont

more meal maiz corn pane cellu pape brew hulle varni grits, tum, cake

gluce

In can
The the A prosporove American
As to says

No an au of foo

> Ma Ric Bar Bar Bar Rye Wh

Barl Rice Rye Whe

A COMING REVOLUTION IN FOOD.

RD.

d useful

e Years'

ion of a ts many ne newly ern and pard as nentable

ngerous

t to give

In 1891

d of 55;

1897 he mmarily

ers with for years

ss. Mr.

ork gives ted into ldren of cation in oportion shed the evening

e £5,000

n 19,712 schools

o pupils

mployed

Swim-

schools

mnasium of every from the average bsentees

e way in lly bring

ed care-to toil in een done ave also o which p on an now 14d.

aised the utomatic paper by to give a so show

ly necesour own

European

hero of

R. Barry

tle of the draw rein he said to

" Your

Mr.

MAIZE AS THE FOOD OF MILLIONS.

PERHAPS the most interesting article in the October Forum is that in which Mr. J. S. Crawford describes "The Maize Kitchen in Paris and Its Lesson," the lesson being that American producers should lose no time in bringing the good qualities of maize as an article of food before the attention of Europe. In most parts of Europe maize as an article for human consumption is regarded with aversion, but, according to Mr. Crawford, it is "the most valuable plant that grows":—

It is rich in forage, rich in feed, rich in food. All animal life upon the farm, from poultry up, grows and fattens upon it—a fact which can be affirmed of no other grain. Millions of people in Europe would be blessed if they knew how to use the cheap corn foods of America and had easy access to them. No mind can take in the commercial possibilities of a market for this grain in Europe.

The managers of the kitchen at Paris prepare and serve, free of charge, an infinite variety of soups and dishes made from maize. But the value of maize does not end with its nutritive qualities:—

It might be thought that a list of the commodities made from maize would be prosaic and commonplace. Not so. On the contrary, it is highly interesting, and—to the thoughtful man—more than suggestive. In that collection you may find corn meal (yellow and white), pearl hominy, hulled corn, cream of maize, granulated corn meal, canned green corn, canned hulled corn, maizena, samp, degerminated samp, cream meal, self-rising pancake flour, quick malt, brewers' grits, husks for mattresses, cellulose made of pith for packing the coffer-dams of battle-ships, paper stock prepared from shells of the corn-stalk, degerminated brewers' meal, Bourbon whiskey, alcohol, bolted corn meal, hulled corn meal, feed of ground corn blades and stalks and cobs, varnish, cob pipes, lager beer, fancy table syrup, pop-corn, table grits, British gum, salves, laundry starch, table starch, frumentum, flaked hominy, gum paste, corn oil, vulcanised corn oil, oil cake, grape sugar, gluten feed, glucose, confectioner's crystal glucose, and confectioner's paste.

Indian corn is one of the cheapest of foods, and dishes can be prepared from it at half the cost of wheaten flour. The Germans are already beginning to appreciate it, and the American export has doubled in ten years. With the prospect of the Siberian railway bringing all kinds of provisions in abundance to Europe, the time has come for American maize producers to pre-occupy the European markets and establish themselves while there is yet time. As to the chemical value of maize as a food, Mr. Crawford

Not many years ago a German chemist, named König, who is an authority on food composition, published the following table of food values:—

| 01 10 | od varues:—            |        | Protein,per cent. | Fat,per cent |     | Carbohy-drates,per cent. |
|-------|------------------------|--------|-----------------------|------------------|-----|----------------------------------|
| M     | aize, American .       |        | 10.17                 | 4.78         |     | 68.83                            |
| M     | aize, S.E. Europe      |        | 9.42                  | 4.13         |     | 69.37                            |
| M     | aize, S.W. Europe      |        | 8.84                  | 5.80         |     | 65.79                            |
| Ri    | ce hulled              |        | 6.73                  | 1.88         |     | 76.46                            |
| Ba    | rley, average, all cou | intrie | 9.66                  | 1.93         |     | 66.99                            |
| Ba    | rley, North America    | an .   | 10.48                 | 2.42         |     | 66.94                            |
| Ba    | rley, England and So   | cotlan | d 9 80                | 2.17         |     | 64.45                            |
| Ba    | rley, C. and N. Ger    | rmany  | 9.88                  | 1.80         |     | 66.75                            |
| Ry    | e, average, all cour   | tries. | 10.80                 | 1.77         | . 6 | 70.21                            |
| W     | heat, average, all cou | intrie | 12.04                 | 1.91         |     | 69.07                            |
|       |                        |        |                       | 1                |     | value of ond Calorics.       |

|               |      |    |  |  |  |  | p | Fuel value of onepound Calorics. |  |  |
|---------------|------|----|--|--|--|--|---|--------------------------------------|--|--|
| Cornmeal .    |      |    |  |  |  |  |   | 17.30                                |  |  |
| Barley, granu | late | ed |  |  |  |  |   | 16.40                                |  |  |
| Rice          |      |    |  |  |  |  |   |                                      |  |  |
| Rye Flour .   |      |    |  |  |  |  |   | 16.30                                |  |  |
| Wheat Flour   |      |    |  |  |  |  |   | 16.75                                |  |  |
|               |      |    |  |  |  |  |   |                                      |  |  |

TRUSTS IN ENGLAND.

By Mr. ROBERT DONALD.

MR. ROBERT DONALD contributes to the American Review of Reviews a paper on Trusts in England, which gives particulars of recent industrial developments which will have considerable interest in this country. Mr. Donald says that England has become honeycombed with trusts and combines, and that there is no effort either to check trusts or to control them. This new phase of industrial combination is entirely and perhaps inevitably the outcome of the joint stock system. This system, while it gives facilities for the formation of trusts. also acts in various ways as a check on abuses and the dangers of these great aggregations of wealth and power. The great safety valve, however, is free trade. The tyranny of capital will be restrained and the combines will find that their safety lies in raising prices as little as possible. Mr. Donald is even disposed to believe that if the combines are under good management and speculation is discouraged, that this new phase of British industry may increase competition with other countries in foreign trade whilst it consolidates the market at home. Mr. Donald devotes several pages to an elaborate record, very convenient for reference, on the number of combinations that have taken place since December, 1897. He has done the work with his usual painstaking accuracy, and I only discern one curious slip. Speaking of the great amalgamation between Sir W. G. Armstrong, Mitchell and Co. and Sir Joseph Whitworth and Co., he says: "This company supplies all kinds of armour; but they have not their own ship-building yards yet, although this development is to come." Now, apart from the fact that ships are built in Elswick itself, what did the firm of Charles Mitchell and Co. bring to the firm excepting their shipyards, which Mr. Donald thinks still are to come? This, however, is but a small matter. Mr. Donald points out that bankers are to be swallowed up wholesale. Lloyds Bank has absorbed thirty-one, and Barclay's and Parr's have each swallowed twenty-four. Among the national and international trusts which have an absolute monopoly in their own fields Mr. Donald mentions the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers, a trust created last July with a capital of eight millions. This trust does ninety per cent. of the business of the whole country. The National Wall Paper Trust, formed in March, 1900, includes all the manufacturers of wall paper in Great Britain. The Bleachers' Trust, formed in July, is an amalgamation of fifty-three firms with a capital of eight millions. The International Thread Trust is associated with twelve foreign manufacturing concerns. large number of combines are just now in an embryo state, waiting for the opportune moment to come on the market. They include a hat trust, a combination of sixty-six firms with a capital of ten millions, and a worsted spinners' trust, which will comprise one hundred and twenty-eight firms, and have a capital of eighteen millions sterling.

THE interesting correspondence of Liszt and Fürstin Wittgenstein is being published by Adelheid von Schorn in the Neue Deutsche Rundschau.

Young Oxford is the name of a threepenny magazine devoted to the Ruskin Hall Movement. From the pages of the November number we learn that the centre of the Ruskin Hall Movement in America will be at Trenton, Missouri. Each number of the magazine publishes a number of short essays on Ruskin topics.

ALMONER OF THE WORLD'S DAILY BREAD.

THE simple endeavour to give mankind day by day its daily bread bids fair to make the American wheat trader not only the greatest of his class, but the most sensitive and alive cosmopolitan to be found in the world. He is bound to consider humanity as a unit—infinitely varied and complex no doubt in its wants, but still a very tangible and palpable unit. Mr. Ray Stannard Baker in the November Windsor gives a very striking and suggestive sketch of America and the world's wheat supply, and of the man who mediates between both. This is the portrait of the type of man which the central position of Chicago has produced:—

The American, with his enormous surplus of wheat for exportation, has become, naturally, the greatest of all wheat traders. He is practically the manager and dictator of the world's wheat movement. He is eminently practical, clearheaded, and far-sighted; and wherever I saw him-in Chicago, Minneapolis, New York, Duluth, Buffalo, Detroit, or Toledohe was always astonishing, he came so near to the realisation of the cosmopolitan. Every morning he knows the conditions of the weather in Chili and the progress of threshing in India. The United States Government hangs at his elbow a map showing the rising storm in Montana, which may reduce by two per cent. the crops of Northern Minnesota. newspapers inform him as to prices in Mark Lane, London; in the Produce Exchange, New York; on the Board of Trade, Chicago; in the Chamber of Commerce, Minneapolis. The railroad companies quote him daily rates for shipments to Rio Janeiro, Hamburg, and Hong Kong. His State Government weighs his wheat as it arrives from the fields, and decides definitely as to its grade. He knows intimately how many bushels of wheat there are each morning at the great terminal elevator points the world over, how much is affoat in steamships, how much is being rushed across the continents in cars. His bank stands ready to advance him money at the lowest rates of interest to the full value of the slips of paper which record his elevator holdings. He knows the personal traits and needs of half the races of the earth. He knows, for instance, just when the Chinaman can be persuaded to buy his cheap flours instead of rice. He knows that Germany will use his bran for making molasses cakes. He knows that the Finns will sometimes eat his wheat, though grown 4,000 miles away, in preference to the flour of Russia. He knows that the Frenchman eats more bread than the Englishman, and the Englishman more than the American; and while there is wheat in the bins of Manitoba or Buffalo he will not allow the poorest bakeshop in London to go without bread to sell. So vast are his dealings that thousands have become units to him; when he sells "Io wheat," he means 10,000 bushels, not ten bushels. He knows just where in all the world wheat will be scarce, and he prepares overnight to turn all his elevators, railroads, canals, and steamship lines to satisfying the demand. He may not know a harvesting machine from a plough, this trader of wheat; but his eye is always on the thin, wavering ratio line between population and production; he is always facing world-wide starvation, and always averting it by his splendidly organised business machinery. Indeed, there is no more impressive spectacle in the whole scheme of human life than the almost frantic energy and haste of the men of the wheat pits, of the railroad and steamship lines, and of the mills, each fighting tooth and nail for his own personal gain, and yet serving all unconsciously the mighty world purpose of feeding the city from the surplus of the distant field.

A few estimates as to last year's crop—the crop of 1899—will give some idea of the wheat business of the American:—

For feeding his 74,000,000 inhabitants for one year, at 43 bushels each, he needed ... For seeding his wheat farms of 47,000,000 acres, at 14 bushels to the acre, he needed...

345,000,000 bushels. 70,500,000 bushels.

Total requirement for one year... ... ... 415,500,000 bushels.

Thus he got from the crop of 1899 something over 600,000,000 bushels of wheat, and that left him approximately 200,000,000 bushels to send abroad to his hungry brethren of other nations. More than a third of this he ground and exported in the form of flour; the remainder he sent as wheat.

From the "World's Work."]

VIINA

by puicon not new in reg wh of l befo desi than tabl £11 year 1870 two

G smel their natu Ame mists Briti irons 1895 The iron

ores, Cumi and C impo State enoug the fu increa Amer likely up til produ

Mi value is not amou at the Mr. princ

Declare Calcula pre

Brit nation

THE DECLINE OF BRITISH COMMERCE.

ws the ded to ny will

Finns vay, in chman

n more oins of hop in ealings

e sells

. He

and he canals,

ay not wheat;

d-wide

ganised

ressive almost

of the fighting

ing all ty from 9-will

hels.

hels.

hels.

000,000

nations.

form of

THE North American Review for October contains a very spirited reply by Mr. Benjamin Taylor to an article by Mr. A. M. Low on "The Decline of British Commerce," published in the same review some time ago. "British commerce is not declining," says Mr. Taylor, "and it is not fair to contrast the rapid increase in the entirely new trades of foreign countries with the slight increases in the already enormous trade of Great Britain." In regard to German trade, Mr. Taylor points out a fact which is not generally remembered—that the statistics of German trade before 1889 do not include the exports of Hamburg and Bremen:—

There are, in fact, no complete "German" statistics available before 1889. Nevertheless, Mr. Low makes up a table with a design to prove the relatively greater progress of other nations than Great Britain's between 1870 and 1895; and in that table he states the "special" export trade of Germany as £116,031,000 in the former and £165,895,000 in the latter year. As already pointed out, the figures Mr. Low quotes for 1870 do not include the exports of Hamburg and Bremen, the two principal ports of Germany.

THE IRON TRADE ARGUMENT.

As to the argument deduced from the increase of the iron trade of Germany and the United States, Mr. Taylor says:—

Germany and the United States had practically no iron smelting to speak of in 1870, and, therefore, had barely tapped their deposits of iron ore. Once they began smelting, it was natural that Germany's output of ore should be quadrupled and America's quintupled in five and twenty years. But the mistake Mr. Low makes is in measuring the decline of the British industry by the decline in the output of British ironstone. That is easily explained. Between 1870 and 1895 we entered upon what may be called the age of steel. The manufacture of steel requires the smelting of hematite ores, the deposits of which in Great Britain are confined to the Cumberland district. To feed the blast furnaces of Scotland and Cleveland, in order to make steel-making iron, we had to import hematite ores from Spain. Germany and the United States are now doing the same thing, neither country having enough native ore presently available for the existing demand of the furnaces. It is perfectly true that the smelting of iron has increased enormously both in Germany and in America, and in America has reached dimensions never yet attained, nor ever likely to be attained, in Great Britain. But it is also true that, up till now, Great Britain is the only one of the three great iron-producing countries that is able to make both for herself and

Mr. Taylor also points out that comparisons of the value of trade in different years may be unfair, if regard is not paid to the difference of prices. To test the actual amount of trade in any year it is necessary to revalue it at the prices of the year with which it is compared. Mr. Taylor quotes the following table based on this principle:—

BRITISH EXPORTS AS DECLARED AND AS RE-VALUED.

| Declared value          | 1839.        | 1898.        | 1897.        |
|-------------------------|--------------|--------------|--------------|
|                         | £255,465,455 | £233,300,792 | £234,350,003 |
| previous year           | 233,613,000  | 233,897,000  | 237,054,000  |
| Variation from price    | +15,851,000  | —508,000     | -2,704,000   |
| Variation from quantity |              | —321,000     | -3,031,000   |
| Actual differences      | +22,106,215  | -828,916     | -5,795,548   |

British trade, says Mr. Taylor, does not suffer from the national conservatism, nor from the stupidity of the British merchant, nor from German and American superiority. All these are pretexts, while the real evil is Trade Unionism:—

This it is that cripples us, by enhancing the costs of production and constantly restricting the output. Mr. Low doubts whether the tyranny of the British Trade Union is any more oppressive than that known in America. But he does not know British Trade Unionism, of which I could tell him moving tales enough to "make his flesh creep." "Why does not the United States suffer from the same cause?" asks Mr. Low. Have patience. The turn of both the United States and Germany will come—will not now be long in coming.

THE WOES OF AN EDITOR'S WIFE.

"AN Editor's Wife," in the November Woman at Home, has a most entertaining paper on "The Girl who should Marry an Editor." No girl, we should say, if such a dog's life is before her; and editors ought to go unmarried if they cannot look after their wives a little better than this particular editor's wife seems to think they do. Unfortunately an editor is seldom an editor when he marries; and this explains why the unwary so often get trapped, for celibacy is not noticeably commoner among editors than among any other men. This is an editor's wife's advice to those not yet so unfortunate as herself:—

If a girl should notice any budding signs of editorship about her fiancé, let her take Mr. Punch's advice, and remain single; unless, of course, she feel strongly that even editorship would not, in her case, quell the ardent springs of affection.

The girl who marries an editor should possess her soul in patience, and, like the lady in the Proverbs, find her comfort in "looking well to the ways of her household." She must not be vain of her accomplishments, for her husband will think nothing of going to sleep during her most masterly efforts at Mozart or Chopin. She will gradually accustom herself to regard her nusic in the humbler light of a soothing soporific. She must not rebel if, like the husband in "Elizabeth's German Garden," he fail "to speak a single whole sentence in three weeks," and she must expect but few endearments and relaxations.

Besides this, she "must endure his absence for at least thirteen hours out of the twenty-four, and must tolerate the fact that his meals, his waking and sleeping hours are all extraordinary and irregular."

If he comes in at half-past three in the morning, filled withwoe and the prospect of a European war, his wife must be ready to soothe and sympathise.

Above all, let her mind her own business, and never seek to invade the editorial sanctum. She may, we are told, "darn her husband's socks, tend him, nurse him, mend him," etc., but on no account must she have literary aspirations of her own, or, if she has, she must confide them to other editors than her husband, "although," as the writer remarks, "why he should think nothing of his wife's literary ability until other editors appreciate it is perhaps less easily explained." Disappointment and hope deferred, apparently, are the daily bread of the editor's wife:—

"We have been twenty-five years married, and Samuel has always had some craze or other," once remarked pathetically the much-jaded wife of a kaleidoscopic and fire-eating editor. "If only he would have a quiet time and settle down!"

Now we can quite understand the remark of a distinguished foreign journalist to a lady on learning that she was the wife of a London editor: "Madame, you have my most profound commiseration."

THE LIMITS OF MUNICIPAL TRADING.

THE birth of twenty-eight boroughs in a single daythe 1st of November-ought to give a powerful impetus to every form of municipal interest, and to make the question of municipal trading, which has occupied a Select Committee of both Houses, and which the current number of the Edinburgh Review discusses at length, one of special public concern. The reviewer tries to find if a line can be drawn between those matters which can best be entrusted to municipalities, and those which may safely be left to private enterprise. He considers that water and light are essentials which may be therefore municipalised, but that locomotion is not an essential. He touches on the question whether municipalised concerns should be run for cheapness or for profits applicable to the reduction of the rates. He quotes the view of the Lord Provost of Glasgow that the second alternative is dangerous: the Corporation of Glasgow applying the profits of each undertaking to that undertaking. The writer gravely doubts whether municipal dwellings do not work more harm than good. He accepts the definition of the Lord Provost of Glasgow that the functions of the municipality are rather functions of service than functions of trade.

A PENNY TELEPHONE.

In respect of the telephone, the writer seems inclined to nationalise and municipalise the system at the same time. He says:—

After repeated application Glasgow has obtained a license from the Postmaster-General, and is in a position to work an exchange over an area equal to that worked in Glasgow by the National Company. Only from the spread of this system and the subsequent introduction of the principle of competition can we look for such a perfection of telephonic facilities as will enable all classes of the public to communicate with each other as freely and as cheaply as they do by post. Already in Glasgow it is proposed to establish numerous call-offices where for a penny any one will be able to communicate with the entire area. The extension of such a system to the United Kingdom is a task immeasurably, less difficult than the establishment of the penny post, and if properly worked there is every prospect that it would be a source of actual profit to those who undertake it. But the position requires to be boldly handled; the interests of a body of monopolists cannot be allowed to override the advantage and convenience of the public at large; and the efforts of the central Government should be supplemented by the energy and enterprise of local associations,

MUNICIPALISATION STRIDING ON.

But the writer calls attention to "a far-reaching attempt by municipalities to invade the province of individual enterprise," and quotes the following instances:—

By an Act of last year power was given to a Midland corporation to provide Turkish baths. In a bill of the recent session-power was sought, among other things, to provide apparatus for games and athletics, to be used presumably, but not necessarily, on recreation-grounds established by the authority. In another, power was sought to provide refrigerators and cold ice stores for the preservation of marketable articles, and to sell ice. In another it was proposed to provide bathing tents. In another, tailoring was contemplated; saddlery in another. In several, power was asked for to construct and manage refreshment-rooms in parks. By many corporations the power of manufacturing as well as supplying electrical fittings was demanded, and in three cases efforts were made to acquire the privilege of providing entertainments and charging for admission.

The House of Lords, on Lord Morley's advice, has refused assent to bills authorising the manufacture as well as the supply of electric and water fittings.

THE LORD PROVOST OF GLASGOW'S RULE.

Among the dangers attending so wide an extension of municipal enterprise, the writer points out the difficulty of finding unpaid municipal councillors with time and ability equal to the new demands, and the peril of stunting individual enterprise. This is the position to which the writer leans:

We believe, then, that it behoves Parliament to impose some carefully framed limit on the trading efforts of municipalities within the areas administered by them. It may be that Lord Crewe's Committee may find some sounder basis for fixing that limit than was suggested to them by the Lord Provost of Glasgow. But there is much wisdom in the definition he laid down, and he supported it with good sense fortified by long experience. He said that the municipalities might safely be entrusted with, but confined to, the supply of things which were in their nature suitable to a monopoly, which were articles of necessity, and which required control of the streets or portions of the public property of the municipality.

GOING BEYOND BOUNDS.

Where the municipality extends its enterprise outside its own boundaries, as where it supplies water or light or locomotion to its neighbours, a new difficulty arises. May it make a profit out of its neighbours' necessities? In the case of tramways the question is becoming grave:—

Glasgow is already working thirteen miles outside the city boundary, and expects soon to be working thirty-four. Huddersfield obtained powers this year to establish spurs of its own system, extending in many directions into many areas. And unless some proper check can be established, we may expect ere long to see a large number of town councils in the position of a board of directors owning and controlling a network of tramways over a wide district, and comparable in difficulty and importance with many minor systems of railways.

Some check, such as insistence on joint management and a

Some check, such as insistence on joint management and a sharing of responsibility by all the authorities affected, will have to be devised, and the higher the authority devising it the

SIR HENRY FOWLER'S DICTUM.

The reviewer cites another outline of suggestea limitation which has been suggested:—

Sir Henry Fowler, a friend of municipal administration if ever there was one . . . would limit it to such undertakings as are clearly for the common good and the general use of the whole community, and which it is for the public advantage to place under public control.

But he would not allow the general user to decide what came under this definition. The reviewer raises the question whether municipal employés should be allowed to retain their municipal franchise. He presses for the imposition by Parliament of "wise and temperate conditions" for the regulation of the whole matter.

The most notable paper in Longman's for November is one by G. Bradshaw on Indian famines. The writer gives a vivid idea of the heroism of the administrators who fight these terrible visitations of hunger. He quotes a missionary who said, "Very few missionaries could show a record of self-sacrifice equal to that of Government officials," and complains that while England honours with almost superstitious reverence the magic letters "V.C.," she recks little of "the men who have saved thousands from a horrible death" and "faced death in the most ghastly of diseases with quiet English pluck." Mr. G. Paston revives out of the dust of oblivion the story of a once famous authoress, Mrs. Grant, of Laggan, whose "Letters from the Mountains" had a great vogue in the beginning of the century.

in the wide Tom from selve the fraction the cain the smell consist transpit " a soldie than the fa

On

betwe

with:

a mo catacl of the in the

of rifl

witne grazir the ti

"I've heard but i repres merci after t be hea presse histor

It we the posound they party complements. No exulting

Thi Vaal dose of dignifi

For 40-pou Brakfo 3-inch gentler Piff, pi more o

"TOMMY" UNDER FIRE.

A PAPER on "Our Soldiers," written by "Linesman" in the November Blackwood, will, if we mistake not, be widely read and vastly appreciated. It is a panegyric on Tommy Atkins, it is true, but it contains pictures drawn from life of the way our private soldiers comport themselves in the actual brunt of battle. The writer contrasts the fantastic imaginings of what soldiers feel in their first action with what he saw at the front. He says:—

The writer's first taste of fire was an unexpected shelling of the camp when dinners were being prepared, and all men were in the peaceful frame of mind inseparable from the fragrant smell of cooking meat. . . . How were all hands taking it, considering that they were men who had only landed from the transport three days before? Apparently they were not "taking it" at all, in the sense of being affected by it. I have seen soldiers make more fuss over the upsetting of a perambulator than they did over the shouting of those grim messengers from the far-off kopie.

A RUSH TOWARDS THE SHELL.

At Colenso,-

sion of fficulty e and eril of ion to se some palities

t Lord

ng that asgow.

e. He

th, but nature y, and public

utside

ght or arises.

sities? oming

he city

idders.

ts own ect ere on of a mways

ortance

and a

1 have

it the imita-

if ever as are whole place

what

s the

lowed

or the condi-ember

writer

rators

uotes

show

nours etters saved

ath in luck."

n the

ggan, vogue One of these monsters landed with a shriek and a thump between the writer and the company he was leading, and burst with a magnificent whirring roar. What did that company do?

. . . The company certainly lost its perfect alignment for a moment, because the men in the immediate vicinity of the cataclysm were edging rapidly towards it to search for fragments of the shattered projectile, and to stare at the hole it had blasted in the ground!

"A FREE HAIR-CUT."

More striking still is this testimony :-

Farther on, when we had entered that spitting, humming zone of rifle-fire, the like of which no living soldier had ever before witnessed, a bullet skimmed along the top of a man's head, just grazing the skin and flicking off the hair in its course. Surely the time for a prayer, or even a shriek, if ever there were one. "I've just had a free 'air-cut, mates!" was the only observation heard by the officer. Rifle-fire has often been compared to hair, but it is pretty safe to say that it never gave a more faithful representation than it did upon the smooth veldt between those merciful ant-hills. Is it credible that rough jokes, loud inquiries after the welfare of friends next door, or rather next heap, could be heard sounding from anthill to anthill from jolly red faces pressed against them behind? It may not be credible, but it is history.

IN RETREAT.

It was the first time the men had come under fire from the pom-pom: they amused themselves by imitating the sound of its voice to a nicety with their own! When they were ordered to retreat they retired like "a party....all silent and all damned" and sulky, but a complete refutation of Sir John Moore's remark that British soldiers were "no good in a retirement":—

No soldiers but our own have ever turned their backs on an exulting foe with their discipline intact—nay, more rigid and dignified than before; with their spirit as high, their courage as steadfast.

A TEA-FIGHT AMID DROPPING SHELLS!

This is how General Hildyard's Second Brigade on Vaal Krantz stood the severest test—"a long and severe dose of artillery fire, without a chance of reprisal or being permitted to advance":—

For fifteen hours shells fell upon that miserable kopje from a 40-pounder perched upon Spion Kop, from six 7-pounders on Brakfontein, from two pom-poms in varying positions, from a 3-inch Creusot in its usual state of hurry, from an irascible old gentleman of a 94-pounder on Doorn Kloof. Wheugh-bang! Piff, piff! Orrgh-crash! Never did bird-fanciers recognise more certainly the different notes of the warblers of the grove than did those 3,000 lodgers on the kopje the respective voices of those vile, unceasing shells. Some died, some were carried away on dripping stretchers before they could learn the full gamut. And the survivors? The few within the writer's ken—quarrelled! During a lucid interval in the shelling, the regimental cooks had contrived to make and distribute tea to the men lying prone in their shelters. The distribution was not, perhaps, impartial.... So there arose a bickering... "Peace" yelled the monstrous shrapnel at the height of the argument; "Shut up!" snapped the pom-pom shells; "Silence!" boomed the far-off 40-pounder. Not a bit of it. No foreign-made projectile ever fired shall stop a Briton well under weigh with a grievance!

NOT FAULTLESS.

The writer explains that the British soldier does not desire glory; does not think of glory; and therefore wins it. He is thinking of unattainable beer or tea, or the next camping ground, or how long his contract-boots will last. The writer allows that Tommy is slow to perceive a danger or a possible advantage, slow to meet the first or seize the latter. He takes no care of himself, and is too dependent on his officers. Nevertheless, the writer concludes, "He is everything a soldier should be, save in one particular"; he is not cunning.

"THE UNION OF CIVILISED PEOPLES."

WITH a noble optimism Baron d'Estournelles de Constant prophesies in the November Humanitarian of the inevitable harvest of good which follows the good seed sown at the Hague. He is not deterred by what has happened in South Africa. He says:—

If we are willing to reason truthfully and coolly, we shall see that the Transvaal War has caused pacific ideas to make a stride in advance, through the unanimous condemnation to which it has been subjected by the civilised world, as well as by the lamentable but significant decision of the Powers to confine themselves to this platonic condemnation and not to render the war general.

No one will emerge from this crisis satisfied, not the conquered nor the conqueror, nor the neutrals who feel themselves responsible to the conscience of humanity. The result, still dim but certain, of this unanimous displeasure, will be expressed in the masses by the need, the necessity of organising peace, and of rendering war more and more rare and difficult.

. . . Everything is helping to prepare peace in the world.

The establishment of apparatus for mediation and arbitration makes the writer confident that no Government will dare to refuse arbitration. "The cause of arbitration is won."

The Chinese disorders have brought to pass this miracle: "the union of the civilised peoples." The writer proceeds:—

The nations will lose their importance; they will perceive that they are small and weak if they remain isolated; they will be forced into association like individuals, not through love, but through self-interest well understood, by the instinct of self-preservation. The twentieth century will be the century of association, not only of men, but of peoples.

But, like a true prophet, the writer recognises the freedom of choice which belongs to those he addresses; so his last words are:—

A ridiculous and blood abortion of civilisation in the Far East; the triumph of barbarism; universal war, or ruin and social revolution—such will be the inevitable result of discord among the Powers at Pekin.

Civilisation has reached the tragic and decisive hour when it must choose between good and evil, between the instincts of violence, of cupidity, and the appeals to reason. It cannot hesitate under penalty of abdicating and going to perdition.

I

VIIM

THE VERY LATEST THEORY OF THE CRUCIFIXION.

By J. G. FRASER.

MR. J. G. FRASER, the author of "The Golden Bough," was regarded by the late Mr. Grant Allen with an almost superstitious veneration. Mr. Grant Allen was not the kind of man to worship any one, but he almost worshipped Mr. Fraser for his "Golden Bough," and he would almost have fallen down at his feet in an ecstasy of devotion on hearing the latest contribution on the theory of religion. Mr. Fraser had contributed to the Fortnightly Review for October and November a paper on the Saturnalia and kindred festivals. Both papers are very interesting and full of much suggestive matter. The only point which will impress the general public is the bearing which they have upon Mr. Fraser's theory of the Crucifixion. But I prefer to allow Mr. Fraser to state this in his own way:—

Festivals of the type of the Saturnalia, characterised by an inversion of social ranks and the sacrifice of a man in the character of a god, were at one time held all over the ancient world from Italy to Babylon. Such festivals seem to date from an early age in the history of agriculture, when people lived in small communities, each presided over by a sacred or a divine king, whose primary duty was to secure the orderly succession of the seasons and the fertility of the earth. Associated with him was his wife or other female consort, with whom he performed some of the necessary ceremonies, and who therefore shared his divine character. Originally his term of office appears to have been limited to a year, on the conclusion of which he was put to death; but in time he contrived by force or craft to extend his reign, and sometimes to procure a substitute, who after a short and more or less nominal tenure of the crown was slain in his stead. At first the substitute for the divine father was probably the divine son, but afterwards this rule was no longer insisted on, and still later the growth of a humane feeling demanded that the victim should always be a condemned criminal. In this advanced stage of degeneration it is no wonder if the light of divinity suffered eclipse, and many should fail to detect the god in the malefactor. Yet the downward career of fallen deity does not stop here; even a criminal comes to be thought too good to personate a god on the gallows or in the fire; and then there is nothing left but to make up a more or less grotesque effigy, and so to hang, burn, or otherwise destroy the god in the person of this sorry representative. By this time the original meaning of the ceremony may be so completely forgotten that the puppet is supposed to represent some historical personage, who earned the hatred and contempt of his fellows in his life, and whose memory has ever since been held up to eternal execution by the annual destruction of his effigy. The figures execration by the annual destruction of his effigy. The figures of Haman, of the Carnival, and of Winter or Death which are or used to be annually destroyed in spring by Jews, Catholics, and the peasants of Central Europe respectively, appear to be all lineal descendants of those human incarnations of the powers of nature whose life and death were deemed essential to the welfare of mankind.

THE ANNUAL BARABBAS-

It is possible that the reader will fail to see the bearing of these conclusions upon the crucifixion of Christ, but Mr. Fraser leaves him in no doubt upon that point. He suggests that it was customary—with the Jews at Purim, or perhaps occasionally at Passover, to employ two prisoners to act the parts respectively of Haman and Mordecai in the passion play which formed a central feature of the festival. Both men paraded for a short time in the insignia of royalty, but their fates were different; for while at the end of the performance the one who played Haman was hung or crucified, the one who personated Mordecai, and bore in popular parlance the title of Barabbas, was allowed to go free. Pilate, perceiving the trumpery nature of the charges brought against Jesus, tried to persuade the Jews to let him play the part of Barabbas, which would have saved His life; but the merciful attempt failed, and Jesus perished on the cross in the character of Haman.

-OR THE ANNUAL HAMAN

Mr. Fraser puts this astonishing theory forward, with the suggestion that its adoption would tend to explain many things in the gospel narrative:—

The hypothesis that the crucifixion with all its cruel mockery was not a punishment specially devised for Christ, but was merely the fate that annually befell the malefactor who played Haman, appears to go some way towards relieving the gospel narrative of certain difficulties which otherwise beset it. On this assumption Pilate had no power to prevent the sacrifice; the most he could do was to choose the victim. Again, consider the remarkable statement of the Evangelists that Pilate set up over the cross a superscription stating that the man who hung on it was King of the Jews.

It is difficult to believe that Pilate could have put up such an inscription, says Mr. Fraser, unless it was merely a traditional form under which the unfortunate victim was annually delivered over to death. Assuming that Mr. Fraser is right, what then? He answers that point himself as follows:—

In the great army of martyrs who in many ages and in many lands, not in Asia only, have died a cruel death in the character of gods, the devout Christian will doubtless discern types and forerunners of the coming Saviour—stars that heralded in the morning sky the advent of the Sun of Righteousness—earthen vessels wherein it pleased the divine wisdom to set before hungering souls the bread of heaven. The sceptic, on the other hand, with equal confidence, will reduce Jesus of Nazareth to the level of a multitude of other victims of a barbarous superstition, and will see in him no more than a moral teacher, whom the fortunate accident of his execution invested with the crown, not merely of a martyr, but of a god.

AN ANGLO-AMERICAN SOCIAL UNION.

SIR WALTER BESANT, much struck by the fact that thousands of Americans visit this country every year without seeing more than the external side of English life, and thereby receiving many false impressions, has had the excellent idea of forming a Union to promote social intercourse between the two nations. The new society is described by Sir Walter in the October Forum:—

It has long been a matter for concern with those who desire not only to maintain friendly relations with Colonials and Americans, but also to cultivate personal friendships with them, that so many visitors from the United States and the Colonies come over every year, stay for a time in London, travel about the country, and go away without having made the acquaintance of a single English family, and without having entered a single English home. They go away without any knowledge of English life except that which can be gained from the outside.

life except that which can be gained from the outside.

The "Atlantic Union" will be an attempt to meet and to overcome this reproach. It will be the object of the Union to attract, if possible, those who occupy, either in the United States or the Colonies, positions of trust and responsibility, those whom their own people look to for leading and for guidance. The Union desires to make the English members acquainted with those who help to form public opinion in the Colonies and the States. In order that this object may be carried out, it is essential that the English members shall themselves belong to the class of those who make and lead public opinion in this country. Membership in the Union will, therefore, be offered only to such persons as can satisfy more or less this condition. It will include, therefore, statesmen, clergymen, men of science, art, and literature, journalists, artists, actors, architects, professors, lecturers, teachers, and, in a word, all professional men, together with leaders in the world of finance and commerce.

The Union has already gained the support of the Primate, and a large number of distinguished men in every walk of life. The yearly subscription is a guinea.

or India Isth by the thus the pict

mor

M

PU

Ele

frie

of 1

rec

life

Con

and

chi

one land any the state pack ticker a los hill; here, rent nate to the soutral outral outral and soutral and soutra

was disposauther the horigin track Wilminut which entered assau

£40, of the When manus having Edwa under asked the co conclu

Mr Lei compl had l fascina

PUBLISHERS AND AUTHORS SIXTY YEARS AGO.

racter

with plain ckery t was layed

On

ifice;

nsider

et up

it up erely

ictim

t Mr.

him-

many racter

s and

n the rthen

efore

other th to uperwhom

rown,

that year

glish

has mote

new

m:-- desire

and

them,

lonies about single nglish

nd to nited bility,

d for

n the y be

them-

oublic

there-

r less

men, ctors, l proe and

f the

every

MR. GEORGE W. SMITH, head of the firm of Smith, Elder and Co., has wisely yielded to what he calls "the friendly pressure" put on him "by a distinguished man of letters from Australia," and has decided to publish his recollections of "some of the incidents of a long and busy life." The first instalment appears in the November Cornkill. Sixty years ago, he tells us, Smith, Elder and Co. carried on business at 65, Cornhill. It "consisted chiefly of an export trade to India and our Colonies," and also of "a small publishing business."

A PEPPERY PIONEER.

This brought the firm into connection with Lieutenant Waghorn, the "pioneer of the Overland Route to India."

At that time the long route round the Cape, occupying three or four months, was the only means of communication with India, and Waghorn's scheme for a shorter route across the Isthmus of Suez and through the Red Sea was eagerly welcomed by the commercial world.

The Government being chilly, the lieutenant worked the scheme himself, distributing the cost over the letters thus transmitted. A duplicate draft for £3 or £4 cost the firm £25 for postage! The writer gives an amusing picture of the irascible pioneer:—

More than once Waghorn arrived at 65, Cornhill, in the early morning when I was the only member of the staff present. On one occasion he arrived, travel-stained and dirty: he had just landed; and without a word of greeting he shouted, "Have you any one here who can run?" I called in a ticket-porter from the street: Waghorn inquired if he could run. "Yes, sir," said the porter, "if I am paid for it." Waghorn handed him a packet and told him to run with it to the Foreign Office. The ticket-porter was stout and scant of breath; running for him was a lost art. Waghorn watched the man waddling down Cornhill; he burst out with a seafaring expletive, not to be repeated here, ran after the porter, seized him by the coat-tails, which he rent halfway up his back, grasped the packet, rolled the unfortunate porter into the gutter, and ran off himself with the dispatches to the Foreign Office. I had to pick the astonished porter from the gutter and pay him handsomely for his damaged coat and outraged feelings in order to save Waghorn from a charge of assault.

HOW MANUSCRIPTS ARE PICKED UP.

Mr. Smith began his adventures as publisher before he was twenty, having had £1,500 assigned him for absolute disposal. His first literary capture was R. H. Horne, author of "The New Spirit of the Age" and "Orion." At the house of one Powell, confidential clerk to the supposed original of Dickens' Cheeryble Brothers, he came on the track of another literary treasure:—

While I waited in Powell's little drawing-room for a few minutes before dinner I took up a neatly written manuscript which was lying on the table, and was reading it when my host entered the room. "Ah," he said, "that doesn't look worth £40, does it? I advanced £40 to Leigh Hunt on the security of that manuscript, and I shall never see my money again." When I was leaving I asked Powell if he would let me have the manuscript if I paid him the £40. He readily assented, and having got from him Leigh Hunt's address, I went off to him to Edwardes Square, Kensington, explained the circumstances under which the manuscript had come into my possession, and asked whether, if I paid him an additional £60, I might have the copyright? "You young prince!" cried Leigh Hunt, in a tone of something like rapture, and the transaction was promptly concluded. The work was "Imagination and Fancy."

Mr. Smith thus sketches the author :-

Leigh Hunt was of tall stature, with sallow, not to say yellow, complexion. His mouth lacked refinement and firmness, but he had large expressive eyes. His manner, however, had such fascination that, after he had spoken for five minutes, one forgot how he looked. He wrote the most charming letters, perfect alike in both form and spirit. I particularly enjoyed the simple old-fashioned suppers to which he frequently invited me.

THE MAN OF LETTERS AND THE MEN OF NOTES.

But business was not the author's strong point. He did not know what to do with "this little bit of paper," as he described a cheque by Mr. Smith for one or two hundred pounds. Mr. Smith gave him bank notes in place of the cheque:—

Two days afterwards Leigh Hunt came in a state of great agitation to tell me that his wife had burned them. He had thrown the envelope with the bank-notes inside carelessly down and his wife had flung it into the fire. Leigh Hunt's agitation while on his way to bring this news had not prevented him from purchasing on the road a little statuette of Psyche which he carried, without any paper round it, in his hand. I told him I thought something might be done in the matter; I sent to the bankers and got the numbers of the notes, and then in company with Leigh Hunt went off to the Bank of England. I explained our business and we were shown into a room where three old gentlemen were sitting at tables. They kept us waiting some time, and Leigh Hunt, who had meantime been staring all round the room, at last got up, walked up to one of the staid officials, and addressing him said in wondering tones, "And this is the Bank of England! And do you sit here all day, and never see the green woods and the trees and flowers and the charming country?" Then in tones of remonstrance he demanded, "Are you contented with such a life?" All this time he was holding the little naked Psyche in one hand, and with his long hair and flashing eyes made a surprising figure. I fancy I can still see the astonished faces of the three officials.

The incident ended by Leigh Hunt recovering the

Mr. Smith's further reminiscences will be awaited with much interest.

THE LAST HERMIT OF WARKWORTH.

THE LATE CANON DIXON.

In the October and November numbers of the Northern Counties Magazine (which surely ought to have been named the Northumberland Magazine, seeing that the other five northern counties are scarcely represented), Miss M. E. Coleridge has an appreciative little notice of the late Canon Dixon.

Those who have read the delightful life of William Morris, by Mr. J. W. Mackail, will probably agree that the most fascinating of its pages are the reminiscences contributed by Canon Dixon, the poet of the Oxford Brotherhood; and those who knew Canon Dixon must have been struck with the resemblance he bore to the portraits of the poet Chaucer.

Richard Watson Dixon was the son of a Wesleyan minister. As curate of St. Mary's, Lambeth, he read the service at Morris's wedding. But it is of Dixon the poet that Miss Coleridge writes in the November Magazine. The volumes are "Christ's Company," "Odes and Eclogues," "Lyrical Poems," "The Story of Eudocia and her Brothers," "Mano," "Historical Odes," and the little book of selections entitled "Songs and Odes." A fitting memorial would be the issue of Canon Dixon's poems complete in one volume. For a number of years before his death he was engaged on a "Hi.tory of the Church of England," some volumes of which have been published.

To the Pall Mall Magazine for November G. Le Grys Norgate contributes an article on the Prima Donnas of the Past—Eleanor Gwynn, Anastasia Robinson, Lavinia Fenton, Mrs. Billington, Madame Pasta, Malibran, Giulia Grisi, Henriette Sontag, Jenny Lind, and others.

COUNT TOLSTOY ON TWO RECENT EVENTS.

I. THE CHINESE QUESTION.

"THE Chinese Lie" is the title of Count Tolstoy's indictment in La Revue et Revue des Revues of the White Man's dealings with the Yellow Man. "On the frontiers of Chinese territories occupied by Europeans," he says, "the great sport is hunting the Celestials." But this is as nothing in comparison with the much greater crime of sending to China missionaries "with a false and lying mission." "Unhappily, the responsibility for this does not lie on Europe alone. America and the rest of the civilised world share in it." The missionaries build hospitals; they take from a Chinese woman her sick child; they heal it and bring it up in the new faith. The mother, too, is converted out of sheer gratitude; the father is faithful to Confucius. "Thus the Christian world has made the conquest of a soul, and society has broken the bonds of a happy marriage. Woe to the family torn asunder by fanatical and religious strife!"

"Let us be frank—brutally frank. We whites only

"Let us be frank—brutally frank. We whites only concern ourselves with the vilest sides of public life in China." "Before everything, we must maintain our prestige," is the cry.

"Prestige, what shady, what monstrous acts are committed in thy name! The prestige of the white man in China begins where justice, with and logic end." We are but reaping the whirlwind of the wind which we sowed. A thousand times have they lied who accused the Empress of lighting the revolutionary fire. We have lit it ourselves.

2. "THOU SHALT NOT KILL."

"He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood not be shed" is Count Tolstoy's new version of an old text. The best sovereigns who have fallen by the assassin's hand, such as Alexander II. and King Humbert, were, he says, "guilty of and privy to the murder of thousands who have perished on battle-fields; and as for the inferior kings or emperors, the victims of the wars of which they were the authors are counted even by millions." "Kings and Emperors, if they were logical, ought rather to be astonished at the rarity of these crimes (of assassination), considering the continual example of them which they themselves set." Kings, emperors and presidents make organised murder their profession. "And yet they are shocked when one of them skilled."

Far is it, however, from Count Tolstoy to exonerate the Anarchist who murders one of these professional murderers. But he asks, How is it that Anarchists can invent no better means of improving the lot of humanity than assassination? Le Roi est mort! Vive le Roi! And the world is no better off than before. "The ills of humanity come not from isolated individuals, but from the organisation of society, which makes all dependent on a few, or oftener on one. Such is the lot of a sovereign, that a wise man would see no course open to him but to abdicate at once. Killing a sovereign is like whipping a child which you have spoilt out of all good habits.

Society is kept in place by "the selfishness and folly of men, who barter their freedom and honour for petty material advantages," and they are men in all ranks; therefore in no case must Alexander or Humbert be killed, but we must unite in showing them that they have no right to kill by making war.

Men unable to take this view are "hypnotised." There is but one way to prevent them killing kings and killing each other in war, and that is to rouse them from their torpor. "And that is what I am trying to do by publishing these lines." LIFE AROUND THE POLES.

M. DASTRE contributes to the first October number of the Revue des Deux Mondes one of his informing articles on life and all things living in the vast regions which surround both the North and South Poles.

To M. Dastre's mind, the principal interest of Arctic and Antarctic exploration is not the solving of certain scientific problems so much as the study of the animal and vegetable life of the Polar zones. In both Polar regions there are four different variations of the landscape the main ice-floe, the inland seas, the mainland, and the ocean. In these four spheres is abundant room for the habitation of animals and plants. Of the two Poles, the Antarctic zone is the most simple; it is an immense expanse, perpetually frozen, of which the centre is occupied by a vast continent, and the circumference is girdled with ice which forms the ice-floe. The main continent is covered with a mantle of snow, which drifts round the rocky summits and smooths the sharp angles of the configuration of the soil. The spectacle is that of a colossal glacier which disgorges itself into the sea or on the ice-floe.

REMARKABLE FAUNA AND FLORA.

If this view of the Antarctic continent is correct, the wonder is that any animal or vegetable life should be maintained in so uninhabitable a region. As a matter of fact, however, the ice-floe, at any rate, presents remarkable fauna and flora. The geographical conditions of the Arctic zone are quite different from those of the Antarctic; it is regarded as certain that a deep sea occupies the centre. A characteristic of the Arctic zone is the continuity of the ice-floe with the lands which are not always frozen over; this is a matter of great importance from the point of view of the distribustion of animals and plants. The ice-floe is a very poor substitute for the solid earth: it is continually breaking up into crevasses, grinding itself into chasms, and re-uniting, apparently capriciously, but really in obedience to the forces of winds and submarine currents. It follows that the ice-floe can only furnish a very precarious habitation for terrestrial animals, and its fauna is therefore practically a marine one. It is the principal glory of Nansen to have realised the supremely important fact that the ice-floe moves in obedience to definite laws, and that its direction can be pretty accurately foretold.

A FLOATING PRAIRIE.

But it is time to pass on to the animals. Curiously enough, the ice-floe in the Polar regions rests upon a relatively warm sea, the waters of which are favourable to various forms of submarine life. The depths of the Arctic sea are actually a little warmer if anything than those of the oceans further south. Even under the ice may be found a kind of green moss which exhibits the elementary vegetable life related to the most simple kinds of seaweed. Under the microscope the tiny atoms which make up the whole layer reveal the most beautiful cells and granulations. Light, which is an almost essential condition of vegetable existence, is obtained in summer when the impenetrable layers of frozen snow formed during the winter disappear. Thanks to this curious kind of moss, the ice-floe, in place of a horrible desert, becomes an immense floating prairie, on which a prodigious quantity of little animals find nourishment; these creatures include jelly-fish, molluscs, and crustacea, which, in their turn, furnish food to animals of greater size, such as members of the seal tribe, whales, and various birds. We thus have a chain of organised life depending ultimately upon millions of tiny points of albuminous seaweed.

Corni Eight gaiety Louis philos rimés, loudes age of writer escent says : Page a more story o Versail best es woman that of

FLA

MR

Not cynicis Blind born b having mainsp betraye Her Even said to respond Mont king, sp "W" asked a Even out int Was meeting (manch surprise

"He h in our most ar
Ther
many a
The whole l honour

guests, which fi Mr. reparte Wher monarch "Oh, o to see an

"Ver you!" The on his of When punished himself, "Eh! r

Age of The I

FLASHES OF FRENCH WIT IN THE OLD TIME.

r of

cles

nich

ctic

tain mal

olar ape

and for oles.

ense

is e is rifts

gles

it of ron life

ion.

ate.

ical

rom

at a nds r of ibupoor

g up

the

that acti-nsen

the t its usly

on a le to the than

e ice

the inds

hich

cells

mer

med

rious esert,

h a ent;

acea.

eater

and life

s of

MR. S. G. TALLENTYRE contributes to the November Cornhill a most readable paper on French Wit in the Eighteenth Century. He draws a graphic picture of the gaiety which pervaded the Courts of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. Those were "the days of suppers and salons, philosophy and depravity, madrigals, epigrams, bouts rimes, the days of jest and pleasure, when mirth was loudest, and misery so miserable that it was dumb": the age of universal mockery. The smart sayings which the writer so plentifully reproduces suggest the phosphorescent glitter which flickers over putrescence. As he says:—

Pages of moralising and moral statistics could hardly present a more startling and real picture of that Court than the little story of the noble and great woman who, entreated to go to Versailles if only to set a good example there, replied, "The best example I can set is to stay away;" or of that other woman who said that the most difficult post to fill at Court was that of a maid of konour.

Not less characteristic of the time is the criticism and cynicism packed into an epigram of a Court lady:—

Blind Madame du Deffand, who was born cynical as she was born bored, when Helvétius was blamed in her hearing for having made selfishness in his great book "On the Mind" the mainspring of human action, answered, "Bah! he has only betrayed everybody's secret."

Here are other illustrations of the cynical fashion :-

Even good, homely old Madame Geoffrin, when some one said to her of a notorious liar, "What he says is quite true," responded, "Then why does he say it?"

Montesquieu boldly defined a lord as "a man who sees the Montesquieu boldly defined a lord as "a man who sees the king, speaks to the minister, has ancestors, debts, and pensions," "Why do you have so many fools in your Order?" someone asked a Jesuit. "Il nous faut des saints," was the cynic reply.

Even the "dumb multitude" could sometimes break out into a bitter smile:—

Was not that a capital story of the two peasants who, meeting the king hunting in winter-time without a muff (manchons) as was the fashion, expressed to a companion his surprise that the monarch did not protect himself from the cold. "He has no need to," said the other. "His hands are always in our pockets." That low-born mot went the round of the most aristocratic circles.

There is more than wit in the saying that follows, as many a wearied hostess will attest:—

The aphorism of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, who spent her whole life entertaining, "Those who come to see me do me honour; those who stay away give me pleasure," pleased her guests, it seems. The mot had a little whip at the end of it which flicked her hearer's interest into new life.

Mr. Tallentyre selects some notable instances of clever repartee. Here is courage as well as wit:—

When Bassompierre, ambassador to Madrid, related to the monarch how he had entered that city on a handsome mule, "Oh, oh!" said Louis, with a kingly wit, "what a fine thing to see an ass on a mule!"

"Very fine, sire," replied Bassompierre; "I was representing you!"

The Duc d'Enghien, when but a child, thus retaliated on his tutors :--

When he had committed some childish fault his tutors punished him by making him have his dinner at a little table by himself, "I hope your Highness will feel ashamed of yourself." "Eh! messieurs," replied the child, "it seems to me that you are the sufferers, since you are deprived of the honour of dining with me."

Age could be no less nimble in retort :-

The Fontenelle of the "Plurality of Worlds," for instance, was much more esteemed for his repartees than for his book, and better known by an anecdote than by his genius. He was ninety-seven when it was told of him that, having paid the beautiful Madame Helvétius a hundred compliments, he passed her without seeming to see her. When she reproached him for his want of gallantry, he replied, "Madame, if I had looked at you I could never have gone by."

In politics, too, the repartee could be an effective weapon :--

When the Bien Aimé himself complacently said of the Farmers-General—those wicked tax-gatherers, the grasping publicans of old France—that they sustained the State, the Duc d'Ayen had the courage to answer, "Yes, sire, as the rope sustains the criminal."

The Chancellor Maupeou was talking one day to Madame Lapelletier de Beaupré, who had persuaded all her many relatives in State berths to oppose the Chancellor's changes: "It is a great pity, Madame, women mix themselves in affairs they understand no more than geese." "And don't you know," she answered, "it was the geese that saved the Capitol?"

Yet it was "the Austrian" who dared to classify her French ladies-in-waiting as "Fossils, Frumps, and Lumps."

But no brilliance of phrase could conceal the rottenness of life. And the burst-up announced itself in an epigram:—

Prudhomme chose-in 1789 as his motto for his new "Journal des Révolutions de Paris": "The great only seem great because we are on our knees: let us get up."

These are but a few tit-bits culled from the feast of good things collated by Mr. Tallentyre.

BIG BEN: THE BIGGEST CLOCK IN THE WORLD.

SINCE the dynamite outrages very few people have seen the inside of Big Ben. One of those few, however, is Mr. Arthur Birnage, the writer of the most interesting paper in the October Harmsworth. The following are some of the curious details he has collected:—

The hour figures are two feet long, and the minute spaces one foot square. The hour hands are made of gun metal, but the minute hands are tubular and made of copper, and are eleven feet long. The apartments where the dials are fixed have the credit of being "the hottest places in London" at night, for about a score of gas jets burn fiercely in a room about four feet wide. The pendulum is just over thirteen feet long, and weighs nearly seven hundred pounds. The hour bell, which gives the clock tower its popular name of Big Ben, weighs thirteen tons eleven hundredweight.

From first to last Big Ben has cost about £22,000. The clock is wound every Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoon. "The winding is very hard work and lasts several hours, and the rests which the winders obtain during the times of chiming are gladly welcomed." The cleaner, we are told, finds it a good day's work to get one face of the clock cleaned within working hours.

One of the most interesting parts of the 180 feet high Clock Tower is the room in which the Serjeant-at-Arms shuts up refractory M.P.'s. Bradlaugh was its last occupant, and the room remains exactly as he left it.

~~~~~

In an interesting interview in the November Humanitarian, the Chinese Minister in London declares each Viceregal province in China to "enjoy perfect Home Rule." He says the people as a whole are not dissatisfied:—"It is the tendency of Confucianism to promote a spirit of contentment; it is your modern civilisation which creates an atmosphere of unrest. The Marquis Ito told me on one occasion that the Japanese were a happy people before the attempted Europeanisation of their country. Our people enjoy absolute equality under the present régime."

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE November number contains many features of exceptional interest to English readers. I have dealt with one of them, Mr. Donald's paper on Trusts, in another page. But for shortness of space, I should have quoted at length from two excellent papers written by Mr. Abbott, manager of the National Democratic Press Bureau, and by an anonymous writer explaining how the Republican National Committee works for votes. The papers taken together contain just the kind of information which we want to have as to the way in which the printing press is used for political campaigning. Republicans sent out, it seems, at this election 80,000,000 copies of seventy different documents and eight posters at a cost of £33,000. The utilisation of newspapers for campaign purposes is systematised, with the result that nearly 4,000 newspapers publish the articles and editorials sent out from the Republican head-quarters. The articles are on the most varied subjects: troop transports, a rural free delivery, and sheep in Oregon, but the net result of every one of them is an earnest exhortation to vote the Republican ticket. The Republican campaign text-book is a closely printed, well-bound volume of 456 pages. One of the documents was printed in twelve different languages, namely: English, German, French, Italian, Norwegian, Hebrew, Swedish, Bohemian, Polish, Greek, Hungarian, Dutch. It is interesting to note the proportionate use of the different languages in election documents. McKinley's letter of acceptance was translated and published in the following proportions: English, 500, German, 100, Norwegian, 50, Swedish, 50, Bohemian, 20, Polish, 20, Italian and Dutch 10 each. Both these papers are profusely illustrated with cartoons and portraits.

Mr. John Finley describes the political beginnings in Porto Rico. Mr. W. E. Burghardt du Bois gives a pleasant account of the progress of the American negroes, whose exhibit will be found in the Congress Hall at the Paris Exhibition. One of the most interesting articles is that which describes the attempt that the Americans are making to create a "Hall of Fame" in the west side of the quadrangle of the New York University of Arts and Sciences, but I hope to refer to this subject again in another issue.

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE Review of Reviews for Australasia is the new title of what was formerly the Australasian Review of Reviews. The September number reproduces from the Cosmopolitan "Dante in Yankee Terms," crediting the discovery of a new humorist to Mr. Brisbane Walker. It is not an honour to be disputed about, but I met Mr. Young and called attention to his work in Chicago seven years ago. An interesting and copiously illustrated paper is to be found in the special Queensland Supplement. It describes the Great Queensland Winter Pleasure Trip. It is written by the Rev. Joseph Berry of Adelaide. From Mr. Berry's descriptions it would seem that Queensland promises to become the Riviera of Australia. The article, however, is much more than a description of the charms of Queensland from the point of view of the tourist. It is a description of the present position and resources of one of the newest and most interesting of our Colonies, of which only half an acre is cultivated in every square mile of territory. Mr. Berry says:—

If the colony were cut into sections, and jointed, as a butcher joints a neck of mutton, every joint would make a colony, with its capital already there, and with its own seaboard, harbours, and mineral and agricultural wealth. The only other colony of which this could be said with equal truth is New Zealand.

I have dealt elsewhere with Mr. Fitchett's article on "Why the Englishman Succeeds." It is deplorable to discover that Mr. Fitchett finds himself constrained to lament the leniency with which we are dealing with the Boers in South Africa, and to defend the execution of Cordua. Mr. Fitchett also takes a view of Russian policy in China which would indicate that Australasian sentiment on the Chinese question would not tend to the avoidance of a great catastrophe in the Far East.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

THE November Scribner's opens with the concluding chapter of Mr. Henry Norman's very excellent account of the Siberian Railway. Now it takes thirty-eight days to go from Vladivostok to Moscow, and part of the journey has to be done by horse power and a very large part by steamer. The uninterrupted railway journey from Moscow to Irkutsk, 3,371 miles, occupies about nine days. Mr. Norman comments on the extremely low fare—only 44.30 dols., including sleeping-car accom-modations; "and this is for a train practically as luxurious as any in the world, and incomparably superior to the ordinary European or American train." In the eastern stretches of the journey the rate of speed is very low, going down to twelve miles an hour, and Mr. Norman tells us that this speed cannot be greatly increased until new rails are laid. The present weight of the rails is but little over 16lbs. to the foot, about half the weight used on the Pennsylvania road between New York and Philadelphia. Mr. Norman thinks this gigantic enterprise will ultimately cost no less than 500,000,000 dols. "Since the great wall of China, the world has seen no one material undertaking of equal magnitude. That Russia, single-handed, should have conceived it and carried it out makes the imagination falter before her future influence upon the course of events."

Mr. Samuel Parsons, Jr., looking at the Paris Exposition from the standpoint of a landscape artist, says: "We may criticise some of the details, as the French themselves do more than any one else; but we must concede that probably never has such a glorious panorama of artistic life presented itself as in the ensemble at Paris in 1900." The one fundamental criticism Mr. Parsons has to make is the confined area allotted for the exposition; the Paris fair having but 250 acres all told, as against 800 acres occupied by the White City at Chicago.

Mr. Jesse Lynch Williams has a pleasant description of "The Cross Streets of New York"; Mr. J. M. Barrie concludes his serial, "Tommy and Grizel"; and there are short stories by Mr. Henry James and Mary Katherine Lee, the latter being illustrated very daintily in colour.

alarr certa

Mi Lond Progr policy aims To To petition

To second more properties the rein

Mr.

his cla strikes

To

advocatelegra influent correspondintellig
The wagencinewspatwentie
It is thought advanta

wealthy

THI Mr. of Can tempor which Germa favoure ment; demand preferen German will not this cor shall n danger our othe arrange German

Mr. 7 on Uni promote makes t I sugge certain ex by any Voluntee

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

T 1E November issue will doubtless be described as an alarmist number, and the articles quoted elsewhere certainly give good ground for alarm.

THE SCHOOL BOARD MODERATES.

Mr. Wm. C. Bridgeman writes on Moderates and the London School Board. After much criticism of the Progressive régime, and especially of its Evening School policy, which he denounces as a failure, he thus states the aims of the Moderate party:—

To preserve what religious instruction now exists.

most cre is

Berry

outcher

y, with rbours,

ony of cle on to dis-ament

ers in ordua.

China

on the e of a luding

unt of ays to urney

art by from nine

y low ccom-lly as perior

in the very Mr.

reatly ght of t half

New

this than a, the equal

have nation

rse of Expo-

says:

rench must pano-

n Mr.

or the

I told,

ity at ription

Barrie

there

Mary

aintily

To protect efficient Voluntary Schools from unfair competition.

To exercise strict economy in the expenses for maintenance.

To resist all extravagant proposals for new buildings or alteration of old ones.

To make the school curriculum such as will be most useful to the large majority of children.

To assist in the organisation of Higher Elementary and Secondary Education without usurping functions which may more properly be exercised by other bodies.

To reorganise the Evening Continuation Schools and consider the reimposition of fees.

COLLECTIVISM IN WAR CABLES.

Mr. Prevost Battersby, war correspondent, writes on his class, and offers "a suggestion for the future," which strikes the general reader with some surprise. He advocates "a severance of the correspondent from the telegraph wire." At present the cable has an evil influence on his calling and character. If there be forty correspondents wishing to cable, they are allowed, say, thirty-five words each in the day. Practically the same intelligence is repeated forty times in the meagrest form. The writer would hand over the cable work to the agencies, who might send a really full message, which all newspapers contributing would receive at a tenth or twentieth of the present cost. He adds:—

It is a popular delusion that the big dailies welcome the thought of war, since from war very few of them reap an advantage, and many, forced to equal the extravagance of more wealthy competitors, face its prospects with despair.

THE TARIFF STRIFE OF GERMANY AND CANADA.

Mr. Ernest Williams waxes wroth over "the Sacrifice of Canada" in our modus vivendi with Germany—the temporary substitute for the old commercial treaty which we denounced at the instance of the Dominion. Germany insisted that Canada should not have most-favoured-nation treatment in this provisional arrangement; and the English Foreign Office yielded to the demand. This is Germany's punishment for Canada's preferential compact with Great Britain. Canada grants Germany most-favoured-nation treatment; but Germany will not reciprocate. Mr. Williams writes to urge that this concession of our Foreign Office to German demands shall not be made permanent in the new treaty. The danger is that other Powers will follow Germany's lead and our other Colonies will be warned not to make preferential arrangements with the mother country. Canada threatens Germany with a tariff war if she persists.

BACHELOR OF-ARMS.

Mr. T. F. C. Huddleston, of King's, Cambridge, writes on Universities and National defence with a view to promote Volunteer training among undergraduates. He makes this novel proposal:—

I suggest that it shall be provided by statute that, subject to certain exceptions, the B.A. or similar degree shall not be taken by any undergraduate who has not attained efficiency as a Volunteer.

His exceptions would include Asiatics, the physically defective, men in holy orders, and Quakers.

Rear-Admiral Fitzgerald contributes an eulogy on the Japanese Navy, ships and men.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THERE are a number of valuable articles in the November issue which have found notice on previous pages.

FOR THE SCHOOL BOARD ELECTOR.

The Hon. Lyulph Stanley utters a protest against Government attacks on higher elementary schools. It is scarcely of the terse, compact and pungent sort of weapon which we might expect a leader to put into the hands of his supporters on the eve of a School Board Election. It is more of a bleat than a bark. He urges:—

The misfortune in connection with this question of higher elementary education is that the Board of Education in the last two or three years has been rapidly drifting into a position of dogged hostility to School Boards, and consequently takes up a position of hostility to all expansion of elementary education.

The Government . . . may yet redeem the past by granting to the industrial classes of England what the same classes enjoy in Scotland, the free expansion of the popular school into a higher section wherever there are found scholars ready and willing to stay on. The narrow limitations of the Minute will have to disappear sooner or later.

AN EXPERIMENT WITH STREET CHILDREN.

Mr. Thomas Burke reports the way the Liverpool Corporation has tried to regulate the street trading of children in its streets. A license with conditions attached and revocable by the Watch Committee was made necessary for the juvenile street trader. The Corporation wanted to have the power to stipulate that children of reckless or drunken parents or guardians must live in lodgings approved by the Corporation. This the Home Office refused to grant. Partly in consequence of this inability Mr. Burke says the system has been a failure. He grants elements of good in the cleaning up of the parents' houses prior to police inspection, and in the rule forbidding the licensed children to enter public-houses.

EXIT ARC-LIGHT: ENTER WELSBACH.

A writer calling himself Ex fumo lucem is allowed to announce that the incandescent gas-lights are superseding the electric arc in street-illumination. Berlin and Paris have rejected the arc light and reverted to gas and Welsbach. Liverpool manufactures its own electricity but has lit its streets with the incandescent gas. Gas companies will doubtless be grateful to the writer. A wider public will at any rate appreciate an opening paragraph of his:—

Several attempts have been made to fix upon the century some peculiarly distinctive appellation. It has been styled the Age of Steel, the Age of Steam, and so forth; but it might as fairly be called also the Age of Light, inasmuch as it has witnessed the birth and development of one of the boldest conceptions of human mechanical skill and power of organisation—the systematic provision of artificial light in any desired quantity, for any purpose, distributed through every town and available at any hour, for the mere turning of a tap or a button. The dreams of all the Utopians of past ages never compassed any such impressive reality. They never do. The dreams of dreamers remain dreams; while the workers continually endow the race with unexpected boons.

"Fidelis" reiterates his plea for reform within the Catholic Church and says, "there is a very general sense of agreement among a considerable number" of his co-religionists in the direction specified.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly Review for November is an extremely good number containing several articles much above the average, and one, that of Sir Robert Hart noticed elsewhere, of the very first political importance. With the exception of the Celtic dramatic poem on "The Immortal Hour," by Fiona Macleod, and Zyx's paper on "Problems and Playwrights," there is not an essay in the number that is not up to or above the average. Most of them, therefore, are dealt with in leading articles, the residue, which can be dealt with in briefer compass, are

"DISILLUSIONED DAUGHTERS."

Among these there is a very interesting paper entitled "Disillusioned Daughters," which for some mysterious reason is printed in smaller type than the rest of the magazine. The writer, Pleasaunce Unite, is a believer in the women of the eighteenth century, and exhorts Englishwomen of to-day to pay more attention to housework. If you want to be happy you must scrub, you must scrub is the burden of her song. She says :-

Heathful employment for girls, economy without ugliness, and an immense advance in simplicity and beauty of living, these are only a few of the advantages to be looked for from a revolution in feminine education, which shall restore to domestic pursuits the honour that was theirs in the eighteenth century.

Incidentally she draws a picture of a villa resident who has five grown-up daughters and who is worried to death with incompetent servants. The remedy, she declares, lies ready to his hand :-

But let these girls once realise how much happier and prettier they would be if they spent their mornings making beds and cleaning silver, and the slovenly house and parlour-maids would find their occupation gone.

ENGLAND IN BELGIUM.

One of the most important articles relating to foreign politics is an anonymous paper upon "England and Belgium." The writer sets himself to explain how it is that the English at the present moment are so universally denounced by the Belgians. Of the fact there seems to be no doubt. The writer says:—

General Brialmont's authority may be taken when he said that "there was not a public man in Belgium who would utter a word of palliation or excuse for England.

He is loath, however, to admit that such universal unpopularity could be due solely to the infamy of the war in South Africa, and he sets himself to explain the various other reasons for our slump in popularity with the brave Belges. He says :-

The English had lost in many ways the popularity they once possessed in Belgium, and impartiality demands the admission that it was very much their own fault. . . . The value of the English visitor and tourist to Belgium has declined, while at the same time there has been no decline in their belief that they are indispensable to the prosperity of that country. Hence their comments at the expense of its people are vulgar and free.

BELGIAN DEFENCES.

Many of the Belgians have got the idea that they would prosper much better if they were no longer a protected State. This aspiration to complete independence leads them to resent the position which England holds in relation to their neutrality. The writer is, however, very sure that they are making a great mistake, and tells them so with a plainness which is not exactly calculated to increase the popularity of his country in Antwerp and Liege. What Belgium should do, he says, is not to talk about an independence which she could not defend, but to set about at once strengthening her defences. In this respect, he declares, a great deal remains to be done :-

She cannot escape the strict application of the existing law of She cannot escape the strict application of the existing law of conscription and compulsory service. Her peace army is 50,000 men short of the necessary number; she has no real reserve, and she requires one of 150,000 men. The citadel of her national freedom, Antwerp, notwithstanding some admirable forts, presents an undefended gap, through which a German cavalry force of 20,000 men could seize the city by a coup de main, when the protecting forts would not dare to fire on the place which personifies the commercial wealth of the country. Let this gap be closed by the construction of the five forts still traced only on

The Rev. S. H. W. Hughes-Games discusses pleasantly and with much appreciation the life and poetical work of the Rev. Thomas Edward Brown, the poet and scholar who made it the ambition of his life to embody in literary form the vanishing traits of Manx life.

HARMSWORTH'S MAGAZINE.

THE October Harmsworth's is very readable. we should hardly give first place to an article on children's little games, even though the children should be "our future kings.

In describing "Where the Government Works," Mr. Herbert Howard gives interesting details about the workrooms of the present Ministry. Lord Salisbury's room bears no distinctive impress of his personality, nor does that of Mr. Balfour, except that it seems to be the only Government office possessing a grand piano. Mr. Chamberlain's imperial ideas are indicated by a huge globe conspicuously placed. It is a particularly workmanlike room, but the desk is adorned with "many and well-seasoned " tobacco pipes.

Mr. H. Shepstone, writing on "Education by Machinery," describes how the height, weight, power of endurance and general capacity of each child is tested before he is admitted into a Chicago school. The most interesting test is that applied by an Italian instrument called the "ergograph," which at once shows whether a child is nervous or highly strung:—

The arm of the pupil is strapped into a rest, and one finger is connected with a weight exactly seven per cent. of that of the child, and the child is requested to raise this forty-five times in a minute and a half. By means of a revolving scroll and stylus a record of the physical condition of the child is obtained.

Mr. Philip Astor, describing Swanley Horticultural College, under the title of "Lady Farmers," pays a compliment to the aptitude of women for this (to them) new career. During the past nine years the women students at Swanley have increased nearly thirtyfold.

"Wonderful Water" is the title of Mr. J. Horner's article on the wondrous uses to which water power is now put. Mr. W. J. Wintle writes on "Secret Societies," not Chinese but English. Those he mentions are the Great Priory (a descendant of the Knights Templars), the Knights of Malta, and another less well known. The impression after reading of the mysterious proceedings of these societies is "much ado about nothing."

Another article is on "Schoolboy Editors," while the interesting account of Big Ben is separately noticed.

In the June number of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS a reproduction of a bust of Oliver Cromwell was given without any acknowledgment as to its source. It appears that the photograph was taken by Mr. H. Burton, by special permission of the director of the Bargello, Florence, Signor Ridolfi. We desire, therefore, now to acknowledge our indebtedness to Mr. Burton.

TH the N "The separa of "tl man i four m in Sou Europ as foll The unbrok

and the Ural M are con that p forest a walkin along o latter a human the ape in woo clasping thereon tropical

His Max M The or present friendli the co sixteen down t often u The I unmarri those w two clas of bad o from th Chinese that it should be of which the same then mis

In a heritage

songs o I do n Highland has faller mind, tal a ban up a clansm ruined cr

L. C. vulgaris with th exceed t spoilt": The d

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THERE are not many articles of eminent importance in the November number. "The Lessons of the War" and "The Army Manœuvres in France" are noticed under separate headings.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF MANKIND.

Mr. Samuel Waddington discusses the precise locality of "the cradle of the human race." He reckons that man first appeared in the Eocene period, which began four million years ago. His first habitat is put by Häckel in Southern Asia, Wallace in Central Asia, Wagner in Europe, and Darwin in Africa. The writer's own view is as follows:—

The cradle of the human race was probably the vast tract of unbroken land lying between the Ural Mountains on the west and the Behring Straits, the sea of Okhotsk, and Manchuria on the east. . . . In this vast region between Manchuria and the Ural Mountains there are high tablelands and other districts that are comparatively destitute of trees, and it is not improbable that primitive man got separated from, or driven out of, the forest and was compelled to give up tree-climbing and to take to walking on these wild plateaux and prairies. After scrambling along on his "back hands" or "hind feet" for a long time the latter at length would develop the strength and form of the human foot, and would lose the shape and character peculiar to the ape. But this would not take place so long as he was living in woods and was accustomed to use his "back hands" in clasping boughs and climbing trees to reach the fruit that grew thereon. It would not have taken place if his cradle had been a tropical forest,

MAX MÜLLER ON CHINESE MISSIONS.

His death lends a melancholy interest to Professor Max Müller's concluding survey of the religions of China. The ordinary reader will be surprised to find Christianity present in China as far back as 636 A.D., and in the friendliest relations with Buddhism. After glancing at the compromising evangelism of the Jesuits in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the writer comes down to modern missions and refers to the offence they often unwittingly caused. He says, for example:—

The European missions would send out not only married but unmarried ladies, and persisted in doing so, though warned by those who knew China that the Chinese recognise in public life two classes of women only—married women, and single women of bad character. What good results could the missions expect from the missionary labours of persons so despised by the Chinese?... After our late experience it must be quite clear that it is more than doubtful whether Christian missionaries should be sent or even allowed to go to countries, the Governments of which object to their presence. It is always and everywhere the same story. First commercial adventurers, then consuls, then missionaries, then soldiers, then war.

CALVINISM AND THE CELT.

In a beautiful but pathetic paper on the Gael and his heritage, which abounds in reminiscences, tales, and songs of the ancient time, Fiona Macleod says:—

I do not think any one who has not lived intimately in the Highlands can realise the extent to which the blight of Calvinism has fallen upon the people, clouding the spirit, stultifying the mind, taking away all joyousness and light-hearted gaiety, laying a ban upon music even, upon songs, making laughter as rare as a clansman landlord, causing a sad gloom as common as a ruined croft.

WHAT'S WRONG AT OBERAMMERGAU.

L. C. Morant writes on what he describes as "the vulgarising of Oberammergau." He has no fault to find with the peasant actors. "Nothing," he says, "can exceed their reverence and devotion. They are not yet small?":—

The disillusion, if disillusion there is, is the work of the audience, and of the Americans in particular. . . . From beginning to end a devotional spirit, or even a spirit of reverence, never breathed its softening influence over that crowded house. . . Perhaps, roughly speaking, there are four kundred people who go to the play with a devout mind and a reverent intention, and the audience numbers four thousand. The leaven is insufficient to work any transformation, and the Passion Play is abused.

The writer closes with an outburst of wrath at the Pope for having given Mayer, who thrice acted Jesus Christ, and all his children a pardon for all their sins.

FRENCH CANADIANS AND THE EMPIRE.

Mr. J. G. Snead Cox explains the French Canadian attitude of latent misgiving concerning the despatch of Canadian volunteers to South Africa. It was one of fear of Imperial Federation. In his own words:—

The people of the French province are loyal to Canada with a passionate loyalty as to the only home they know; they are grateful to Great Britain for her faithful guardianship, and proud of her protection; they look forward neither to the establishment of a great French State on the St. Lawrence nor to annexation to the United States, but they view with deep distrust the prospect of constitutional changes within the Empire which may diminish their relative importance and influence as a separate community.

RISKS OF WAR AND INDUSTRY.

Mr. F. H. Kitchin selects for criticism a newspaper's comparison between the casualties of war and of industry. The statement that more workpeople had been killed and wounded in eight months of industrial life than the war in South Africa had claimed as its victims, was made to suggest that the risks of war and industry were equal. The writer supplies the forgotten element of proportion. He deducts 15 per 1,000, the normal rate of mortality of British troops on foreign service from the South African totals, and presents the following table of mortality and accident per 1,000 exposed:—

| | Non-Comm.
Officers and Men in
S. Africa. | Railway
Ser-, vants. | Miners
and Quarry-
men. | Sailors. | Factory
Workers. | Industrial Average. |
|-----------------------------------|---|----------------------------|----------------------------------|----------|--------------------------|----------------------------------|
| Deaths Those wounded or injured) | 36·9
67·4 | 30.96 | 1.31
9.31 | 7.89 | 0°205 | 0.79 |
| Total | 104.3 | 32.16 | 7.2 | 18.86 | 17.275 | 17:23 |

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. J. A. R. Marriott wants to know whether we are to have Cabinet government or departmentalism? the traditional method of rule, or the American? Lady G. Ramsdem bewails the prevalent extravagance in dress, and shows how even "wealthy people who go out in Society" need spend no more than £500 a year on dress.

The Royal Magazine.

THE ornament of this month's Royal is Mr. Reginald Maingay's well-written sketch of the private life of Lord Roberts, which, however, is more a sketch of his career than of anything else, interlarded with a little personal description. Other articles are on "Fighting the Plague in India"; "Four-footed Patients and their Doctors," a curious account of the Royal Veterinary College; and a brightly written account of Tangier, "A City of Contrasts." The other papers are all interesting, though hardly requiring notice.

deal

60,000 e, and ational s, prev force en the which santly ork of cholar terary is gap nly on

But dren's "our " Mr. t the bury's y, nor to be piano. huge worky and n by wer of tested most ument ther a of the nes in a stylus

n) new udents orner's wer is leties,"

com-plars), The ings of le the given ppears ton, by trgello,

now to

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE bill of fare for November is not very appetising. Mr. Edmund Spender's plea for justice in China is noticed among the Chinese articles.

A NEW KHAKI PERIL.

Mr. R. Shuddick calls earnest attention to a littlethought-of danger resulting from Khakimania, namely, its effects upon our dress:—

This khakimania that has seized upon the nation bids fair to destroy the time-honoured reputation for smartness possessed by the British Army. The trend of the khaki uniform is admittedly towards ineffectiveness. It may be utilitarian, but it is by no means distinguished-looking. It is made loose-fitting, which is ill-fitting; therefore it is slovenly, and is as palpably readymade and "sloppy" looking in appearance as the uniform of Jacques Bonhomme, whom the War Office seems to have taken for its model when it designed the khaki clothing of Mr. Atkins, If our Army is no longer to set us an example in the wearing of smart, well-made garments, it is then good-bye to the bespoke tailoring trade as a separate and distinct branch of industry. The first to go will, of course, be the sergeant master-tailor and his staff of soldier-workmen. . This slovenliness in military garments will soon spread itself to civilian attire. This is inevitable, and when it does come about there will certainly be no call for the craft of the skilled tailor. All our clothes will be factory-made, just as our boots are.

EDUCATION IN TARIFFS.

Mr. Algernon Warren asks, "Is tariff information sufficiently disseminated by Her Majesty's Board of Trade?" He argues that it is not enough to send consular and tariff reports to chambers of commerce or on application to free libraries, or to pre-paying yearly subscribers. He urges that the Board should send them to "all resorts of commercial men for business purposes and into commercial schools." Much waste would be saved and fresh enterprise shown were our youth instructed as to the actual openings and shuttings of trade-doors.

"SHABBY IMPERIALISM."

This is the title which J. M. K. gives to the "reckless greed, bluster and blind folly" which we have shown in China, to our "vampirism" in India, in abstracting the margin of saving which might shield the ryot from the horrors of famile, and to our Soudanese and South African enormities. The policy recommended may be inferred from the following extract:—

In the interests of peace we should retire from Egypt, as soon as that can be safely done. And in the meanwhile it would, perhaps, be well for the sake of conciliation to restore the Dual Control, with provision for arbitration, whenever the two Powers were decidedly disagreed on any point. As to Africa generally, our main duty and policy coincide: we should extinguish the slave-trade, and keep out the perhaps still worse curse of drink. In the Far East we should endeavour to reconcile China and Japan, so as to form a solid and permanent barrier against aggression.

Land reform and curtailment of the liquor trade at home are also added.

A DRASTIC PURGE.

Mr. W. E. Snell asks for administrative reform, secured by constituting Parliament a lynx-eyed employer and critic of all departments of State:—

The parliamentary hand must always be an amateur.... But he must know how to manage experts. All town councillors understand this distinction, and politicians will doubtless learn it in time. The House of Commons must be the microcosm of the constituencies, reflecting their amateurishness and their provincialism. Just as Board schoolmasters are unfit for membership of a School Board, just as the town clerk and chief constable are outside of the Town Council, so the House of Commons must purge itself of all Government officials.

There is no room there for military or naval officers, for Secretaries of State, or for Under-Secretaries.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Allan Ogilvie objects to the present blend of philanthropy and legislation, and asks justice for the poor secured by law. This is his remedy:—

Provision made by Act of Parliament for a minimum day wage for every man and woman in employ, that must show an equivalent to the amount per diem it costs the public to maintain a criminal.

Mr. H. C. Garrod laments that it is increasingly difficult for a Churchman to find place in the Liberal party. Liberalism, he says, is growing more and more "the representative merely of the aims of a narrow Nonconformity."

THE COSMOPOLITAN.

CAPTAIN A. W. BUTT, U.S.V., writes in the November Cosmopolitan on "A Problem in Army Transportation," the problem being to transport horses across the Pacific to the Philippines for the use of our troops. It is no light matter to transport a cargo of horses across the Pacific. The animal must stand on its legs about forty days, and always suffers more or less from the sudden change of the sea voyage. The old method was to sling the horse, holding him in his recumbent position by means of a breastplate. In rough weather this was terribly uncomfortable and dangerous, and produced frequent panics in the cargo. The Quartermaster's Department has made a study of this question, and has now brought the transportation of horses to such a degree of perfection that the average loss on a voyage does not amount to 3 per cent. Other governments transporting animals count on a loss of 15 per cent. Captain But was the first to try the experiment of crossing the Pacific without unloading stock, and out of 456 horses only one was lost. This great record was obtained by extra care and the exercise of common sense. Electric and steam fans were used to give fresh air to the animals, and they were lifted by means of portable stalls, and the horses were tied in their stationary stalls on the transport with ropes long enough to give them three feet leeway from the stall. The horses learned to ride with the movement of the vessel, and after six hours of the first rough weather they worked together as if they were uniform machinery.

THE FUTURE OF GALVESTON.

Mr. John Fay, in an excellent article on "The Galveston Tragedy," prophesies that the Island City will never again be popular, as a city of homes, until some engineering genius constructs a sea-wall, or successfully elevates the city ten feet above its present level. He thinks that these feats are not beyond the bounds of possibility.

LIFE AT CAPE NOME.

Eleanor B. Caldwell, in her description of "A Woman's Experience at Cape Nome," tells of her visit to the newest mining-camp last summer. Her first dinner in a Nome restaurant consisted of a thin, tough steak, potatoes, poor bread and poor coffee, for 2 dols. apiece. She says that all the money that is being made is made in these saloons and restaurants. One small eating house, twelve by twenty feet, rented for 75 dols. a day. Water sold at three buckets for 25 cents, and these economic unpleasantnesses were by no means the most important obstacles to a lady's sojourn at Nome. When the small-pox broke out, a couple of weeks after the writer's party arrived, she took the next boat home.

The writted paper notice General in ten

"R

paper

what

for ari the rig Switze is in has a the tra to ret the ar If b could r inspirir word, object of Aristoc were t traditio

us in th

One

Morocoment roof Virgold or the coaterror of goes on curious "Ward first her a ship; so much like a l

So, it not me piracy. in the sexceede ended i

Of the reform they we lawyers, officials, which m it was instructiventy-e Ages in agree to service, the Egy

A wr

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE October number is full and varied in its contents. written perhaps with less of brilliance than usual. The first paper on malaria and the mosquito claims separate notice, as do the articles on China, South Africa and the General Election. The last is distinctively progressive in tendency.

DEMOCRACY DISAPPOINTING.

"Recent Political Theory and Practice" is the title of a paper written to show that democracy has not done what was expected of it. It has substituted plutocracy for aristocracy. In the United States it has not brought the right kind of men to the top. Except in exceptional Switzerland, it has equally failed in Europe. Germany is in truth, as well as in name, a monarchy. England has a leisured class which is still a political class; and in the transition from aristocracy to democracy has managed to retain the advantages of both regimes. The point of the article lies here :-

If by any chance we could fix this moment of transition, could retain what was good in the old order while enlarging, inspiring, and controlling it with the spirit of the new, if, in a word, we could boldly grasp and adhere to the truth that the object of Democracy is to bring to the front the right kind of Aristocracy, we should perhaps succeed far better than if we were to attempt a logical and consistent remodelling of our traditions and institutions in solving the problems which await us in the new age.

THE ORIGIN OF MOORISH PIRACY.

One of the best-written articles sketches the story of Morocco, past and present. It quotes a startling statement made by Captain John Smith, president and planter of Virginia in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that "the old original pirates of Morocco were Englishmen from the coast of Devon!"—

These Devonshire buccaneers had long, indeed, been the terror of Christian princes, and in the days of James I., Smith goes on to inform us, they retired to Barbary. His account is curious and minute, as of an eye-witness; it runs as follows :-"Ward, a poor English sailor, and Dansker, a Dutchman, made first here their marts, when the Moores scarce knew how to saile a ship; Bishop was ancient, and did little hurt, but Easton got so much as made himselfe a marquesse in Savoy, and Ward lived like a Bashaw in Barbary; they were the first that taught the Moores to be men of warre."

So, it appears, Englishmen have the infamy of beginning not merely the African slave trade, but also Moorish piracy. A sort of Nemesis is suggested by the fact that in the seventeenth century the English captives in Barbary exceeded those of all other nations. The piracy only ended in 1820.

A POLICY FOR EUROPE IN MOROCCO.

Of the present the writer speaks strongly, yet not with-

This "travesty of an Empire" has in it no principle of reform or regeneration, since its people want neither. As they were a thousand years ago, such they are to-day. Their lawyers, priests, doctors, learned men, saints, pilgrims, soldiers, officials, have never changed from the old-world pattern, which may be primitive or mediæval, but is the same now that it was in the thirteenth century of our era. . . . It is an instructive lesson for modern Christians, showing us within twenty-eight hours' sail of France the barbarism of the Middle Ages in full vigour. . . . If the Powers of Europe could agree to put Morocco in commission, with a trained civil service, they might do for the Moors what England is doing for the Egyptians.

A NEW CAREER FOR IRELAND.

A writer on Elizabethan sport, after mentioning that our parks in early Tudor times numbered four thousand, concludes with this novel suggestion :-

Land is far too valuable a commodity in England to permit us to look for an extension of game preserves within its borders. Scotland has great resources, but notwithstanding great expenditure the supply in that country is not equal to the demand. Ireland, on the contrary, has tens of thousands of acres in Donegal, Connemara, Cork and Kerry, not to speak of smaller areas elsewhere, affording splendid facilities for sport. Game is at present sadly deficient in quantity; and, owing to causes known to all, it is hopeless to expect the landowners to stock and properly preserve their moors. Properly treated they would harbour immense quantities of game; and abundant sport would attract men of means to the country, would lead to the expenditure of a good deal of money, and would give employment to many an Considering the favourable change in the condition of things in Ireland, and its rising popularity as a tourist resort, we may perhaps hope that there is a future before it for sport, and that it will in time be able to meet the ever-increasing demands of English sportsmen, which even Elizabethan conditions at home would be barely sufficient to supply.

CURRENT JINGO DOGGEREL.

The gorge of the Quarterly rises at the sort of thing which has recently been perpetrated under the name of English patriotic poetry. The writer says:—

The vulgarity and ignorance that disfigure so many of these patriotic effusions must, we fear, be attributed to the elementary education of the last thirty years, which has given to crowds of people a certain capacity for self-expression without ideas to express, and an interest in reading without the taste to dis-criminate good from bad. The cure, of course, is not to be found in a withdrawal from the policy of universal education, but in the improvement of the education given; in teaching things that really profit to know; not least, perhaps, in putting before the young people better models of the heroic in

OTHER ARTICLES.

The merits of the Presidential election are summed up strongly to the disfavour of Mr. Bryan, who is declared "unfit even to discuss" American foreign policy. The literary papers treat of Charles Lamb, Anatole France, and of Longinus.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

In this number there is a long and well-illustrated article by Mr. Theodore Dreiser dealing with "Fruit-Growing in America." The writer tells very ably of the surprising growth of the fruit-growing industry within recent years and predicts a splendid future for American fruit farmers.

Professor W. O. Atwater continues his investigation of the dangers and usefulness of alcohol in an article entitled "Alcohol Physiology and Temperance Reform."
The sum and substance of Professor Atwater's full discussion is that, while all investigators agree that alcohol in large quantities is injurious, their judgments as to the results of small doses are conflicting; probably where men are called on for great muscular exertion, or continued nervous expenditure, the balance of testimony would be against the use of alcohol, even in small Professor Atwater thinks it very necessary quantities. that the public should have a better understanding of the nature of the drink-evil; and he thinks the time has come for the calm and careful study of the causes and the adaptation of treatment to the nature of the drinkdisease, as against the conventional temperance-work.

The literary feature of this number of Harper's is the collection of "The Love-Letters of Victor Hugo," which are published with comments by M. Paul Meurice. The letters in this section are addressed to Mlle. Adèle Foucher, when Hugo was but eighteen years of age and his sweetheart was seventeen.

for Secre-

f philanthe poor day wage show an maintain reasingly

Liberal nd more ow Non-ovember rtation," e Pacific It is no cross the out forty sudden s to sling ition by this was produced master's and has a degree does not nsporting ain Butt e Pacific only one xtra care nd steam and they e horses port with way from ovement st rough uniform

Galveston ver again gineering rates the nks that lity.

Woman's ne newest a Nome oes, poor says that e saloons welve by r sold at pleasantstacles to proke out, ived, she

CORNHILL.

THE November number of Cornhill is a capital antidote to the depression caused by November fogs. It is eminently readable throughout, and has in it much that is worth remembering. Mr. S. G. Tallentyre's "French Wit in the Eighteenth Century" offers a fund of amusement which we have drawn upon elsewhere. Mr. George M. Smith's reminiscences "In the Early Forties," and the Rev. Roland Allen's estimate of the causes of the Chinese outburst, also claim separate notice.

The Great Fur Company, better known as Hudson Bay Company, is picturesquely sketched by Beckles Willson. Few people are aware of the immensity of the wealth of the Company. To-day, after all that has been ceded to the Canadian Dominion, and sold to purchasers, the Company owns acres valued at from twenty to thirty millions. There are two sales of fur every year in London; the last sale realised more than £300,000, and last year's sale of land realised about the same total.

Demetrius C. Boulger unearths the story of "a great Chinese satrap—the greatest viceroy" in Chinese history; a certain Wou-San-Kwei, an able general of the seventeenth century, who fought first against the Manchus, then as supporter of their dynasty, and finally died in 1670 in rebellion against them

1679 in rebellion against them. Mrs. Margaret Woods' pastels from Spain give a picturesque view of San Ildefonso.

Sea-fishing memories are recalled by F. G. Aflalo from such diverse places as Dorset, Devon, Cornwall, New South Wales, Queensland, Italy, and Morocco.

New South Wales, Queensland, Italy, and Morocco.

Max Beerbohm comically laments "Ichabod" over a hat-box sent to be repaired in the full glory of unnumbered travel-labels—the pride of its owner's heart—and returned by the repairer stripped of every proof and trophy of triumphant travel.

Mr. Barry O'Brien gives a graphic sketch of Sarsfield, who fought William of Orange at the Boyne, and foiled him at Limerick.

THE WORLD'S WORK.

THE first number of Doubleday, Page and Co.'s new magazine, The World's Work, published in New York, appears for November. The editor is Mr. Walter H. Page, a member of the firm which publishes the magazine. Mr. Page has had a very full and successful editorial career at the helm of the Forum, and later as editor of the Atlantic Monthly. He outlines the special field and ambitions of the new magazine in his opening editorial remarks. The World's Work is divided into departments, the first, under the title "The March of Events," dealing through short articles with current topics, questions arising from new colonial experiments, the Chinese problem, and various social and economic questions of the day. Following this department is a group of features, many of them illustrated, including travel sketches, fiction, and nature-study, as well as discussions of public questions. The magazine ends with two departments following out more definitely its peculiar aim, "Short Stories of Men Who Work," and "Among the World's Workers;" the latter being occupied with giving examples of the country's prosperity as seen in the industrial conditions at various business centres. An article on "The Cost of National Campaigns" gives a striking idea of the sudden and huge increase in the expense of getting a President elected. writer estimates that the cost of the Presidential campaign in 1864 was £40,000 for both parties, and that the cost of the National Committee's operations alone in 1900 will be over £1,000,000; whereas "a Presidential campaign causes the total expenditure of perhaps £4,000,000." The World's Work has a somewhat larger 1 age than the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, and therefore considerably larger than the usual magazine size. The magazine is carefully printed on handsome paper, and the illustration scheme is dignified by unusually well executed full-page portraits of Secretary Hay, the Hon. Richard Olney, Rudyard Kipling, and Joel Chandler Harris.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

THE October number comes as a relief to nerves wearied with the incessant din of electioneering. Only four articles out of eleven deal with the questions which have been hurtling round the electoral arena. Perhaps the most important article in the series is a study of Municipal Trading, which demands separate notice.

HOW IDEAS COME TO A GENIUS.

An appreciation of Hermann von Helmholtz ranks him, Clerk Maxwell, and Lord Kelvin as the three chief agents in the revolutionary progress of the second half of the closing century. "All bore the stamp of universality distinctive of greatness." Their work led to the cherishing of "a more plastic idea of the universe." How so great a genius received his ideas, is a matter of general interest.

"Lucky ideas," he said, "often steal into the line of thought without their importance being at first understood; then after-wards some accidental circumstance shows how and under what conditions they originated; they are present, otherwise, without our knowing whence they came. In other cases they occur suddenly, without exertion, like an inspiration. As far as my experience goes, they never come at the desk, or to a tired brain, but often on waking in the morning, or when ascending woody hills in sunny weather. The smallest quantity of alcoholic drink," he added, "seemed to frighten them away."

WHO IS THE CHIEF POET OF THE CENTURY?

Another article recalls Matthew Arnold's prophecy that "When the year 1900 is turned, and our nation comes to recount her poetic glories in the century which has then just ended, the first names will be Wordsworth and Byron." The reviewer grants that "Wordsworth now stands far higher" than Byron. Nevertheless, he agrees with Tennyson that Byron and Shelley with all their mistakes "did yet give the world another heart and a new pulse." He concludes that "the time has surely now come when we may leave discussing Byron as a social outlaw, and cease groping after more evidence of his misdeeds"; rather should we assign him the permanent rank in our literature which the powerful impression he made on it justifies.

GLOOMY GENERALISATION FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

A review of recent works on Cæsar's Gallic War leads the writer to indulge in a generalisation which may be commended as a corrective to the shallow optimism prevailing in some quarters concerning the future of our South African conquests. After recounting the desperate resistance of the Gauls after Cæsar's first conquests, the writer proceeds:—

Such is the course of all conquests. The conquered, crushed by military disasters, submit for the moment; then, recovering from panic and realising what the loss of independence really means, they attempt, under some Vercingetorix, a new, a more desperate, and perhaps a more general resistance.

OTHER ARTICLES.

There is a clear survey of the process of the Chinese imbroglio; and a suggestive examination of medical shortcomings in the South African campaign.

atte and on the field enough which having tion. Coathar Saw great

T

Saw

boys the a at pr ness
by th men vesse feel t marin
M: Idea

ment so fa

world

soft-

wage

But the h ingenadvan been factur indivimasse scorne for thior disp

Mr Conn descr only distri beaut Keigh the pl

Mr. distril astoniof electric prise palitic all thi

many o

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

THE October number opens with an article by F. E. Saward on a subject which is necessarily receiving great attention just now, namely, "The World's Need of Coal, and the United States Supplies." Mr. Saward comments on the exhaustion of coal in Great Britain, and points to the much more economical working of American coalfields, which are easier of access and whose coal is good enough to meet all requirements. He foresees a great impetus to the export of coal from the States, to meet which it is proposed to build a fleet of 7,000-ton steamers having a speed of ten knots, which, after careful calculations, is found to be the most desirable rate of progress. Coal by this means could be placed at Cardiff for 12s. less than the wholesale selling price at that place! Mr. Saward thus describes the results of the building up of a great export trade in coal:—

It means the elimination of a troublesome surplus from the soft-coal markets of the United States, and prosperity and good wages throughout the mining regions. The million men and boys employed therein, or connected with local industries, under the auspices of good times, would buy so much more freely than at present as to have a decided influence upon the general business of the country. The railroads would be greatly benefited by the increased earnings. Three thousand or more seafaring men would find continuous employment on the coal-carrying vessels, and ship-yards and builders of marine engines would feel the impetus of the great addition to the American merchant

HANDICRAFT V. MACHINERY.

Mr. H. J. Skelton points out in an article on "National Ideals the Prime Influence in Iron-Trade Development," one of the chief causes why America can compete so favourably with Great Britain in the markets of the world. He says:—

But while the best brains of America have been devoted to the honourable pursuit of industry, to developing mechanical ingenuity, to guiding, governing, and giving all those general advantages which a trained intelligence confers, such has not been the case in England. . . England has built up her manufacturing position essentially upon handicraft—the skill of the individual worker has been the dominant idea amongst the masses of the English people. Their intense individuality has scorned the idea of mechanical aids to industry, quite as much for this pronounced characteristic as from any fear of supplanted or displaced wage-earning capacity.

HELL WITH THE LID OFF!

Mr. F. C. Keighley, in a very interesting article on the Connellsville Coke Region, shows that Mark Twain's description of it as "looking like Hell with the lid off," is only an impression produced by passing through the district by rail. It is in fact, he says, one of the most beautiful sections of south-western Pennsylvania. Mr. Keighley recounts how the whole of the vast industry of the place has arisen in less than a business man's lifetime. The article is well and copiously illustrated.

INTERMEDDLING MAYORS AND ALDERMEN.

Mr. W. H. Booth in a paper on "Electric-power distribution in Great Britain," lays the blame of the astonishingly backward condition of England in respect of electrical undertakings upon so-called municipal enterprise and short-sighted Parliamentary action. Municipalities, he says, like to control their little kingdoms in all things:—

This is apt to be the attitude of the smaller boroughs, and in many cases it arises from the occupancy of the mayoral chair by some strong man who carries with him the whole of the council or a majority of it, and, having been more than usually successful as a purveyor of soaps, sugars, and jam, thinks himself perfectly competent to undertake such affairs as electrical distribution.

THE THOUSAND-MILES AUTOMOBILE TRIALS.

An instructive article by Mr. W. Worby Beaumont describes the recent thousand-mile trials of automobiles and the conclusions to be deduced therefrom. He says:—

One of the noteworthy results of the great trial is the confirmation that it affords of the continuous working capacity of the little high-speed motor which so many engineers and others not acquainted with its performance under severe conditions seem to think is the vulnerable part of a motor carriage. It may safely be said that, on the whole, the motor itself may be depended upon to give less trouble than any other part of the car machinery. There are, no doubt, many motors in which slight modifications of the lighter parts, which are too light and have insufficient size and strength in joints and pins, will reduce the number of stoppages for slight adjustments and for repairs. These, however, the experience now obtained will make easy.

CASSIER'S MAGAZINE.

THE ENGINEER AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

MR. JOSEPH HORNER contributes a paper to the October number descriptive of machine tools, cranes, boilers and engines in the great world's show. He deplores the fact that so many of the best engineering exhibits were banished to Vincennes, a fact which largely caused American exhibits to suffer by comparison with those of other nations. He concludes his article by saying that no engineer can afford to miss such an opportunity of studying the present state of manufactures among industrial nations as is afforded by a visit to the Exhibition. The article is well illustrated. The photo of the English pavilion makes that rather overshadowed building look quite imposing.

GOLD DREDGING.

In an article on "How to make Gold Dredging Pay." Mr. A. W. Robinson says :-

There are few more promising or more profitable fields of work when carefully administered, and the ground available has as yet scarcely been touched. Unfortunately in many cases large sums of money have been squandered without result, because of the lack of knowledge and experience to provide for all the points essential to success. All these failures can be traced to perfectly preventible causes, and when rightly judged, they serve as landmarks to point the safe way. The success of gold dredging in New Zealand is such that a large business has been built up, with many companies operating and paying good dividends from ground that is by no means rich.

His paper endeavours to point out the best way to avoid these failures.

TRANSITION TO ELECTRIC POWER.

Mr. Alton D. Adams, in a paper on the "Transition to Electric Power," points out that the short distance transmissions are on the increase, and that long distance transmissions virtually do not count. Water power has always been used by manufacturers, but the introduction of the dynamo has largely increased its utility. Mr. Adams says:—

A distinct feature of electrically distributed water-power is the advantages it offers to manufacturers of small and medium capacity. The consumer of 100 horse-power will probably have to pay somewhat more per unit than the consumer of 1,000 horse-power, but the difference in rates will represent only a small fraction of that in cost which would result were a separate water-wheel installed for each case.

nerves g. Only ns which Perhaps study of ice.

nks him, of agents

lf of the ality dis-erishing

in 1900

,000,000

than the carefully scheme

portraits

Rudyard

o great a interest. If thought then afterder what the courfar as my or a tired ascending of alcoy."

comes to nas then rth and rth now e agrees all their t and a rely now a social e of his ar leads may be optimism re of our lesperate ssion he

l, crushed recovering nce really v, a more ests, the Chinese medical

THE MONTHLY REVIEW.

THE Monthly Review for November is illustrated with a coloured map of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and various portraits of Dutch worthies illustrating a paper on the Naval Exhibition at the Hague; and also some illustrations of the art of primitive China. We have a second instalment of Mr. Anthony Hope's story, and a poem by Mr. Laurence Binyon describing the meditation of King Asoka. A further novelty is Mr. W. Hall Griffin's translation of an Italian manuscript describing the trial and death of those concerned in the murder of Pompilia. The translator says it is the best prose account of the whole case which is known to exist. There are various other articles, such as one on Cecil Rhodes, by Professor Martens on China, and by Mr. Neville on the National Defence, which are noticed elsewhere. One of the most interesting papers is Mr. A. R. Colquhoun's of his journey on the Trans-Siberian Railway to Port Arthur. Mr. Colquhoun says:—

The Trans-Siberian, however badly laid, however costly in construction, has conferred inestimable benefits on the nation to which it owes its being.

It is not pleasant to read, although we are becoming accustomed to it by this time, that the great market opened up by the railway has been taken advantage of by the enterprising German:—

The best teachers, artisans, and skilled workmen are Teutons. The writer in his journey met innumerable commercial travellers and agents of German nationality, but only one firm of British traders, a few British and American prospectors, and half-a-dozen English engineers employed on the ice-breaker at Lake Baikal. There is no paper in Russia printed in English, and the language is practically only available at the Russian ports. In Siberia it is unknown except among the Germans. The French are not in evidence at all.

Altogether Mr. Colquhoun thinks that the Russians themselves in making the railway have been already crowned with success, which even now much exceeds the hopes of the initiators of the scheme. It is impossible to exaggerate the possibilities of the railway when it is at length completed, strengthened, and put in order.

The other out-of-the-way paper is that devoted to an account of Chinese masterpieces of art. Japan is recognised as one of the greatest artistic nations of the world, but Chinese art is little understood. The writer of this article, Mr. C. J. Holmes, is very enthusiastic about the art of primitive China. He says that the finer bronzes emerge with credit from the ordeal of being compared with the very greatest works of painters and sculptors of Europe, in subtleness of design and perfection of workmanship, that remain unsurpassed by any Occidental metal work. Even their paintings are very remarkable, for they are limited by material, technical method, and subject-matter:—

Nevertheless, outside the very greatest names of Europe, it is surprising how small a number of painters can be said to possess the qualities which characterise the great periods of Chinese art. The evidence of their porcelain is enough to prove that the Chinese have been masters of colour to a degree unknown in the West. Individual European artists have been magnificent colourists, but in no nation, not even in the Japanese, has the colour faculty been developed so invariably and so uniformly.

Mr. Paul Waterhouse in a paper on the study of Gothic architecture discusses the two books recently published on the subject—Mr. Leader Scott's and Mr. Edward C. Prior's. The latter puts forward on behalf of England what the former maintains on behalf of Como, but Mr. Waterhouse is chiefly impressed by the centrality and catholicity of the Churches' power in this matter.

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

THE November Pearson's is quite one of the most readable of the lighter magazines. An illustrated article on Ben Austrian, the self-taught American "painter of the barnyard," and on Lady Butler, will interest the general reader as well as the art lover. It is singular, as the writer remarks, that a woman should to-day be the most popular painter of English war pictures. Lady Butler is the only woman who has ever approached the honour of an A.R.A.

UNDER-WATER PHOTOGRAPHY.

Mr. Robert Sherard has a remarkable account of Mr. Boutan's experiments in under-water photography. After many trials, and of course specially constructed cameras, Mr. M. Boutan can now claim complete success, not only in photographing submarine scenery and life, but also in taking instantaneous views of divers at work. By means of artificial light, photographs can now be taken at any depth to which it is possible for an operator to descend. Another interesting photography article is on "Dr. Schufeldt's Experiments in Photographing Living Fish."

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

Mary Fermor writes upon "Mud Baths," describing the chief establishments of Europe. Her remarks on Karlsbad and Marienbad are of special interest. Mr. Turner Morton describes the "Days of Duelling," and some of the famous duels that took place in Hyde Park. The most famous political duel, between the Duke of Wellington and Lord Winchilsea, took place in 1829 in Battersea Fields, presumably now Battersea Park. "The Way of a Waterspout," when it makes for a little Yorkshire town, and a paper on "Whalebacks" will interest many people. "Whalebacks" are the curiously constructed boats which for eight months of the year do the cargo and passenger trade on the great American lakes. They were recently entirely bought up by millionaire Rockefeller.

Last and far from least, there is a prettily and often charmingly written article, "Pointers from a Porcupine Quill," by Mr. W. D. Hulbert. We hope Mr. Hulbert will let us have some more of these delightful natural history articles.

The Lady's Realm.

THE November Lady's Realm is an exceedingly aristocratic, not to say royal number. The first place is given to a brightly written account of the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough at Blenheim Palace. One is really sometimes tempted to ask how every one in "high life" manages to be such a pattern of perfection. Sarah A. Tooley writes on "The Weddings of the Queen's Children," from that of the Princess to that of the late Duke of Edinburgh. Another royal article is on the Royal Dowagers of Europe; and again it is impossible not to be a little incredulous as we read the accounts of Margaret of Italy, the Dowager-Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, the Empress Frederick, and the Dowager-Empress of Russia.

Other articles are on the Maison Felix in Paris; and Mr. George A. Wade's "Where some Famous Women were Wooed." Mrs. Gladstone, it seems, was wooed and won in the Coliseum at Rome; Charlotte Brontë at lonely Haworth; the famous Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, at a St. James' Palace Ball; Mrs. Browning in a prosaic house in Wimpole Street, and Lady Burton first met her husband on the romantic ramparts of Boulogne.

I have the H ject of Fut

Tw

gives

He of converse and All The gers. experimental Latinsbecoms stood and reasons will be

Ameri The from 6 lumber trees of trees is sooner ducing men, trees cu seed the

Mr.

the Use the gravailal those of Brican be of the those of the constant of the c

"The an art Eucker Despi Froebel and this upon co development froe establish elevate with it.

Writi Hon. Jo will nev benefit follows In the mind tha

THE FORUM.

THE Forum for October is a good average number. I have dealt elsewhere with Mr. J. P. Dolliver's article on the Presidential Election, with Sir Walter Besant's project of an "Atlantic Union," and with Mr. C. Denby's "Future of China and of the Missionaries."

CUBA.

Two articles deal with Cuba. The Rev. C. W. Currier gives the reasons "Why Cuba Should Be Independent." He objects to the limited number of delegates to the Cuba convention, as making them liable to outside pressure. "A Cuban's" article reads suspiciously like the work of an American annexationist. He says:—

The projectors of the Protectorate do not fear exterior dangers. What they fear, and with them many Cubans of experience, are those daily revolts and those monthly pronuncial mientos that have characterised the early history of all the Latin-American republics, and which in many of them have become permanent conditions. And the Protectorate, as understood and practised by the most powerful nations on earth, will not remedy this. The only help lies in annexation to the United States—a solution which, if accepted by a majority of the Cubans, will be more dignified than a fictitious and nominal independence.

A TIMBER FAMINE IN AMERICA.

Mr. Henry Gannett predicts a timber famine in America as the result of fires and careless foresting:—

The present methods of lumbering are extremely wasteful, from 60 to 75 per cent. only of the tree being cut and utilised as lumber. The younger trees—those of insufficient size—or the trees of inferior species, are left standing. The waste of the cut trees is left upon the ground, where it dries, and inevitably, sooner or later, intentionally or unintentionally, is burned, producing a hot fire which destroys all the trees left by the lumbermen. Thus, over the lumbered tract not only are all the mature trees cut, but the young growth, which might be depended upon to seed the area for a future crop, is destroyed by the inevitable fires.

AMERICAN COAL SUPREMACY.

Mr. E. S. Meade, writing on "The Coal Supremacy of the United States," points out that America has become the greatest coal-producing country in the world. The available area of her coal-mines is five times greater than those of Europe. Between 1870 and 1898 the production of British coal increased 83 per cent., while that of American coal increased 629 per cent. American coal can be more cheaply worked owing to the shallowness of the mines, while the seams are much thicker than those of Europe.

FROEBEL AND HIS PHILOSOPHY.

"The Philosophy of Frederick Froebel" is the title of an article by Professor Rudolph Eucken. Professor Eucken says:—

Despite its numerous advantages, however, the philosophy of Froebel does not furnish a sound basis for an educational system; and this because, as already stated, it is fundamentally established upon conflicting principles. Froebel's pedagogy regards spiritual development as a natural growth—as a slow and sure development from within, analogous to that visible in the plant world. On the other hand, the principal tenet of his philosophy is the establishment of independent activity, which would necessarily elevate man above nature, and, indeed, places him in contrast with it.

THE IMPERIAL ZOLLVEREIN.

Writing on "Imperial and Colonial Preferential Trade," Hon. John Charlton expresses the belief that Great Britain will never tax the food of her home population for the benefit of the Colonies. He concludes his article as follows:—

In the meantime it is gradually dawning upon the Canadian mind that there is a more direct road to securing a remedy for the great disparity existing between the volume of exports to the United States and of imports from that country than preferential duties in favour of Great Britain. As the fact becomes known that while we buy 48,000,000 dols. of manufactures from the United States, we are only permitted to sell 6,000,000 dols. of our farm products in return, this query is naturally suggested: If the American tariff continues to bar our farm products from the markets of that country in exchange for the goods we buy, why not put our duties up to the American standard of 50 per cent., and commence feeding the operatives that produce the goods by securing the production of the latter in our own country?

THE NEGRO PROBLEM.

Mr. O. W. Underwood, Member of the House of Representatives from Alabama, writes on "The Negro Problem in the South." Disfranchise the negro, legally as well as practically, he says:—

It is contended by some that the disfranchisement of the negro will stop the development of the race. I do not believe that he will be affected in his moral, industrial, or educational development by being disfranchised by law; for, as stated above, he has been practically disfranchised for twenty years in most parts of the South. The real question involved is not one of the disfranchisement of the negro, but the enfranchisement of the white man. I believe that the only development that can come to the negro race must come through the instrumentality of the white race, and that the negro through his own unaided efforts is incapable of rising above his present condition. The black race has come in contact with every civilisation that the world has ever known; but, as a race, it has shown no development from its contact with them. The individual may have risen in the scale of life, but as soon as the sustaining influence of the higher civilisation has been removed the race has retrograded. The masses of the negro race cannot, and will not, receive the full benefit of their contact with our civilisation so long as political hostility keeps up a continued conflict between the two races.

EDUCATION IN PUERTO RICO.

Mr. V. S. Clark sums up American educational reforms in Puerto Rico as follows :—

The total result of the American influence exerted over the school system of Puerto Rico has been wonderfully broadening and beneficial, however, and were we to withdraw from the island to-day it would certainly endure. Nearly 100,000 modern American text-books in Spanish have disseminated information throughout the land. Teachers' examinations, conducted in writing and without the possibility of favouritism being shown, have set new standards of attainment before both teachers and pupils. The separation of the schools from the teachers' residences—though the schools still occupy rented buildings—has introduced a higher ideal of school organisation, and has tended to emphasise the school as a distinct institution.

Mr. Marrion Wilcox writes on "Our Agreement with the Sultan of Sulu."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

OF eighteen articles in the October North American Review, eleven deal with the Presidential campaign. Of the remaining seven: I have dealt elsewhere with that on Buddhism, by Professor Rhys Davids; with that on China and Russia, by Josiah Quincy; with the Rev. A. W. Jackson's paper on James Martineau; with Mr. Y. Ozaki's "Misunderstood Japan," and with Mr. Benjamin Taylor's "Decline of British Commerce." Mr. Claude Phillips publishes the fourth part of his article on "The Picture Gallery of the Hermitage." The only other article is one on "Catholic Citizens and Constitutional Rights," in which the Rev. T. H. Malone replies to a paper by Bishop McFaul in an earlier number of the Review.

; and omen d and të at Marling in ourton ts of most article

st the ngular, day be

Lady

ed the unt of

photo-

v con-mplete cenery

divers is can for an graphy

Photo-

ribing

ks on

Mr.

Park.

ike of 829 in "The Yorkterest

condo the lakes.

onaire often upine

ulbert

atural

risto-given ess of some-life "

ah A.

ieen's

e late n the ssible

ats of burg, ess of

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THE Nouvelle Revue is adopting the American system of many short articles, there being twelve contributions in the first October number and nine in the second. With the exception of Captain Gilbert's interesting but highly technical analysis of the Transvaal campaign, the Anglo-Boer War is not touched upon, and international politics are conspicuous by their absence. The place of honour is given to M. Saint-Saëns, the famous French composer, who contributes some curious pages on spiritualism and materialism, as explained and set forth in the works of Hirn and Buschner.

NIETZSCHE'S VIEW OF WOMEN.

Foreign thought and foreign science are attracting more and more notice in France, and M. Grappe contrives to give his compatriots a clear account of woman according to Nietzsche. The German philosopher is believed by many people to have been a profound misogynist. According to the French critic, this is quite a mistake; and, far from disliking or despising womanhood, he in one of his works observed: "The perfect woman is a far higher type of humanity than the perfect man; but then the perfect woman is far rarer than is the perfect man." His theory as to the education of girls appears in these days quite old-fashioned. He would wish to see every budding woman educated and trained by her own mother; he dislikes women's colleges and girls' schools. "Whatever you do," he said, "do not masculinise the education of your girls." He considered women gifted with extraordinary intuition. On the other hand, he wished that those who became the apostles, the masters of the world, should remain single.

WHO WAS THE REAL DAUPHIN?

M. D'Orcet once more puts the question—Was the child who died in the Temple prison really Louis XVII.? He answers this all-important question in the negative, and declares quite positively that the boy whose martyrdom is the most ignoble and horrible incident of the great French Revolution was, to the full knowledge of Marie Antoinette and of Louis XVI., a child who, though he may not have known it himself, was only playing a part, the true Dauphin having been confided to a Scotch stretainer, who finally took him to Canada, from whence he never returned, but lived and died under the name of Rion.

RUSSIAN PHILANTHROPY.

M. Raffalovich contributes to the second number of the Revue a most interesting and instructive article on that portion of the Russian section at the Exhibition dealing with Russian private and political philanthropy. According to this writer the British working man might well envy his Russian brother, whose Government watches over him with paternal solicitude, and provides him with an excellent lodging at cost price; while his mind is as little neglected as his body, there being many institutions which have for their object the intellectual and moral development of the worker. The leaders of the Temperance Party will probably be surprised to learn that in Russia drunkenness has in a great measure decreased owing to the determined action of the Government, which has now had for nearly 100 years the sale of spirits in its own-hands.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Other articles deal with the Chinese drama and dramatic literature; the modern British drama; a brief-sketch of Charles Buonaparte, the father of Napoleon; and certain suggested political reforms in Algiers.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THE interest of the Italian reviews of last month is rather literary than political. A thirty-page article on "Matilde Serao" in the Nuova Antologia (October 16th) from the pen of a sister-writer, Gemmer Ferruggia, is the most complete study of the novelist we have yet come across. From it we learn that Matilde Serao was born at Patras in 1856, of a Neapolitan father and a Greek mother, and acquired her reputation through persistent hard work. To-day the critics and the public alike agree in according her a front place in the ranks of contemporary writers:—

Even the bitter enemies of women of letters bow down before Matilde Serao as before a marvel of strength and activity; the past generation who have watched her career contemplate her with a surprise in which there is no disdain; those who have made their way by her side, and know how steep has been the ascent, respect her as a loyal comrade; and those who still aspire to fame, describing themselves vociferously as "the young," do not dare to attack her, as Gabriele d'Annunzio (to whom they offer the not always flattering homage of terming him Master) paid her a tribute of admiration in his fine dedication to "Giovanni Episcopo," pointing her out as an example of the brilliant worker.

Her originality, her sincerity, her independence, her indefatigable power of work, are among her most striking characteristics, but our authoress considers that the main quality of her writing should be summed up in the word "fantasy." We are told that alone among her contemporaries she escaped in her youth the influence of Zola, just as recently she has declined to bow down before Ibsen. Her critic regards "Al Paese di Curragna" as the greatest of her novels, and her recent volume of travels in the Holy Land, the "Paese di Gesu," as perhaps the most sincere of all her books. It is pleasant to read that Matilde Serao and Eleanore Dusè have been lifelong friends, and that in her journalistic capacity Mme. Serao did much in earlier years to build up the reputation of the great actress.

Various lengthy studies of the philosophy and the poetry of Frederic Nietzsche appear this month. One in the Rivista Politica e Letteraria declines to admit his originality, and asserts that his teaching was derived in all its essential features from his great German predecessors, more especially Schopenhauer. Prof. Barzellotti, on the other hand, in the Nuova Antologia, regards the "newness" of Nietzsche's views as a main cause of the interest they excite. He admits, however, that he had neither the breadth of mind nor the intellectual integrity of Schopenhauer, and regards him as essentially a morbid and unhealthy genius.

Among political articles of the month the most noteworthy is contributed by the veteran Francesco Crispi to the Nuova Antologia (October 1st), pointing out all that in his opinion has been peacefully accomplished for Italy and for Europe by the Triple Alliance during the last eighteen years. The editor of the Antologia, Maggiorino Ferraris, still continues his energetic agitation on behalf of agrarian reform.

Flegrea, the Neapolitan magazine, steadily improves in quality. The latest number (October 5th) contains, besides a long poem on the moon by d'Annunzio, which doubtless his disciples will admire, a pleasantly-written article on English love of nature and the influence of Ruskin in art and literature.

Professor O. Marucchi, the most distinguished of living Roman archæologists, contributes to Cosmos Catholicus an illustrated article on the recent discovery of the exact site of the celebrated Lacus Juturnae in the Roman Forum, which he considers established beyond a doubt.

THI its, usu article elsewh his exp

M. series from ( His d view ( conduct As M specia with t tions,
to trea

It s

of Frie

prepar ments better in his that of the cor genius that C inordin one wh as the fact, a people influen berger to-day would exact : did no over G will be among victor, France he obse anarch compa and in gard th in autu to grov people leading

Amo interest Marsha in Russ statistic striking Germai on the appears similar Englan view th

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE Revue de Paris, although perhaps not quite up to its usually high standard, nevertheless contains not a few articles of interest and importance. We have noticed elsewhere the article of Colonel Arthur Lynch embodying his experiences with the Boers.

IN YUN-NAN.

M. François begins in the first October number a series of letters from Yun-nan, which range in date from October in last year to May in the present year. His description of Yun-nan-Sen is interesting, and in view of the unrest in the South his account of the conduct of the mandarins is only what one would expect. As M. François is the French Consul at Lang-Chau, special interest attaches to his account of his squabbles with the local viceroy on the subject of the likin exactions, when he was accused of importing arms contrary to treaty obligations.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

It seems only the other day that the powerful intellect of Friedrich Nietzsche was extinguished, and now we have, prepared by M. Lichtenberger, an analysis of his judg-ments on France and Germany. The philosopher was better known and certainly more popular in France than in his native country. This is largely due to the fact that on the morrow of the Franco-German War he had the courage to extol the imperishable grandeur of French genius, and at the same time to attack with bitterness that German culture of which his compatriots were so inordinately proud. He passed with the great public as one who despised everything that a good German reveres, as the enemy of religion, morals, and Fatherland; in fact, as a dangerous madman whose extravagances people did not even discuss. Gradually, however, his influence made itself felt in Germany. But M. Lichtenberger explains that his diatribes against the Germany of, to-day must not be taken too literally, and, moreover, it would be well if Frenchmen had no illusions as to the exact nature of the opinion he professed for them. He did not believe at all in the absolute superiority of France over Germany; he predicted that the twentieth century will be an era of gigantic struggles for the leadership among the different European nations. Although he wisely abstained from prophesying which would be the victor, it is nevertheless pretty clear that he did not regard France as an organised nation to be very strong; indeed, he observed in modern France the disquieting symptoms of anarchy. He seems to have shared the belief of most of his compatriots in the decadence of the French race, thoughand in this he differs from his compatriots-he did not regard that decadence as necessarily an inferiority. Just as in autumn the leaves of the trees turn yellow and fall, only to grow green again in spring, so the decadence of a people may be a necessary prelude to a transformation leading to a new and higher life. From that point of view the words "decadence" and "corruption" are unjust.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned an exceedingly interesting study by General Dragomiroff on the famous Marshal Suvaroff, whose memory was recently honoured in Russia. M. de Rousiers contributes some remarkable statistics on the commercial growth of Hamburg—a striking illustration of the enormous strides taken by German commerce. M. Corday has a well-written article on the characteristics of village life in France, which appears to have passed through a process somewhat similar to that which has depopulated our villages in England.

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

WE have mentioned elsewhere M. Dastre's article on the fauna and flora of the Polar regions, and M. Filon's on the settlement movement in England.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

M. des Noyers describes the methods of a Presidential campaign in the United States. Without insisting, he says, on the weak side of an electoral system of which the inconveniences are due, above all, to the abuses introduced into the work of the founders of the Republic, it is impossible to avoid being struck by its complications and by its delays. Both these characteristics are explained in great measure by the rudimentary condition of communication between the different States of the Union at the epoch when the American Constitution was set up. Railways and telegraphs have now brought even the most distant States near to the heart of the political system, but the American people are still extremely loth to lay any sacrilegious hand upon the noble edifice of the revered Lincoln.

THE TRUE PARLIAMENTARIANISM.

M. Benoist takes the opportunity to reply to several criticisms which have been levelled against his theory of the true Parliamentarianism, which he expounded in the Revue des Deux Mondes for August. The Marquis Tanari, an Italian senator, is selected by M. Benoist for the honour of a special reply. He admits that nothing is more certain, from M. Benoist's point of view, than that we cannot aim at destroying Parliamentarianism; we should, on the contrary, construct it. It is the phrase, "from his point of view," which annoys M. Benoist, who had laid down absolutely the conception that geography exercised an important influence upon the development of Parliamentary institutions, the home of which is primarily in the West. M. Benoist goes on to describe very vividly that particular form of democracy which appears in this country. Here, rather than a demo-cratic equality, he thinks there is a sort of Britannic equality, or, so to speak, a common pride in the Civis Britannicus sum—an equality more real, he admits, than the one which is so loudly asserted in speeches and articles in France. He agrees with Signor Tanari that England lives by tradition; but, as he well points out, it is a tradition which is purely formal, and it is rather a survival than a living thing. It would be dangerous, in M. Benoist's opinion, for France to throw herself blindly into an imitation of British political forms, because of the radical difference between the French and the English people. In summing up, M. Benoist points out that Parliamentarianism on the English pattern has changed its form even in Eng-land while growing old; on the Continent it has changed its form still more completely. Moreover, though it has worked well for two centuries in England, it has not succeeded in working well on the Continent, and the mother of Parliaments has not produced a child which resembles herself.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles must be mentioned an interesting account by M. Radau of experimental astronomy, with special reference to the work done at the great Observatory at Meudon; M. Goyau contributes one of his interesting historical studies on the sentiment of patriotism and humanitarianism which prevailed in France in those eventful years of the war in 1870-71; and M. Brunetière's article on the literary work of Calvin, in which he studies the origin of that exclusively French reform movement which was not political, but theological and moral.

icle on er 16th) a, is the t come as born Greek rsistent e agree contemonth is

n before activity; template ose who has been who still as "the unzio (to terming dedicaexample nce, her striking ne main ne word contemof Zola, before na " as lume of perhaps to read en lifey Mme.

e poetry
e in the mit his rived in an preof. Baratologia, a main owever, hor the ds him

st notecrispi to all that or Italy the last Maggiotion on roves in ence of living tholicus ne exact Roman doubt.

ontains,

, which

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE October numbers of this magazine are of more than usual interest. Count Tolstoy's two articles and Mr. Alfred Stead's sketch of President Kruger are noticed separately.

M. Augustin de Croze writes two long papers on "Pagan Brittany." His account of the superstition and ignorance still existing in some parts of Northern France, fostered rather than discouraged by a recreant clergy, is more interesting than inspiriting. It is fetichism and not religion, superstition and not faith, which here have influence.

THOUGHT CURES.

M. Jules Bois, in reply to the question "Can we reform our characters?" says that we can, by having recourse to the as yet but half-known power of mental action. Much of his article is devoted to an account of Dr. Bérillon's Psycho-Physiological Institute in Paris, where the doctor ministers to minds and wills diseased. To him resort those whose mental and moral equilibrium is at fault, vicious children, nervously depraved women, hopeless drunkards or thieves, morphia maniacs, etc. Sleep is first induced—hypnotic sleep; and then a temptation is put in the way of the subject—irresistible to him in his waking hours, but which, hypnotised, he must resist. This power of resistance, implanted in the hypnotised subject, grows until it has force enough to enable him in his natural subject to overcome the most besetting sins. Thus have been cured not only habitual drunkards, but kleptomaniacs, and the victims of many other evil habits. To resuscitate a deadened conscience is the doctor's aim.

M. Jules Bois also quotes a new theory, propounded by an American, as to the composition of the human body, which, according to this, is ultimately resolved into oxygen and azote, on the just proportions of which depend both physical and mental health. Every good, that is, affirmative inspiring, kindly or even happy thought, increases the quantity of oxygen, and consequently benefits the organism; each bad thought is correspondingly harmful. Another American scientist asserts that the breath of a human being, affected disagreeably or painfully, leaves a precipitate of harmful quality, liable to cause illness; while the breath of one inspired by benevolent and joyous feelings leaves a precipitate which has the effect of a tonic.

"ENGLISH CALM" AS VIEWED BY A FOREIGNER.

Prince Karageorgevitch tells us he has heard of English calm till he was tired of the name of it; then he spent some time in London when we started on our "military promenade" to Pretoria-which was to last a trifle of two months or so-and heard our patriotic songs and read our patriotic papers. His faith in our calm was shaken. At the time of the Ladysmith relief he watched grave City gentlemen jigging about, top-hatted and frock-coated, before the austere Bank of England, and failed to find the spectacle suggestive of much "calm." He then describes what he saw in the music-halls, booksellers' and photographers' shops, and nowhere does he find calm. As for our press, he thinks it the most uncalm element in a very delirious nation. Finally, in the train which takes him to Folkestone on his return journey, two fellow-passengers nearly come to blows because one is reading the Daily Mail and the other Truth and the REVIEW OF REVIEWS. England's devotion to Chamberlain, he thinks, marks the lowest point of her degradation. The year 1900 has been l'année terrible for the English conscience. When her hysterical crisis is over, England may again find the sympathy due to her genius and her services to freedom and civilisation.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. G. Caye writes on the Psychology of Inventors, many of whom he thinks must be mad as March hares. M. J. Hitomi, of Formosa, writes on the Japanese theatre, its history and development. Amongst the books reviewed, M. Finot has an excellent critique of Mr. Stead's electioneering pamphlet, "The Candidates of Cain."

Ueber Land und Meer.

THE chief feature of the October number is a sketch of Moltke by G. Scheibert. He mentions that, although Moltke was a great strategist and successfully led armies to victory, he would have been of no use as a leader of a regiment. The article is illustrated with portraits of Moltke and his wife and a few sketches made by the great field-marshal himself. There are several finely printed plates in the magazine and many other illustrations sprinkled promiscuously amongst various papers and articles. Dr. Stefan Epstein writes upon electricity at the Paris Exhibition, and his article is garnished with photos of the great world show, some few of which relate to the subject matter. Fritz von Ostini contributes a short sketch on Felix Vallotton and his work, and reproduces five of the artist's sketches, amongst them the Kaiser, Queen Victoria, Felix Faure and Napoleon I.

The Girl's Realm.

In the November number begins a series of papers in which notable women tell of their early struggles. Mrs. L. T. Meade's account of "How I began" to be a popular authoress will interest many readers no longer girls. Sarah A. Tooley writes on "The Daughters of our Soldier Prince," the Duke of Connaught; and another interesting paper is on the Frobel Educational Institute at West Kensington. The other articles hardly call for remark.

The Woman at Home.

BESIDES the amusing paper on "The Girl who should Marry an Editor," separately noticed, the November Woman at Home contains nothing but a mass of storyettes, not very heavily weighted by the second instalment of Lord Roberts' biography. It is curious to note that Lord Roberts has for thirty odd years been trying to induce the British military authorities to order soldiers to carry carbines on their backs, instead of in the usual bucket on their saddles, experience having convinced him of the great saving of life which would result from the adoption of the former plan. With what success his efforts have met every one knows. Marie A. Belloc has also an article on "How to Shop in Paris," in which many practical hints are given.

The Windsor.

THE contents for November are characteristically rich and varied. Chief among the articles stands that by Ray Stannard Baker on the American wheat supply, which claims separate notice. Mr. F. A. McKenzie's sketch of the Salvation Army as a Social Force is also well done and very readable. Mr. Morgan Brown illustrates by diagram and otherwise the varying value of a vote in different parts of the United Kingdom. He fastens on the case of Romford with its 25,000 voters and one representative, which could provide electors for no less than ten of the smaller constituencies. Irving Montague describes the canine arm of modern regiments, literally "dogs of war."

bir cor art wri Me ser fine ent re-Sw

tha

be

the year the En bot He Co

rigories ser unt Pru reo up its defe chi aga gen he far lead his

Go Wi bio

the all the von Bra Fre the Las Ble arti

the

Chi

....

and her

nventors, ch hares, e theatre, reviewed, election-a sketch although d armies ader of a traits of e by the al finely strations ers and ricity at hed with ch relate ibutes a ork, and them the apers in s. Mrs. popular er girls. r Soldier teresting at West emark.

n I.

o should ovember of storyl instals to note trying to soldiers he usual outle from iccess his felloc has n which istically ds that supply, Kenzie's also well rates by e in difthe case entative, n of the ibes the of war."

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Nord und Süd.

On October 26th the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Moltke was celebrated throughout Germany. In consequence of this, Nord und Süd has a very interesting article on the great strategist, by Alfred Semeran. The writer mentions as a curious fact that Blücher and Moltke had many points in common; both were born in Mecklenberg, and both these men who rendered such service to Germany left home at an early age, and finding no opening for their ambition in their own country entered foreign service. That both, still as young men, re-entered the Prussian army, Blücher leaving the Swedish and Moltke from the Danish army, and then led that Prussian army from victory to victory. What Blücher began at the opening of the century Moltke triumphantly completed at its close. The one drove the French headlong over the Rhine, and the other wrested from them the territory that had been forcibly taken two hundred years previously, and, together with Bismarck, fulfilled the dream of years, namely, the union of the German Empire. Blücher's strong arm and Moltke's keen brain both did their utmost for Germany's honour and power.

Moltke was the third son in a family of eight. His father was a lieutenant-general in the Danish army. He, with his elder brother, spent a rather joyless youth in Copenhagen. Writing of this time, he said that the only advantage he obtained from the rigid discipline and rigorous rules under which he lived, was that he early learned to bear every hardship. He entered the Prussian service, and, in 1835, became a captain. From that year until 1839 he served the Porte, still remaining in the Prussian army. He was asked to prepare a report on the reorganisation of the Turkish army. After that he drew up plans for the fortification of the Dardanelles and its banks; then directed, together with Hafiz Pacha, the defences of Varna. He had also to prepare a plan for the defence of Constantinople. In 1858 he was made Chief of the General Staff. It was in the campaign against Austria that he became known to fame as a great general, and, says Mr. Semeran, in the war against France he showed he was the greatest leader of his time and by far the greatest strategist. He was not only a great leader, writer and orator, he was also a great man, and all his triumphs never made him proud.

The magazine contains a translation of one of Baring-Gould's stories and a sketch of John Ruskin by A. Wilmersdoerffer. Most of the other articles are biographical.

Deutsche Rundschau.

With the October number, the Deuts Rundschau enters its twenty-seventh year. Its programme remains the same, namely, to supply an educated public with all that is best in literature and knowledge. It opens with the first instalment of a new novel by George Freiherrn von Ompteda. "Berlin in October and November, 1806," consists of interesting extracts from the diary of Graf von Bray covering the period of the battle of Jena and the French occupation of Berlin. M. von Brandt writes upon the popular beliefs and customs of Japan, as depicted by Lascadio Hearn, whom he compares to Kipling. Lady Blennerhassett writes upon Chinese characteristics. The article is chiefly based upon Mrs. Bishop's book, "The Yangtze Valley and Beyond." She emphasises the fact that the Yangtze-Kiang river and its tributaries provide the only means of access to the most prosperous part of China.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.

In common with most of the other German magazines, the Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land for October contains a eulogistic sketch of Moltke. Ulrich von Hassell, the writer of the article, dwells more upon the less known side of the Field-Marshal. As an orator and debater he made his influence felt in Parliament and in he country.

C. von Zepelin contributes a paper upon the position of Russia and England in Asia. He opens with a description of how Russia obtained her present position, and mentions the part played by Count Ignatieff in 1860, when France and England occupied Pekin. He reviews all the various relations, especially those which almost led to collision between Great Britain and Russia, and finally says that Russia constantly protests her friendship for China, and China knows exactly how to value this "friendship"; whilst the British Lion always roars—and retreats-if not before China, then before Russia. Ulrich von Hassell, in the events of the month, writes a most interesting article upon the immigration of Boers into German West Africa. The war has caused many Boers, to whom English rule was abhorrent, to trek away from the Transvaal, Orange Free State, and parts of Cape Colony. Portuguese East Africa does not offer them any attractions, especially as there is a prospect that Great Britain will ultimately control that Colony. There is therefore only German territory left, and it is being peacefully invaded by Boers and their families, at present chiefly from Cape Colony. The question at once arises as to how far this should be permitted. The pros and cons, of the situation are ably set forth by von Hassell in such a way as to point to the granting of free permission to settle in Namaraland. On every hand it is admitted that the Boers are the finest colonisers in Africa. They can overcome all difficulties in a way quite impossible to others, and especially to German peasants. For the opening up of the country nothing could be better than this influx of homeless Boers; but it is to future events that German statesmen look with apprehension. The Boers, they fear, are likely to establish a State of their own which will object to be managed from Germany. This could be avoided by the judicious sprinkling of German settlers amongst them-to sandwich a Boer between two Germans, so to speak. That would work well excepting for the fact that there are no German settlers to speak of, nor are there likely to be. The figures of the white population are interesting. In 1895 there were 535 military and officials and 1,239 civilians. In 1900 these had only increased to 801 military and officials and 2,587 civilians. Among the latter must be numbered no fewer than 850 Boers. It is therefore evident that the German population stands a good chance of being swamped. The most interesting admission made by the writer is that all the South African States will ultimately federate. German West Africa would become part of this United States, which fact shows clearly enough that Germany does not contemplate a united South Africa under the British Flag. Nor are these the only difficulties troubling the German administrators. Owing to the discovery of copper mines, a large influx of Englishmen and Afrikanders has taken place. They practically run the mines, and the Germans fear another Rand and its consequences in West Africa. In fact, as Herr von Hassell points out, the German Government is likely to follow the example of the French in so many of their colonies, namely, take care that justice and right prevails, but English and Afrikanders will secure all the plums.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN NATURAL COLOURS.

By H. SNOWDEN WARD, Editor of "The Photogram."

TEN years ago, in the REVIEW OF REVIEWS for August, 1890, I described the position and possibilities of "photography in natural colours," and a reference to those old notes may usefully precede the reading of the following.

In the decade many things have happened, of which the most interesting, scientifically, is the discovery, by Professor Gabriel Lippmann, of a successful "direct' method of photographing colour. The discovery is remarkable, because it was based upon pure reasoning by a man who knew nothing whatever of photography. Professor Lippmann began with the wave theory of light, and reflected that in passing through the thickness of a sensitive photographic film the actinic light pursued a waved course, the length of the waves varying with the "colour" of the light. He supposed that if these lightwaves could be reflected back along their original course, the original and returning waves would "interfere" at definite and regular intervals; and, further, that the deposit of silver to form the photographic image would take place in layers corresponding to these intervals. That is to say, he supposed that if monochromatic light passed through the film twice, the silver in the film would be deposited in layers parallel with the surfaces of the film. These layers would form a sort of trap or grating, so that if at any future time white light were thrown through the film and reflected, only those rays which corresponded in wave length (or "colour") to the originally acting light could be seen. As each coloured ray produced its own particular trap or grating, a film upon which various coloured lights had fallen would reflect various colours.

THE DIRECT METHOD AND ITS DRAWBACKS.

Experiment was made with photographically sensitive films backed with mercury to reflect the light, and the theory was found to be perfectly correct. There are, however, difficulties in the way of making this a practically useful process. To see the colour photograph at all it is necessary to shield it from sidelights, to illuminate it at one exact angle, and to view it from a corresponding angle. As an object for the optical lantern, too, the Lippmann picture has drawbacks. We cannot throw the light through it as we do with an ordinary lantern slide, but must allow the light to fall upon its surface and so be reflected to the screen. In this way a great deal of light is lost, so that even with a powerful electric light we cannot brilliantly illuminate on the lantern screen a disc of more than two or three feet in diameter, which is too small to be seen by a numerous audience. Then, again, the films with their layers of silver are liable to expand and contract under changing conditions of heat and moisture, with the result that the reflected colours are more or less untrue. Altogether, the Lippmann process is as yet a fascinating scientific curiosity without practical value. But it is a ver/ great thing to have secured a "direct" process at all after the master-minds applied to the problem had declared it to be practically "a proven impossiThe indirect methods which I described in 1890 have progressed famously along the lines then predicted. The theory and the outlines of practice were then fully established, but later work has produced dry plates more equally sensitive to all rays of the spectrum.

THE INDIRECT METHOD.

Briefly stated, the "indirect" process is this:—By means of dry plates specially sensitive to various parts of the spectrum, with the aid of light-filters, which are transparent bodies to "filter" the light falling upon the sensitive plate by absorbing certain coloured rays and transmitting the rest, we make three negatives, each being the effect of one of the "primary" colours of light. From these negatives we may make three transparent positives, each in its proper colour. When these are superposed the correct representation of the original object will be seen, with all its colours, tints and shades as in nature.

Though only the three colour-impressions are made, they represent all intermediate colours. For instance, following the Young-Helmholtz theory, we make colour-impressions of red, green and violet as primaries. Now where yellow exists in the original it will affect the red and the green light-impression, though neither of them so strongly as would the pure red or the pure green. In the transparencies green and red we have the yellow object represented, and the super-position of red and green gives the yellow effect.

By a modification of this process, making a photomechanical printing block from each of the three colour impressions, and printing these blocks one over the other, using three different and suitably coloured inks, we obtain good prints in natural colours, and the process is in very extensive everyday use for printing coloured illustrations.

The transparencies when viewed in a stereoscope, or projected by the optical lantern, are wonderfully striking, vivid and true, as every one will admit who has seen the Kromskop invented by Mr. F. E. Ives, or who may this winter have the pleasure of seeing the marvellous lanternslides made by Mr. E. Sanger Shepherd.

AN INTERMEDIATE PROCESS.

An intermediate process to all intents and purposes is the one originally known as the Joly, and now as the McDonough-Joly process, for reasons which will appear. Like the "indirect" process it makes three separate colour-impressions, but like the Lippmann process and the ideal direct process which still remains a dream, it needs only one exposure and one dry-plate. Originally suggested by Louis Ducos du Hauron, a most able Frenchman, who has just received the "Progress" medal of the Royal Photographic Society, it lay dormant for a quarter of a century because there were no dry-plates sufficiently sensitive to all the different colours. Six or eight years ago, in ignorance of the suggestion of Du Hauron, Dr. Joly of Dublin, and James McDonough, an American, independently thought of the same idea; and after working upon it for a little time they independently patented it in England and in America.

The essence of this simple method is to take a sheet of glass, ruled with a great number of fine lines of coloured exposered, g fine a from to the

of wha an ob throug red li form will p
the sil
The rather gelati

and si transp It i positive colour parend gelative opacit they a of three The red sh

origina

other o

proces

sented

and b

To over a makin transp by trai Where leaves these s the eye where appear with th offensi at a di seen th Prin portrai is first with a must b exactly ordinal masks while t Book in one necessa Like drawba sion in Still, the is simp

The sp market

block !

gelatine, and to place this in contact with the photographic plate in the camera during the time that the exposure is being made. The ruled lines are alternately red, green, violet, red, green, violet, and are usually as fine as three hundred to the inch. The light passing from the object photographed through the lens and on to the sensitive plate is "filtered" by the coloured lines of what is called the "taking screen." Thus, if we have an object reflecting only red light its rays can only pass through the red lines of the screen, and only under these red lines will the silver in the dry-plate be reduced to form the negative image. Light from a yellow object will pass through the red and the green lines, reducing the silver under them both.

The set of diagrams should help to make plain a rather complicated but very beautiful and ingenious process. It will be seen that in all cases white is represented by bare paper; red, green, violet (blue), yellow and black are represented by their heraldic tinctures; and silver deposit, in both the negative and the positive transparency, is represented by black.

It is, perhaps, well to say that these negatives and positives are not coloured, they are merely records of colour-impressions. Like crdinary photographic transparencies they consist of black silver deposited in gelatine, and varying in density from almost complete opacity to complete transparency. The difference is that they are arranged in lines, and that each line in any set of three represents a different colour-sensation.

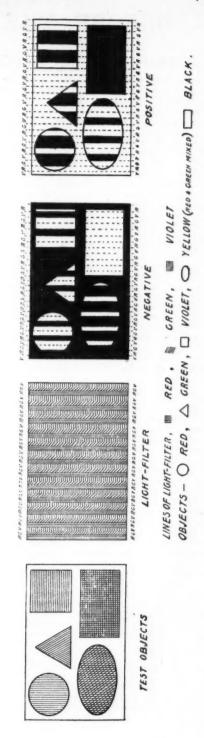

The transparencies are made from the negatives as in ordinary photography. In any part of the picture where red should show, the part representing the red line of the original "taking screen" is transparent, and so with the other colour-impressions.

To see the colour picture we place the transparency over a ruled coloured screen similar to the one used in making the negative, taking care that the lines of the transparency cover their proper lines on the screen, and by transmitted light the picture is seen in all its beauty. Where (say) yellow should be seen, the transparency leaves the red and green unmasked; but we do not see these separate colours, because the lines are so fine that the eye is unable to distinguish them. In the same way, where all three lines are left uncovered the effect is an appearance of white. These pictures can be projected with the ordinary magic lantern, and though the lines are offensively visible to any one sitting close to the screen, at a distance from which the whole picture can be clearly seen they present no difficulty.

Prints upon paper like our ordinary photographic portraits, but in colour, can easily be made if the paper is first ruled with the sets of coloured lines, then coated with any of the photographic sensitive surfaces. Care must be taken to register the negative colour-impression exactly over the right lines, then print and finish in the ordinary photographic way. The photographic image masks some of the lines and supplies the shadows, while the clear lines allow the colours to show through.

Book-illustrations can be made by making a printingblock from the colour-impression negative, and printing in one black impression upon paper ruled with the necessary lines.

Like all other human inventions this process has its drawbacks, the chief of which is that the black impression in all prints tends to lower the tone of the picture Still, there are the immense advantages that the process is simple—it differs very little from ordinary photography. The special apparatus, which will probably be on the market next year, should be very inexpensive.

have The fully more

-By ts of are the and each ght. rent are are inal ides ade, nce, our-

Now red nem In low and otolour her, tain very

the this es is the ear. rate and n, it ally

dal or a ates or Du

and

t of red

BEFORE THE CENTURY ENDS.

A CHRISTMAS GIFT FOR OUR WORKHOUSE BAIRNS.

SIX weeks from to-day the nineteenth century will come to a close. There is still time, although not much, for us to wipe out one of the many reproaches which will cling to the memory of the closing century. It is only a little thing, and yet one which demands for its doing the co-operation of a good many people, and some little organised effort. Scattered up and down the three kingdoms, there are planted in the heart of every section of the community houses in which are barracked regiments or companies of those upon whose childhood has fallen the dread shadow of death. Everywhere in every county in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, are to be found these houses or sections of houses in which at this moment thousands upon thousands of little orphans must pass their living-day, and in which to-night they will fall asleep without the hush of a mother's erayers, without the comfort of a mother's kiss. The children who are maintained by the poor law in the workhouses of the land are the children of the State, that is to say, they are your children and mine. There is no one, be he or she never so lonely or celibate, but may fairly claim to be part parent of this great army of motherless little ones. But how seldom we ever think of these unknown children of ours, who every day are growing up towards a manhood and womanhood which will be uninspired and intensified by the daily and nightly benediction of a parent's love.

In some of the workhouses a good deal has been done to make the children's rooms as much like home as possible. But even in well regulated workhouses, the aspect of the children's ward is often enough to make one shudder. Children cannot be dealt with wholesale. Each child needs some individual human to mother him or father him, or brother him or sister him, to open up to his little toddling feet the ways of life, and teach him little by little something of the wonderful world into which without his leave he was born, and in which he must continue to live as best he can till the summons comes to him that in time will come to all.

I well remember the first children's ward I ever saw. It was a room, warm no doubt, clean equally of course, but when that was said, all was said. Some twenty or thirty little children, from the ages of two to four, toddled in, and sat down on little forms around the room. An old crone, whose vital force had almost ebbed, was put by the fire to keep order in the room, and to see that the children did not do any mischief. There the children were, with a toy or two among the lot, and there they were left for an hour and two hours at a time, to exist as best they might, to amuse themselves as best they could. There was no one to teach them to play, there was no one to do anything except to repress disorder and see that they did not fall into the fire. There were no illustrations on the walls; there were no picture-books on the table; only twenty or thirty children with the old woman, who was quite content so long as they did not cry or quarrel. And so life went on with them from day to day, and week to week, until they grew old enough to be drafted off to school. Now every Christmas in many workhouses, especially in those that participate in the kindly benevolence that prompted the Truth doll competition, there are toys, which if carefully husbanded last for some months, but which too often share the fate of all toys in all nurseries, public and private. The suggestion which I wish to lay before my readers is that while we cannot individually undertake the duties of teaching or superintending or playing with the little waifs and strays who are gathered in these palaces of poverty, we might at least before the century closes do something to remove the shame and disgrace of allowing these children to grow up without pictures on the walls of their nursery or without picture-books, with which to lure them on to the uncongenial task of learning to read.

for me Th

pa po

for

Th

vai

rep

poi sho

of hit

the lite

live

chi

pic cos

wai

a ( hou

kno

hou

pict

fifty

of

littl sen sim

mai

with to e is b

T

knov

have read

with towi

to th

prise

fictio

bein

brou while adde per shilli

a bo

from Tem

TI

T

I recently made an inquiry, through the kind services of my Helpers, into the provision made in many workhouses on this question of pictures for the walls and picture-books for the bairns, and found, what indeed I had suspected would be the case, that much, very much still remains to be done before the little ones can be made to share, however slightly, in these simple necessities of our homes. But I thought I saw a way by which something could be done. In the publication of the "Books for the Bairns," I have at last succeeded in bringing out a Child's Library of fifty volumes at a price which places it within the means of the poorest. Fifty little volumes, each with illustrations on every page, covering almost every subject that is dear to nursery lore, full of fairy tales and fables, of nursery rhymes and travel tales. and all manner of other interesting things dear to the childish reader, are now produced and can be delivered in any part of the United Kingdom for the sum of five shillings. I do not wish to sing the praises of my own goods, but what I cannot help but feel is that very few people adequately realise the fact that the cheapness of production, both of paper and of print and of illustration, has now rendered it possible for any one who has five shillings to dispose of, to present any child or children within his acquaintance with a collection of books clearly printed, written specially for children, covering more than three thousand pages, and with a picture on every page. There has been nothing like it produced since the world began, and it seems to me that this fact alone suggests the possibility by which something can at last be done to provide the little ones in the workhouse with pictures at the beginning of the new century.

But this is not all. Picture-books, even with the greatest care, are apt to perish in the using. The prolonged process of attrition which goes on in every nursery wears out books, especially paper-covered books; but the advantage of the penny library is that each number can be replaced when worn out at a minimum of expense.

When we come to deal with pictures we have to deal with a much less perishable commodity. But here, too. the obstacle of expense seemed formerly insuperable. To obtain pictures good enough to put upon the wall, even of a workhouse, necessitated an expenditure which might very easily exceed the resources even of wealthy people. But here again the experience of the present year enables me to suggest a solution hitherto out of our reach. In the four Portfolios of Masterpiece Pictures now published at 4s. (4s. 6d. by post), we have an accessible store of pictures for mural decoration which no one hitherto could command at the price. The four portfolios contain

488

IS. olic and fore my dertake ng with n these century lisgrace ures on ks, with earning services y worklls and ndeed 1 y much e made sities of some-Books ing out places olumes, almost of fairy l tales. dear to can be fore the praises out feel ct that of print for any ent any llection hildren, with a of the ith the The n every books: it each mum of to deal ng like s to me

which

le ones

ere, too. le. To even of might people. it year reach. ow puble store nitherto contain

forty-eight pictures and reproductions of many of the most famous masterpieces of classic and modern artists. The second portfolio reproduces the six famous Murillo paintings of the story of the Prodigal Son, while the third portfolio contains eighteen pictures of animal life selected for the purpose of interesting and instructing little folks. The other portfolios contain miscellaneous pictures of various kinds, and with these is given away an admirable reproduction of Burne Jones' "The Golden Stairs," and a portrait of the Princess of Wales, and an excellent reproduction of Raphael's "Sistine Madonna," while we should, for this particular purpose, add our reproduction of Joshua Reynolds' "Cherub Choir," the like of which has hitherto been unprocurable except at five times the price.

We have, therefore, here two collections, one of pictures, the other of books. We have fifty volumes of children's literature, and fifty two pictures admirably adapted for livening up the walls of the living rooms in which the children live. I am in a position to deliver a set of each, pictures and books, at every workhouse in this land at a cost (including carriage) of ten shillings! Now what I want to do is to ask my readers to join with me in making a Christmas present to the little ones of the workhouses, so that we may have the satisfaction of knowing when the New Year dawns that every work-house in the United Kingdom will at least have fifty picture books for the bairns in its library, and that fifty-two pictures will brighten the walls of that prison of the State in which they have to spend their little lives. This can best be done by a localising of the For instance, nothing is so sense of responsibility simple as to take a county area. In your county how many workhouses are there? Could you send up an order with remittance for "Books for the Bairns" and pictures to each workhouse in your county? If so be that this is beyond your power, there is your workhouse in the district in which you live? Will you, as a Christmas gift to your children whom you have never seen, and whom you may never see, send the 10s., which will supply them with picture-books and pictures? Or, if so be that you do not live within reach of any workhouse, and have no living connection with the children of the State in your locality, would you send a subscription to be spent in supplying the needs of those workhouses which stand in areas outside the range of the benevolence of any of our

The suggestion seems to me so simple, so practical, and one which meets so admirably the admitted needs of the poor and appeals to the humanitarian sympathy of the well-to-do, that I should be bitterly disappointed if the century closes without realising this ideal. I want to urge my readers in every part of the three kingdoms to take part in doing a direct good, and giving con-tinuous pleasure to some of the most forlorn little mites in the world. Therefore, for your children and for our children, I plead that my scheme should have your immediate and hearty response.

My appeal has so far met with an encouraging response. At present I have promises that cover halfa-dozen counties. It practically amounts to a Christmas gift of tos, for each workhouse. The whole scheme could probably be carried out by a total expenditure not exceeding £1,000.

If any subscriber resident in any of the counties already covered should feel disposed to help forward this good work, I shall be very glad to open a subscription for the providing of boxes of picture-books and portfolios in any district which may be chosen; and I shall also be very glad to start a subscription myself with £10 10s., which will enable us to cover twenty-one workhouses. But no time must be lost, and I beg of you to send in your subscriptions at once.

Our Circulating Library.

To many of our readers the above library is still unknown, and we would direct the attention of those who have not yet made a trial of the scheme to the good reading which the books afford, and which, if brought within the reach of people living in villages and small towns, might be of immense benefit and entertainment to them during the coming winter season.

The books have been carefully selected, so as to comprise all branches of literature, poetry, history, travels, fiction, and illustrated magazines; forty-five to fifty books being contained in a box. All the boxes have been brought up to date by the addition of a few recent novels, while a new series, mainly composed of novels, has been added to those already in use.

The subscription for these boxes is thirty shillings per quarter, while a cheaper series is issued at thirty shillings the half year, sixty books being contained in a box.

Lists of the boxes and full particulars may be obtained from THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS CIRCULATING LIBRARY. Temple House, Temple Avenue. E.C.

A Company of "Three Letters."

THE Romans used to brand a thief with the Latin word for thief, which happened to be Fur. The culprit was spoken of as "a man of three letters." Mr. Beckles Willson tells in Cornhill a story of three letters, which stood, not for a man, but for a Company, but, strange to say, a Company whose business is expressed in English by the word Fur. The Great Fur Company is his title for the historic and still enormously wealthy Hudson's Bay Company. This is the story—with comments:-

A few years since, in the solitudes of the West, two European tourists were struck by the frequency with which they came across a certain mystic legend. The legend consisted of three letters. Eager to solve its meaning, they addressed a half-breed lounger at a small station on the Canadian Pacific Rail-way. "Tell us, my friend," said one of the tourists, "what those three letters mean? Wherever we have travelled in this country we seem to have seen it either on flags, or sewn on the garments of Indians, or painted on the bows of canoes, or stamped on bales and boxes. What does 'H.B.C.' mean?" Returned the native grimly: "That's the old Company.

'Here Before Christ.'

Might not the first missionary who, in 1818, reached York Factory contemplate this vast cure, and say, "Here before Christ! Bartering, building, warring, judging, slaying, ruling over and trafficking with a million souls—here before Christ!" Many a sermon might be-and perhaps has been-preached from that text.

THE BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

T is about time the fashion of publishing was changed. There is no reason in the world why all the good books of the year should be published in October and November. Yet it seems to be becoming more and more an established custom on the part of London publishers to bring out all the books of importance just when the November fogs are beginning to close down upon the City. It would surely be better to distribute them more evenly throughout the year. In consequence of the number of first-class books that appeared in a bunch, so to speak, I am unable to notice any one of them at the length which it deserves. Neither am I able to notice all of them. I have only to make a more or less arbitrary selection, and accord to each of them a more or less inadequate notice. From among the many books of the month I have selected (I) "Napoleon: the Last Phase," by Lord Rosebery; (2) "The Life and Letters of Professor Huxley," by his Son; (3) Mr. Morley's "Cromwell"; (4) Miss Marris's "Life of Mr. Chamberlain"; (5) Lady Hope's "Life of Sir Arthur Cotton"; (6) Dr. Conan Doyle's "The Great Boer War."

ROSEBERY ON NAPOLEON.*

I FORGET how many years ago it is now since, talking about the extraordinary interviews with which Prince Bismarck favoured the world immediately after his fall from power. Lord Rosebery made the remark that it was simply Napoleon at St. Helena over again. Since that time Lord Rosebery himself has gone to St. Helena, of his own choice, although not without telephonic attachment with the mainland. It is, therefore, with considerable interest that I turned to the volume which appeared at the end of last month.

Lord Rosebery's book, which is a somewhat portly volume, bears the title of "Napoleon, the Last Phase." It contains two hundred and sixty-one carefully indexed pages, of which three-fifths are devoted to a discussion and description of the various authorities upon whose books and memoirs the historian bases his narrative. Lord Rosebery's chief authority is Gourgaud, whose book, first published in 1898, Lord Rosebery regards as the most trustworthy of all the materials to be found in the literature of St. Helena.

GOURGAUD.

"When we read the private diary of Gourgaud," said Lord Rosebery, "we feel a doubt of all the other records, and a conviction that this book is more nearly the unvarnished truth than anything else that has been put forth." Gourgaud left St. Helena in 1818, and Napoleon died in 1821, and as a result we know nothing or next to nothing of these three years of Napoleon's Gourgaud was a young officer to whom Lord Rosebery devotes more than twenty pages of his narrative. He says:—"The one capital and supreme record of life at St. Helena is the private journal of Gourgaud, written without flattery or even prejudices, almost brutal in its raw realism. He alone of all the chroniclers strove to be accurate, and on the whole succeeded." He was devoted to the Emperor, but full of an unreasonable petulant jealousy which made his devotion intolerable. Gourgaud, says Lord Rosebery, "reveals to us a new Napoleon, strange and contrary to our ideas. In his pages we see Napoleon gentle, patient, goodtempered, trying to soothe his touchy and morbid attendant with something like the tenderness of a parent for a wayward child. The revelation of his book is the for-bearance and long-suffering of Napoleon. It seems almost incredible, in view of the incessant irritations and annoyances to which Napoleon was exposed on the part of his own friends, that he should have borne them with so much gentleness and patience.

ENGLAND'S TREATMENT OF NAPOLEON.

"Napoleon at St. Helena" suggests the observation that there are few subjects upon which British and continental opinion are in such sharp antithesis as the treatment which was accorded to the great Emperor when he threw himself upon the mercy of England, and was rewarded by being sent to die in a remote and almost inaccessible island in the Southern Atlantic. Few Englishmen have any conception of the feeling of indignation and horror with which the story of Napoleon's banishment is regarded in most countries in Europe. The revival of this painful memory by the selection of the island as the prison for the burghers was one among the many unfortunate incidents of the present unlucky

Lord Rosebery says: "If St. Helena recalls painful memories to the French, much more poignant are those it excites among ourselves. While every Englishman must regret that his Government ever undertook the custody of Napoleon, he must regret still more that the duty should have been discharged in a spirit so ignoble and through agents so unfortunate." Lord Rosebery thinks that the selection of St. Helena as a place of confinement can fairly be justified; but beyond that he has very little to say in favour of the method in which we dealt with our prisoner.

WHY THIS BOOK WAS WRITTEN.

The interest of the book, however, to most of us, is not so much the picture which it gives of Napoleon in his island prison as the kind of reflected light which it throws upon Lord Rosebery himself. Why should he, of all men, have undertaken to write this book? He evidently feels that some apology is needed for it, for he himself volunteers a couple of explanations, or excuses, for his collation of these morbid, sordid, insincere chronicles. Lord Rosebery's first answer is curious. He says :-

The first answer to this question is incidental and personal. To the present writer Lord Beaconsfield once explained why he wrote "Count Alarcos"; a drama nearly, if not quite, forgotten. It was produced, he said, not in the hope of composing a great tragedy, but of laying a literary ghost. The story haunted him, and would, he felt, haunt him until he should have put it into And so it is with this little book. It cannot help embodying a tragedy, but it was written to lay a literary ghost, dormant for years, only quickened into activity by the analysis of Gourgaud's last journals, and by stimulating leisure.

The second explanation is more serious, namely, that the time has now come when history can record her final judgment upon the man Napoleon. It is the end of the book, about thirty or forty pages, which the general

Bert subj mate at th

reac sugg Ros of N

T

beli

ficat enro

Ros

acci " T dest

corr of F

on l he v

revo

Eur

Thi

driv

pass

spri

men

Stat

ever

To

rela

slee

and adm

legis

code bod

secu had

He

faile

Hel

sit e

all asle

occa

We

wou

trac

which

trac

He the '

occa

labo victo the a

are,

490

[&]quot; Napoleon, the Last Phase," by Lord Rosebery. (A. L. Humphreys, reader will find much that is most interesting and suggestive in the whole volume, for it is here that Lord Rosebery condenses his general verdict upon the career of Napoleon. What was Napoleon?

"THE SCAVENGER OF GOD."

To the philosopher, and still more the philosopher who believes in the divine guidance of human affairs—a classification in which Lord Rosebery would appear to be self-enrolled—Napoleon is simply a scavenger of God. Lord Rosebery says scavenger is a coarse word, but it accurately represents Napoleon's first function as ruler. "The revolutionary volcano had burnt itself out. He had to clear away the cold lava, the rubbish of a past destruction, the cinders and the scoriæ and the fungus of corruption which had overgrown all." The Government of France had fallen into the gutter and he picked it up on his sword's point. But he was not only a scavenger, he was also a scourge of fire, the sword and spirit of the revolution, which visited the ancient monarchies of Europe and compelled them to get their houses in order. This demoniac man pursued his path as if possessed, as if driven by the inward sting of some burning devil.

HIS GENIUS AND ENERGY.

As a soldier the results of his military genius were unsurpassed. As an administrator he controlled every wheel and spring, large or small, of his vast machinery of Govern-ment as if it were his plaything. "In all the offices of State, he knew everything, guided everything, inspired everything. His mind was a cupboard, a pigeon-hole. To deal with any subject he opened the pigeon-hole relating to it, and closed the others; when he wished to sleep, he closed them all. He remembered everything, and forgot nobody. Great as a soldier, great as an administrator, he was perhaps greatest of all as a legislator. Everything that he did has passed, but the code remains. This dynamo of a man was lodged in a body almost ideally perfect. He once fought for five consecutive days without closing his eyes, and then when he had won the victory, he slept for thirty-six hours on end. He seemed incapable of fatigue, and his digestion never failed. The first tooth he ever lost was extracted at St. Helena, and then, it appeared, unnecessarily. He would sit eight or ten hours in council, taking a leading part in all discussions until one minister after the other fell asleep in his chair. "Come, gentlemen," said he, on one occasion, "pull yourselves together. It is only two o'clock. We must earn the money that the nation gives us." He would work for eighteen hours at a stretch without any trace of weariness. Sometimes the tremendous energy which was his mainspring would get a little out of the traces, and then woe betide those who crossed his path. He kicked Volney once in the stomach so violently that the philosopher was carried away senseless. On another occasion he knocked down his Chief Justice, and belaboured him with his fists. He is said to have attacked Berthier with the tongs.

LIKE A SUPERNATURAL VISITANT.

It is evident that Lord Rosebery is fascinated by his subject. He says:—

"France in chill moments of disaster, or even of mere material and commercial well-being, will turn and warm herself at the glories of Napoleon. The atmosphere is still imbued with the light and heat of the Imperial ear, with the blaze of his victories, and with the lustre of those years when Europe was the anvil for the hammer of France."

As for the method and the morals of Napoleon, these are, he says, the subordinate matters for history which only concerns itself with his effect and result. But although subordinate for history, they are profoundly interesting for mankind:—

"We study them as we would the least facts concerning a supernatural visitant; a good or bad spirit, something alien to ourselves, and yet linked to ourselves by the bond of humanity—not merely human shape and human utterance, but human failing and human depravity."

JOHN BULL JINGO AS NAPOLEON.

What, then, is Lord Rosebery's verdict? It is a verdict very much like that which Lord Rosebery himself possibly in his anti-Jingo moments would pronounce upon the present phase of Great Britain's activity. The lean and hungry conqueror has swelled into the sovereign, and then into the sovereign of sovereigns, and then came the catastrophe. "He loses the balance of his judgment and becomes a curse to his own country and to all others. "His neighbours' landmarks become playthings to him." "His island enemy"—in Napoleon's case England, in our case Russia or Kruger or any one else whom we choose to adopt in that capacity—"is on his nerves; he sees her everywhere; he strikes at her blindly and wildly." "He has ceased to be sane. The intellect and energy are still there, as it were in caricature; they have become monstrosities." Then comes the inevitable collapse, and the reaction and the decline. Napoleon exhibited this in person. The British Empire, suffering in the delirium of Jingoism, exhibits the same phenomena to which, alas, Lord Rosebery himself has not failed to minister! "The truth," says Lord Rosebery, "is that the mind of man has not in it sufficient ballast to enable it to exercise or endure for long supreme uncontrolled power. The human frame is unequal to anything approaching omnipotence." And what is true of the human frame is equally true concerning the British Empire.

THE NEMESIS OF EXPANSION.

Had he proceeded more slowly, says Lord Rosebery, "had he taken time to realise and consolidate his acquisitions, it is difficult to limit the extent to which his views might have been realised. But the edifice of his empire was so prodigiously successful that he would not pause even a moment to allow the cement to harden. And, as he piled structure on structure, it became evident that he had ceased to consider its base."

As we read these words, reminiscences of Lord Rosebery's earlier speeches, when he eulogised the Manchester school and implored John Bull to pause and digest what he had already swallowed rather than to go on pegging out indefinitely enormous claims to unoccupied territory, occur to readers, who cannot fail to draw the parallel, which may not have been present to the writer's own

OUOS DEUS VULT, ETC.

No doubt, says Lord Rosebery, Napoleon had convinced himself that he had increased his power in exact proportion to the increase of his dominions. He seemed to consider that each annexation, however procured, added as many valid instruments of his policy as it did human beings to his realms. It added, as a rule, nothing but veiled discontent and expectant revolt. Napoleon professed to consider that "the populations that he had conquered could be relied upon as subjects and soldiers. This strange hallucination indicates the loss of his judgment and, more than any other cause, brought about his fall. Whom God wishes to destroy, says the adage, he first deprives of sanity."

And these grave and weighty words are from the pen more when more , so all of

Juate Lord Miss The

con-

the peror and most Few g of con's rope. n of nong inful hose man the the oble bery e of

t he

we

us, leon hich he, He he ses, cere ous.

onal.
y he tten.
great him, into help nost,

that inal the eral

of the one-time Liberal Leader, who at the last election had not a single word to say in protest against the insane hallucination that the annexation of the Dutch Republics added to the strength of the Empire, and who allowed men boasting themselves to be his followers to be foremost in the rabble rout that clamoured for the adoption of that insane and suicidal policy.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S LIFE AND LETTERS.*

PROFESSOR HUXLEY was so conspicuous and so marked a personality that his life and letters, now collected and edited by his son, will command a very wide circle of readers. There is no one at present who can be compared to this doughty scientific athlete, who was always ready to challenge conclusions with all and sundry upon almost every topic. To many Professor Huxley was a figure as forbidding as he was formidable, and they were comparatively few who were able to see behind the grim vizor of the ruthless knight the kind heart and sympathetic nature of the man. These volumes will do some good service, in that they raise the vizor and enable us to see the human features underneath. For Professor Huxley was a man full of human frailties and human virtues. He was by no means the iron man-at-arms of an aggressive scientific heterodoxy. In these volumes we have the man as he was, keen, vigorous, uncompromising. not a little intolerant, but nevertheless at the same time the man, tender-hearted, sympathetic, full of the milk of human kindness, even at the time when he was discharging some acrid showers of gall and verjuice upon those whom he deemed it his duty to belabour. There was a certain perversity about the man, sometimes which led him to assail those whom, if he had but seen more clearly, he would have recognised as his best friends and natural allies. But it is no use wishing him to have been other than he was. Right through the middle of the closing century he was a force which made in its way steadily for righteousness and for truth. He trod under foot many things which, when he came to the close of his long life, he might well have wished to have spared. His zeal for truth made him somewhat unamiable and uncharitable to everything that he chose to consider humbug. And it is distressing to note how much excellent human energy he expended upon controversies which he had much better have left alone. He was exuberant, however, as strong men are apt to be, and wasteful in the might with which he smote all those who crossed his path.

The spirit of the man is better shown in his letters than in any of his more formal works. He had a great gift of exposition, great sympathy with all that made for intellectual progress, and a somewhat arrogant impatience with those who obstinately or stupidly refused to see the light as soon and in the same way as he did; but whether he was right or whether he was mistaken in his conclusions, he was honest and fearless, and no man need less fear the curse which was pronounced upon the Church of Laodicea.

It is impossible in the compass of one or two pages to give any but the merest outline expression of the immense fund of material which crowd these portly volumes. Professor Huxley was a copious letter writer, with a glib and facile pen, who unbent himself in his familiar correspondence more than most men. Some of his letters, especially those which he addressed to his grandchildren,

* "The Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley," by Leonard Huxley. (Macmillan.) 30s. net.

are charming illustrations of the art of being a grandfather. All his letters are direct and lucid. Many of them are luminous, not a few are full of a humour grimly Scotch and others are delightfully nonsensical. Taken together with the other materials in his book they present us with a vivid picture of the man as he really lived and taught and battled amongst us.

To discuss his scientific achievements here would be absurd. What a man has done in unlifting the veil of Isis from the mysterious work of God, which we call nature, is important, no doubt, especially for other students and men of science. But to the multitude the most interesting, and indeed the most important, question is not what Huxley discovered, but how Huxley lived. How did he, as the net result of all his masterful strivings after truth, come out? At what conclusions did he arrive? How did he finally face the problem of the Universe? Was he merely a negative force? Had he a positive faith? Has he any word of stimulus of en-couragement or of hope with which to cheer the wearied heart of man?

In these volumes there is much material for answering these questions. Primarily destructive, Huxley was, nevertheless, essentially a believer. He did not believe in Gadarene swine, in the Noachian deluge, or in Mr. Gladstone. But he did believe in the universal supremacy of the Eternal Law-believed in it with such intensity that he would not cumber it with the experimentally unverifiable theory of a Divine Lawgiver. He was in essence a Calvinist, minus the Calvinist's grasp upon the personality of the Deity. As he himself said in a very remarkable passage, well worth quoting just now, when Hooliganism is bringing about a great revival of the orthodox doctrine :-

The doctrines of predestination, of original sin, of the innate depravity of man and the evil fate of the greater part of the race, of the primacy of Satan in this world, of the essential vileness of matter, of a malevolent Demiurgus subordinate to a benevolent Almighty, who has only lately revealed Himself, faulty as they are, appear to me to be vastly nearer the truth than the "liberal" popular delusions that babies are all born good, etc. etc.-(Vol. II., p. 303.)

Like all the good Calvinists, Huxley was a man of strong and even rugged backbone, and he also shared their tendency to make a good deal more of the Devil than of God. His last famous utterance in his second Romanes lecture concerning the difference between the cosmic process which works by the struggle for existence and has as its result the survival of the strongest, which may be the fittest from the point of view of its environment, and at the same time the most utterly unfit and wicked from the point of view of the moralist, was, he repeatedly declares in truthful jest, nothing more or less than a sermon endeavouring to establish on scientific foundations the orthodox doctrine that Satan was the Prince of this world-the Prince, mark you, not the King.

It is characteristic of this illegitimate spiritual child of John Knox that in the closing years of his life he spent much time and thought as to the best way of preparing and publishing a new Bible for the use of the working people. The first mention of this is to be found in a letter of November 3, 1892.

In another place he says he has the firm conviction that Iesus would have repudiated the doctrine of the Incarnation as warmly as that of the Trinity :-

I have a great respect for the Nazarenism of Jesus, very little for later "Christianity." But the only religion that appeals to me is prophetic Judaism. Add to it something from the best stoics, and something from Spinoza, and something from Goethe think l (Vol. 1

A li up the while a Men's unlear for the -(Vol He

the b be de VII. X. M In place propos The d It i that l

the co in Pr more "If like to the pe which intere menta

MR.

TH

It is stern

sympa worth those annou a life had to North in sha in tho at pre he h soldie and v verita of Fo bête n book 1 for the dering repetit days discov longed

I do mate o I do s expect

Englis

the ve

would

grandany of grimly

Goethe, and there is a religion for men. Some of these days, I think I will make a cento out of the works of these people.— (Vol. II., p. 339.)

A little later we are told that he was thinking of taking they really uld be veil of e call other de the ques-

Tuxley

sterful

ns did

of the d he a of en-earied

vering never-eve in n Mr.

macy that verifi-nce a ersonverv

when

of the innate

e race,

ness of s they beral"

etc .-

an of hared

Devil

econd n the tence

which viron-

and is, he r less

ntific

s the King.

ild of spent aring

rking letter

ction

f the little als to e best from A little later we are told that he was thinking of taking up the threads of late evolutionary speculation,— while actually planning out and reading for a series of Working Men's Lectures on the Bible, in which he should present to the unlearned the results of scientific study of the documents, and do for theology what he had done for zoology thirty years before.

—(Vol. II., p. 345.)

He never got further than to draw out the scheme of the book in twelve chapters. The first six were to be devoted to the religion of Israel. Then we had—VII. Prophetism; VIII. Nazarenism; IX. Christianity; X. Muhammedanism; XI. and XII. The Mythologies.

In the last year of his life he altered his plan, and in place of the contemplated lectures to working men he proposed to write "A Bible History for Young People." The design was never accomplished.

It is more as an ethical than as a scientific teacher that he will be remembered by most men. He was a stern witness for truth, and if there was a good deal of the cosmical process, formerly known as the old Adam, in Professor Huxley, he shares that failing with many more orthodox teachers.

"If I am to be remembered at all," he wrote, "I should like to be remembered as one who did his best to help the people." It is a good saying; there is no better with which to close this brief and inadequate notice of a most interesting story of a life surcharged with moral and mental energy.

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S "OLIVER CROMWELL."*

THIS is the best book that Mr. Morley has yet written. It is compact, luminous, thoughtful, philosophic, and sympathetic. It is a theme worthy of the author, and worthily has he dealt with it. I confess I was one of those who heard, with some degree of trepidation, the announcement that Mr. Morley had undertaken to write a life of the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. I had too lively a remembrance of the many discussions in Northumberland Street, in which I had found my views in sharp antagonism to those of my chief, for Mr. Morley in those days was much more of a doctrinaire than he is at present. Before Mr. Morley went into Parliament, he had but little sympathy with the iron-handed soldier who had broken Parliament after Parliament, and whose biography by Mr. Carlyle had become a veritable gospel of the false doctrine of the worshippers of Force. In those days Cromwell was somewhat of a bête noire to Mr. Morley, and when the chapters of this book began to appear in the American magazine selected for their publication, I turned over the first pages wondering whether I was to witness a nineteenth-century repetition of the gibbeting which disgraced the early days of the Reformation. I was, however, delighted to discover that a closer study of his subject and a prolonged meditation on the achievements of the greatest of Englishmen, had led Mr. Morley profoundly to modify the verdict which I feared from old experience that he would have passed upon this "bold bad man."

MR. MORLEY'S ESTIMATE.

I do not mean to say that I regard Mr. Morley's estimate of Cromwell as entirely adequate or altogether just. I do say that it is immeasurably better than anything I expected to find. For Mr. Morley, by constitution and by education, was incapable of putting himself in Cromwell's place. He has, however, done his best, and done it very well; but always there is the note of the sectarian about him, the sectarian whose sectarianism shows itself in being anti-sectarian. The persistence with which Mr. Morley claims the credit of the Liberal victory of the seventeenth century for the Rationalists is one of those traces of human nature from which even Mr. Morley is not exempt.

* "Oliver Cromwell," by John Morley. (Macmillan, ros. net.)

CROMWELL AND IRELAND.

In his study of the subject Mr. Morley has found much more to attract than to repel in the character of Cromwell. Of course, he has nothing but scathing words to utter concerning the Irish policy of Cromwell, of which it suffices to remark that it is not surprising that two hundred and fifty years ago Oliver Cromwell should have been as blind to the essential features of the Irish question as the predominant partner is to this day. But as Cromwell commanded the enthusiastic admiration of Cardinal Manning, although on very different grounds, so even Mr. Morley finds much in Oliver to compel his unwilling admiration. Cardinal Manning told me that he regarded Cromwell as the greatest English Sovereign who had ever lived, and especially praised him because he was the first to recognise the true genius of modern England, which, again to quote the Cardinal, consisted in a recognition of the responsibilities and opportunities of English influence abroad, together with a tender solicitude for the welfare of the English people at home.

HIS ATTRACTION FOR MR. MORLEY.

Mr. Morley is attracted to Cromwell not by any Imperialist sympathies, but rather by his admiration for Cromwell's instinct for government, and still more by his constant recognition of a moral element in the government of mankind. On this point there are many fine things in this book, and it is good to have the great moralist of the present day discoursing upon such a text as the life and career of the great Puritan monarch, whose name and memory are perhaps the most abiding inspiration which our democracy has inherited from its ancestors.

The book is well indexed. From some of the entries under the sub-heading of "The Character of Cromwell" we take the following extracts:—

Personal Characteristics:—Affection. Broad-mindedness. Comparison and tenderness. Courage and fortitude. Education, furtherance of. Energy. Faith. Finance, incapacity for. Force, distrust of. Form and dogma, indifference to. Geniality. Honour. Hopefulness. Impetuosity and passionateness. Jesting, love of. Legal apprehensions, incapacity of. Military excellence. Moderation. Moral unity. Music, love of. Mysticism. National sentiment. Order and government, instinct for. Persistency and patience. Popularity with his troops. Public opinion, attitude towards. Reserve. Sagacity, lack of. Sport, love of. Toleration. Unity, desire for.

Not much of the bold, bad man here!

MR. MORLEY AS BALAAM.

Those who expected that Mr. Morley would endeavour to reverse the favourable estimate of Cromwell, which has prevailed since Mr. Carlyle undertook the task of editing his actual utterances, must be agreeably surprised at finding that like a modern Balaam Mr. Morley has blessed where he might have been expected to ban.

It is difficult to refrain from speculation as to the contrast that there must inevitably be between Mr. Morley's Cromwell and the great biography of Mr. Gladstone, upon which he has been engaged for the last two years. The latter may have more of immediate interest for those to whom Mr. Gladstone's achievements are a living memory.

But I shall be much surprised if his study of Cromwell does not outlive in English literature his biography of Gladstone. The Gladstone book will no doubt be indispensable to the future historian, and will occupy an abiding place among the materials out of which the history of England in future will be built; but I should not be surprised if a hundred years hence Mr. Morley were better known by his Burke and his Cromwell than by all his greater works which bulk much more voluminously in the catalogue of his writings.

WHY CROMWELL IS REVERED.

Mr. Morley may possibly be surprised that so thoroughgoing a Cromwellian as his old assistant at Northumberland Street should be enthusiastic about his diligent effort to minimise the successes of Cromwell in the domain of statesmanship. The Saturday Review, I notice, exults in what it regards as the depreciatory effect of Mr. Morley's criticism upon the reputation of the Lord Protector. But those who indulge in such comments simply fail to understand the real hold which the character of Cromwell has upon the English nation. It is not that we think him divinely inspired or infallible. We know him to have been intensely human and humbly conscious of his manifold shortcomings. It is not that we regard him as a heaven-sent genius, with a perfect formula for the solution of all difficulties. No such formula is possible on this earth. No; the intense abiding and ever-increasing appreciation of Cromwell, which makes him above all others the supreme embodiment of the national ideal, is not due to any of the delusions which Mr. Morley sets himself, with somewhat unnecessary zeal, to demolish. It is due to the fact that Cromwell was—first, a thoroughly honest and a thoroughly earnest, good Secondly, that he was animated by the noblest ideals, many of which were far in advance of those of his own generation. Thirdly, that while never for a moment forgetting these ideals, and constantly making almost superhuman efforts for their realisation, he was never a pedant or a doctrinaire, but always the supremely practical Englishman. Fourthly, that he was a man who never despaired. "In him hope glowed like a pillar of fire after it had gone out in other men." And his energy, his patience, his perseverance, his courage, were not unworthy of his invincible faith. Fifthly, that whatever difficulties encompassed him, he never was submerged. He always came out on top, displaying greater resources in defeat and disaster than even in prosperity. He was the Handy-man incarnate-the man who in one way or another always put things through, and, on the whole, put them through more satisfactorily than could have been accomplished by any other method which any one else can even now suggest as possible. It was the indomitableness of the man, his unfailing resource, his magnificent hopefulness, his robust faith, and his absolute indifference to all but the vital essence of things, which make him the national hero.

THE NET EFFECT OF MR. MORLEY'S BOOK:

Mr. Morley may tell us that this, that, or the other project of his perished with the using. No doubt. But for the time it served his turn, and was capable of being used. A statesman in a revolutionary time is like a sailor sweeping down a rock-strewn rapid with nothing between him and destruction but the débris of a wreck. Merely to survive and get through he has to display a thousandfold more valour, more dexterity, more resource, more presence of mind, than is demanded from the captain who plies between Gravesend and Greenwich. It is easy to say that Cromwell did not work miracles. Had he possessed that gift he would have lost his fascination. Mr. Morley points to many expedients or policies which Cromwell tried and abandoned. But what neither Mr. Morley nor any other critic has ever ventured to tell us is, what is better or more lasting expedient or policy they could have invented if they had been in his place, and had been doomed to work with his materials. Hence Cromwell will stand rather higher in the opinion of his countrymen after they read Mr. Morley's book than he did after they finished reading Carlyle's magnificent dithyramb in praise of the Lord Protector.

PECCAVI. BY E. W. HORNUNG.

THIS is a very powerful story. It is the tragedy of a single soul, told with marvellous sympathy and great power. A clergyman, eloquent and popular, is overcome in a moment of passion with the daughter of one of his parishioners. He implored her to marry him, but the girl, who loved him devotedly, considered that such a union would injure him in his parish. She therefore disappeared, only to return when her baby was born. Her father, who is an atheist, a strong, rugged, semi-savage character, hears that his daughter has sent for the clergyman on her deathbed. Without dreaming that the clergyman was the father of his grandson, he goes to the vicarage and insists upon knowing the name of the scoundrel who has ruined his child. The clergyman confesses. Thereupon the whole parish turns upon him. His vicarage is wrecked, and the church burned down. The clergyman is suspended for five years, but is not deprived of his living.

Boycotted by his flock to such an extent that no one will sell him food, he determines, as an act of expiation, to rebuild the church from his own private means. The squire, who had determined to drive the clergyman out of the parish, succeeds in prevailing upon all the builders in the countryside to refuse to supply him with materials or to accept the contract for rebuilding the church. Thereupon the penitent sinner determined to build it with his own hands, and for years, in winter's cold and summer's heat, he labours as a mason, placing stone upon stone without any soul to speak to him or give him comfort. His faithful dog alone bears him company, but after a time the poor dog is murdered by some ruffian, and he is left entirely alone. Undaunted and undismayed, he pursues his self-appointed He is then accused of having burnt the church down himself, and prosecuted, with no other result, however, than that of enabling him to score heavily off the squire, who had trumped up the charge in the hope of finally ruining the man whose dogged resolution and iron will had baffled all his efforts to banish him from the parish. After some years his child strays into the church where the clergyman is busy working, and through him the solitary worker makes the acquaintance of the squire's adopted daughter, and between them there springs up a dangerous intimacy. It would not be fair to the author to tell the end of this pathetic tale. The tragic note struck at the first is maintained throughout with great skill. It is a great sermon, which will probably be more discussed this year than any sermon preached in any pulpit.

The picture of the lonely clergyman, a labouring and excommunicated outcast, at his self-imposed task, until his hair turns white, though not with age, will long dwell in the memory of all those who read this remarkable book. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

grea wou ber the shor

L

sary hist like cern 66 late.

M which Mr. and full ance muc also life, is, ir abou and

Si large it is sees have featu berla for th woul regar perha excel litera after could Chan usual

Mr side, minis Act (confo than desce ances devot seems new 1 berlai of un Comp in Ha able standi two h

* " Je Marris.

leathe

THE LIFE OF MR. CHAMBERLAIN.*

LAST month I was lunching in Paris with one of the greatest criminologists in Europe. He remarked that he would like very much to make an autopsy of Mr. Chamberlain.

"What," said I, laughing, "as the supreme criminal of the century?"

"It would be very interesting," he replied. "But I should particularly like to have all the documents necessary—his portraits at various ages, his autograph, the history of his career, and above all," he added, "I should like some account of his ancestry and particulars concerning his boyhood."

"Oh," I said, "I believe he was a very good boy."
"Ah," said he, "it is often so. Criminal traits develop late."

ot work

ave lost edients

d. But ic has more ented if med to 1 stand

er they finished

e of the

a single

ver. A e in a

of his

but the such a erefore

s born.

-savage clergy-

clergy-

icarage

rel who There-rage is rgyman living.

hat no act of private drive

evailing fuse to act for sinner and for labours soul to g alone

dog is alone.

pointed church

t, how-off the hope of nd iron om the church

through ince of n there

be fair

. The

ughout

robably ched in ng and k, until

g dwell

arkable

Miss Marris' book contains a good deal of the material which my friend desired for his criminological autopsy of Mr. Chamberlain. As a frontispiece it has his autograph and portrait, both as recent as last August. We have also full details of all that is known of Mr. Chamberlain's ancestry and Mr. Chamberlain's boyhood. These form much the most interesting part of the book; but there is also at the end a description of Mr. Chamberlain's daily life, which is very interesting and delightful to read. It is, indeed, very welcome to be able to read something about Mr. Chamberlain which excites no animosity and provokes no criticism.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AS HE SEES HIMSELF.

Since the book may be regarded as, to a very large extent, Mr. Chamberlain painted by himself, it is very profitable to know what Mr. Chamberlain sees when he looks in the mirror. For those who have not the advantage of surveying his natural features in the glass, I hasten to announce that Mr. Chamberlain appears quite too good for this wicked world. But for the unfortunate accident of his Unitarian ancestry he would certainly be canonised. This book, indeed, may be regarded as a kind of contemporary canonisation. He is, perhaps, not quite so great and good a man as the excellent Mr. Perks is described in the electioneering literature which he distributes to his constituents; but, after Mr. Perks, it is difficult to imagine that any one could be altogether so super-eminently excellent as Mr. Chamberlain. When Nature fashions such a prodigy, she usually breaks the mould.

HIS CORDWAINING ANCESTRY.

Mr. Chamberlain, on his great-great-grandmother's side, was descended from one of the Nonconformist ministers ejected from the Church of England by the Act of Uniformity. He is very proud of his Nonconformist ancestors—much prouder, indeed, of them than most living Nonconformists are of his ancestors' descendant. What was far more conspicuous in his ancestry than their Nonconformity was their hereditary devotion to the art of the cordwainer. Cordwainers, it seems, differ from cobblers in that the former works in new leather, while the latter works in old. Mr. Chamberlain's father, grandfather, and an indefinite number of uncles had all been Masters of the Cordwainers' Company in the City of London. There is a cobbler in Hayling Island who made to me the very honourable boast that his family had mended the understandings of the Hayling Islanders for the last two hundred years. Mr. Chamberlain's connection with leather did not go back quite so far as that of my worthy friend at Hayling, but he has an honourable record in this respect, and one of which he would do well to be proud. In India all callings are hereditary, even those of the hereditary clerks who pray to their inkhorns. But in England also some families stick to their last; and until Mr. Joseph Chamberlain took to politics his family had been faithful to their hereditary calling.

• "Joseph Chamberlain: the Man and the Statesman," by N. Murrell Marris. Hutchinson. ros. net.

THE FIGHT ABOUT THE PEACE SOCIETY.

When Mr. Chamberlain was a boy, he appears to have been one of those extraordinarily good boys who in the Sunday school books usually meet with a premature death, being too good for this world. He was serious, studious, and industrious, and the only occasion on which he ever seems to have been involved in a fight arose from his great zeal in the cause of peace. The boys in the school, it appears, had formed a Peace Society, a step which the worthy school-dame regarded with profound disapproval, knowing, as she said, that it would be sure to breed fighting. Mr. Chamberlain was president of that Peace Society, and the chief contributor to its funds; for it is recorded that he brought to the treasury no less a sum than a fourpenny piece, given him for the purpose by one of his uncles. The rest of the subscriptions appear to have amounted to three-halfpence, and a fierce feud arose as to how this magnificent balance should be disposed of. In the end it was given to a crossing-sweeper, although in what way this was supposed to advance the cause of peace does not appear in the narrative.

AN INCIDENT OF HIS SCHOOL DAYS.

The account of young Joseph's schooling seems to be authentic, and is confirmed by Joseph himself, who, as a good boy should, looks back to the record of these early days with gratitude and pride. One curious incident recorded by the schoolmistress, describes how Mr. Chamberlain, with other scholars, took part in a dramatic representation of the "Worship of Baal." She had been explaining to them the worship of Baal in the Biblelesson, and, going out afterwards into the playground, was astonished to find that her pupils had set up a model clay image on the wall, and were bowing down before it in imitation of the ancient idolaters. The subject has afforded a theme for the pencil of Mr. Gould, who portrays Joseph as doing obeisance before the image of Lord Salisbury. Mr. Gould would probably have been better inspired, had he substituted for the somewhat broad visage of Lord Salisbury an image of Moloch, the original prototype of the Jingoism of to-day.

A GOOD BOY WHO LEARNS FRENCH.

With the exception of that solitary battle-royal over the distribution of the 5½d., Mr. Chamberlain's youth seems to have passed without any incident which could have been recorded as foreshadowing his present apotheosis as Jingo High Priest. He spent much of his time at the Polytechnic, and enjoyed himself as a well-behaved, serious-minded Nonconformist youth of the well-to-do middle class is expected to do. He early acquired a mastery of French, and now writes and reads it with facility, a fact which must not be forgotten when the time comes to consider his claims to be Foreign Minister of England. In this he has the advantage over Sir Edward Grey, who, if he ever should be Foreign Minister, will need an interpreter when holding converse with diplomatists accredited to the Crown.

ASHAMED OF HIS BEST DEEDS.

We have the history, told with much appreciation and enthusiasm, of how Mr. Chamberlain became the patron saint of the Midland capital, after which, by a short transition, we come to the story of his début as member of Parliament and Cabinet Minister. As might be expected, considering his present surroundings, his biographer glides with delicate step over the narrative which deals with Mr. Chamberlain's career as a Radical Minister. For instance, Miss Marris barely mentions the part he took in handing over the Transvaal in 1881. A single paragraph stating that he supported Mr. Gladstone's policy gives the reader no clue to the fact that the policy of the retrocession of the Transvaal was not really Mr. Gladstone's policy, but Mr. Chamberlain's; that, to Mr. Chamberlain's credit be it spoken, he was the most energetic, and at one time almost the only energetic advocate in the Cabinet for the restoration of the Boers' independence. Neither is any reference made to the eloquent and passionate speeches in which Mr. Chamberlain denounced in those days the policy to which he has now succeeded in committing the nation.

THE JAMESON RAID AND THE KAISER'S TELEGRAM.

We naturally turn with considerable interest to this -official account of the Jameson Raid. It is interesting to find that Mr. Chamberlain's historian-in-waiting is very careful to discriminate between the Jameson Plan and the Jameson Raid. For the former, to which Mr. Chamberlain was a party, she has nothing but good words; whereas all her indignation is reserved for the ill-conceived measure by which Dr. Jameson upset the apple-cart in which Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Rhodes had embarked their political fortunes. Another interesting fact which may be noted is that Mr. Chamberlain asserts that the German Emperor's telegram to Mr. Kruger justified the English Government in expecting German intervention on behalf of the Transvaal. The exact words are as follows :-

Such support appeared by no means impossible, for it was rightly considered that the telegram to President Kruger, sent by the German Emperor immediately after the Raid, conveyed a thinly veiled offer of assistance should Kruger appeal for it, and it is certain that his subsequent attitude both towards Germany and England was based on this assumption.

It would be interesting to know whether Mr. Chamberlain expressed this view to the Kaiser when he met him at Windsor.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AND RUSSIA.

Another piece of thin ice, in skating over which some dexterity is necessary, is the episode of the Leicester speech. With this the author deals more frankly, and we may see in her pages Mr. Chamberlain pluming himself concerning his exploit on that occasion. Mr. Harmsworth must have read with despair this evidence that the Colonial Secretary is still unregenerate. It may be taken as a sign of grace that the biographer does not venture to refer to Mr. Chamberlain's famous long-spoon speech. Of that indiscretion the author is probably ashamed. She does not do justice to the extent to which Mr. Chamberlain in previous years supported Russia. A mere passing reference is made to the part which he took in supporting Mr. Gladstone's Bulgarian campaign, nor does she allude to the fact that in 1885 Mr. Chamberlain was the only Cabinet Minister who withstood Mr. Gladstone, when the Prime Minister and his Cabinet committed themselves to a course of hostility to Russia about the Afghan frontier. Neither, on the other hand, does she chronicle the fact that it was Mr. Chamberlain who in the autumn of 1884 succeeded in thwarting and crippling for a time the efforts which were made in that year to rehabilitate the naval strength of Great Britain.

HOW HE BROUGHT ABOUT THE BOER WAR.

It is not necessary to notice the official narrative of the origin of the present war. Suffice it to say that it is wonderfully wanting in perspective, and no one who reads it could realise the fact that the war was rendered inevitable, first by Mr. Chamberlain's complicity in the Jameson Plan, which necessitated the subsequent whitewashing of Mr. Rhodes and the fiasco of the South African Committee; secondly, that the mischief thus done was aggravated by Mr. Chamberlain's revival of the pretension that the suzerainty of 1881 was still in existence; thirdly, that President Kruger from first to last begged and prayed for arbitration upon all the disputed questions at issue between the two countries, and that Mr. Chamberlain absolutely refused his request; fourthly, that when Mr. Kruger had accepted the Joint Commission proposed by Mr. Chamberlain for inquiry into the seven years' franchise, Mr. Chamberlain went back on his own offer, and sprang new demands upon the Boers in a fashion which convinced them that, no matter what concessions they made, he was determined to force them into war. To leave out these four things, or rather to slur them over in a disingenuous fashion, is the way in which history is written in Birmingham.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN "EN FAMILLE."

It is a relief to turn from this travesty of history to the description which we are given of Mr. Chamberlain in family life. Upon this subject Mr. Chamberlain and his amanuensis can speak with undisputed authority, and I gladly quote the following passages describing Mr. Chamberlain as a family man :

So far as the public sees he lives two lives-the one official, about which they think they know everything, the other private, about which they know nothing. These are so far dissociated that the public almost forgets there is a private life, and imagine that the Chamberlain of debate—cool, wary, relentless, absolute master of himself and of his facts, unmoved either by applause or dissent-is Chamberlain the man, in his relations with his family, his friends, and mankind generally.

His many acts of private charity are so privately performed that they are not even suspected.

"More than once," said one who knew him intimately, "he has taken endless pains to set up a ne'er-do-well on his feet again; often, perhaps, the effort has been wasted, but sometimes it was rewarded, and that was enough for Mr. Chamberlain. He will not allow anything to come between him and his friends, and would do his utmost to smooth away any misunderstanding; he was the life and soul of the circle he moved in before all the cares of office sat so heavily upon him; the truest and most loyal fellow it is possible to find."

To his servants he is a kind and considerate master; the gardener who first served him died in his service, and his town and country coachmen have both been with him for many years. He takes a kindly interest in those who serve him; and perhaps it may be allowable to mention that he steadily encourages his household in thrift and in making provision against old age by adding each Christmas a bonus to the savings of both his indoor and outdoor servants.

Some people may find it difficult to realise that such a man as Mr. Chamberlain is truly fond of children.... In the days when his children were young he would not have them banished to the nursery, but kept them with him as much as possible, and was seldom too busy to play with them at their own games, or to devise treats for them. And in later years it has been said of him that his sons are his most intimate friends.

His rule of life he has himself declared. "No work is worth doing badly; and he who puts his best into every task that comes to him will surely outstrip the man who waits for a great opportunity before he condescends to exert himself."

enor subj and Indi nobl char with India fasci daug nearl subje tunity he w intere grave impos Cotto two qu reader regard

Th

I

beca

The o not on decisiv trators that th the s who ha was an experie honesty might h accome accurac solemn, treated authorit stateme to admi single e Arthur platform method neither Secretar pass him whirling no right administ possible b upon at officials the exper public-spi not com Anglo-Inc this is vas but lo consul " " Life of oughton.)

India Off

LIFE OF SIR ARTHUR COTTON.*

IT is very difficult to review a book such as this, because the importance of the question which it raises so enormously transcends the interest, great as it is, in the subject of the biography. Sir Arthur Cotton was a good and great man. He was a very fine type of the Anglo-Indian school which represents much that is finest, noblest, and altogether most admirable in the British character. His character is not only worthy to be placed with that of Lawrence and Edwards, and the great Indians of the first half-century, but he was a singularly fascinating and charming human personality. His daughter has told the story of his life with wonderful felicity, never over-doing the devotion which one less nearly related to her father might have paid to her subject, but on the other hand never neglecting an opportunity to portray by happy, familiar touches the man as Yet, although the book as a biography is he was. interesting, the questions which it raises are so terribly grave that in the limited space at my disposal I feel it impossible to do even the slightest justice to Sir Arthur Cotton as a man. I must devote my whole space to the two questions that are forced home upon the mind of the reader on every other page of the book.

OUGHT AN EXPERT TO BE LISTENED TO?

The first question is a bewildering wonder whether any regard ought ever to be paid to the authority of an expert. The question seems an absurd one, but it appears not only to have been put, but to have been answered decisively by a succession of able Anglo-Indian administrators in a sense which would justify the conclusion that the only man who has no right to be heard on the subject is the supremely able, honest expert who has devoted his life to its study. Sir Arthur Cotton was an expert of the best type; he was a man of varied experience, with the highest character of scrupulous honesty, and a man who had not only written as to what might be done, but who had with his own hands actually accomplished it on a sufficient scale to verify the accuracy of his conclusions. Yet for fifty years his solemn, reiterated, and emphatic warnings have been treated as non-existent by the men placed in supreme authority in India, who were perfectly well aware of the statements which he had made, and who were also ready to admit that he spoke from sincere conviction with a single eye to the public welfare. For fifty years Sir Arthur Cotton lifted up his voice, in the press, on the platform, before select committees, and used every method of accessible publicity, with the net result that neither Liberal nor Tory Viceroy, or Liberal, or Tory Secretary of State for India, has done anything else but pass him by as if he were a mere crank uttering wild and whirling words. He meant well, no doubt, but he had no right to be treated seriously by sane and sober administrators. It is therefore possible, and not only possible but has actually been shown to be a principle acted upon at the India Office, and by the Viceroy and his officials in India, that no attention need to be paid to the expert, no matter how capable, how honest, how public-spirited he may be, if his conclusions should not commend themselves to the judgment of our Anglo-Indian bureaucracy. It may be said that this is as it should be—that Sir Arthur Cotton was but one expert out of a multitude, that the India Office had other experts quite as good as he to consult and in whose judgment they had more confidence, that therefore the neglect shown to Sir Arthur Cotton does not in the least discredit expert testimony, it only shows, which no one can deny, that it is possible for an occasional expert to have a "bee in his bonnet." Let us admit this, and pass on to the second question.

WHOM SHOULD WE HANG?

It is one which may be stated in a much more striking fashion than the former question which I have just discussed. It is whether, in face of the facts as to the loss of life and the infinite agony of human suffering occasioned by the last great famine in India and its predecessor in Madras, it would not be right and just to order Sir Henry Fowler, Lord George Hamilton, Lord Lansdowne, and various other high officials who might be named, to the gallows in order that they might make such tardy retribution for their crimes as can be obtained by the sacrifice of their lives. To that question the nature of our answer must depend upon the decision arrived at on the prior question, namely, whether it is right to hold the ruler or the minister personally responsible with his life for an honest if perverse error of judgment which has cost the lives of millions of his fellow-subjects. For it is difficult for any one to read carefully through the chapters in this book describing the long struggle which Sir Arthur Cotton waged in vain against the obstinacy of the opponents of canals in high places, without feeling that whatever there may have been to be said on the other side, history has with an iron finger written her infallible verdict. Lord Curzon this month admitted that the recent famine had cost the lives of five millions of human beings. Ten millions more had been saved from perishing by being fed from day to day by the Government.

THE REFUSAL TO MAKE CANALS.

The great famine in Madras which occurred in 1878 showed a similar terrible death-bill. And these are but two of nearly fifty famines which have mowed down our-fellow-subjects in India since Sir Arthur Cotton by his great irrigation works on the Godaveri showed how easy it was to ensure an Indian province against famine, not only without cost to the State, but with direct profit to the Imperial exchequer. The contention that Sir Arthur Cotton brought forward with inexhaustible, patient persistency has been abundantly demonstrated by the facts now universally admitted. Railways, he said, while very useful, cannot possibly prevent famine. Whereas canals for irrigation and for navigation can be absolutely relied upon to safeguard the popula-tion from starvation. The first and negative part of his proposition has been lamentably proved by the recent famines. In 1880, the Famine Commission appointed by the Indian Government expressly confirmed the accuracy of Sir Arthur Cotton's contention when it declared that the construction of canals was the measure of the first importance to be taken in providing remedies from famine. Instead of acting upon this mandate, the Indian Government has since 1880 spent £250,000,000 upon railways and has not spent half that amount upon canals. Instead of giving the canal the first place, it has had to take a very back seat indeed. But the canal in the regions where it has been constructed has prevented famine, while the railways, which have been favoured in every way, have utterly failed to do more than facilitate measures for its relief when famine had actually broken out.

IS IT A CASE OF CULPABLE HOMICIDE?

Now these facts, which no one can dispute in face of Lord Curzon's own admission as to the mortality and expenditure caused by the recent famine, f thus ival of its still from upon the two cly re-Kruger by Mr. francing offer, in a at cone them

tive of that

o one ir was plicity

equent

South

to the clain in and his , and I Chamofficial, private, ssociated

imagine absolute ther to way in applause with his erformed ely, "he his feet

ometimes mberlain. is friends, standing; re all the most loyal ster; the his town my years. I perhaps grages his ld age by his indoor a man as

In the not have with him play with em. And his most

k is worth task that or a great [&]quot;" Life of Sir Arthur Cotton." By Lady Hope. (Hodder and compel us to face the question how far previous Viceroys and Indian Secretaries and others who share their responsibility for ignoring Sir Arthur Cotton's advice can be held guiltless of culpable homicide. It is no answer to say that they were honestly mistaken. So is many an engine-driver who misreads, honestly enough, the signals, and finds, when put on trial for manslaughter, that the honesty of his intentions is no answer to the terrible charge of having by his mistaken judgment entailed the death of one or more of his fellow-men. How much more is the responsibility which weighs upon those whose error of judgment has entailed the murder by the slow torture of starvation of twice five millions of innocent human beings for whom they proudly assume the rôle of an earthly providence?

THE CRUCIAL QUESTION.

It is, of course, impossible to do more than state the question in the brief space at my disposal for the review of Lady Hope's book, but no one who reads the book will be able to get rid of the question. He may answer it one way or he may answer it another, but whatever answer he may finally decide to make, he will find it impossible to arrive at any conclusion without having passed through a very terrible quarter of an hour, in which there will have come home to him in grim reality the suspicion that all our recent Indian Viceroys and Secretaries of State for India may have deserved capital punishment. Further, there is no doubt that if we could on one occasion only behead a Viceroy or Secretary of State for India when it was proved that a million men had died because he had arrived at a wrong conclusion in face of repeated warnings, it would do more to rehabilitate the somewhat tarnished prestige of our Indian administration than all the dithyrambic eloquence which is so freely employed to magnify the sagacity, the wisdom, and the benevolence of our Indian Administration.

THE GREAT BOER WAR.*

By Dr. CONAN DOYLE.

DR. CONAN DOYLE is a brilliant writer and an enthusiastic patriot, and his book is thoroughly readable from first to last. Although Dr. Doyle was swept off his feet by the wave of military enthusiasm which passed over this country last year, he is too sane a man and too vigilant an observer to produce a book of this kind without saying many things which are well worth saying and well worth remembering. His narrative of the causes leading to the war is very imperfect, and very far from doing justice to President Kruger. He recognises, however, that the Jameson Raid, or still more the way in which it was handled by the South African Committee and Mr. Chamberlain, did much to aggravate the situation. He inserts in a parenthesis that he does not believe that Her Majesty's Government was privy to the Jameson conspiracy; and therein I entirely agree with him. The question is not as to whether Her Majesty's Government approved of the conspiracy, but whether Mr. Joseph Chamberlain knew and approved of and supported and co-operated in this conspiracy. Of this unfortunately there is now no room for doubt. In describing the negotiations which preceded the outbreak of war, Dr. Doyle fails entirely to realise the extent to which Mr. Chamberlain's assertion of the suzerainty of 1881 prejudiced the case, nor would any one who reads his pages imagine that the Boers expressly and repeatedly stated their readiness to abide by the provisions of the Convention of 1884. Neither does he seem to have understood the difference between Mr. Chamberlain's offer to refer immaterial questions to arbitration and his absolute refusal to permit arbitration on the question which alarmed the Transvaal Government. But although these are serious blemishes in a work which professes to explain how the war came about, they only need to be referred to in passing. The value of the book does not depend upon his account of the diplomatic negotiations; but it is to be found in the brilliant pictures of battles and Dr. Doyle's account of the war as he saw it, and finally in his admirable and outspoken criticism of the defects which the war revealed in our military administration and training.

The concluding chapter of his book, in which he sums up the conclusions at which he arrived as to the changes which should be made in our military system, I noticed at some length last month when they appeared in the Cornhill Magazine; and there is, therefore, no need now to do more than quote the following passage:—

The slogging valour of the private, the careless dash of the regimental officer—these were our military assets—but seldom the care and foresight of our commanders. It is a thankless task to make such comments, but the one great lesson of the war has been that the army is too vital a thing to fall into the hands of a caste, and that it is a national duty for every man to speak fearlessly and freely what he believes to be the truth.

According to Dr. Doyle, Lord Roberts began extremely well in his repression of looting, and he declares that in the march of the army to Kroonstad the forces under Lord Roberts' immediate command were sternly forbidden to loot. It was as much as Tommy Atkins' life was worth even to steal a goose from the fields through which he marched. This fact, for which Dr. Doyle vouches as an eye-witness, only intensifies our regret that a commander who began so well should have fallen from grace so terribly. The contrast between Dr. Conan Doyle's description of the severity with which looting was forbidden up to Kroonstad is in melancholy contrast with the terrible picture of wholesale looting and systematic devastation of the country which took place as soon as our armies reached the Transvaal.

I take leave of this interesting and valuable book with the following brief quotation, describing the modern battle-field in these days of long range guns and smokeless powder:—

No sign of the enemy could be seen, though the men were dropping fast. It is a weird and soul-shaking experience to advance over a sunlit and apparently a lonely country-side, with no slightest movement upon its broad face, while the path which you take is marked behind you by sobbing, gasping, writhing men, who can only guess by the position of their wounds whence the shots came which struck them down. All round, like the hissing of fat in the pan, is the monotonous crackle and rattle of the Mausers; but the air is full of it, and no one can define exactly whence it comes. Far away on some hill upon the skyline there hangs the least gauzy veil of thin smoke to indicate whence the six men who have just all fallen together, as if it were some grim. drill, have met their death. And somewhere else, up yonder among the boulders, there rises a horrible quacking, a dreadful monotonous hyæna laugh, which comes from the worst gun of all, the malignant one-pounder Maxim, the hateful "Pom-pom."

As a postscript I must add that Dr. Doyle will probably live to regret his choice of the title. A war waged by the undivided might of the British army against 40,000 burghers can hardly deserve to be described as "great," except, of course, from the point of view of the Boers.

"Ser that shou a var grow In si Barri ment ruthle action chapt obitu death and a chara

Fre

In

work cheap hangs Rinto every tyrann promp perfori but be them. that h superb He ma but all is una tempta times h

ting w become calls th

of his a

Tom fame an Carried he prop his im flees to realises however although occupy the chile is the p revolves. clear-sigl belief, pr cannot a avoids a to draw

"Do yo tell me wh "That is they would I thought which coun world, I

Grizel fal

her think obstacles

a touchin

^{* &}quot;The Great Boer War." By A. Conan Doyle. (Smith Elder.) 7s. 6d.

TOMMY AND GRIZEL.

sly and provi-

e seem amber-

on the

which ey only ie book

lomatic pictures

saw it,

inistra-

e sums changes noticed

l in the o need

h of the t seldom thankless f the war

the hands

to speak

xtremely that in es under nly forkins' life through

r. Doyle

r regret

ve fallen

r. Conan

ting was rast with stematic

soon as ook with modern

d smoke-men were erience to side, with oath which

y, writhing

d, like the can define

on the skyto indicate

er, as if it somewhere

a horrible hich comes er Maxim,

I probably ged by the nst 40,000 is "great,"

Boers.

By J. M. BARRIE.

IT is impossible to read Mr. Barrie's sequel to "Sentimental Tommy" (Cassells, 6s.) without wishing that Tommy had never lived to be a man. He should have been a boy for ever. That, however, is a vain wish, for Mr. Barrie has allowed Tommy to grow up and we must take him as we find him. In sketching Tommy's career as a man of genius, Mr. Barrie has penned a satire upon the artistic temperament. He does not spare Tommy and lays bare with a ruthless hand the secret springs which prompt all the actions of this spoiled child of fortune. In a concluding chapter Mr. Barrie makes selections from the imaginary obituary notices which appeared in the papers at the death of Mr. T. Sandys. It is a touch of a master hand and a cutting satire upon the world's estimate of a man's character and ideals.

From the day Tommy sets foot in London in search of work as the amanuensis of "colossal" Pym, the writer of cheap popular serial fiction, to the moment when he hangs throttled on the spikes of the park railings of Lord Rintoul's estate, he is incurably sentimental. He clothes every act with a gauzy mist of sentiment. He is tyrannised over by his sentimental impulses, whose promptings he is powerless to resist. His actions are performed, not because he believes them good or bad, but because of what he thinks other people will say of them. He is always playing a part, and always conscious that he is playing it. He can make believe at times so superbly as almost to deceive himself and the reader. He makes love as he believes the perfect lover should, but all the time he does not love, and cannot love. He is unable to resist the wiles of the tempter, provided the temptation is shrouded with sentimental wrappings. At times he is aghast at the situations into which his besetting weakness lands him. He escapes so often, that he becomes convinced at last that his "little gods," as he calls them, will always rescue him from the consequences of his actions.

Tommy's great book upon woman brings him fame and popularity. He becomes the pet of Society. Carried away by one of his sentimental impulses, he proposes to a widow whom he hardly knows. his immense relief, she refuses his offer. his immense reliet, she relies his circumstance and he flees to Thrums when the hot fit is over, and he flees to Thrums when the hot fit is over, and he flees to Thrums when the hot fit is over, and he however, is only a secondary personage in the story, although Mr. Barrie probably intended he should occupy the foreground. Grizel of the crooked smile, the child of the Painted Lady, grown to womanhood, is the pathetic human figure around which the story revolves. She is passionately devoted to the truth, clear-sighted, and endowed with a horror of all make-belief, pretence and sham. It is pain to Grizel if she cannot answer yes or no to a question. Tommy always avoids a direct answer, and shirks anything that threatens to draw a dividing line between truth and falsehood. Grizel falls in love with Tommy. Irresolute Tommy lets her think he loves her, but when the way is cleared of all obstacles to their marriage he recoils in dismay. With a touching proud humility Grizel refuses to bind him :-"Do you mean you don't love me?" she said. "You must tell me what you mean."

"That is how others would put it," he replied. "I believe they would be wrong. I think I love you in my own way, but I thought I loved you in their way; and that is the only way which counts in this world of theirs. It does not seem to be my world. I was given wings, I think; but I am never to know that I have left the earth until I come flop upon it with an arrow through them. I crawl and wriggle here, and yet"—he laughed harshly—"I believe I am rather a fine fellow when I am flying!"

She nodded. "You mean you want me to let you off?" she asked. "You must tell me what you mean." And as he did not answer instantly: "Because I think I have some little claim upon you," she said, with a pleasant smile.

upon you," she said, with a pleasant smile.
"I am as pitiful a puzzle to myself as I can be to you," he replied. "All I know is that I don't want to marry any one. And yet I am sure I could die for you, Grizel."

And yet I am sure I could die for you, Grizel."

It was quite true. A burning house, and Grizel among the flames, and he would have been the first on the ladder. But there is no such luck for you. Tompy.

there is no such luck for you, Tommy.

"You are free," was what she said. "Don't look so tragic," she added, again with the pleasant smile. "It must be very distressing to you, but—you will fly again." Her lips twitched tremulously. "I can't fly," she said.

There are many Tommies in the world, and it is unfortunate that they have so strong an attraction for the Grizels. It is the Grizels whose lives are spoiled and whose loving self-sacrifice is lavishly, but vainly, squandered upon the men who are not worthy to kiss the hem of their garments. Poor, patient Grizel is finally driven insane by Tommy's heartless and thoughtless behaviour. Tommy is fond of posing as a martyr, but he is not of the stuff of which martyrs are made. In remorse, it is true, he marries Grizel, and by months of devotion and care he wins her back to sanity. But, although he acts the part of the perfect lover, he knows he does not really love, and he hugs the conviction that he is a very fine fellow to sacrifice himself in this noble fashion. Temptation crosses his path, and with hardly a struggle he falls. The temptation is baited with a lost MS., the one thing in life to which he is genuinely devoted, and he promptly throws good resolutions, self-respect, and every restraining influence to the winds. Happily a kindly, merciful providence interferes and cuts short his life. Once more his "little gods" save him by the desperate remedy of despatching him from this life. But from first to last it is Grizel upon whom the reader's eyes are fixed, and it is she who will live when the memory of Tommy, like the fame of his works, has perished. (Cassells). 6s.

THE PEOPLE OF CHINA.

CHINA SUB-EDITED.

The only fault which might be found with Mr. Robertson-Scott's excellent little book, "The People of China" (Methuen), is that it contains too much information. It would be difficult to discover any book which is more closely packed with interesting and useful facts than is this. Mr. Robertson-Scott's book is divided into six divisions. First, he treats of the country and its vastness; following this come three chapters devoted to the "History of China." Four chapters deal with "The Chinaman," his government, education, characteristics and religions. Under the heading "The Foreign Devil," Mr. Robertson-Scott writes on the Jesuits in China, the Opium Trade, British Sphere of Influence and the Outlook for foreign trade. "The Future" of China is dealt with under the two heads of the Views of the Foreign Devil and the View of the Chinaman. An appendix contains a glossary, a "Who's Who" of prominent men connected with China, which will help the reader to place his facts with the greatest of ease.

Mr. Robertson-Scott's book is one which is to be strongly recommended to all those who wish to store their minds with the essential facts upon the Chinese question with the least expenditure of time and money.

QUISANTÉ.

By ANTHONY HOPE.

In its setting Mr. Anthony Hope's new romance "Ouisanté" (Methuen, 6s.) is a political novel. It deals with political parties, Parliamentary debate and General Elections. But politics are merely the outer garments in which he clothes his characters. Wrappings of another fashion would have suited the subject almost as well. The story itself, apart from its surroundings, is a very clever analysis of the character of Alexander Quisanté and his influence upon those with whom his career brings him into contact. Quisanté is an extremely able man, possessed of execrable meanness, unlimited self-confidence and immense will power. He is an outsider, but his undoubted ability and splendid mental gifts enable him to obtain a command-ing position in the party to which he has allied himself. His manners antagonise even his warmest admirers, but they are attracted by the great force of the man and his cleverness in turning apparent defeat into victory. He is always doing things the morality of which one cannot be quite certain about. Those who know Quisanté best are most fully alive to his manifold shortcomings, but despite their better judgment they follow his career with fascinated interest. What Mr. Hope calls Ouisanté's "moments" atone for many faults. At these times the man rises to a higher level and loses himself in his subject. At crises in his career his lowest and highest nature are called into play and the two are so inextricably mixed that both have to be accepted as part of the man. At one moment he wheedles an ignorant fool with flattery, at another he rouses keen honest men to fine enthusiasm; now he seems to have no thought that is not selfish and mean; now imagination wraps him in a glow of heartfelt patriotism.

Quisanté half attracts and half repels all whom he works with. He gains a footing upon the political ladder by his influence over Dick Benyon and in society by his marriage with Lady May Gaston. May Gaston is not able to explain the fascination Ouisanté has for her, all she knows is that the fascination exists. She does not love him and is not even proud of him, except when he has his "moments." Her married life Her married life is not a happy one, and yet she would not undo it if she could. She marries him hoping to be able to develop the best that is in him, but very quickly discovers that Quisanté must be taken for better and for worse. Mr. Hope has made the most of this opportunity of tracing the effect of Quisanté's character upon that of his wife May, who really only wanted a good place from which to look at Quisanté's career, but finds the position of wife too close for detached contemplation. Quisanté's powerful character left its stamp upon his wife. Even after his death his influence remains all-powerful. Writing two years later to the man who loved her and whom she could have loved, May Quisanté says, in refusing his second offer of marriage :

I write very sadly; for I didn't love him. And now I can love nobody. I shall never quite know what that means. Or is it possible that I loved him without knowing it, and hated him sometimes just because of that? I mean, felt so terribly the times when he was-well, what you know he was sometimes. If find no answer to that. It never was what I thought love meant, what they tell you it means. But if love can mean sinking yourself in another person, living in and through him, measuring him with your very life, then I did love him. At any rate, whatever it was, there it is. Yet

I'm not very unhappy; I have a feeling that I have had a great share in something great, that without me he wouldn't have been what he was, that I gave as well as took, and brought my part into the common stock. We did odd things, he and I, in our partnership, things never to be told. My poor cheeks burn still, and you remember that I cried. But we did great things too, he and I, and at the end we were a little together in heart. It wouldn't have lasted? Perhaps not. As it was, it lasted long enough—till "it came," as he said—and he died asking me to tell him that he had spoken well. I'm glad he knew that I thought he had spoken well.

THE MEN OF THE MERCHANT SERVICE.

MR. BULLEN's latest book on the sea and ships is one of the most useful that he has written. In "Men of the Merchant Service" (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.), he has compacted into a handy volume an immense amount of information which parents of boys who wish to go to sea will find invaluable. It is filled with practical hints and suggestions. To the general reader the chief merit of the book will be its clear and interesting account of what life on shipboard is actually like. The British public are astonishingly ignorant about the details of maritime affairs. Mr. Bullen's book should remove any legitimate excuse which exists for this ignorance. He describes the position and duties of every man on board ship, and succeeds in making each man stand out conspicuously from his fellows. Mr. Bullen, however, is not merely content with setting forth, in the easy style of which he is a master, the work and duties of each individual of the crew. Incidentally he takes occasion to point out many of the weak spots in our merchant service. One of these is the lack of discipline which prevails on board ships manned by English sailors. The British sailor on board a man-of-war is made to obey, and does so. On board a sailing vessel the discipline is not nearly so strict, and the obedience is much less general. This is one of the many reasons, Mr. Bullen believes, why the foreigner is replacing the Englishman in the merchant marine of this country. It is interesting to note that in this respect American crews compare favourably with English. The methods of the American officers, however, in asserting their authority hardly commend themselves for imitation. The American sailor is much harder worked than the British sailor, but, on the other hand, he is very much better fed. He is also, Mr. Bullen asserts, generally more intelligent and better educated. Although Mr. Bullen is not blind to the many drawbacks of our Mercantile Marine as it exists to-day, he is strongly of opinion that it offers a fine career for enterprising and adventurous youths. But he contends they should enter the profession with their eyes open and with a knowledge of what will be expected of them. Mr. Bullen solemnly warns us that unless the tendency to man and officer our vessels by foreigners is checked we shall heap up for ourselves an awful mountain of disaster. In painting the British seaman in his true colours, Mr. Bullen is bringing nearer that day to which he looks forward, when our sailors will be appreciated at their true worth, andwhen the British seaman shall no longer feel that he is com pletely isolated from the thoughts and sympathies of hi countrymen, as if he were the inhabitant of another planet, and when the British man-o'-war's man, whether he be bluejacket stoker, shall know of a truth that his friends at home realist what he is doing during his long absence from home: how he for their sakes, in order that the steady stream of ships from prolific lands far away shall never cease by day or by nigh through the years, keeps sleepless watch all round the world.

by

ar

H

re

pa

ch

we

M ave had a e wouldn't nd brought he and I, oor cheeks e did great together in s it was, it nd he died m glad he ips is one en of the has comamount of go to sea hints and merit of nt of what public are maritime legitimate scribes the ship, and spicuously ot merely which he dual of the it many of of these is ard ships sailor on es so. On nearly so ral. This ieves, why the merresting to compare American ity hardly American sailor, but, d. He is ligent and lind to the s it exists ers a fine iths. But sion with what will warns us officer our eap up for ainting the is bringing when our and he is comhies of hi planet, and luejacket o home realis ne: how he ships from or by night e world.

ICE.

CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOKS.

A GUIDE TO CHRISTMAS LITERATURE.

CHRISTMAS books are early comers. Most of them are published two months at least before December 25th. In order to help my readers in their selection of giftbooks from the hundreds of volumes published for the Christmas season I have, as on previous occasions, compiled the following list of the most suitable books for presents.

BOOKS FOR THE BAIRNS.

The children's Christmas books are this year more sumptuous than ever. The beautifully illustrated volumes that are now prepared for the nursery leave nothing to be desired. No child could have a more delightful present than the two handsome books which Mr. Grant present than the two handsome books which shall," by Richards has published this autumn—"Piccallili," by Edith Farmiloe, and "Four and Twenty Toilers," by Mr. Bedford and E. V. Lucas. They are illustrated with beautiful coloured pictures. Their gettrated with beautiful coloured pictures. Their get-up could not be improved upon. "Piccallili" (6s.) is the catching title Edith Farmiloe has chosen for her children's Christmas book. It contains twenty-six short stories, each illustrated on the opposite page by admirable coloured sketches of the incidents described in the letterpress. A large number of the tales are characteristic scenes from Italian life; but some are taken from life in the East End.

"Four and Twenty Toilers" (6s.) is undoubtedly the most charmingly illustrated of all the Christmas books of the season. The colouring of the sketches is exquisite. The various toilers whose daily occupations are described cover a very wide range of labour. Mr. Lucas's verses are not as good as Mr. Bedford's pictures, but the little ones will not complain of either.

The Golliwogg has apparently come to stay. He is a somewhat unsightly addition to the inhabitants of the nursery, but he is certainly amusing. This year he and his companions tell of their adventurous expedition to the North Pole. More fortunate than their predecessors, they reach their destination after many perilous adven-tures and hairbreadth escapes. "The Golliwogg's Polar Adventures" (Longmans, 6s.) is a good present for a child who can appreciate fun in picture and verse.

he war has, of course, left its imprint upon Christmas literature. It has been responsible for the birth of "The Tremendous Twins" (G. Richards, 6s.), whose adventures promise to make them nursery favourities. The authors of "The A.B.C. for Baby Patriots" are the parents of the Twins, whose wonderful achievements are described in verse and pictures. The Twins go to the war as Commanders-in-Chief, appoint "darling 'Bobs'" their Chief of Staff, and defeat the Boers. The illustrations are excellent and amusing.

"Rigmaroles and Nursery Rhymes" (Bousfield) is a collection of verses written for children by Alfred H. Miles. The volume is profusely illustrated with pictures by many of the best known artists of the day, and is sure to be appreciated by young people who enjoy pictures and rhymes.

"A Trip to Toyland," a picture story told by Henry Mayer, is a very clever book published just recently by Mr. Grant Richards (6s.). The many fullpage illustrations which it contains constitute the chief charm of the book, but the artist is clever with his pen as well as with pencil, and the story of the Dumpy Babe and his collection of toys is most quaintly told by Mr. Mayer. The pictures, however, are delightful. bold and sweeping outlines the artist has told his story more effectively than in his letterpress, and being reproduced in colours the drawings are doubly dear to the infant mind. How the Dumpy Babe and his toys fly off one fine night in search of Toyland, how they rested and picked daisies on the Milky Way, went for a ride on shooting stars, paid a flying visit to Saturn, rested again on sunbeams, and finally arrived in the Enchanted Land of Toys,-is all described with immense ability.

The old nursery tales never grow old, and new editions of them are always welcome. Mr. J. A. Shepherd has illustrated afresh "A Frog he would a Wooing Go" and "Who Killed Cock Robin" (G. Richards, 1s.). Many of the pictures are printed in colours and some of them are exceedingly cleverly drawn.

The old fairy tales, too, bear endless repetition. If there is a child of your acquaintance who delights in elves and dwarfs and fairies you can make him no more acceptable present than "The True Annals of Fairy-Land" (Dent, 6s.). Many of the tales are old favourites, but there are also some new ones amongst them. The volume makes a most handsome gift-book. It teems with dainty pictures from the pencil of Mr. Charles

"Wyemarke and the Mountain Fairies" (Duckworth, 3s. 6d. net) will be welcomed by those who possess the adventures of the little eleven year old girl and her cousin Marjorie in the realm of the Sea Fairies. Mr. E. H. Cooper has now peopled the Swiss Alps with mountain fairies for the benefit of Wyemarke and his little friends. Edith Farmiloe's second Christmas book, "Chapel Street Children" (G. Richards, 5s.), is a collection of tales of London life. She sketches and writes with equal facility and has a keen sense of humour. Where others can only see tales of mean streets she is able to find amusing scenes and incidents. The pictures are a great addition to the letterpress. It is a good gift-book for a child who is proof against the infection of the East End dialect.

Mr. W. T. Forster has written a slim volume of "New Fables for Boys and Girls" (C. H. Kelly). Animal life supplies the material out of which the fables are constructed, and to each tale is attached a moral rendered conspicuous by the use of large type.

The annual volume of "Bubbles" (3s. 6d.) contains no fewer than 114 full-paged coloured illustrations, and there are plenty of short interesting articles on subjects. of every description, ranging from natural history to the British Empire.

TALES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Christmas books for boys and girls vary very little from year to year. Writers of Christmas literature keep to the old paths and rarely stray into bye-ways. Several new names are becoming favourites in the nursery, but in the playground the old writers are still the most popular. Mr. Louis Becke, however, is a new-comer. His "Tom Wallis" (R.T.S., 5s.) is a fine tale of adventure in the Southern seas. Mr. Becke only needs to draw upon his own life and experience in the islands of the Pacific for an unlimited supply of adventurous incidents and episodes. His book contains eleven illustrations by Lancelot Speed.

The popular writers of juvenile fiction have naturally and inevitably turned to the Transvaal War for subjects. Mr. Manville Fenn's tale of Briton and Boer, "Charge!" (Chambers, 5s.), is a spirited story which will make a boy's blood tingle; Mr. Henty has selected Natal as the scene of his hero's trials and adventures. "With Buller in Natal; or, a Born Leader" (Blackie, 6s.) combines with Mr. Henty's usual deftness history and fiction. It is illustrated, of course, but the map is something of a novelty. Mr. Henty alone ventures to include so useful but prosaic a thing in his volume of romantic adventures. Mr. William Johnston has also been attracted by the name of Buller, but he has chosen one of that General's earlier campaigns. The characters in "One of Buller's Horse" (T. Nelson, 3s. 6d.) see much of the fighting in the Zulu War, including the fatal battle of Isandhlwana and the heroic defence of Rorke's Drift.

Mr. Henty's two new historical romances deal with the wars in Flanders and Spain, and with the army of Garibaldi in its struggle for the liberation of Italy. "In the Irish Brigade" (Blackie, 6s.) is illustrated with twelve full-page pictures by Charles M. Sheldon. "Out with Garibaldi" (5s.) is the title of Mr. Henty's Italian tale.

The history of Austria is full of adventure of the most romantic description. It is, however, unexplored country so far as the writers of boys' stories are concerned. Mr. Herbert Haynes has at last turned his attention to the Dual Empire, and out of the events of the Hungarian insurrection has made a story of thrilling interest. "Red, White and Green" (Nelson, 5s.), despite the unfamiliar names of its characters, should be popular with boys who prefer to imbibe history with a flavour of fiction.

Mr. Andrew Home has written a school story the

Mr. Andrew Home has written a school story the nature of which is sufficiently indicated by its title—
"The Story of a School Conspiracy" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.).
Mr. Guy Boothby is a prolific writer. His latest story,
"Long Live the King" (Ward, Lock, 5s.), will no doubt be eagerly devoured and quickly forgotten. It is an excellent book for a wintry afternoon.

"Ye Mariners of England" (Nelson, 6s.) is a book for a boy who is interested in the Navy. Mr. Haynes has endeavoured to form into a connected narrative the exploits of our sailors from the days of the Saxons to the Jubilee review at Spithead. He has described the men and the ships they fought in, as well as their deeds of daring. The volume is illustrated with sketches of typical ships and the portraits of famous mariners.

Miss Pollard has written an extremely interesting historical tale of the persecutions of the Spanish Inquisition in the Netherlands during the reign of Philip of Spain. "The Scarlet Judges" (Partridge, 6s.) follows closely Motley's masterly work on "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Her tale gives a graphic glimpse into the life of the period, and deals with all the famous characters and incidents of that troublous time.

A book of a very different character is Mr. H. Cornwall Legh's "Gold in the Furnace" (R.T.S., 3s. 6d.). It is a story of a girl's struggle to help her family, with an account of the trials she was compelled to undergo. It is a good, healthy story, which ends happily in the good old-fashioned way.

A pleasant, well-told story is Ethel Turner's "Three Little Maids" (Ward, Locke, 3s. 6d.). It is a brightly written, prettily illustrated tale of Australian life, with a touch of humour which adds life to the narrative.

Mrs. Molesworth's tales are always sure of a warm welcome from her wide circle of readers. "The Three Witches" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.) will make a pretty little Christmas gift for a small girl, who will appreciate the numerous illustrations as well as the letterpress.

The annuals are always acceptable presents, much appreciated by the young folks, and by many of their elders as well. They contain a vast amount of miscellaneous reading, and a vast gallery of pictures and drawings. The Sunday at Home, the Leisure Hour, the Boy's Own Annual, the Girl's Own Annual, Good Words, and Young England make handsome gift-books at Christmas time.

Hans Andersen: An Edition de Luxe.

THE Fairy Tales of Hans Andersen are the heritage of both rich and poor, but only the comparatively rich may be blessed with the superb edition just brought out in this country by Mr. Wm. Heinemann (2 vols., demy 4to, 20s. net). At the moment when we were correcting the proof-sheets for a new translation of one of the most charming of all Hans Andersen's Stories-The Snow Queen-for our Penny Series of "Books for the Bairns" -a modest edition which will be read by many thousands of children before Christmas-there came to hand an advance copy of this truly worthy edition of the Danish poet's immortal fairy tales. After "Robinson Crusoe," Hans Andersen is more popular among British bairns than any other books written for their amusement; and no better man than Mr. Brækstad could have been entrusted with the English translation. But apart from the faithfulness of the translation the great charm of this new edition will to most people lie in the superb illustrations, of which there are 240. For the first time Hans Andersen is properly illustrated, by one of his own countrymen, the greatest living Danish artist, and one who has succeeded in interpreting the true spirit and genius of the author. Hans Tegner, the artist in question, after fifteen years' labour has produced a series of drawings which are to be placed in the Danish National Museum, and which are reproduced in these two volumes by the most expensive and perfect process of woodengraving, and reproduced so well that the entertaining and fascinating charm of the pictures is enhanced rather than belittled, as is too often the case with the more modern and less costly form of photo-engraving. Mr. Edmund Gosse, who knew Hans Andersen in his later years, contributes a critical introduction to the work. As Mr. Gosse truly says: "Hans Andersen's laborious and beautiful life was the most enchanting of his fairy tales; it closed at last in honour and serenity"; and it is well that the approaching centenary of his birth should be commemorated by the issue of a monumental edition of his best work.

The Magazine of Art (Vol. 1900).

MANY questions of absorbing interest in the artistic world have occurred in the present year to give both charm and interest to the new volume of The Magazine of Art, and it is impossible to turn over the 580 pages of this most handsome publication without recognising that the magazine has played a very important part in that popularising of art of the highest and best type which has been so significant a feature of the year now drawing to a close. Here are nearly 800 choice engravings, to say nothing of all the special plates ("Rembrandt" photogravures, etc.), with which the volume is enriched. The list of literary contributors is no less distinguished than that of the artists, and it will be noted that the editor, Mr. Spielmann, has followed up his previous articles on the portraits of Tennyson, Browning, Gladstone and others, by one on the portraits of Chaucer. He has also a specially interesting paper on John Ruskin. Beautifully printed, and tastefully bound, this annual volume is one which naturally falls into the category for the comparatively more expensive but greatly-to-be-desired gift-books of the Christmas season. (Cassell, large 4to., 21s.)

In the Young Woman for November Miss Isabel Brooke-Alder publishes an interview with Miss Ada Crossley, the well-known Australian contralto.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

| BIOGRAPHY. | MISCELLANEOUS. |
|--|---|
| Bax, E. Belfort. Marat, the People's Friend. l. cr. 8vo. 353 pp. (Richards) 10/6 | Almanack and Diary for 1901. In case, (Illustrated by Ethel Larcombe.) (Dent) net 1/ |
| Brooke, Stopford. A. Tennyson; His Art and Relation to Modern Life. In two volumes. cap. 8vo. 254 pp. and 254 pp. [Isbister] net 2/6
How, F. D. Archbishop Plunket, med. 8vo. 262 pp [[Lighister]] 15/0 | Sampson Low and Co.) net 2/6 Byrde, R. A. High Aims at School. cr. 8vo. 134 pp |
| Norvius, F. de. Les Milliardaires Americains, paper, 393 pp. 100 paper, 100 p | Lacombe, Paul. La Guerre et l'Homme. paper. 411 pp. 17, Rue Cujas, Paris 3 fr. 50 c
Lucy, Henry W. The Law and Practice of General Elections. 40 pp. |
| Page, Jesse. Alfred the Great. cr. 8vo. 304 pp(Partridge) 2/0 Purcell. Edmund S. Life and Letters of Ambrose Phillipps de Lisle. | Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." Gem Edition, 171 pp |
| In two volumes. dy. 8vo. 422 pp. and 382 pp (Macmillan) net 25/0 Rosebery, Lord. Napoleon; The Last Phase, med. 8vo. 261 pp. (A. L. Humphreys) 7/0 | Pitman's Year Book for 1901. cap, 8vo |
| ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES. | Rotch, A. Lawrence. Sounding the Ocean of Air. cr. 8vo. 184 pp. (S.P.C.K.) 2/0 |
| Fitzgerald, Edward. Miscellanies. cr. 8vo. 206 pp. (Macmillan) net 2/6 Morris, William. Architecture and History, and Westminster Abbey. cr. 8vo. 50 pp | Ryder, Maxwell. Elocution and Stage Training. l. cr. 8vo. 232 pp. (T. Burleigh) net 5/Shaw, Bernard. Fabianism and the Empire. paper. 107 pp |
| FICTION. | Thomson, Clara, and E. E. Speight. The Junior Temple Reader. |
| A. M. F. On the Banks of the Seine. 1. cr. 8vo. 296 pp | cr. 8vo. 402 pp |
| Bridgman-Metcham, D. Atlantis; the Book of the Angels. roy. 8vo. | NEW EDITIONS. |
| 462 pp | Carr, J. A. Life-Work of Archbishop Benson. cr. 8vo. 273 pp |
| (Macimian, 6/5 | Caxton, William. The Golden Legend. Vols. V. and VI. cap 8vo. |
| Carrel, Frederic. The Realisation of Justus Moran. l. cr. 8vo.
310 pp | 257 pp. and 274 pp |
| Crawford, F. Marion. In the Palace of the King. cr. 8vo. 363 pp. | (H. Marshall) 1/0 |
| Cromarty, Deas. The Heart of Babylon. l. cr. 8vo. 238 pp | Gaskell, Mrs. Cranford. cap. 8vo. 263 pp |
| Crommelin, May. The Luck of a Lowland Laddie. 320 pp. cr. 8vo. | Hume, Fergus. The Silent House in Pimlico. paper. 124 pp |
| Dudeney, Mrs. Henry. Men of Marlowes. l. cr. 8vo. 288 pp | Macaulay, Lord. Essays, Vol. II., Temple Classics. cap. 8vo. |
| Ellis, Havelock. The Nineteenth Century. cr. 8vo. 166 pp | 480 pp |
| Everett, Yorick, The House of Giants. 1, cr. 8vo. 376 pp | Newman, Geo., M.P. Bacteria, I. cr. 8vo. 397 pp(Murray) 6/c
Porter, Jane. The Scottish Chiefs. dy. 8vo. 564 pp(Deat) net 5/o
The Journal of John Woolman. (New Century Edition.) cr. 8vo. |
| (Ward, Lock) 3/6
Heppenstall, R. H. The Malice of Grace Wentworth, 1, cr. 8vo. | Thomson, Mortimer. The Divine Comedy of Patriotism, cr. 8vo. |
| 320 pp | 320 pp |
| Hodder and Stoughton 6/0 Lynch, Hannah. Clare Monro. cr. 8vo. 184 pp | POETRY. |
| Marsh, Richard. A Hero of Romance. cr. 8vo. 317 pp | Abbott, G. F. Songs of Modern Greece. cr. 8vo. 307 pp |
| Merrick, Leonard. The Worldlings. 1. cr. 8vo. 342 pp(Murray) 6/0
Norway, Arthur H. Parson Peter. 1. cr. 8vo. 392 pp(Murray) 6/0
Parker, Gilbert. The Lane that had no Turning. cr. 8vo. 314 pp. | Rutter, JThe Nineteenth Century. I. cr. 8vo. 315 pp |
| Piercey, Annie M. A Japanese Maiden. cap. 8vo. 95 pp | Dixon, Charles. The Story of the Birds. cr. 8vo. 304 pp. (G. Allen) |
| Radford, Dollie. The Poet's Larder. cap. 8vo. 171 pp | Donald, R. New London Boroughs. paper. 76 pp |
| Short, R. Saronia, I. cr. 8vo. 258 pp. (Arrowsmith) 0/6 | Greenwood, Thomas. British Library Year Book, 1900-1901. cr. 8vo. 345 pp |
| Ward Lock 6/2 | Hutchinson, H. N. Living Races of Mankind. In 18 parts. Part I. 32 pp. Profusely Illustrated. (Hutchinson) net 0/1 |
| Stephens, R. N. Philip Winwood. cr. 8vo. 412 pp | Report on Changes in Rates of Wages and Hours of Labour in the |
| Upward, Allen. The Wrongdoer. paper. cr. 8vo. 196 pp | U. K. 1899 (Board of Trade). 293 pp(Eyre and Spottiswoode) 1/6
Snailum, W. W. Fifteen Studies in Book-Keping. cr. 8vo. 300 pp.
(Cambridge University Press) pp. 3/ |
| Vachell, H. A. John Charity. I. cr. 8vo. 326 pp(Murray 6/0
Ward, Mrs. Humphrey. Eleanor. cr. 8vo. 504 pp(Smith, Elder 6/0
Yonge, Charlotte M. Modern Broods. I. cr. 8vo. 316 pp | Cambridge University Press) net 3/4 The Extra-Parliamentary Hansard. Vol. I. October 1800-Sept. 1000 med. 8vo. 837 pp |
| HISTORY AND TRAVEL. | RELIGIOUS. |
| Colquhoun, A. R. The Renascence of South Africa. cr. 8vo. 300 pp. | Coote, Sir A. Bible Helps for Busy Men. cr. 8vo. 123 pp. (H. Marshall) net 2/6 |
| Doyle, Dr. A. Conan. The Great Boer War. I post 8vo. With mare | Cresswell, R. H. The Liturgy of "the Apostolic Constitutions." |
| 532 Pp. Sir W. W. A History of British India. med. 8vo. 449 pp. Moore, A. W. A History of the Isla of May (Longmans) 16/0 | Granger, Frank. The Soul of a Christian. cr. 8vo. 303 pp. (Methuen) 6/6 |
| dy. 8vo. 1 cent pp. | Hitchcock, F. R. H. St. Augustine's City of God. cr. 8vo. 114 pp. (S.P.C.K.) Mead, G. R. S. Fragments of a Faith Forgotten. med. 8vo. 630 pp. |
| Whishaw, Fred. A Hunter's Log in Russia. cr. 8vo. 268 pp. (Dent) net 3/6 Worsfold, Basil. The Story of Egypt. cap. 8vo. 225 pp. (Dent) net 3/6 | Theosophical Publishing Society) net volt Russell, R. Religion and Life. cr. 8vo. 210 pp[Longmans] net 2/6
Sincloir, Archdescop. "Unto You Young Men." cr. 8vo. 248 pp. |
| (H. Marshall) net 1/6 | (Richards, 3/6 |

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

EVEN a year ago who would have supposed that to-day one of our difficulties would be the number of reports upon International Correspondence, making it difficult to give each one proper notice? On my table lie four magazines, neither of which has given less than two pages to the question. True, the journals are for October, but then each promises a continuation for November, which has not reached me at the time of writing.

"THE SCHOOL WORLD,"

Mr. Neville Ross was much struck by the ease and correctness with which boys and girls of fourteen in a Bürgerschule in North Germany read English. He comments upon the fact that in times past our own language was considered sufficient for business matters, as other nations learnt it in order to do business with us. But we no longer have the undisputed command of the markets, and the foreigner who has learnt the value of a command of languages is now pushing his trade over half the world, whilst we are only half-hearted in our efforts to do the same. From this premiss he argues upon the value of International Correspondence. It is unnecessary to give here his arguments in its favour. With regard to possible objections, this experienced teacher remarks :-"Some teachers fear the introduction of harmful and vicious ideas; but even if one admits—which I utterly refuse to do-that the mere fact of being foreign is synonymous with being vicious, surely any boy of any nationality would be incapable of writing anything harmful to a mere correspondent." Mr. Ross then speaks of the greater danger of illustrated papers, and disposes of that by the fact that all communications are sent to the school address, gives his own plans for prevention, and also for the sustenance of the scholar's interest in the exchange of letters.

"PRACTICAL TEACHER."

Some of our readers know that when M. Mieille first suggested that we should organise a plan for scholars, he at the same time secured the interest of the editor of the Practical Teacher in a seheme of exchange of letters between teachers. Consequently M. Mieille's interesting papers appear always in this journal, and in October and November deal with the International Congresses of Education in Paris. He gives a summary of the programme, comments upon the significance of such gatherings-and the spirit of enthusiasm, inquiry, courtesy -in a word teachableness-of the members, and points out the special virtues of the different systems : the selfgovernment of British secondary schools; thoroughness of German; and splendid State organisation and inspection of the French system. The collaboration of men and women teachers, as in Scotland, America, and Sweden, provoked a most lively and interesting discussion. Those interested in education who do not read French will appreciate M. Mieille's articles.

"REVUE UNIVERSITAIRE."

M. Max Leclerc, the head of the great publishing house, Armand Colin, Rue de Mézières, Paris, having instigated and in every way encouraged the Congress on Secondary Education which met in August at the Sorbonne, the report given in the journal published by him is naturally of exceeding interest, and this interest is increased by the delightful way in which M. Berenger treats his subject. I refer my readers to the October number, quoting only the vote after the discussion of International Correspondence and M. Berenger's concluding words :-"This assembly leaves behind the noble comforting experience that during its sitting, Socialism and Conservatism have debated peacefully, liberty of thought and Catholicism have rubbed elbows. America, Asia, and Europe have exchanged experiences, and men and women have co-operated on the same footing towards the better building up of the child. The first faint outline maybe of a more beautiful future." The unanimous vote was thus recorded :- "This Congress, considering that the scheme of the Scholars' International Correspondence. undertaken by private persons and carried out under conditions proved suitable by the experience of three years, constituting a precious auxiliary not only to the acquirement of modern languages, but also to the general culture of the mind and international relations, expresses the hope that all scholastic authorities will encourage by every means the development of the plan."

REPORT OF THE GERMAN BUREAU.

Just as German education is more thorough, consecutive, and penetrating than ours, so their conception of the correspondence is more grave than with us. Hence a series of rules which I must some day give in their entirety-just mentioning here that one rule is "To prevent misunderstanding the sending of comic postcards and literature of all sorts is prohibited to the scholar, unless he has first shown the same to his teacher or parents and received their permission." Is not this rule a good one for us to follow? One of the pages contains a letter from a German schoolmaster, in which he says: "The greatest gain of the International Correspondence is this-that between two nations, which have for so long counted themselves enemies, a new bond of friendship is being formed. One can well understand that the exchange of friendly letters concerns not only the individuals themselves, but creates a gradually widening circle of influence. As an example I quote from a letter from France received by one of my boys:-"J'attendais avec impatience une lettre d'Allemagne. C'est hier soir que j'ai reçu votre lettre. On m'a remise au réfectoire pendant la souper. En voyant qu'elle venait d'Allemagne mes camarades se sont tous écriés: 'Oh! qu'il a de la chance! il a un corre-spondant allemand.'" The master comments upon this great gain, and says truly, "Who, a few years ago, would have predicted such a letter from a French boy to a German lad?"

GOOD NEWS FOR COMPETING CANDIDATES.

Alas! I have little space left; yet in my hand is a precious pamphlet to be obtained at Nutt's, in the Strand, and published by Delalain, of Paris, called "Simplification of French Syntax." Surely every scholar in France, and many in other countries, will record a vote of thanks to M. Leygues, the French Minister of Public Instruction, who proclaims such good news for scholars. For example, who that has ever had before him an examination paper containing such words as cauliflowers, capitals, passports, and vainly sought to remember where and how to put the plural, will not welcome the rule that such words in the future may be taken as one; with the plural sign at the end of the word only, or that instead of four different rules which must decide whether the four letters of the little word "gens" make a masculine or a feminine noun, we may now comfortably conclude it to be always feminine.

Th

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Art Annual.-H. VIRTUE. 28. 6d.

The Work of the War Artists in South Africa. Illustrated. A. C. R. Carter.

"The four extra plates contained in this number have been chosen to prove the high standard reached in the illustration of the war by representative black and white artists. Mr. Caton Woodville's record of work is an astonishing display of industry and gifted facility, and the fine subject, 'Their Ordeal of Fire,' is in every way worthy of his powers. In Mr. Frank Craig's 'Holly Communion on the Veldt,' the young artist has sought inspiration from the most solemn ceremony known to men.

A return is made to the grim actuality of war in Mr. John Charlton's 'Cavalry crossing a Drift.' This well-known painter of the horse has a subject here into which he has put much of his experienced study, and in every case the trooper's mount is drawn to the life.

Our frontispiece, 'Colonel Plumer's Attempt to Relieve Mafeking,' is drawn by Mr. Frank Dadd. The drawing is alive with movement, and the figures of the troopers of the Rhodesian Horse, whether scorning or using cover, are powerfully realised."

Art Journal.-H. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. Nov.

Frontispiece: "In the Time of Peace," after R. G. Hutchison. R. Gemmell Hutchison. Illustrated. Gabriel Setoun. Some Prints in Colours. Illustrated. J. H. Slater. The Decoration of London Restaurants. Illustrated. F. Miller. The Artistic Position of Du Maurier. Illustrated. L. Lusk.

"Other men have drawn beautiful and distinguished women, but the idealisation of a gentlewoman was a feat accomplished by Du Maurier as no one else has accomplished it. Therefore, if for that alone, the study of his whole work may be justly called a polite education for one whose opportunities are few, and the dignity of this quality is reflected upon many of his other types. It is true that when he set himself to present a woman who was not a lady he succeeds partially. It was easier for Keene to draw a lady than for Du Maurier to draw one who was not, though difficult for both. The Grande Dame is, in fact, so rare that she belongs rather to Romance than to Reality, and that is why Du Maurier renders her so completely. In this he is consistent with his finest instincts, and surely it is no mean niche to have made for himself in the Temple of Fame, that he should be among the greatest of those who have rendered the gentlewomen should be among the greatest of those who have rendered the gentlewoman

Mr. Kempe's Painted Glass Windows. Illustrated. C. Quentin.

Artist.-Constable, 18, Oct.

Claude Monet. Illustrated. W. Dewhurst. Glass and Ceramic Industry at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. W. Fred.

W. Fleu.
The National Competition, 1900. Illustrated.
Subject in English Painting. R. de La Sizeranne.
The Pencil Drawings of G. W. Collins. Illustrated.
Philip de Wispelaere, Wood-Carver, Illustrated.
W. H. Cooper's Designs for Electric Light Fittings. Illustrated.

Atlantic Monthly .- Oct.

John Ruskin as an Art Critic. C. H. Moore.

Century Magazine,-Nov.

H. C. Anderson; a New Sculptor. Illustrated. Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer.

Chautauguan .- Oct.

Masterpieces of the French Revolution. Illustrated.

Critic.-Oct.

Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelites. Illustrated. Elizabeth L.

Caricaturists caricatured. Illustrated. Concluded. R. Hughes.

Great Thoughts .- Nov.

George Tinworth ; Interview. Illustrated. W. Durban.

Harmsworth Magazine.-Oct.

Our Doré Gallery; How the Pictures were painted. Illustrated.

Library.-Sept.

Two Notes on Art Libraries. W. H. J. Weale. King Charles I.'s Embroidered Bible. Illustrated. C. Davenport.

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 18. 4d. Nov.

Frontispiece :- "Miss Charlotte Peirse," after Romney. Mr. William Roberts writes:—"Romney may, in fact, be still said to lead in the matter of price. The beautiful portrait of Charlotte Peirse born in 1780, married in 1797 to Inigo Freeman Thomas, of Ratton, Sussex, and died at Lisbon in 1800, painted when a young girl in white muslin fress, blue sash, and large hat, the strings of which she holds in her hands, walking in a landscape (canus of 3 in. by 47 in., is one of the most charming pictures which even Romney ever painted; and 7000 guiness, at which Mr. Martin Colnaghi acquired it, is by no means a high amount as Romneys go nowadays."

The Grands Prix for Painting at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Frantz.

Lacquered Furniture at Buckingham Palace, Illustrated, F. S. Robinson.

Charles John Allen, Sculptor. Illustrated, E. R. Dibdin. Picture Sales of the Season. Illustrated. W. Roberts.

Studies by Ldward Stott; Illustrations. Gems of the Wallace Collection. Illustrated.

The National Competitions. Illustrated. Harold Nelson. Illustrated. A. F

Recent Acquisitions at the National Gallery and at the Scottish National Portrait Gallery. Illustrated.

Monthly Review .- Nov.

Some Chinese Masterpieces. Illustrated. C. J. Holmes.

New Ireland Review .- Nov.

Sandro Botticelli. W. P. Coyne.

Nineteenth Century.-Nov.

The Van Eycks. W. H. James Weale.

North American Review.-Oct.

The Picture Gallery of the Hermitage. Continued. Claude Phillips.

Northern Counties Magazine .- Oct.

Aspects of Modern Art. Sir W. Eden. Nov.

On Modern Painting. O. Sickert.

Pearson's Magazine.-Nov.

The Art of the Age. Illustrated. Continued.

Poster .- I, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND. 6d. Sept. Paris Exhibition Notes. Illustrated. C. Hiatt. Ancient Advertising. Continued. E. Wenlock.

Lettering. E. F. Strange. Richard Ranft. Illustrated.

The Salle Caillebotte at the Luxembourg. Illustrated. C. Hiatt.

Railway Magazine,-Nov.

Artistic Railway Posters. Illustrated. W. G. Gwennett, Scribner's Magazine.-Nov.

Two Old Masters in Mexico. Illustrated. S. Baxter.

Sunday Strand,-Nov.

William Holman Hunt, Illustrated, R. de Cordova,

Temple Bar.—Nov.
Some Recollections of a Sketcher. H. F. Abell.

Westminster Review.-Nov.

The Art of the Brothers Van Eyck. Katherine W. Elwes.

Young Woman.-Nov.

A Gallery of Fair Artists. With Portraits.

In the October number of the Revue de l'Art the series of articles on Art and the Arts and Crafts at the Paris Exhibition is continued. They include Foreign Painting, Bookbinding, Ironwork, etc.

505

ing

)nnd nd nd he ne

ote

at ce.

er

99 1e

al

es

re

e

a 11-

S

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Ainslee's Magazine. - International News Co. 10 cents. Oct. Kwang Hsu and the Empress Dowager. Illustrated. I. T. Headland. The Eastward Migration of Oriental Peoples. Illustrated. F. M. Todd. Mrs. Potter Palmer. Illustrated. Caroline Kirkland.

American Catholic Quarterly Review.—Burns and Oates.
4 dols. per ann. Oct.

A Commission on the Greek Ordinal in the Seventeenth Century, Abbot F. A. Gasquet.
Lord Russell of Killowen. Rev. G. McDermott.
St. Francis of Assisi and the Religious Revival in the Thirteenth Century.
Father Cuthbert.

Some Heterodoxies and Inconsistencies of Russian Orthodoxy. Rev. R.

Parsons. The Two Kenricks; Their Early Environment. J. J. O'Shea.
Anglo-Saxonism and Catholic Progress. B. J. Clinch.
The Story of the Scottish Reformation. Dom M. Barrett.
Proposed Reformation of the Calendar by the Russian Astronomers. D.
O'Sullivan.

Virgins consecrated to God in Rome during the First Centuries. Mgr. J. A. Campbell.

The Catholic Church in Its Relation to Material Progress. Rev. R. F.

American Historical Review.-Macmillan. 3s. 6d. Oct. The English and Dutch Towns of New Netherland, A. E. McKinley. Some Political Aspects of Homestead Legislation. J. B. Sanborn. The Buford Expedition to Kansas. W. L. Fleming. The Guiana Boundary. G. L. Burr. Diary of John Harrower, 1773–1776.

Angio-American Magazine. -- 60, Wall Street, New York. 25 cents. Oct.

Roosevelt; the Representative American. G. B. Chandler.
Modern Fiction. Concluded. E. Ridley.
Quivera; the History and Legends of an Ancient American Kingdom.
Continued. E. E. Blackman.
Hawaii First. Illustrated. Dr. E. S. Goodhue.
The Canadian Royalty in the Yukon. Continued. W. H. Lynch.

Antiquary .- ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. Nov. All Souls' Day in Italy. Miss E. C. Vansittart.
Notes on St. Mary Cray Church. Illustrated. J. Russell Larkby.
Quarterly Notes on Roman Britain. Continued.
Neolithic Man; His Ideas and Their Evidences.
Fishwick's History of Preston. Illustrated.
Diary of Journeys in England, and between Ireland and England in 1761 and 1762. Continued. G. Bowles.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. 1s. Oct.
Architecture of the Past in South Africa. Illustrated. A. H. Reid.
Modern House Designs. Illustrated, Beresford Pite.
The Great Mosque, Damascus. Illustrated. Continued. R. Phené

The Great Mosque, Spiers.
Spiers.
Blickling Hall and Church. Illustrated.
The Tower and Its Latest Addition. Illustrated. J. C. Paget.
Fountains, Illustrated. F. Hamilton Jackson.

Arena.—GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. Oct.

The Antithesis of True Expansion. E. V. Long.
Imperialism: Its Strength and Weakness. Albert Heston Coggins.
Imperialism in Historic Evolution. George Warren Kenney.
Imperialism of Manhood? Joseph Dana Miller.
Militarism or Manhood? Joseph Dana Miller.
Bryan as a Soldier. C. F. Beck.
Philadelphia's Election Frauds. Clinton Rogers Woodruff.
The Futility of Anti-Trust Legislation. A. G. Wall.
The Education of Indians. Elaine Goodale Eastman.
The Artistic Impulse in Man and Woman. E. A. Randall.
The Secret of the Modern Hebrew's Immortality. Ezra S. Brudno.
Jewish Contributions to Science and the Future of the Jews. Rev. A.
Kingsley Glover. Arena.-GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. Oct.

Argosy.—George Allen. 1s. Oct.

Letters from the North. Illustrated. Continued. Charles W. Wood.
The London of Chaucer's Time. F. Rinder.
Concerning Sussex Folk. Christina B. Knox.
Balliol College, Oxford. Illustrated. H. W. C. Davis.
Some Famous Theatrical Riots. N. Williams.

Nov. Heroines in Fiction, H. A. Spurr.
Letters from the North. Illustrated. Continued. C. W. Wood.
Erasenose College. Illustrated. Rev. I. G. Smith.
The Dictionary of National Biography. H. Ellis,
Electioneering in England. Asiatic Quarterly Review, -ORIENTAL INSTITUTE, WOKING. 58. Oct.

The Desirability of a Definite Recognition of the Religious Element in Government Education in India. R. Maconachie. The Garton Lectures on Indian and Colonial Agriculture in Edinburgh University. Prof. R. Wallace.

The Garton Lectures on Indian and Colonial Agriculture in Edinburgh University. Prof. R. Wallace.

The Chinese Imbroglio and How to get out of It. E. H. Parker.

Missionary Troubles in China. Taw Sein Ko.

The Sultan and Central Africa. S. H. Fitzjohn.

A Glimpse at the Gold Coast. H. Bindloss.

Was Abdu-R-Kahim', the Translator of Babar's Memoirs into Persian?

Continued. H. Beveridge.

British Land Policy in India (as regards Landlords). B. H. Baden-Powell.

The Cathayans. E. H. Parker.

Siamese Intercourse with China. Major G. E. Gerini.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. Oct.

The Crisis in China. James B. Angell.
The Crisis in China. James B. Angell.
The Capture of a Slaver. J. Taylor Wood.
Some Old-Fashioned Doubts about New-Fashioned Education.
Finding the First Dynasty Kings., Canon H. D. Rawnsley.
Some Letters of Martineau.
The Seven Lean Years; Western Farms and Eastern Investors. Referee.
A Letter from New Zealand. John Christie.
Our Immigrants and Ourselves. Kate Holladay, Claghorn.
A Plea for American Needlecraft. Ada Sterling.
Voting by Mail. Edw. Stanwood.

Badminton Magazine. HEINEMANN IS. Nov. Some Scenes in the Highlands. Illustrated. A. I. Shand. Hunting in Brittany. Illustrated. J. L. Randall. A Day with "The King's Otter Hounds," Illustrated. W. Browne. Sportsmen in Purple. H. Macfarlane. Horses that I have known, Illustrated. R. A. Blagden. More Continental Sportsmen. D. B. Varé.

Bankers' Magazine.-WATERLOW. 18, 6d. Nov. The Report of the Post Office and the Hints It contains for Bankers. Railway Pension Funds. Loyalty among Bankers.

Bibliotheca Sacra.—Kegan Paul. 75 cents. Oct.
Competence of Imagination to serve the Truth. E. H. Johnson.
The Church at Antioch. J. M. Stifler.
Fifty Years of Baptist History. Henry Clay Vedder.
Fifty Years of Baptist History. Henry Clay Vedder.
The Title "The Son of Man." Milton G. Evans.
The Resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ the Central Fact in Christianity.
Henry G. Weston.
Savonarola and Jesus. Rev. J. W. Buckham.
The Appeal to Reason. Rev. Joseph Evans Sagebear.
Theology in Terms of Personal Relation. Prof. Henry Churchill King.
The Future of China. G. Frederick Wright. Bibliotheca Sacra. - KEGAN PAUL. 75 cents. Oct.

Blackwood's Magazine. -BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. Nov.

Army Reorganisation. Army Reorganisation.
An Autumn Day's Sport near Peking.
Our Soldiers. Linesman.
The Cinque Ports.
The Rival "Foreign Devils." Col. H. Knollys. The Way Operations in South Africa.

Musings without Method. Continued.

On the Move with Buller; Spitz Kop, Sept. 16.

After the Annexation. The New Parliament.

Bookman.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Oct. What I think of the "Master Christian"; Symposium. Andrew Lang. With Portraits. W. Pett Ridge.

Bookman .- (America.) Dodd, Mead and Co., New York. 25 cents. Oct.

Plagiarism—Real and Apparent. Continued. Bunford Samuel. The Blumine of "Sartor Resartus." E. S. Nadal, An American Impression of the New Grub Street. Edgar Fawcett, The Bachelor in Fiction. P. Pollard.

James Lane Allen's Country. Illustrated, A. B. Maurice.

Canadian Magazine.—Ontario Publishing Co., Toronto.
25 cents. Oct. The Jason of Algoma; the Wonderful Industrial Development in New Ontario. Illustrated. Principal Grant.
The Canoe Meet of 1900. Illustrated. D. J. Howell.
The Wild Fowl of Ontario. Illustrated. Continued. C. W. Nash.
Shooting the Wilson Snipe. Illustrated. R. Gourlay.
Government Ownership of Railways. Continued. R. L. Richardson.
Parent and Teacher. Agnes Deans Cameron.

506

Th

Ele

He

Sui Sui

Th

-14

Bo Par A

Po Th

Ch

Re Ri Wi

Pri Le

Th Br Hi

Co

Th

Sai

Captain .- George Newnes. 6d. Nov.

Concerning Fireworks. Illustrated. J. A. Kay. The Chinese Public School-Boy. Illustrated. A. Collins.

55. nt in Uni-

ian?

-11

y.

Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. 6d. Nov. Cassell's Magazine,—Cassell, od. Nov.

The Building of a Great Telescope. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
London Omnibuses. Illustrated. W. B. Robertson.
Quaint and Comic Vanes. Illustrated. R. Machray Liners in Time of War. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.
Town and Gown Rows at Oxford. Illustrated. M. R. Roberts.

Cassier's Magazine.—33, Bedford Street, Strand. 1s. Oct.
The Paris Exhibition: Machine Tools, Cranes, Boilers and Engines. Illustrated. Joseph Horner.
Electric Cables for High-Tension Service. Illustrated. William Maver,

How to make Gold-Dredging pay. Illustrated. A. W. Robinson.
Transition to Electric Power. Alton D. Adams.
Recent American Steam-Engine Practice. Illustrated. James B. Stan-wood.

Some Gearing for Electric Motors. Illustrated. Alfred H. Gibbings.
Water-Cooling Towers. Illustrated. J. A. Reavell.
Suction Air Chamber for Pumps. Illustrated. F. Meriam Wheeler.

Century Magazine, -MACMILLAN, 15, 4d. Nov. My Midwiner Garden, Illustrated, M. Thompson,
Our Schools for the Stage, Illustrated, B. Howard,
The Education of Sam (Dog), C. D. Warner,
A Yankee Correspondent in South Africa, Illustrated, J. Ralph,
The New York Zoological Park, Illustrated, W. T. Hornaday, Daniel Webster, Illustrated, J. R. MacMaster,
The Problem of the Philippines, Bishop Potter.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 7d. Nov. Cuba as a Field for Emigration. Cuba as a Field for Emigration.
Legal Shreds and Patches.
The Weaving of "Turkey" Carpets in Donegal. Mary Gorges.
Bonifacio; a Quaint Town of Corsica.
Parliamentary Anecdotes of Sir William Harcourt.
A Question of Industrial Supremacy. J. Burnley.

, Chautauquan.-Chautauqua Press, Cleveland, Ohio. 20 cents. Oct.

Pioneer Women of Acadia. Illustrated. Mary Sifton Pepper.
Political Clubs during the French Revolution. J. W. Perrin.
The Rivalry of Nations. Illustrated. E. A. Start.
A Reading Journey from Gibraltar to Alexandria. Illustrated. Marie Jadwin.
The Song of Roland. F. M. Warren.
The Inner Life of Fénelon. C. M. Stuart.

Church Missionary Intelligencer, -Church Missionary Society.

Archdeacon Moule. China and its Future. Bishop Peel in East Africa. Church Missions in the Far East. Mrs. Bishop.

Church Quarterly Review .- Spottiswoode. 6s. Oct.

Recent New Testament Commentaries. Ritschlianism and Church Doctrine. Ritschlianism and Church Doctrine.
William Morvis.
Principal Caird's "Fundamental Ideas of Christianity."
The Church of England in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries.
Lecky's Map of Life.
The New Dictionary of the Bible, Vol. III,
Dr. Gasquet and the Old English Bible.
A Review of Irish History.
Some Modern Writers on the Atonement.
The Passion Play.

Classical Review .- DAVID NUTT. 18. 6d. Oct. The Platonic Letters. Continued. H. Richards.

Contemporary Review. - COLUMBUS CO. 28. 6d. Nov. The American Presidential Election. Dr. Albert Shaw. Bryanism. Sydney Brooks. Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley. Higher Elementary Schools. Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley. The Closing Exhibition. Patrick Geddes. Concerning South African Settlers. Arnold White. Virgil and the Divine Pastoral. Countess Martinengo Cesaresco. India; an Empire Adrift. Vaughan Nash. The Movement for Reform Within the Catholic Church. Fidelis. Gas Light. Ex Fumo Lucem. The Street-Trading Children of Liverpool. Thomas Burke. Steinitz and other Chess-Players. Antony Guest. The Position in Italy. Bolton King.

The Patriotic Election—and After. J. A. Spender.

Corphill Magazine.—Sauth. Elder. 15. Nov. The American Presidential Election. Dr. Albert Shaw.

Cornhill Magazine. - SMITH, ELDER. 15. Nov. Cornhill Magazine,—SMITH, ELDER. 18. Nov.

In the Early Forties. George M. Smith.
San Ildefonso. Mrs. Margaret L. Woods.
Sarsfield. R. Barry O'Brien.
Sea-Fishing Memories. F. G. Aflalo.
The Great Fur Company To-Day. Beckles Willson.
Of Some of the Causes Which led to the Siege of the Foreign Legations at Peking. Rev. Roland Allen.
Wou-San-Kwei; a Great Chinese Satrap. Demetrius C. Boulger.
French Wit in the Eighteenth Century. S. G. Tallentyre.

Cosmopolitan.-International News Co. 6d. Oct. The Organisation of the Russian Army. Illustrated. Lieut. W. C. Rivers.

Kivers.
The American Colony in Paris. Illustrated. W. G. Robinson.
The Inspection of a Railway. Illustrated. Cromwell Childe.
The African Boer. Continued. Olive Schreiner.
The U.S. Navy Fifty Years from Now. W. E. Chandler.
Some New Members of the Comédie Française. Illustrated. Emil.
Friend.

Some New Members of the Comedie Française. Illustrated. F. Friend.
Offshore Whaling in the Bay of Monterey. Illustrated. Edward Berwick.
How Indian Baskets are made. Illustrated. Helen M. Carpenter.
The Care of the Teeth. Arthur De Voe.
The Hygiene of Sleep. Dr. C. Edson.
How Honour and Justice may be taught in the Schools. E. S. Holden.

Critic.-G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK. 20 cents. Oct.

"Ralph Connor." With Portrait. One Who knows Him. Furness's Edition of Shakespeare. W. J. Rolfe. Furness's Edition of Shakespeare. W. J. Conspiracy as a Fine Art. Andrew Lang.

Dial.—315, WARRAN,
The Architecture of the Mind.
Nietzsche and His Philosophy.
Oct. 16. Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Oct 1.

A Century of American Verse.

Dublin Review .- BURNS AND OATES. 6s. Oct. Dr. Martineau on the Notes of the Church. X. Y. Z. Physical Science versus Matter and Form; a Rejoinder. Rev. C. Aherne. The Irish Church from the Danish to the Anglo-Norman Invasion. Rev. E. A. D'Alton.

Theology and Modern Thought. Rev. W. H. Kent. Scientific Speculation and the Unity of Truth. R. E. Froude.

Economic Review. - RIVINGTONS. 3s. Oct. How far is Pauperism a Necessary Element in a Civilised Community? T. How far is Pauperism a Necessary Element in a Civilised Community? T. Mackay.

Elements of the Housing Problem. Mrs. L. Fisher.

Famines in India. F. C. Channing.

Economic Theory among the Greeks and Romans. Miss E. Simey.

Gambling and Aids to Gambling. C. E. B. Russell and E. T. Campagnac Practicable Temperance Reforms. Reformer.

How We became a Nation of Shopkeepers. Miss Alice Law.

Edinburgh Review .- Longmans. 6s. Oct.

The War in South Africa. M. Rostand and the Literary Prospects of the Drama. The Completion of Italian Unity, 1861-1871. The Works of Lord Byron. Hermann yon Helmholtz. Hermann von Helmholtz.
Municipal Trading.
The Roman Conquest of Gaul.
China and International Questions,
The Restoration Régime in Scotland.
The Sick and Wounded in South Africa.
The General Election.

Educational Review .- J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. Oct. Relation of Woman to the Trades and Professions. W. T. Harris.
The Cuban Teachers at Harvard. R. Clamp.
Transportation of Rural School Children at Public Expense. A. A. Transportation of Rural School Children at Public Ex Upham. Principals' Reports on Teachers. F. L. Soldan. The Big Red Schoolhouse. Elizabeth M. Howe. Democracy and Education in England. W. G. Field. Recent Italian Educational Literature. A. F. Chamberlain.

Educational Times. -89, FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. Nov. The Teaching of Patriotism. Dr. J. J. Findlay.

Engineering Magazine. -222, STRAND. 18. Oct. ? The World's Need of Coal and the United States Supplies. F. E. Saward. National Ideals the Prime Influence in Iron-Trade Development, H. J.

Skelton,
Mining Methods in the Connellsville Coke Region. Illustrated. F. C.
Keighley.
Electric-Power Distribution in Great Britain. W. H. Booth,
The Use of Water Powers by Direct Air Compression.
W. O. Webber.
Centralisation of the Steam-Condensing Plant. Illustrated. H. G. V.

Oldham.
Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. Hugo Diémer.
The Thousand-Miles Automobile Trials. Illustrated. W. W. Beaumont.

Engineering Times .- P. S. King. 6d. Oct.

The Tsar's Yacht Standart. Illustrated.
On the Use of Liquid Fuel in Locomotives. Illustrated. James Holden.
Modern Methods of Saving Labour in Gasworks. Illustrated. Continued.
C. E. Brackenbury. Their Construction and Management. Illustrated. P. R. Björling.

Pumps: Their Construction and Management. Illustrated. P. R. Björling. Paris Exhibition, 2900. Illustrated. Continued. Recent Improvements in Electro-Galvanising. Illustrated. S. Cowper-

English Historical Review .- Longmans. 5s. Oct. English historical Review.—LONGMANS, 5s. Oct.

Customs of the Western Pyrenees. A. R. Whiteway.
Colchester and the Commonwealth. J. H. Round.
The Foreign Policy of England under Walpole. Continued. B. Williams.
Nelson at Naples. Capt. A. T. Mahan.
Byzantines and Arabs in the Time of the Early Abbasids. E. W. Brooks.
Notes on the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. Sir H. H. Howorth.
The Laws of Breteuil. Continued. Miss Mary Bateson.

English Illustrated Magazine .- 198, STRAND. 6d. Nov. English Austrated magrazine.—198, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Some Extraordinary Auctions. Illustrated. G. A. Wade. In a Moorish Market. Illustrated. The Queerest Streets in England. Illustrated. W. A. G. The Myers Collection at Eton College Museum. Illustrated. W. M. Webb. Eighteenth-Century Duels, Illustrated. R. Machray.

Englishwoman's Review .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 18. Oct. The Closing Century; Its Losses and Its Gains, Women and the War.
Women's Congresses in Paris,

Etude.-T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. Oct. Common Sense in Music. J. S. van Cleve.

The Reproduction of Orchestral Effects on the Pianoforte. E. R. Kroeger.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. Oct. Is the "Song of Songs" a Mystical Poem? Rev. M. Kaufmann Recent Criticism of the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Pr Prof. G. G. Findlay

The Bible of the Jews. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth.

Singleness of Vision. Rev. A. T. Burbridge.

Marriage and the Divine Life; St. Paul's Apologia pro Vita Sua. Prof. W.

M. Ramsay.

"Unto the Greeks Foolishness"; a Study in Early Apologetic. Rev. David Smith.

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 6d. Nov. What have We gained in the Sinaitic Palimpsest? Mrs. Agnes S. Lewis. The Songs of the Ascents. Rev. D. Smith. Some Internal Evidence for the Use of the Logia in the First and Third Gospels. Canon Sir J. C. Hawkins.

The Book of Jonah. Rev. T. M'William.

Feilden's Magazine,-Temple Chambers. 18. Oct. Electrical Methods of Heating as applied to the Working of Metals. Illustrated. G. W. de Tunzelmann.
Quick-Fring Guns for Field Artillery Use. Illustrated. Capt. T. G. Tulloch.
Piece-Work. Claude W. Hill.
The Central London Railway. Illustrated. Continued. W. N. Twelve-

Some Notable Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Continue Some Recent Applications of the Alternate-Current Motor. Illustrated.

Fireside. -- 7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Nov. Examinations, Examiners, and the Examined. Rev. W. Burnet. Workmen's Dwellings as They are. Illustrated. Anagrams.

Domestic Servants in Former Days

Folk Lore .- DAVID NUTT. 58. Sept. Animal Superstitions and Totemism. N. W. Thomas. The Ancient Teutonic Priesthood. H. Munro Chadwick.

Fortnightly Review .- Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. Nov. The Peking Legations; a National Uprising and International Episoue. Su Robert Hart.

Mr. Chamberlain. H. Whates.
England and Belgium.
Rev. Thomas Edward Brown. Rev. S. H. W. Hughes-Games.
Bryan and McKinley—the Parting of the Ways. J. Lowry Whittle.
Bryan and McKinley—the Parting of the Ways. J. Lowry Whittle.
Three Years' Progressivism at the London School Board. T. J. Macnamara,
The Downfall of Liberalism. Edward Dicey.
The Saturnalia and Kindred Festivals. Continued. J. G. Frazer.
Disillusioned Daughters. Pleasaunce Unite.
Problems and Playwrights. Zyx. The Peking Legations; a National Uprising and International Episode, Sir Problems and Playwrights. Zyx.
"The Immortal Hour"; Dramatic Poem. Fiona Macleod.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Oct. Forum,—GAY AND BIRD. 1s. 6d. Oct.
The Paramount Issues of the Presidential Campaign. J. P. Dolliver, Why Cuba should be independent. Rev. C. W. Currier.
Is a Timber Famine imminent? H. Gannett.
The Lesson of the Maize Kitchen at Paris. J. S. Crawford.
The Future of China and of the Missionaries. C. Denby.
The Philosophy of Friedrich Froebel. Prof. R. Eucken.
Imperial and Colonial Preferential Trade. John Charlton.
J. The British General Election. H. W. Lucy.
A Plea for the Annexation of Cuba. A Cuban.
The Negro Problem in the South. O. W. Underwood.
The Coal Supremacy of the United States. E. S. Meade.
Education in Puerto Rico. V. S. Clark.
Oar Agreement with the Sultan of Sult. Marrion Wilcox.
The Atlantic Union. Sir Walter Besant.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.—141, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. 20 cents. Oct.
The Reproach of Russia Illustrated. Dr. N. M. Babad.
The Home of Jeanne d'Arc. Illustrated. C. Johnson.
China; a Survival of the Unfittest. Illustrated.
Admiral Phillip's Diary. Illustrated.
The Race for the Chinese Market. With Map. John Foord.
Recollections of Gen. Robert E. Lee. Illustrated. Robert E. Lee, jun.
The Estufa. Illustrated. Marion Hill. Friends' Quarterly Examiner.—54, HATTON GARDEN. 1s. 6d. William White. J. Sturge.

Recollections of Ober-Ammergau. M. Catherine Albright.
Samuel Taylor Coleridge. R. Westlake.
The Sacraments. B. Atack.
The Education of Women, Past and Present, in the Society of Friends.

Martial Sturge.

Genealogical Magazine. - Elliot Stock. 18. Nov. The Stoneleigh Peerage Case, George Morley.

The Direct Line of the Three Principal Branches of the Segesser Family.

F. J. Whitgreave.

The Arms of Todmorden; the Arms of the University Extension College, Reading.

Royal Descents. Continued.

The Earldom of Menteith. Concluded. W. M. G. Easton.

The Stage Herald. G. A. Lee.

Gentleman's Magazine.-Chatto and Windus. 1s. Nov. The Evolution of the Stars. J. Ellard Gore.
Lacock Abbey. A. H. Diplock.
Concerning Vagabonds. M. M. Turnbull.
West Pyrenean Doctors in the Middle Ages. A. R. Whiteway. The Courtyer. H. Schütz Wilson.
Two Remnants of Paganism. F. G. Dunlop-Wallace-Goodbody
The Creeds of Tzarland. E. W. Lowry.

Geographical Journal.-Edward Stanford. 28. Oct. The Southern Cross Expedition to the Antarctic, 1899-1900. With Map. C. E. Borchgrevink.
Studies in the Anthropogeography of British New Guinea. Haddon.

Geography at the British Association, Bradford, 1900.
Political Geography and the Empire. Sir G. S. Robertson.
The Origin of Land-Forms through Crustorsion. M. M. Ogilvie Gordon.
Geological Magazine.—Dulau. 18, 6d. Oct.

Further Notes on Podophthalmous Crustaceans from Upper Cretaceous of British Columbia, etc. With Plate. Continued. H. Woodward. On a Granophyre Dyke intrusive in the Gabbo of Ardnamurchan, Scotland. Prof. K. Busz.

The Age of the Raised Beach of Southern Britain as seen in Gower. R. H. Tiddeman. The Age of the English Wealdon Series. G. W. Lamplugh.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Oct. Anne Beale, Governess and Writer; Extracts from Her Diary. Illustrated. Eccentric Flowers. Illustrated. Mrs. E. Brightwen. Site, Base, Support, and Superstructure in Building. Illustrated. H. W. Stre, Base, Support, and Superstructure.

Brewer.
The Queen's Horses and Donkeys. Illustrated. E. Jessop.
Some Singers I have met. With Portraits. A Vocalist.

Girl's Realm .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 6d. Nov. The Daughters of Our Soldier Prince, Illustrated, Mrs. S. A. Tooley.
The Froebel Institute; How to be Merry and Wise. Illustrated. Christina
G. Whyte. In Doll-House Land, Illustrated, Miss Alice Corkran, How I Began, Illustrated, Mrs. L. T. Meade, Girls Who Excel in Sports, Illustrated, Kathleen Waldron.

Good Words .- ISBISTER. 6d. Nov.

Good Words.—Isbister. 6d. Nov.
Bedford County Jail; a Notable Prison. Illustrated. Lina Orman Cooper.
The Fate of the Sand-Eel. Illustrated. F. G. Aflalo.
Recollections of Bygone Days.
Oscar H. Illustrated. W. F. Harvey.
Rochester Cathedral. Illustrated. Canon Benham.
The Shrinkage of Britain. H. Macfarlane.
Professor James Dewar. With Portrait. Prof. G. G. Henderson.
Modern Inventions anticipated. Illustrated. H. G. Archer.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Nov. Miss Marie Corelli. Barry Lambert. In the Andes and the Alps; Interview with Mr. Edward Whymper. Illustrated.

Rev. J. Robertson; Chaplain to the Highland Brigade. With Portrait, J. H. Young. Professor John Milne; Interview. With Portrait.

Harmsworth Magazine.-Harmsworth. 34d. Oct.

Our Future King at Play. Illustrated. V. C. Feesey.
Where the Government works, Illustrated. H. Howard, Lady Farmers, Illustrated. Philip Astor.
Wonderful Water; Illustrated. Philip Astor.
Wonderful Water; Illustrated. A. Birnage.
Secret Societies. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle.
Education by Machinery; Peculiar School Tests. Illustrated. H. J.
Shenter Societies. Illustrated. W. J. Wintle.

School Boy Editors. Illustrated,

Some Fruit Love Ho The The The Oper

> A Fa The A Pr The

The

The The Some Won Grad The Inde

> In Nati

Prere eice Glou

Med Is Co The Trut In

Gruy Impe Ir The Shal

Sir

Note Chin Four An

Why The

Harper's Monthly Magazine.-45, Albemarle Street. 28.

Some Literary Memories of Cambridge. Illustrated. W. D. Howells. Alcohol Physiology and Temperance Reform. Prof. W. O. Atwater. Fruit-Growing in America. Illustrated. T. Dreiser, Love-Letters of Victor Hugo. With Portrait.

Home Magazine.—Nassau Street, New York. 20 cents. Oct. The Best Fire Department (at New York) in the World. Illustrated. Chi.f. E. F. Croker.

The Wonderful Commerce of the United States. Illustrated. O. P.

Austin.
The Most Powerful Gun in the World. Illustrated. F. Heath.
The Real Mark Hanna. With Portraits. W. M. Clemens.
Open-Air Fêtes at Bryn Mawr. Illustrated. D. Allen Willey.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Oct. The Holy Spirit as essential to Effective Gospel Preaching. Rev. F. B.

The Holy Span as Mayer Mayer.

A Few Don'ts for Preachers. Principal Allan Pollok.

The Stampede into Evolution. Prof. J. B. Thomas.

The Religious Characters in "The Canterbury Tales." Prof. T. W. Hunt.

The Prophetic Office of the Christian Ministry. Rev. T. S. Wynkoop.

The Social and Political Condition of China. Sir Chichen Lorêngluh.
A Problem in Psychology. F. Lees.
The Future of Arbitration among Nations. Baron D'Estournelles de onstant. Constant.

The Housing of the Poor. Rev. J. W. Horsley.
The Evils of Nicotine. E. A. Wüterich.
Some Antique Virtues, Rev. J. R. Byrne.
The Bubonic Plague. Dr. C. F. Craig, Women Astronomers. J. E. Gore.
Ethical Balances.

YORK.

n.

6d.

ends.

mily.

llege,

lap.

1.

s of and.

Н.

ted

W.

tina

it.

J.

Ideal Review .- GAY AND BIRD. IS. 3d. Oct. Theoretical Learning. Hon, Boyd Winchester.
Gradual Development of Thought in Hindu Philosophy. Kannoo Mal.
The Making and Decaying of the Creed. Rev. Henry Frank.

Index Library.-172, EDWARD STREET, BIRMINGHAM. 215. per annum. Sept.

Prerogative Court of Canterbury Wills, Continued. eicester Wills. Gloucester Wills. Continued.

Indian Church Quarterly Review.—Keymer, r, Whitefriars; Street. 2 Rupees. July.
Some Early Impressions of India. Bishop Macarthur.
National Churches and Catholic Christianity. Z, T. Cops.

Priesthood, Major C. B. Mayne. Lal Behari Dey. Rev. A. S. Dyer. Immortality and Doom. Continued. Rev. J. O. Nash. International Journal of Ethics, -Sonnenschein. 28. 6d.

National Ideals; Conscious and Unconscious. Gilbert Murray. Medical Ethics. R. B. Carter. Is Commercial Integrity increasing? I. W. Morton. The Relation of Ethics to Evolution. A. W. Benn. Truth-Secking in Matters of Religion. Eliza Ritchie. The Ethics of Tolstoy and Nietzsche. Maurice Adams.

International Magazine. -A. T. H. Brower, Chicago. 10 cents. Oct.

Gruyère: a Mediæval Village. Illustrated. E. C. E.
The Rulers and Governments of Asia. E. Parsons.
The Belgian Hare. Illustrated. E. H. Glover.
The Effect of Narcotic Poisons on the Nervous System.
Imperial Régimes in Mexico. Illustrated. Continued.

Dr. B. H. Boyd.
H. M. Skinner.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIN. 25.

The Ethics of Patriotism. Rev. W. H. Kent. The Ethics of Patriotism. Rev. W. H. Kent.
Shakspeare's Idea of Reprobation as formulated in Lady Macbeth. J. D.
Colclough.
Sir Cahir O'Doherty's Rebellion; Its Causes and Its Consequences.
Bishop O'Doherty.
The Work of the Feis Ceoil Association. Rev. G. O'Neill.
The Office and Mass for the Dead. Rev. H. Bewerunge.

Irish Monthly .- M. H. GILL, DUBLIN. 6d. Nov.

A Dash across Europe, Concluded, C. T. Waters, The Third Century of the Passion Play at Oberammergau, Geraldine Gavan Duffy.

Jewish Quarterly Review .- MACMILLAN. 3s. 6d. Oct. Jewish quarterly Review,—MACMILLAN. 38. od. Oct.
Notes on Ben Sira, edited by M. E. N. Adler. Prof. I. Lévi.
Chinese Jews. M. N. Adler.
Fourteenth Chapter of Genesis and Recent Research. Prof. M. Jastrow, Jr.
An Ancient Bookseller's Catalogue. E. N. Adler and I. Broydé.
Why I do not go to the Synagogue. A. G. Henriques.
The Pesita to the Book of Proverbs. Dr. H. P. Chajes,
An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews. Continued. Prof.
M Stringshaider.

M. Steinschneider.

The Testament of Job and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. F. C.

Kalonymos Ben Kalonymos; a Thirteenth-Century Satirist. Dr. J. Chotzner.
The Ephraim Genealogy. H. W. Hogg.
Notes on the Sefer Ha-Galuy Controversy. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth.

Journal of Education .- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. Nov. In Loco Parentis. H. Macan.
The Training of Teachers. M. W. Keatinge.

Journal of Geology.-LUZAC. 50 cents. Oct. The Origin of Beach Cusps, J. C. Branner,
A Contribution to the Natural History of Marl. C. A. Davis,
A Remarkable Marl Lake, C. A. Davis,
The Origin of the Débris-Covered Messas of Boulder Colorado.
W. T. Lee,
Results of Tests of Wisconsin Building Stone. Continued. E. R. Buckley.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution .- J. J. Keliher. The Knights Hospitallers and Ambulance Work in War. Major A. C.

From Enslin to Bloemfontein with the Sixth Division. Major J. E. Caunter. The Navy under Cromwell; Its Strength and Cost, 1654. Charles Dalton. New Naval Tactical Game. Capt. G. F. King-Hall.

Knowledge. -326, HIGH HOLBORN. 6d. Oct. Knowledge,—326, High Holborn. 6d. Oct.
The Smallest of the Wild Cattle. Illustrated. R. Lydekker.
The Borders of the Karst. G. A. J. Cole.
On the Respiration of Certain Dragon-Fly Nymphs. Rev. A. East.
The Metamorphosis of Herders into Tillers. Prof. A. C. Haddon.
Aurorae. E. Walter Maunder.
Dark Markings in the Solar Corona. Illustrated. W. H. Wesley.
Electric Waves. Illustrated. G. W. de Tunzelmann., Plants and Their Food. Illustrated. Continued. H. H. W. Pearson.
Stone Implements on the Gold Coast. Illustrated. L. W. Bristowe and H. P. F. Marriott. Continued. H. H. W. Pearson.
The Great Felescope of Paris, 1500. Illustrated. E. Antoniadi.
The Pygmiss of the Great Forest. Illustrated. R. Lydekker.

Ladies' Home Journal,-Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. Nov. The Future of the White House, Illustrated, Col. T. A. Bingham, E. Nevin; the Man Who wrote "Narcissus," Illustrated, W. S. Cather, Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON. 6d. Nov.

The Duke'and Duchess of Marlborough at Blenheim Palace.

Marion Leslie.

M. Felix; a Parisian Prince of Dress. Hlustrated. Intime.

The Weddings of the Queen's Children. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.

Where Some Famous Woman were wood. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.

Does Love endure! Discussion. The Royal Dowagers of Europe. Illustrated.

Land Magazine.-149, STRAND. 15. Oct.] Animals in Nature and in Domestication. J. P. F. Bell.
Egypt and Its Agricultural Problems. W. C. Mackenzie.
The Use of Salt in Agriculture. X.
The Protection of Wild Birds. J. R. V. Marchant.
Inherent Capabilities. A. W. Crampton.
Wheat: New Breed against Old. H. H. Cave.
Sheep-Breeding Experiments in Yorkshire. J. R. Campbell.
Gypsum as a Fertiliser. J. E. R. S.

Leisure Hour .- 36, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov. About the Less Known Land of Burns, Illustrated, B. MacGregor, Napolson I, the Alarm Bell of the Century, Illustrated, W. Stevens, The Siege of Shanghai, Illustrated, J. P. Hobson, French Invasions of the Isle of Wight, Edith E. Cuthell, The Awakening of Russia. With Map. M. A. Morrison, Posy Rings, Illustrated, Volunteers from Mutineers, With Portraits, W. Jeffery.

Library.-KEGAN PAUL. 38. Sept.; Karl Dziatzko. With Portrait.
The King's Printer at Shrewsbury, 1642-43. W. H. Allnutt.
A London Circulating Library of 1743. W. E. A. Axen.
Archbishop Parker, Collector and Author. S. W. Kershaw.
How Things are done in St. Louis Public Library. Continued. F. M.
Crunden. Some Private Presses of the Nineteenth Century. H. R. Plomer.

Library Journal,-Kegan Paul. 28. Oct. Photographs and Photoprints in Libraries. C. A. Cutter. Outline of the Literature of Libraries. F. J. Teggart. For Library Consolidation in New York City.

Library World,-4, Ave Maria Lane. 6d. Oct. Bristol Meeting of Library Association; Report.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.—Lippincott, Philadelphia. is. Oct.

The Flowers of Fall. Eben E. Rexford.
A Harvest Home in Thrums. M. E. L. Addis.
Afloat in Dixie. A. Hendricks.
Baroness Curzon of Kedleston. With Portrait. Virginia T. Peacock.

London Quarterly Review .- Charles H. Kelly, 2s. 6d. Oct.

The Union of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church. Prof. James Orr and Prof. James Denney.
Picturesque Yorkshire. John Telford.
The Present Position of the Revised Version of the New Testament. James Hope Moulton.

Hope Moulton.
Pusey as a Devotional Writer. Frederick Platt.
Our Commercial Rivals. Urquhart A. Forbes.
Horace Bushnell. Principal S. D. F. Salmond.
Practical Idealism. Arthur Boutwood.
Friedrich Nietzsche; His Life and Teaching. Bennet Hume.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans, 6d. Nov. Mrs. Grant of Laggan; a Lady from the Mountains. George Paston, Indian Famines. G. Bradshaw.

Ludgate.-123, FLEET STREET. 6d. November. Lecturing to the Dutch. Illustrated, I. Zangwill.
Concerning Exhibitions, With Diagrams, H. Macfarlane.
The Queen as a Playgoer, Illustrated, W. Calvert, Berry Pomeroy Castle; a Relic of William the Conqueror. Illustrated.
C. W. Wood.
Fire! Fire! Illustrated. Austin Fryers.

McClure's Magazine.—10, Norfolk Street, Strand. 10 cents. Oct.

The Strategy of National Campaigns. Illustrated.
Sir Henry Morgan and his Buccaneers, Illustrated. C. T. Brady.
The Ancestry of the Horse. Illustrated. F. A. Lucas.
The Life of the Master. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. John Watson.
Casting a Great Lens: a New Venture in Practical Philanthropy. Illustrated.
R. S. Baker.

Some Lessons of the War. A. Conan Doyle.

Macmillan's Magazine. - MACMILLAN, IS. Nov.

Shakespeare's "Richard the Third." J. L. Etty.
The Evolution of a Wheat-Crop. H. Bindloss.
Art and the Woman. By Two Brothers.
Impressions of Klondike. C. C. Osborne. Art and the Woman. By Two Brothers.
Impressions of Klondike. C. C. Osborne.
The Settlement of South Africa.
Our Army and Its Critics. Hon. J. W. Fortescue.

Manchester Quarterly.—SHERRATT AND HUGHES, MANCHESTER. 6d. Oct.

Charles Stuart Calverley, A. W. Fox.
Shakespeare's French Critics, W. Butterworth.
Glimpses of Arab Life. S. Schofield.
The Poems of George Meredith. J. H. Brocklehurst.
The Romance of the Ritter von Staufenberg. L. Clay.
Some Recent Garden Literature. G. H. Bell.

Medical Magazine.—62, King William Street. 18. Oct.
Plague in Bombay. Concluded. Lieut.-Col. G. Waters,
The Reconstruction of the University of London. Continued. Dr. W. H.

Some Dangers of Experimental Research. J. Oldfield.

Mind .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 4s. Oct.

Pragmatism. W. Caldwell.
On the Conception of 'ENE'PPEIA 'AKINH∑I'A∑. F. C. S. Schiller.
The Principle of Least Action as a Psychological Principle. W. R. B. Gibson.

The Normal Self; a Suggested Formula for Evolutionary Ethics. R. R. The Psychological and Sociological Study of Art. Y. Hirn.
Some Physical Conclusions in respect to Space. Dr. S. T. Preston.

Missionary Review of the World.—44, FLEET STREET. 25 cents. Oct.

The Mysteries of God's Providence in China. Illustrated. Dr. A. T. Pierson.

Government Protection for Missionaries. Dr. J. T. Gracey, Christianity in Manchuria. Illustrated. Rev. J. Ross. Hope for the Prisoners. Mrs. M. Ballington-Booth. The Greek Church of Russia, B. Meakin.

Monist .- KEGAN PAUL. 28. 6d. Oct. The Belief in the Resurrection of Jesus and Its Permanent Significance.

The Bellet in the Resurrection of Jesus and its Permanent Significance. Prof. P. Schwartzkopff.

Lamarck's Views on the Evolution of Man, on Morals, and on the Relation of Science to Religion. Prof. A. S. Packard.

Mathematical Principles of Esthetic Forms. Illustrated. Dr. A. Emch.

The Ethics of Child Study. Dr. M. P. E. Groszmann.

The Greek Mysteries; a Preparation for Christianity. Illustrated. Dr. P.

Month.—Longmans. 1s. Oct.
Father Richard Frederick Clarke. Rev. J. Rickaby.
Fresh Light on Our Martyrs from the Valladolid Manuscript. Dom Bede John Forster; a Man of Letters of the Old School. Percy Fitzgerald.
Alma; a Suddy from Spenser. Constance Hope.
Studies on the History of Queen Mary Stuart. Continued. Rev. J. H. Pollen.

Monthly Review .- JOHN MURRAY. 28. 6d. Nov. The Empire and Militarism, On National Character, Cecil Rhodes.

The Rosary. Rev. H. Thurston.

Europe, China, and the Peace Conference. F. de Martens.
The Trans-Siberian-Manchurian Railway. With Maps. A. R. Colquhoun.
National Defence. R. Neville.
The Naval Exhibition at the Hague. Illustrated. Prof. J. K. Laughton.
Religio Laici. Rev. H. C. Beeching.
The Modern Study of Gothic Architecture. P. Waterhouse.
The Modern Study of Gothic Architecture. P. Waterhouse.

Munsey's Magazine,-Horace Marshall and Son. 6d. Oct. The Crisis in China. Illustrated. I. T. Headland. Where American Officers are made. Illustrated. Lieut. W. E. Ellis. The Ruler of the Turks. Illustrated. W. R. Bradshaw. The Adirondacks; an American Playground. Illustrated. M. Foster. Tammany Hall. Illustrated. H. Davis. Italy and Her Makers. Illustrated. W. Littleffeld.

Musical Times.-Novello. 4d. Nov. St. Michael's College, Tenbury. Illustrated. Snippets. Joseph Bennett. F. G. E. Dr. H. Walford Davies.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 25. 6d. Nov. Reconstruction or Catastrophe. An Englishman.
The Invasion Problem, Capt. W. E. Cairnes.
Universities and National Defence. T. F. C. Huddleston.
The Japanese Navy. Rear-Adm. Fitzgerald.
The History of a Small Estate in Wales. Stanley Leighton.
American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.
Moderates and the London School Board. William C. Bridgeman.
Civil Engineering as a Profession. L. F. Vernon-Harcourt.
War Correspondents; a Suggestion for the Future. H. F. Prevost Battersby. War Correspondents; a Suggestion 101 and Battersby. The Sacrifice of Canada. Ernest E. Williams.

New Century Review .- 434, STRAND. 6d. Oct. REW CENTURY REVIEW.—434, STRAND. 6d. Oct.
Flash Lights on the Progress of the Century, or the Scientific Horizon of 1800-1900. J. L. McCarthy.
The Sceptical Spirit of Modern Toleration. E. S. P. Haynes, Paris and Its Exhibition. One Who was There.
Conditions and Prospects of the Northern Hind. J. Dowman.
Capitalist Patriotism and Its Effects in South Africa. J. E. Ellam, Grattan's Parliament. A. E. Drinkwater, Australasia and Colonial Maritime Responsibility, H. H. d'Egville,
The Fruit Supply. A. J. H. Crespi.
The Garrick Club.

New England Magazine.—5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. Oct.

Early Traffic on the Connecticut River. Illustrated. C. G. Burnham.
The Homes and Haunts of George Bancroft. Illustrated. A. S. Roc.
The Church on the Lenox Hilltop and round about It. Illustrated. F. Lynch.
Robert Bartlett; a Forgotten Transcendentalist. C. S. Fobes.

New Ireland Review .- Burns and Oates. 6d. Nov. Flax Culture in Ireland, Dr. T. Fitzpatrick.
Agrarian Socialism. E. Vliebergh.
The Religious Songs of Connacht. Dr. Douglas Hyde.

Nineteenth Century.-Sampson Low. 25. 6d. Nov. Cabinet Government or Departmentalism? J. A. R. Marriott, Cabinet Government or Departmentalism? J. A. R. Marriott, Lessons of the War:

Place the War Office in Commission. Lord Thring, Suggestions from the Front. Lieut.-Col, Charles & Court,
Our Belated Battleships. Archibald S. Hurd.
Buddhism and Christianity in China. Prof. Max Müller.
The Lake-Dwellers. Rev. Dr. Jessopp.
Extravagance in Dress, Lady Guendolen Ramsden.
Voice-Culture. Mrs. Walter Creyke.
French Canada and the Empire. J. G. Snead Cox.
Electioneering Women; an American Appreciation. Miss Elizabeth L.
Banks.

Banks.
The Cradle of the Human Race. Samuel Waddington.
Army Manœuvres in France. H. Somers Somerset.
The Casualties of War and of Industry. F. Harcourt Hitchin.
The Vulgarising of Oberammergau. L. C. Morant,
The Gael and His Herliage. Fiona Macleod.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Reid.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 28. 6d. Oct. Bryan or McKinley? Symposium, Buddhism, T. W. Rhys Davids,
China and Russia, J. Quincy,
James Martineau, Rev. A. W. Jackson,
The Decline of British Commerce. B. Taylor, Misunderstood Japan, Y. Ozaki,
Catholic Citizens and Constitutional Rights. Rev. T. H. Malone.

Northern Counties Magazine.—Elliot Stock. 6d. Oct.

Elswick. Illustrated. A. C.
Bewcastle Cross. Illustrated. W. G. Collingwood, Canon Dixon; the Last Hermit of Warkworth. Miss M. E. Coleridge.
Nov.
Elswick. Illustrated. Continued. A. C.
Canon Dixon; the Last Hermit of Warkworth. Concluded. Miss M. E.

Coleridge.
North and South. J. C. Tarver.
With the Border Hounds. Illustrated.

J. H Penn Good Finla Pale Repo

Certa

Repo Dung Recre

High

Abno Our (Unde The The Mud In the Point The I

Brow The I

The F Prelin A New

Mariti Counc Direct Woma The C After t

Politi

Bleedi

Pr

Religion The H The D

Plague Septic Pul Reptor The Sc

Public Great (

lquhoun.

ghton.

Oct.

Prevosa

ents. m.

strated.

beth L. ot.

ge.

is. ster.

orizon of et.

M. E.

Puritan.-16, PILGRIM STREET. 6d. Oct. Great Crusades in Birmingham. A. Mez. The Immensity of China. A. S. Quick.

Open Court.—Kegan Paul. 6d. Oct.
On Greek Religion and Mythology. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.
The Curbing of the Spirit of Inquiry; the Conflict between Theology and Science. Carus Sterne.
Certain Aspects of the Eleusinian Problem; Primitive Rites of Purification.
Rev. C. J. Wood.

Our Day.—112, LA SALLE AVENUE, CHICAGO. Sept. J. H. Raymond; from Newsboy to Educator. E. C. Cleveland. Penny Prevident Eanks. C. Holdridge. Good and Bad Bacteria. Mrs. H. M. Plunkett. Finiand's Unhappy Plight. E. H. Crawford. Municipal vz. Private Ownership. H. T. Smith.

Palestine Exploration Fund.—38, CONDUIT STREET. 28, 6d. Oct. Report on the Excavations at Tell Sandahannah. F. J. Bliss. The Influence of the Aegean Civilisation on South Palestine. F. B. Welch. High Place and Altar at Petra. Dr. S. I. Curtiss. Reports from Galilee. Dr. G. Schumacher. The Dead Sea. Sir Charles Wilson. Sport among the Bedawin. W. E. Jennings-Bramley.

Pall Mall Magazine,—18, Charing Cross Road. 1s. Nov. Durrobin Castle, Illustrated. Lord Ronald Sutherland-Gower. Recreations of Prison. T. Hopkins. Prima-Donnas of the Past. Illustrated. G. Le Grys Norgate. How to popularise Our Army. Illustrated. Continued. Searchlight. The Master, Servants, and Hounds. Capt. A. G. Bagot.

Parents' Review.—Kegan Paul. 6d. Oct.
Browning's "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower came." W. B. Odgers.
The Early Æsthetic Culture of the Child-Mind. Irene Langridge.
Abnormal Conditions of Mind in Young Children. Dr. Helen Boyle.
Our Girls. Miss Hester P. Theedam.

Pearson's Magazine. -C. A. PEARSON. 6d. Nov. Under-Waerson's magazine, — A. Franson, Gr. 1907.
Under-Water Photography:
The Experiments of L. Boutan. Illustrated. R. H. Sherard.
The Experiments of R. W. Shufeldt. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
Mud Baths. Illustrated. Mary Fermor.
In the Days of Duelling. Illustrated. T. Morton, Pointers from a Porcupine Qzill. Illustrated. W. D. Hulbert.
The Way of a Waterspout, Illustrated. E. Harfield.
The Home-Coming of the Nakannies. Illustrated. W. A. Fraser.
Whalebacks. Illustrated. W. Fawcett.

Physical Review .- MACMILLAN. go cents. Oct.

The Effect of Temperature, of Colloidal Ferric Hydrate, and of a Magnetic Field on the Hydrolysis of Ferric Chloride. H. M. Goodwin and Frederick W. Grover.

Preliminary Note on the Efficiency of the Acetylene Flame. Edward L. Nichols. The Development of Kathode Rays by Ultra Violet Light. E. Merritt and Oscar M. Stewart.

A New Method of Measuring the Resistance of a Galvanometer. Wm. S. The Verification of Boyle's Law. N. H. Williams.

Political Science Quarterly,—Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d. Sept.

The American Constitution and New Territory, Prof. J. W. Burgess. Maritime Law in the Spanish War. Prof. J. B. Moore. Council versus Mayor, Prof. E. D. Durand. Direct Tax:s under the Constitution, Continued. Prof. C. J. Bullock. Women's Wages, M. B. Hammond. The Currency Act of March 14, 1300. Prof. J. F. Johnson.

Positivist Review.-Wm. Reeves. 3d. Oct. After the Khaki Election. F. Harrison. What the Imperialists mean by Imperialism. G. Murray. Bleeding India. A. H. Haggard.

Practical Teacher.—33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Nov. Geography in Elementary Schools, T. G. Rooper. Miss Jenny Andréen; a Practical Teacher of Industrial Art. Illustrated.

Presbyterian and Reformed Review.—MacCalla and Co., Philadeliphia. 80 cents. Oct.
Religion and National Life. H. M. Scott.
The Historicity of Ezra. J. O. Boyd.
The Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa. J. I. Marais.
The Inscriptions of the Psalms. C. Martin.

Public Health .- 129, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. IS. Oct. Plague at Sydney. Dr. J. A. Thompson, Septic Sore-Throat apparently caused by Infected Milk. Dr. J. K. Warry.

Public School Magazine .- 131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Oct. Repton School. Illustrated. F. C. Hipkins. The Schools in Camp. Illustrated. F. E. Bray. Reading School. Illustrated. Pablic Schools and National Defence.

Quarterly Review .- John Murray. 6s. Oct.

Malaria and the Mosquito. Illustrated. Charles Lamb. Morocco, Past and Present.
Recent Political Theory and Practice. Recent Political Aneory and Fractice.
Elizabethan Sport.
Longinus and the Treatise on the Sublime.
The Novels of M. Anatole France.
Early Scottish History.
The Coming Presidential Election.
Federation in South Africa.
English Patriotic Poetry.
The Chines Crisis. The Chinese Crisis.
The General Election.

Quiver.-CASSELL. 6d. Nov. Missionary Martyrs of the Nineteenth Century. Illustrated. Rev. A. R. Buckland. Christ, the Teacher. Illustrated. Bishop Boyd Carpenter.
Built by Books. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Things That happened on a Sunday. Illustrated. Rev. H. B. Freeman.
Ira D. Sankey; a Master of Song: Interview. Illustrated. F. M. Holmes.

Railway Magazine .- 30, FETTER LANE, 6d. Oct. Temple Meads Railway Station, Bristol. Illustrated. R. H. Cocks. The Great Central Railway; the New Competitor. Illustrated. W. J. The Great Central Railway; the New Competitor. Illustrated. W. J. Scott.
Scott.
Electric Signal Locks. Illustrated. E. M. Floyd.
The Clogher Valley (Light) Railway. Illustrated. E. Hurst.
The Mount Pilatus Railway. Illustrated. R. L. Pearse.
The Basingstoke and Alton Light Railway. Illustrated. Arthur Kelly.
Why Queensland adopted the 3 ft. 6 in. Gauge. Illustrated. Rebus.
The American and Canadian Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.
Continued. D. T. Timins.
What a Bank Holiday means to London Railways. Illustrated. G. A.
Wade.

The Cape of Good Hope Government Railways.

The Cape of Good Hop2 Government Railways.

Nov.
Carlisle Citadel Station. Illustrated. H. V. French.
The Midland Scotch Express. Illustrated. W. H. Bracewell.
The Longest British Railway Tunnels. Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
The Port Talbot Railway. Illustrated. J. Rees.
A Pligrims Railway in Canada. Illustrated. J. Fairman.
How to Obviate the Cannon Street Complications. H. C. Cooke.
The Inception of the Broad Gauge. Illustrated. H. Rake.
Railway Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.
How Fog Signals are Made. Illustrated. G. Stoker.
The Waterford, Limerick and Western Railway. Illustrated. W. Beddoes.

Reliquary,-Bennose. 2s. 6d. Oct. The Old and New Churches of St. Michael, Barton-le-Street. Illustrated.
J. C. Cox.
An Early Christian Chancel at Rosciolo, Italy. Illustrated. Leader Scott.
On Bells, Illustrated, R. Quick.
Bronze Bowl found at Needham Market, Suffolk. Illustrated. J. R. Allen.

Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, New YORK. 25 cents. Nov.

Trusts in England. Robert Donald.
The American Negro at Paris. W. E. Burghardt Du Bois.
The Political Beginnings in Porto Rico. Prof. J. H. Finley.
The Hall of Fame at New York. Illustrated. Chancellor H. M. Mac-Cracken. The Management of the Democratic Campaign. Illustrated. W. J. At How the Republican National Committee works for Votes. Illustrated.

Review of Reviews.—(Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne, 9d. Sept.
Why the Englishman succeeds. Continued. Dr. W. H. Fitchett.
The Fighting of the Month in China and South Africa.
The Revolt against the Palsface. Illustrated.
The War in South Africa; Side-Lights on the Battlefield.
The Great Queensland Winter Pleasure Trip. Illustrated. Rev. J. Berry.

Royal Magazine.-C. A. PEARSON. 4d. Nov. The Art of the Camera, Illustrated, R. Grey.
Fighting the Plaque in India, Illustrated, C. Lipsett.
The Private Life of Lord Roberts, Illustrated, R. Maingay, Four-Footed Patients and Their Doctors, Illustrated, A. Maude and E. M. Baker.
An Artist in Smoke and Sand, Illustrated, H. J. Holmes, Paint, Pay, and Promotion in the Navy, Illustrated, A. S. Hurd,
When an Army Encamps, Illustrated, H. Grainger, Tangier; a City of Queer Contrasts, Illustrated, G. Rhodes,

Saint George.-Elliot Stock. 15. Oct. An Apology for St. Paul's Cathedral. Canon H. Scott Holland. Thoughts on a Recent Visit to Tolstoy. J. C. Kenworthy. The Moralization of Money-Lending. H. C. Devine. Ruskiniana; Unpublished Letters.

St. Nicholas. -- MACMILLAN. IS. Nov. Children and Courtesy Four Hundred Years Ago. Illustrated. Mrs. Elizabeth R, Pennell.

School Board Gazette. - BEMROSE. IS. Oct. The Administration by the Board of Education of the Minute establishing Higher Elementary Schools. Lord Reay's Annual Address.
Central Higher Grade School, Manchester. Illustrated.

School World .- MACMILLAN. 6d. Nov. The Training of Probationers in Secondary Schools. F. J. R. Hendy Historical Novels and Their Uses in Teaching. Continued. C. S. Fearen-

The Law relating to the Teachers' Tenure of Office. Continued. T. A. Organ.

Scottish Geographical Magazine. - Edward Stanford. 18. 6d.

Address to the Geographical Section of the British Association, 1900. Sir George S. Robertson.

The Geographical Section of the Meeting of the British Association at Bradford.

Madagascar; the Land of Parrots, Concluded. Capt. P. Oliver.

Scribner's Magazine. - Sampson Low. 15. Nov. The Great Siberian Railway. Illustrated. H. Norman.
The Cross Streets of New York. Illustrated. J. L. Williams,
A Camera at the Fair. Illustrated. D. L. Elmendorf.
The Landscape Features of the Paris Exposition. Illustrated. S. Parsons.

Strand Magazine. -- George Newnes. 6d. Nov. The First Moon—Photographs taken with the Great Paris Telescope. Illustrated. F. Deloncle. tratted. F. Deloncie.
Truffle-Hunting with Pigs and Dogs. Illustrated. M. D. Griffith.
The Evolution of Our Map. Illustrated. B, Wilson.
The Arctic Expedition of the Duke of Abruzzi. Illustrated. Dr. O. Malagodi, Lord Chief Justice Romer. Illustrated. R. de Cordova. The Modern Russian Officer. Illustrated. • A. Anderson.

Sunday at Home .- 56, PATERNOSTER ROW. 6d. Nov. Rev. W. Carlife and the Church Army. Illustrated.
Missions and War in China. Illustrated. Rev. J. Ross.
Sir Arthur Cotton and His Work for India. With Portrait. Florence Anne Fulcher. George Holland; an Apostle of the East-End. With Portrait. G. H.

Sunday Magazine.-ISBISTER. 6d. Nov. The Religious Element in the Poets: Continued. Bishop Boyd Carpenter. Bells; Lin-Lan-Lone. Illustrated. F. J. Crowest. Rev. John M. Bacon, Balloonist. Illustrated. C. Middleton. Nature's Kindergarten. Florence MacCunn.
The Exiles of Acadia. Illustrated. Emily P. Weaver.

Sunday Strand,-George Newnes. 6d. Nov. Sunday Strand.—George Newns. 6d. Nov.
Some Notable Hymn Writers. Illustrated. F. A. Jones.
The Church of the Sacred Heart, Paris; a Nation's Repentance. Illustrated. Ada Cone.
Bishop Perowne. Illustrated. Edith Pitcairn.
The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Continued. Ian Maclaren.
Chinese Boxers and the Missionary. Illustrated. Rev. H. Rees.
Padre Robertson. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley.
The Smiling Gods of Japan. Illustrated. A. E. Manning Foster.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. IS. Nov. Hon. Mrs. Norton; the Real "Diana of the Crossways." J. Fyvie. Heine as an Impressionist. E. B. Shuldham. Winter in a Great Wood. G. A. B. Dewar.

Temple Magazine. - Horace Marshall. 6d. Nov. Albert Edward, Millonaire; the Prince of Wales and His Money. A. Mee. The Royal Caledonians. Illustrated. Katherine Carson. Model Villages. Illustrated. G. A. Wade. The Mission to Lepers in India and the Far East. Illustrated. S. Stapleton. Mont. St. Michel; the Palace of the Angels. Illustrated. J. A. Humestohel; Some Famous Lady Farmers. Illustrated. Mrs. D. A. Fletcher.

Theosophical Review .- 3, LANGHAM PLACE. 18. Oct. Theosophical Review.—3, JANGHAM PLACE. 18. Oct.
On Pre-Existence. V. Rydberg.
A Child's Tragedy. Eremita.
Indian Hymnology. A Hindu Student.
Counsels of Perfection. Miss Hardcastle.
The Secret of Evolution. Mrs. Annie Besant.
Society and Solitude as Means for Training Character.
The Reasonableness of Reincarnation. W. G. John.
Druidw. Anulets and Other Symbols. Mrs. Hooper. The Wise Men of the Chilkats. H. H. P.

Travel.—Horace Marshall. 3d. Oct.
Baghchiserai and Its Environs. Illustrated. Dr. H. Lansdell.
San Gemignano and Early Tuscan Art. Illustrated. Rev. H. T. Knight.
The New Year in the High Alps. Illustrated. W. J. Dawson.

United Service Magazine.-W. CLOWES. 28. Nov. Notes on the Evolution of Cavalry. Continued. Lieut.-Col. F. N. Mande. Frederick the Great. Continued. William O'Connor Morris. Our Own Mandarins. T. Miller Maguire. The Peace Constitution of the Volunteer Force. Lieut.-Col. Rustace Balfour. Baltour.
Some Remarks on This Year's Special Training of the Volunteers.
Mounted Infantry. Major R. H. Carr-Ellison.
The Artillery in Colenso. Capt. C. Holmes-Wilson.
Notes on Artillery Fire. Regimental Officer.
The Art of War before and after the Renaissance Period. Henry Ellica.
Malden. Field Engineering for Home Defence. Continued. Capt. R. F. Sorsbie.

Universal Magazine. - HORACE MARSHALL. 6d. Nov .. The Earl of Hopetoun. Illustrated. Australian. Peeps into Women's Clubs. Illustrated. Mrs. L. Bingen. Picturesque Travancore. Illustrated. A Travancorean. Caylon; Grett Britain's Paradise. Nellie Bruton. Italian Anarchists. Illustrated. G. M. Fiamingo. Bridal Crowns. Illustrated. G. Norge.

Werner's Magazine. -43, East 19TH STREBT, NEW YORK:

Stuttering. H. G. Haun. Practical Vocal Physiology. Illustrated. C. Lunn. Goethe. Illustrated. Stanley Schell.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.—CHARLES KELLY. 6d. Oct. Toledo; the City of the Seven Hills. Illustrated. F. G. Smith.
The Subjects of the Sultan. Illustrated. Continued. Miss Lucy M. F. Garnett. Charles Wesley M'Cullagh. Wesley and Alfred Tennyson. Illustrated. Continued. Some Aspects of Settlement Life. Illustrated. Continued. W. H. Hunt. Chaucer, H. E. Bannard, Westminster Review.-F. WARNE. 26. 6d. Nov. China; a Plea for Justice. A. Edmund Spender. Tariff Information. Tarifi Information.

Imperialism in extremis, alias Shabby Imperialism. J. M. K. Administrative Reform. W. E. Snell.

Philanthropy exrsus Legislation. A. Ogilvie.

Churchmen in the Liberal Party. H. C. Garrod.

Napoleon in the Near East. W. Miller.

The Actor's Value. A. Laidlaw.

Khakimania: Its Effects upon Our Dress. R. Shuddick.

The Plays of Hermann Sudermann. Dora M. Jones.

Wagner and Legends of the Grail. Jennette Pryce.

Friendship between the Sexes. L. K. Stibbard.

Wide World Magazine. - George Newnes. 6d. Nov. What a Foreigner saw in China, Illustrated, W. H. Rees, Alligator-Hunting in Florida, Illustrated, A. Maude,
A Church on Wheels, Illustrated, A. Inkersley,
Where Dogs are used as Policemen, Illustrated, J. E. Whitby,
The Great Festival of Jeyasu at Nikko, Illustrated, Yei Theodom The Greatouriou Ozaki,
A Religious Fair in Burma. Illustrated. M. C. Conway-Poole.
Cloud-Bursts in Arizona. Illustrated. J. J. E. Lindberg.
How the Mecca Pilgrimage is conducted. Illustrated. A. E. Wort.
Life in Mendiland. Illustrated, T. E. L. Alldridge.,
The Sugar Cane Industry in Natal. J. Cassidy.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 6d. Nov.. Tennis. Illustrated. E. H. Mills.
Dogs of War. Illustrated. Irving Montagu.
The Value of a Vote. Illustrated. H. Morgan-Browne.
America and the World's Wheat Supply. Illustrated. R. S. Baker:
The Salvation Army as a Social Force. Illustrated. F. A. McKenzis.

Woman at Home .- Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Nov. How to shop economically in Paris. Illustrated. Marie A. Belloc. Lord Roberts's Career in India. Illustrated. An Officer.

Womanhood.—5, AGAR STREET, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Furniture of the Celestials. Illustrated. Mary Ryan, Emigration for Women. Evelyn Wills.

World's Work.—Doubleday, Page and Co., New York-25 cents. Nov.

The Powers' Stakes in China.

Rome as a Political Bogey. W. S. Davis.

A Revolution in Nature-Pictures. Illustrated. A. R. Dugmore.
The Place of the United States among the Nations.
New Culture for New Conditions. M. H. Liddell.
Our Growth as a World-Power. F. Emory.
The Cost of National Campaigns.
A Day's Work of an Arctic Hunter. Illustrated. A. J. Stone.
The Riches of a Rural State. Illustrated. W. R. Lighton.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL. 3d. Nov. Leaders of Thought and Action in Australia. Illustrated.
Men and Manners in Parliament. Illustrated.
The Romance of an Ocean Liner.
Principal Rainy; a Great Scottish Church Leader. With Portrait. Johns

Young Woman .- Horace Marshall. 3d. Nov. What It means to be a Chinese Woman. Illustrated, Miss Ada Crossley; Interview. Illustrated.

Alte Paris a Luis C China. Rome King I T Friedri The I

Count Canton

Gabriel Prince Fire, A Deuts Michae The Li The St. Deutse

Berlin i

Lafcadi Psycho

Marie v

The Ch De Equal I Gar Reform Sailors' Count v

Haecke Adolf B Social E Does G

Ex-Libr

A Journa America The Sign

The Sch

Politics Gobinean Corn Du Kun Baden A Mon

Moltke. Russia a Cont Burial an German The Wor Travel R Neue

The Prob The Corr Scho Art. F.

Bibliot The Fren The Paris

Dramatic Corre The Righ A Moral THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt,—Benziger and Co., Einstedeln. 50 Pf. Oct.
Paris and the Exhibition. Illustrated, G. Baumberger.
Luis Coloma, With Portrait. Ola Hansson.
China. Illustrated. G. M. Stenz.
Rome in the Jublic Year. Illustrated. Eremos.
King Humbert. Illustrated. A. B.

netare

Ellies

nie

t. M. 7.

Iuna.

odom.

Daheim.-Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig, 20 Pf. Oct. 6.

Friedrich August von Kaulbach, Illustrated, Dr. A. Rosenberg,
Oct. 13.

The New Bavarian National Museum at Munich, Illustrated, F. von

Count von Moltke. Illustrated. W. von Bremen.

Oct. 27.

Gabriel Seidl. With Portrait.
Prince Hohanlohe and Schloss Werki. Illustrated. E. Zabel.
Fire, Accident, and Burglary Insurance. O. Klaussmann.

Deutscher Hausschatz .- F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 18. Michael Denis. With Portrait.

Michael Denis. With Portrait.
Salt. A. J. Cüppers.
The Libraria of the Dome at Siena. Illustrated. G. von Graevenitz.
The St. Ottlia Mission Institution in Bayaria. Illustrated. Dr. L. Steuert.
Johannes Schrott. With Portrait. J. H.
Deutsche Rundschau.—Gebrüder Paetei., Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr.

Berlin in October-November, 1806; Diary of a Diplomatist.
Lafeadis Hearn on the Folk-Lore, etc., of Japan. M. von Brandt.
Psychology in the Healing Art. O. Binswanger.
Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach and Louise von Français. A. Bettelheim.
The Characteristics of the Chiuese. Lady Blennerhassett.

Deutsche Worte, —LANGEGASSE, 15, VIENNA VIII./1. 1 Kr. August-Sept.

Æqual Electoral Rights. A. Friedrich.
Prostitution and Marriage. Statistician and Frau T. Schlesinger-Eckstein.
Gartenlaube.—Ernst Keit's Nache, Leitzig. 50 Pf. Heft 11.

Reform of Women's Dress. Prof. Eulenburg.
Sailory' Homes. Vice-Adm. R. Werner.
Count von Moltke. Illustrated. E. Montanus.
The Paris Exhibition. Illustrated, Continued. J. C. Heer.
Ex-Libris. Illustrated. K. Rosner.
Gesellschaft.—E. Pierson, Dresden. 75 Pf. Oct. 1.

Haeckel's World-Problem. R. Steiner. Adolf Bartels. S. Lublinski,

Oct. 15.
Social Democratic Tariff Debates, G. Bernhard.
Adolf Bartels. Continued. S. Lublinski.
Grenzboten.—F. W. Grunow, Leipzig. 1 Mk. Oct. 4.

Does Germany need a Colonial Army? The School in Posen. Goethe and the Goethebund.

A Journey from London to Boulogne in 1763.

American Imperial Politics.

Oct. 18. The Significance of the Chinese Campaign for Germany. Politics of Self-Government.

Politics of Self-Government. Gobineau on Classical Antiquity. Oct. 25.

Corn Duties and Commercial Treaties. Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Oct. Baden Art at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.

Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. 1 Mk. 25 Pf. Oct.

Moltke. U. von Hassell.

Russia and England in Asia at the beginning of the Twentieth Century.

Continued. C. von Zepelin.

Burial and Cremation. Dr. A. Freybe.

German Missions in the Protectorates. U. von Hassell.

The Woman Movement. Pfarrer Boockh,

Travel Reminiscences. R. O. von Natzner.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. Fischer, Berlin. 1 Mk. 50 Pf.

The Problem of Love. L. A. Salomé.
The Correspondence of Liszt and Fürstin Wittgenstein. Continued. A. von Art. F. Serraes.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Bibliothèque Universelle.—18, King William Street, Strand.
20s. be: annum. Oct.
The French Revolution and the Jewish Question. J. Hocart.
The Boers of South Africa and Their History. Continued. J. Villarais.
The Paris Exhibition. Concluded. H. de Varigny.
Dramatic Music in Russia. M. Delines.

Correspondant .- 31, Rue Saint-Guillaume, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c.

Oct. 10.

The Right of Association before the National Assembly in 1871. C. de Lacombe.

A Moral Awakening. P. Allard.

Neue Zeit .- J. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 25 Pf. Oct. 6. Letter from Bakunin to Marx.
Protection of Workmen. K. Kautsky.
The English Elections. J. Brockle.

Oct. 13.

The Socialist Congresses and the Socialistic Minister. K. Kautsky.

Nord und Süd .- SCHLESISCHE VERLAGS-ANSTALT, BRESLAU. 2 Mks.

Clara Tschudi. With Portrait. A. Kohut. Moltke. A. Semerau. Friedrich, Nietzsche as Theologian and Antichrist. F. von Oppeln-

Bronjkowski.
Schubart and His Daughter Julia. R. Krauss.
John Ruskin. A. Wilmersdoerffer.
Albert Roffhack. Hans Lindau.

Stein der Weisen.-A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf. Heft 2-

Chinese Writing, F. Paris Exhibition. Illustrated, E. Pendl. Cremona Violins. Illustrated, J. Gebeschus. Heft 8.

Dreams. Dr. C. Schmidt. Posters. M. Richter.

Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
1 Mk. Heft 3.

The Armea Valley. Illustrated. W. Hörstel.
The Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. S. Epstein.
Felix Vallotten. Illustrated. F. von Ostini.
Count von Moltke. Illustrated. J. Scheibert.

Die Zeit .- GUNTHERGASSE z, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. Oct. 6. England and Germany, Prof. G. Kaufmann. Commercial Education and Social Politics. M. Richter. The New Bayarian National Museum. W. Kirchbach. From Paris to Madrid. R. Muther.

The Political Position of the Queen of England. W. F. Brand.
Proportional Representation. Dr. J. Landmann.
The Mythology of Buddhism in Thibet and Mongolia. E. Schlagintweit.
Madrid. R. Muther.

Oct. 20.
Shady Sides of French Colonial Policy. F. Vogt.
The Election in England. F. W. Hirst.
Malke. Amiron. Moltke. Armiger.

Oct. 27.

The Fourth German Chancellor. H. von Gerlach.
The Vatican, Austria-Hungary, and the Slavs. Roman Clerical.

Zeitschrift für Blidende Kunst,—E. A. Seemann, Berlim.

46 Mks. per ann. Oct.

Friedrich Kallmorgen. Illustrated. M. Dressler.
C. Moest's Statue of the Empress Augusta. Illustrated. H. Grimm, Otto Wagner. Illustrated. L. Hevesi.
Albrecht Dürer's "St. Hieronymus." Illustrated. M. G. Zimmermann.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde,—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig.
24 Mks. per ann. Oct.

The History of German Caricature to the Time of Napoleon, Illustrated, G. Hermann.
John Bellingham Inglis. O. von Schleinitz.
Writings on the Gutenberg Celebration. F. von Zobeltitz.

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft.—Breitkoff und Haertel, Leifzig. 10 Mks. per ann. Oct.

Concerts in Russia. N. Findeisen. Music in Stockholm. A. Lindgren.

Zukunft.-FRIEDRICHSTR. 10, BERLIN. 50 Pf. Oct. 6.

Paris Impressions. H. van de Velde, Nietzsche and His Work. A. Riehl.

Oct. 13... German Religion? K. Jentsch. Art and the Lex Heinze. Leo Berg.

Oct. 20.

The Turks. H. Gelzer. Oct. 27.

Primitive Remedies. C. Lombroso. Ruskin's Sentimental Science. S. Saenger.

At Pekin. H. Delorme.
The Catholic International Scientific Congress at Munich. P. Pisani.
The Touat and the Occupation of Southern Algeria.
Pere Chocarne and Lacordaire. L. de Lanzac de Laborie.
The Arms of Paris. C. de La Roncière.
The International Railway Congress at Paris. H. de Cardonné.

The Condemnation of the Republican Régime. P. L. Target.
The Abbé de Rancé and James II. of England. F. M. L. Serrant.
The Reorganisation of St. Cyr. G. Bourelly.
The International Congress on Sunday Rest. F. Gibon.

John

Humanité Nouvelle.-15, Rue des Sainte-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Oct.

The Apologists of Crime. C. Detré.
The Evolution of the Russian Novel. P. Boborykine.
The Boxers and Secret Societies in China. A. de Pourvourville.
The Extension of the Mental Horizon. J. Novicow.
The Immateriality of the Soul. L. de Potter.

Journal des Economistes.—14. Rue Richelieu, Baris. 3 frs. 50 c. Oct.

The Parliamentary Work of the Chamber of Deputies, 1899-1900. A Liesse. Profit-Sharing. G. de Nouvion.
The Evolution of Collectivism.

Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. Oct. Margaret in Goethe's "Faust." Continued. A. Boutarel. Mercure de France .-- 15, RUE DE L'ECHAUDÉ-SAINT-GERMAIN, PARIS.

Albert Samain. Nietzsche. H. Albert. Fragonard and the Prix de Rome, V. Josz. -

Monde Moderne .- 5, Rue St. Benoît, Paris. 1 f. 50 c. Oct. Insectivorous Plants, Illustrated, F. Faideau. Eylau. Illustrated. Lieut. L. The Manufacture of Boots at Fixed Prices. Illustrated. P. Calmettes. Guatemala. Illustrated.
On a Canal Boat. Illustrated. G. Tomel.
Montserrat. Illustrated. E. Richet.
The Foreign Colonies at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. L. de Caster.

Nouvelle Revue.—18, King William Street, Strand.
55 frs. per annum. Oct. x.

Spiritualism and Materialism. C. Saint-Saens. The Chinese Drama. L. Charpentier. Political Reforms in Algeria. A. Castéran. Paul Verlaine. L. Claretie. Woman according to Nietzsche. G. Grappe. Louis XVII. in Canada. G. D'Orcet. Oct. 15. The South African War. Capt. Gilbert. Russian Philanthropy at the Exhibition. A. Raffal The King of Rome's Grandfather. H. Beauquier. Modern British Drama. C. Hastings. A. Raffalovitch.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.-23, BOULEVARD POISSONNIÈRE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. Sept.

The End of Socialism. P. Denis.
The Dutch Pavilion at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. M. L. de Rule.
Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mdme. U. Rattazzi. Oct.

The Chinese People, P. Siefert.
The Duchesse de Chevreuse. J. Turquan, Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mdme. U. Rattazzi.

Questions Diplomatiques et Coloniales,—16, Rue Cassette, Paris. 10 frs. per ann. Oct. 1.

Bordeaux and French Colonisation. H. Lorin.
Asiatic Russia at the Paris Exhibition. P. Labbé.
The Hostains-d'Ollone Mission in West Africa. With Map. Oct. 15.

The Austro-Hungarian Problem. Continued. W. Beaumont. The French Colonies at the Paris Exhibition. A. Bernard.

Réforme Sociale.-54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. Oct. 1. Friendly Societies in England in the Eighteenth Century. Continued. L. Home Industries in Belgium. A. Julin.

The Future of Industrial Colonisation in New Caledonia. M. Feillet.

The Social Condition of Chili. C. Subercaseaux.
The Financial Crisis in the Russian Capitals. G. Afanassiev.
Insurance against Death, Old Age, and Sickness. L. Fontaine.

Revue de l'Art .- 28, Rue du Mont-Thabor, Paris. 7 frs. 30 c. Oct.

Foreign Art at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. G. Lafenestre.
Engravings on Precious Stones at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. E.
Babelon. Baceton.
Bookbindings at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Beraldi, French Tapestry at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. F. Calmettes. Ironwork at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Havard. Potsdam at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. L. de Fourcaud.

Revue Blanche.-23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr.

Chinese Songs. L. Charpentier. The Practical Means of Socialism. E. Fournière. Oct. 15.

The Christian Martyrs. A. Dennery.
Sada Yacco and Loie Fuller. C. Manclair.
When I was a Child in China. Yan-Fou-Li.
The Assassination of King Humbert. Count Tolstoy.

Revue Bleue,-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. Oct. 6.1

Alfred de Vigney and the Baraudin Family. L. Séché. The Congress of the Union Socialiste. L. de Seilhac, Magic, Sorcery, and Satanism in the 16th and 17th Centuries. M. Ruedel. Oct. 13.

The English Elections. A. Moireau. Michelet and Quinet. E. Faguet. Emile Verhaeren. A. Beaunier. Socialistic Unity. L. de Seilhac. Oct. 20.

The War in S. Africa. M. van Broekhuisen. Agrippa d'Aubigné and Victor Hugo. Paul Stapfer. The Presidential Election in America. A. Moireau.

Oct. 27. Kate Field. Mme. Jeanne Mairet. The War in S. Africa, Concluded, M. van Broekhuisen.

Revue Chrétienne.-II, AVENUE DE L'OBSERVATOIRE, PARIS. 6 frs. per ann. Oct. 1. The Progress of Atheism and the Responsibility of Christians. J. E. Néel. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. E. Robert.

Revue des Deux Mondes.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. 62 frs. per annum. Oct. r.

The Priesthood, E. Lamy The Priesthood. E. Lamy.
An American Presidential Campaign. J. P. des Noyers Émile Péhant; a Breton Poet. L. Séché.
Ancient Engines of War at the Exhibition, M. Maindron.
Life in the Polar Regions. A. Dastre.

English Social Settlements and Working Men's Colleges. A. Filon. Experimental Astronomy at Meudon. R. Radau. Patriotism and Humanitarianism, 1870-1871. G. Goyau. Art at the Exhibition. R. de La Sizeranne. Calvin's Literary Achievements. F. Brunetière. Organised Democracy and Real Parliamentaryism. C. Benoist.

Revue d'Economie Politique.—22, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS.
20 frs. per ann. Aug.-Sept.
Primary Education in France. E. Villey.
German Science and German Conscience. M. Lair.
The Society of Production and Consumption of Birseck in Switzerland. Dr. V. Totomiantz.

The Great Divisions of Economic Science. A. Girault.

Revue Encyclopédique.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. 7s. per qr. Oct. 6.
The Meat Industry. Illustrated. G. Martin.
The United States of Colombia. Illustrated. A. Lefort.

Oct. 13.
Decorative Art at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. G. Mourey.

Oct. 20.
The Wine Industry. Illustrated. G. Martin.
Criminology. M. Yvernés.
Tunis. Illustrated. G. Loth. Oct. 27.

Pasteur as a Darwinist. F. Le Dantec. The Ports of Tunis. Illustrated. P. Laurencin.

Revue Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies.—)2 Rue de LA Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. Oct.

The Portuguese Colonies at the Paris Exhibition. J. Joûbert. The Siegs of Coomassie. L. J.

Revue Générale. -- 16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. Oct.

The Programmes of the Belgian Parties, C. Woeste, Relief Works in France. L. Banneux. The Plural Vote. L. Dupriez.
Belgium and the Paris Exhibition. F, Bournand.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. x fr. 50 c. Oct. 5. H. G. Wells. M. Tinayre.

Oct. 20. A Visit to Elba. Mdme. de Harrasowsky. The Paris Exhibition. A. Latouche.

Revue du Monde Catholique.—76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris-z fr. 50 c. Oct z.

France and China. Concluded. H. J. Leroy. Jean Louis Gouttes. L. Robert, Lamennais. Concluded. A. Roussel, St. Theresa. C. Thiébauld. A French Missionary in China. Dom Chamard.

Oct. 15. Jean Louis Gouttes. Continued. L. Robert. A French Missionary in China. Continued. Dom Chamard. Egyptian Mythology. Abbé V. Ermoni. Pierre Bonhomme. J. B. J. Ayrolles. On Heredity. C. Mondain. With A Cer Nietz

Conce

The I Revu

> Spain' The I The B Revu

Pagan Hypne The C The P

Pagan Thou English The Co George The Ja The Li

The Ro Cardina The Pa The Sto Diary o

Civil

The Ca To Mgr. St The Gr Travels The La Ancient The Ha

Cosmo

The Ha Ruskin: Nuov

The His A Visit to Commen The Poe After Ei Education The Phil

Minca Be Navigabl

Else

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 23, Bedford Street, Strand. 60 frs. per annum. Oct.

Yunnan. A. François.
With the Boer Army. A. Lynch.
A Century of Art. M. Hamel.
Nietzsche on France and Germany. H. Lichtenberger.
Science and Morals—Village Life. M. Corday. Oct. 15.

Ruedel.

. 6 frs.

E. Néal.

RAND.

RIS.

nd. Dr.

RAND.

SUE DE

rs. per

ARIS.

PARIS.

Concerning Souvoroff. Général Dragomirov.
The Port of Hamburg. P. de Rousi.rs.
A Provençal Vendetta in the 16th Century. A. Le Braz.
The Part played by Machinery. L. Houllevigus.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire .- 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. Oct. 10.

Spain's Foreign Finance and the Convenio Project. G. Manchez.
The Parlement de Paris under Louis XVI. Continued. E. Glasson,
The Rôle of the President of the French Republic in the Sanction of Ordinary Laws, Séverin de la Chapelle,
The Budget in England. V. Marcé.
Councils of War in Times of Peacs. R. Guyon.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 1 fr. Oct. 1. Pagan Brittany. Illustrated. A. de Croze. Hypnotism as a Cure. Illustrated. Jules Bois. The Chiness Lie. Count L. Tolstoy. Kruger at Home. Illustrated. Alfred Stead. The Psychology of Invention. G. Caye. Oct. 15.

Oct. 15.
The Psychology of the Elections in France. P. Pottier.
Pagan Brittany. Continued. Illustrated. A. de Croze.
Thou shalt not kill; Apropor of the Assassination of King Humbert.
Count L. Tolstoy.
English Calm. Prince B. Karageorgevitch.
The Congress of the History of Religions. J. de Coussanges.
Georges Rochegrosse and Historical Painting. Illustrated. C. Mauclair.
The Japanese Theatre. Illustrated. J. Him.
The Literary Movement in Belgium. E. Gilbert.

Revue Scientifique,-FISHER UNWIN. 6d. Oct. 6.

The Progress of Biology. W. Turner.
A Case of Musical Precocity. C. Richet.
Astronomy, and the Record of the Movements of the Earth's Crust. J.
Péroche.

Oct. 13. Animal Totemism. S. Reinach.

Oct. 20. The Progress of Astronomy. A. A. Comman.
The Basques and Their Open-Air Games. P. Tissié.
The Metric System. J. de Rey-Pailhade.

Oct. 27. The Political and Economic Consequences of a War in Europe. J. de Bloch.

Revue Socialiste .- 27, Rue de Richelieu, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Oct. The Juridical Aspects of Socialism. G. Sorel.
The Uerman Social sts and the Agrarian Question. E. Milhaud.
The Congresses of 1200. G. Rouanet.
The Congress of Italian Socialists. G. Pinardi.

Revue Univarsitaire .- 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per ann. Oct.

The Aggregation of Letters,
The International Congress of Secondary Education at the Paris Exhibition. H. Bérenger.
The Congress of Teachers in Secondary Schools. Prof. P. Malapert.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.—4. Rue du Frontispice, Brussels. 1 fr. 50 c. Oct. General Education and the Formation of Modern Spirit. A. Prins.

Criminal Lunatic Asylums, Dr. P. Heger. The Study of the Classics. D. de Moor.

Université Catholique. -Burns and Oates, 20 frs. per ann. Oct.

The Peerage of the Restoration. Laurentie.
Militant Irony. Abbé Delfour.
The Problem of Association. Magny.
The Triple Alliance. Comte J. Grabinski.
The Book of Esther. Continued. Baronne de Fontmagne.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica.-VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. Oct 6.

The Roman Plebiscite of the Holy Year Cardinal Sporza Pallavicino and the Republic of Venice. The Participation of the Manchu Dynasty in the Recent Massacres.

Oct. 16.

The Elementary Schools at the Mercy of the State, The Stele in the Forum and its Inscriptions. Continued. The Conclusion of the Concordat, Diary of the Holy Year.

Cosmos Catholicus.-VIA STA. CHIARA 20, ROME. 30 frs. per annum.

The Cathedral of Djakoro and the Mission of the Slav Race. Padre Indinin, Mgr. Strossmayer. With Portrait. Count C. Voinovitch di Quarenghi. The Great St. Be.nard. Illustrated. J. Beyssac. Travels in Al. ania. Continued. Marquis MacSwiney. The Lacus Yuturna recently discovered in the Forum. Prof. O. Marucchi. Ancient and Modern Music., A. G. Corrieri. The Hauran. Illustrated. Père Lammeus.

Flegrea. - PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. Sept 20. German Troubadours in Italy. P. Savy-Lopez. The Hatred of Foreigners in China. G. Gabrieli.

Oct. 5. Conservatives in the Chinese Empire. F. Cerone. Ruskin and the English Love of Nature. Jahn Rusconi.

Nuova Antologia. - VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum.

Oct. r. The Historical Antecedents of Christianity. Continued. Prof. R. Mariano. The Historical Antecedents of Christianity. Continued. A Visit to Cogne. A. Barulli. Commemorations of Humbert I. G. Pompili. The Poetry of F. Nietzsche, Teresita F. Coduri. Home Colonisation and Agrarian Reform. M. Ferraris. After Eighteen Years. Francesco Crispi.

Ct. 16.

Education in Secondary Schools. N. Gallo. The Philosophy of F. G. Nietzsche. Prof. Bazellotti.

Matilde Serao. With Portrait. Gemma Ferruggia. Human Characteristics. Continued. P. Mantegazza. Parties and Programmes. G. Alessio.

Rassegna Nazionale, -- Via della Pace 2, Florence.
30 frs. per annum. Oct. 1.

The Commemoration of Humbert I. L. Vitali.
The Emperor Constantine. Marquis Nobili-Vitellaschi.
Tolstoi criticised by an Italian Bisaop. G. Gabrieli
The Conservative Genius of the Church. S. Kingswan.

Oct. 16.

Bruno Chimirri; the New Minister of Finance. L. Servius.
Italian Savings Banks. P. Manassei.
Polar Expeditions, E. Oberli,
The Foreign Policy of France; Cairo or Strasburg? G. Amadori.

Riforma Sociale.-Turin. Sept. 15.

The Task of Sociology. Prof. A. Loria.
The Hedonistic Theory of Value. A. Graziadei.
Commerce with China. A. Sylos.

Oct. 15.
Trusts in the United States. Prof. F. Flora.

Rivista Internazionale.-Via Torre Argentina 76, Rome. Sept. The Social Origin of Crime. Dr. R. Spina.

The Jubiles of 1300 and the Inspiration of the Divine Comedy. F. Ermini.

Rivista Politica e Letteraria.—Via Marco Minghetti 3, Rome.

An Ideal Wall in China. XXX.
Frederic Nietzsche, P. Orano.
The Chinese Theatre. G. Sinimberghi.
A Second Confucius. G. Natali.

A Revenge for Erythrea. XXX.
Naval Defence. A Senator.
Victor Emanuel III. and the Royal Prerogatives. A. Chialvo.
Shelley's "Cenci." A. J. Rusconi.
Art and Democracy. A. Beltramelli.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elsevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift,—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 15. 8d. Oct.
Minca Bosch Reitz; a Dutch Sculptor. Illustrated. C. W. H. Verster.
The Marine Exhibition at The Hague. Illustrated. J. E. Heeres, Navigable Air-Ships. Illustrated. Dr. Bleekrode.

De Gids.-Luzac. 38. Oct.

Facts and Fancies about the Dutch Indies. C. Th. van Deventer. Nietzsche; a Problem. Dr. Byvanck. Equal Representation of the People at Elections. Prof. Molengraaf.

Vragen des Tijds.-Luzac. 15. 6d. Oct. Provincial Decentralisation in the Dutch Indian Possessions. P. H. van der Kemp.

State Protection of Agriculture and How It works. G. Zijlma.

Greek for Jurists. C. A. Wienecke.

[Woord en Beeld,-ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum.

Therese Schwartze, Pertrait-Painter. Illustrated. Napoleon I. and His Sisters. Illustrated. G. H. Betz. Gustav Adolph Heinze, Composer. Illustrated. D. Kouwenaar.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Ciudad de Dios .- Real Monasterio Del Escorial, Madrid. Oct. 5. 20 pesetas per annum.

Recollections of a Prisoner in the Philippines. P. Jose de Prada. Faith and Medical Sciences. Z. M. Nunez. Faith and Medical Sciences. Z. M. The Solar Eclipse. A. R. de Prada.

España Moderna.—Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum.

Chinese Pleasures and Anusements. Gen. Tcheng-Ki-Tong.
The University Problem. Adolfo Posada.
The Journey of the Spanish Mission to the Sultan of Morocco. Rafael Mitjana. The Course of Events in Spanish-America. Iob.

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid. 2 pesetas. Sept. 30. Neurasthenia in Statesmen. Dr. Calatraveno.

The Official Teaching of Philosophy in Spain. J. E. Lledo. The Disarmament of Europe and the Prospects of General Peace. L. M.

Oct. 15.

Friedrich Nietzsche. Juan Fastanrath. Labour and Its Organisation. Manuel Gil Maestre. In Favour of the Contention that We are Now in the Twentieth Century. P. P. Blanco. Some Musings on the Plaza de Toros, Antonio Frates.

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 15 frs.

The Commerce of Guinea during the Past Decade. H. de C. The Portuguese Merchant Marine. A. Ramos da Costa. African Products for the Lisbon Market. The Island of St. Thomas. Gabriel Pereira.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa.-Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. Sept. 30. Solar Heat. S. A. Ramsvig.

The Socialist Millerand as Minister of Commerce. J. D.

Oct. 15.

The Treasures of Dr. Sandvig of Lillehammer. Illustrated. Chr. Brinchmann.

The Autumn Bird-Flight. S. A. Ramsvig. The Works of Sören Kirkegaard. With Portrait.

Tilskueren .- Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Oct. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, Jul. Wulff. The Danish Court in 1770, Aage Friis. The Danish Court in 1770. Aage Friis.

Art-Literature. Karl Madsen.

Religious Indifference and Cultural Retrogression. U. Birkedal.

PARTS I. & II. (ready in a few days).

PART I. (5th Edition): Limp Cloth, 1/6; Morocco Grained Cloth, 2/6; Red Leather, 3/6. PART II.: Limp Cloth, 1/-; Morocco Grained Cloth, 2/-; Red Leather, 3/-.

THE TWO PARTS POST FREE FOR 2/6.

TWENTIETH CENTURY

A Translation into MODERN ENGLISH from the Original Greek (Westcott and Hort's Text).

IN THREE PARTS.

Part 1.-The Five Historical Books (Ready). Part II.—The Apostle Paul's Letters to the Churches (Ready in a few days). Part III. (in preparation).-The Remainder of the New Testament.

Birmingham Gazette:—"We like the central idea of the book, and we warmly commend this 'tentative' edition to all who wish to enjoy a lucid story of the 'Good News,' . . . A child might read these Gospels and the Acts without ten queries, and yet understand all."

British Weekly:-With all deductions it will not be denied that this translation makes some passages more intelligible; and the new renderings give freshness to the narrative."

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE. Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Ober Ammergau 1900.

By W. T. STEAD.

Price 2s. By Post, 2s. 3d.

This handbook contains the authentic text in German of the drama as it was set on the stage at Ober Ammergau. It is accompanied in parallel pages by the English translation, which is not a mere translation, but a description of the action of the play. The book is handsomely got up, and is illustrated by admirable reproductions of the peasant players, and the sacred tableaux of 1890; besides a series of interesting photographs of Ober Ammergau itself. English and American visitors to Ober Ammergau this year found no book so useful as this.

THE MANAGER.

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

The Passion Play at An Ideal Library for Children

OF BOOKS

FIFTY BOOKS, each complete in itself, with Pictures on almost every page, are just what your children want.

It is the first time in the History of the World at such a Library could be bought for such a that small sum.

For the price of a single 5s. Volume FIFTY BOOKS !

All of the Best, all Illustrated.

A collection, the equal of which for variety, range, and illustration cannot be bought elsewhere for ten times the money. If you doubt this,

Just try and see where you can get 3000 pages of printed matter and 3324 pictures for Two Half-crowns!

HAVE YOU GOT THEM FOR YOUR BAIRNS?

If not, then just think what a treat you can give them by getting "The Box of Books for the Bairns." It will be no trouble to you; simply send a Postal Order for 5s. to the MANAGER, "Books for the Bairns," Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C., and the Box of Books will be sent Dost free to any part of the United Kingdom. But for those who reside outside the United Kingdom, the better plan is to buy the Fifty Books without the box, then they can be sent to any address by Book Post for 6s.

num.

L. M.

Century.

15 frs.

. Oct.

dren s !

s NS

f, with

World such a range, for ten

3000 ctures

OUR

for the ly send Books Street, be sent gdom. United Books to any

By C. E. Perugini.]

A SUMMER SHOWER.

[See page 609.

518

visi whi coul here mak Tha bece peo mos hav for don nati Arb proj pres mag seer Rul anci the not plan

met the craft see was stea dest

to to thin failu expl

lay But with obje

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Dec. 1, 1900.

A Rainbow

The old Century is nearing its end. Its sun is setting in blood. But in the midst of the lurid smoke-clouds of war there may be discerned dimly visible amid the gloom the rainbow of hope. That which all the preaching of all the apostles of peace could not achieve has been accomplished by the heroic sacrifices which the Boers have made and are making in the cause of liberty and independence. Thanks to them "L'Arbitrage, L'Arbitrage" has become the popular rallying cry of the Continental peoples. When the Hague Conference closed, its most earnest members declared that they would have laboured in vain and spent their strength for nought and in vain unless something was done to bring home to the knowledge of the nations the significance and the importance of the Arbitration Convention. They contemplated but the propagandism of the platform, the pulpit and the press, supplemented mayhap by the pictures of the magic lantern and the kinematograph. But the Unseen, whom our forefathers described as God, the Ruler and Governor of the World, and whom pagans ancient and modern would describe as the Fates or the Destinies, willed otherwise. For their ways are not as our ways, and often when they cause our little plans to miscarry it is because they have their own method of arriving at the goal. Scheming to cross the sea in a row-boat, we despair when our fragile craft founders in the surge. But looking up we see that the wave which seemed so fatal to our hopes was but the swell made by the screw of the huge steamship sent to carry us more swiftly to our destination.

"He Maketh the Wrath of Man

The war in South Africa, that concentrated sum of all the stupidities, to Praise Him." upset the programme for the propaganda of peace. It seemed fatal to the hope of popularising arbitration. To the unthinking the war seemed to brand the Conference as a failure, and to hopelessly prejudice any attempt to explain to the masses the hope for the future that lay wrapped up in the Convention of Arbitration. But this war has not only furnished mankind with the most conspicuous and irresistible of object lessons as to the ruinous cost, the excessive prolongation and practical uselessness of modern war, but it has quite unexpectedly created the most eloquent and the best equipped propagandists of arbitration, and launched them upon their apostolate in Europe at the psychological moment, under circumstances of all others most calculated to open every ear to their words. Of all the unexpected devices of the Destinies, who could have imagined that in the forge of the South African war they were fashioning an instrument by which they intended to popularise arbitration throughout Europe? President Kruger's mission reveals the result. heroic valour and the unparalleled sacrifices of the farmers of the veldt have aroused the enthusiasm and commanded the admiration of the world. The central figure in that great tragedy, whose episodes recall even to Englishmen the glories of Thermopylee and of Sempach, is the cynosure of every eye. To him Admiration, sympathy, the every ear is turned. passionate indignation which is roused in the heart of man at the spectacle of a gigantic Ahab endeavouring to slay a friendless Naboth order to seize his vineyard, secure for President Kruger an eager and respectful audience throughout the Continent. The roar of the Long Toms and the rattle of the Mauser emphasise his words. Could the wildest imagination in its moods of optimism have conceived any apostle better qualified to interest the masses of the Continent in the work of the Hague Conference?

Mission.

As the Colosseum became the gigantic President Kruger's advertising board of the Christian religion, so this war in South Africa is the screen upon which is thrown.

in blood-red light, a world-wide advertisement of the Hague Convention. In time of peace public attention needs to be flogged with scorpions to rouse it to pay even the most languid attention to arbitration and the rules of war. But with Hell let loose, and the flames of Tophet blazing skyward from every Boer farmstead fired by the British torch, there is no difficulty in obtaining a hearing for President Kruger when, in a voice that reverberates throughout a continent, he declares that in the provisions of the Hague Convention lies the only hope for international action in the cause of peace. A thousand eloquent sermons, a thousand thrilling orations, a million effective pamphlets would have done little to turn the eyes of mankind to this new hope of the world compared with what has been effected by the mission of Paul Kruger. For everywhere and always the old President has but one word to say. He pleads for Arbitration. The war was forced upon him by the scornful refusal of the British Government to arbitrate the dispute; and now that the war has been raging for fifteen months, he comes to the capitals of Europe to remind the nations of their solemn declarations at The Hague, and to invoke their friendly intervention, sanctioned by the Convention of Arbitration, on behalf of his sorely tried but indomitable nation.

Mr. Kruger arriving at Marseilles.

"Cui bono?" the sceptic will say. Commis Voyageur "What's the use of advertising the for the Hague Convention. existence of the Hague Convention when nothing can come of it, or of exciting hopes doomed only to disappointment?" To which the reply is that although it would undoubtedly be better if the appeal to the Hague Convention were immediately followed by cessation of the war, it will still be a distinct gain to wake up the mind of the great public to the existence of the Hague Convention, even although the policy of Germany should render it of none effect. In some ways there is reason to believe that the immediate thwarting of the popular demand will tend to intensify the popular belief in the value of the boon which it All the misery and loss and evil resulting from this war will be set down, and rightly set down, to the refusal to settle the trouble by Arbitration. great gain is that the most conspicuous, and in the popular estimation everywhere outside the British Empire, the most heroic, figure on the world's stage in the closing year of the nineteenth century proclaims aloud that if his appeal to the Hague Convention had been heard last year there would have been no war, and that if the signatories of that Convention would but use their friendly offices even now the threatened extinction of his nationality would be averted. Hence on his authority and in reliance upon his evident sincerity the millions of Europe will realise as they never did before that the Hague Convention is a sacred ark of the covenant filled with unspeakable blessings for mankind. Who could have hoped for so blessed a result from this appalling crime in South Africa as the despatch of President Kruger as a commis voyageur for Arbitration through the cities of the Continent?

President Kruger arrived at Marseilles

President Kruger's on Thursday, November 22nd, and Reception. met with the most enthusiastic reception which has been accorded to any foreigner in France in the memory of living man. Mr. Michael Davitt, who was present on the occasion, assures me that in his long and varied experience of enthusiastic receptions he never saw anything approaching to the spontaneity and the displayed when the great southern seaport of France rose to welcome him who, more than any living man, incarnated to them the great ideals of liberty, independence, and patriotism. Of course the Jingoes curl their lips in scorn, and are quite positive that all mankind outside these islands are utterly mistaken. But even they have been compelled to recognise the overwhelming demonstrations of popular enthusiasm with which the President has been hailed not only at Marseilles, but at every other station on his route through Europe. They cannot deny that the opinion of the civilised world is dead against us, and that President Kruger, despite all his shortcomings, has become a world-wide hero who, in the affection and admiration of the

by C dow

sive mon grou gent resp the ! his t as w the upor and succ peop adm dem with relat itself

whol

dese

demolower in Be fact show to fact previous damp Germa-hur tant a more president and a more pr of dis

after nothi

man

dent,

nations, has succeeded to the place so long occupied by Garibaldi.

A Tribute France.

settle

st conopular

de the heroic.

in the entury

appeal

d been

have signa-

would

s even on of verted.

n reliity the lise as

t the

ed ark

speak-

Who

ssed a ica as ommis

of the seilles

l, and siastic

orded

living

n the varied

r saw

d the thern

more great otism.

corn.

these

have mon-

, but rope.

ilised

uger,

-wide

the

The

But Kruger is much more than Garibaldi. Garibaldi, at his best, was always looked at askance by the governing classes. President Kruger's reception in France showed that from the President down to the gamins the whole nation thrilled responsive to his appeals. The story of Mr. Kruger's twelve months' War of Independence had prepared the ground, and the dignified bearing, the reserve, the genuine conviction and exalted eloquence with which he responded to their assurances of sympathy, intensified the general impression to an extraordinary extent. In his tour through France, it may be said of Mr. Kruger as was said of our own Charles Stuart when mounting the scaffold: "he nothing common did or mean, upon that memorable scene." It was a great ordeal, and President Kruger came through with unexpected success, and in justice it may be said that the French people excelled themselves in the combination of admiring enthusiasm and of scrupulous reserve. The demonstrations in favour of Mr. Kruger passed off without either word or deed calculated to strain the relations between England and France. That was in itself no mean achievement, and one on which the whole French nation, from the highest to the lowest, deserve to be heartily congratulated.

When President Kruger left Paris on

The Kaiser's

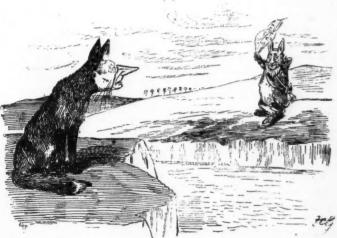

a somewhat impul-White Feather, Sive journey to Berlin, the same demonstrations of enthusiasm followed him at every station, both in Belgium and in Germany. The fact that William II. for once showed the white feather, and feared to face the old President, alleging a previous engagement, in no way damped the popular enthusiasm in Germany: The Kaiser has gone a-hunting, and from that important avocation he could not snatch a moment, even to receive the President to whom he despatched his famous telegram after the Jameson Raid. This combination of discourtesy and cowardice-for, after all, if he had decided that nothing could be done, a brave man would have seen the President, and told him face to face that he refused to help him-has not raised the Kaiser in the opinion either of his subjects or of the rest of Europe. It is the first time he has ever shown a lack of that moral courage which has always distinguished the House of Hohenzollern. Being thus rebuffed by his former correspondent, President Kruger has turned his face towards Holland, where he will be received by the Dutch as the hero of their race. But it does not really matter to what part of Europe the old President turns his steps—the whole population, rich and poor, aristocrat and democrat, rises to its feet, doffs its hat, and salutes in him the heroic champion of the great popular ideals of the century. Our Jingoes may not relish this, they may sneer at it, and even profess to like it, but in his heart of hearts there is no man amongst us who does not recognise in this spontaneous and universal acclamation of President Kruger by all the nations of Europe the most emphatic condemnation of English policy that has ever been recorded by the democracy of Europe.

President Kruger has appealed to the Hague Convention not for arbi-Why not Mediate? tration, but for mediation. Mediation during war-time is expressly suggested in the first section of the Arbitration Convention as a means of obtaining peace. It is affirmed that the offer of such mediation "shall not be regarded as an unfriendly act." It is understood that France and Russia would be only too glad to

Westminster Gazette]

Brer Rabbit Turns up Again.

[London.

Bimeby Brer Fox hear somebody making er monstus fuss, en way cross the yuther side er de creek he see Brer Rabbit skippin' des ez lively ez a cricket, en twistin' his mustans i en wavin' his hankycher. Den Brer Fox feel like he bin swop off mighty bad.

Westminster Gazette.]

Mr. Chamberlain and Moses.

"Good heavens! Can that be Kruger?"

[Mr. Chamberlain, with his wife and son, yesterday morning visited the churches of St. John Lateran, Santa Maria Maggiore, and San Pietro in Vincoli, where he stayed for some time admiring the celebrated statue of Moses by Michael Angelo.—The Times, November 20th, 1900.]

offer their mediation if Germany would consent to take part in this effort to bring the war to a close. The Kaiser, however, having succeeded in developing a blood feud in South Africa between the two races whose union might threaten the safety of German colonies, is not yet convinced that German interests demand a change in his attitude. It is open to any Power to offer mediation, but if a mediation were offered by all the Powers, it would be difficult for England to treat the appeal with disregard. But with Germany in her present mood there is no hope of this. It remains, therefore, to be discussed whether the small Powers might not make a collective remonstrance and suggestion. Such a remonstrance, coupled with a suggestion for mediation in the interests of peace, if emanating from the small Powers, need not be regarded by this country as partaking of the nature of menace. Undoubtedly, if the great Powers united in proffering mediation, English pride would revolt against it. If Holland, Belgium, the Scandinavian States, and the other small Powers were to remonstrate against the extinction of a nationality as the penalty of conquest, and offer their services to put a term to the war which is costing us so dear, Lord Salisbury might reject the offer, but the experiment is worth while trying. The small nations are most interested in this matter. Equally with the great Powers, they have signed the Hague Convention. They have as much right to speak on behalf of nationality and independence as the great empires, if not somewhat more; and national feeling runs so high in Holland and Belgium that it is possible some such representation may be made. If so it would bring out more clearly than ever the extent to which England, under the present Government, has forfeited her old position as leader and champion of the smaller nationalities of Europe.

While President Kruger is receiving The War which the homage which mankind is slow to pay to any but those rare souls who emerge but once or twice in the century to defend the aspirations and offer themselves a living sacrifice for the cherished ideals of the race, the ubiquitous De Wet has carried the war into the enemy's camp by suddenly reappearing upon the extreme southern border of the Orange Free State. Almost the last despatch which Lord Roberts sent home before leaving the seat of war was to admit another of those humiliating defeats which have done so much to destroy British prestige. A force of 451 men and two guns was defeated and captured by De Wet at Dewetsdorp, after a fight in which only fourteen had been killed and about fifty wounded. It was recorded as a great achievement that some of our generals had headed De Wet off from invading the Cape Colony, where the Afrikander feeling is red-hot with indignation at the stories, universally circulated and as universally believed, concerning the atrocities alleged to have been committed by our troops upon the women in the Transvaal. Personally I do not think there is any evidence to justify the popular Afrikander belief that the Dutch women have been subjected to the worst outrage at the hands of our soldiers. I was very glad to learn that the investigation on the spot in Natal has led to a disproof of a specific charge made concerning the alleged violation of the women of the Besters' household. When this charge was brought before the world in Parliament, Ministers refused to investigate it, with the result that it continued to pass current. Fortunately a bishop in Natal showed more regard for the reputation of the British Army than the Ministers at home, and he obtained and published an explicit refutation of the calumny from the father-in-law of Mr. Bester. But while there is no evidence as to the violation of Dutch women by the troops, and much evidence as to the good behaviour of the latter, there

ter W be ma thi wh of wit

is

pe

re

im

sa

hu has wa civ una san

Em tage whi of ade The spec the earr men

pro

how pres in which of t his :

is too much reason to fear that the women left most penniless, without arms, in the midst of the Kaffir great population, have suffered horrible wrongs, the telling ntion. of which has almost goaded the Cape Colonists into alf of revolt. Matters have come to a pretty pitch when a ires, if Cape Member of Parliament can write a letter o high imploring the Queen to kill the women outright, to e such save them from ng out gland, er old

maller

eiving

s slow souls

in the selves

of the r into

on the State.

s sent admit

have orce of red by n only ınded.

some invadling is ersally

ng the y our sonally

ify the n have inds of

at the a disng the house-

world

it, with ortun-

or the

ters at explicit law of

to the much

, there

The inexpiable wrong, the unutterable shame That turns the coward's heart to steel, the sluggard's blood to flame.

It is evident that, although we have The still nearly 200,000 men in South Humanity of Africa, we are still as far as ever from Lord Roberts. being in effective occupation of the territories we have annexed on paper. In sheer desperation we are proceeding to devastate the country. Whole districts are being laid waste by fire; and not being able to capture or kill the Boers, we are making prisoners of their women and children. And this is done by the direct orders of Lord Roberts, who is returning from Africa, leaving behind him one of the greatest failures which have ever been associated with the British arms. Lord Roberts, they say, was a humane man. So was Robespierre. Colonel Hanna has reminded us that, in Afghanistan, Lord Roberts was the only general who violated the usages of civilised war in punishing the innocent when he was unable to reach the guilty. He has carried out the same principle in South Africa, with disastrous results.

Lord Brougham, on a famous occasion, was said to have circulated a The Tsar's Illness report of his death, in order that he ight read the obituary notices which promptly appeared next day in all the papers. The Emperor of Russia has had a somewhat similar advantage last month, thanks to an attack of typhoid fever, which compelled Europe to contemplate the possibility of his disappearance. Not until then did Europe adequately realise how much it owes to Nicholas II. The practice of ordering prayers in churches for specific objects has gone out of fashion, partly from the growing scepticism of the age and partly because it is seldom that Christendom is sufficiently earnest about any one subject, save the attainment of material comfort, to pray about it. however, the general sentiment had found expression in the old channels, there is not a church in Christendom-Greek, Roman, or Protestantwhich would not have put up prayers for the recovery of the Emperor of Russia. The mere thought that his malady might have a fatal issue was a nightmare to the Cabinets of Europe. Fortunately his illness ran a regular course, and he is now convalescent. When he is well enough to cast his eve over the comments of the Press of the world, he would be more than human if he were not to experience a certain complacent pride in seeing how universally mankind recognised his worth, and his value to the

After the mission of President Kruger Count von Bülow's and the illness of the Emperor, the chief Continental event has been the debut of Count von Bülow. The new German Chancellor made his first appearance in his new office at the opening of the Reichstag, and has had a most favourable reception. The Reichstag was inclined to be irritable, on the ground that the Emperor had taken action in China without consulting the representatives of the German people. as he was bound by the Constitution to have done. Count von Bülow, remembering the proverb about the soft answer which turneth away wrath, apologised for the infraction of the Constitution, and even asked for a bill of indemnity from the offended deputies. It is so unusual for a German Chancellor to apologise or to ask for indemnities that the Reichstag forgave him on the spot, and he gained more in a moment by conciliation than he could have done by a month of bullying. He also did his best to defend and explain away the astonishing speeches of the Kaiser. The "No Quarter" speech was tacitly admitted to be indefensible, but it was excused on the ground that the Kaiser was suffering from the ungovernable emotion occasioned by the news of the killing of his Ambassador and the report that the whole of the Legations had been massacred. dealing with his various assailants the Count displayed the cheery good-humour and the straightforward candour which have distinguished him in diplomacy. and which proved equally successful in Parliament. But with all his skill he could not remove the disagreeable impression that the German troops in China have been carrying out but too faithfully the counsel given by the Kaiser in his Attila The German War Minister, who was speech. subjected to a very salutary dressing down by Herr Bebel, informed the Reichstag that if the Chinese were being massacred, it was a punishment for the crimes and for the atrocities committed by the Huns upon Europe several centuries ago! Since the French Revolutionists set out to punish the Pope for Cæsar's crimes, nothing quite so ridiculous has been heard in our time. There were the usual declarations as to the humanity of 'he German soldier, the usual appeals to patriotic sentim nt, and all the rest of the dust which is thrown in the eyes of those who are calling attention to outrages which will not bear investigation. Despite all their questioning, neither Herr Bebel nor any of the other deputies could extort from the Government any explicit answer to their challenge to produce the orders given to the German soldiers in China by the commanding officer.

The Situation The negation although and R

Affairs in China are still dragging on. The negotiations make little progress, although it is very clear that America and Russia have taken the very sensible line of refusing to be dragged at the heels of Germany in pursuing a policy of vengeance. They object to demanding the execution of the Ministers as a condition precedent to the re-establishment of peaceful relations; they object to the levying of a huge indemnity, the attempt to collect which would intensify popular irritation against the foreigner, and they refuse to pursue the Empress to Singan. It would seem as if Lord Salisbury had tied himself up with Germany in this business, which is much to be regretted. Count von Bülow in his explanation to the Reichstag of the Anglo-German agreement, made it out to be a great victory for Germany, as it secured her equal rights in the Yangtse Valley with Great Britain. Our natural ally in China is Russia, not Germany; and it is at least satisfactory that the larger half of the Englishspeaking race has recognised that fact, and is acting upon it in a sensible, business-like fashion, Looting Pekin.

The news which arrives by every mail from China is calculated to make Europeans hang their heads for shame. Universal loot seems to be the rule in Pekin. The representatives of the great Powers which at The Hague solemnly forbade the seizure of private property, have looted the capital of China, a country with which they are not technically at war. They have done this in the most cold-blooded manner possible, and the sales of looted property take place every day, except Sunday, in the presence of the British Ambassador and British Generals. The other nations are equally busy. We have flung aside the garb of civilisation, and are acting like our piratical ancestors in the days of the Vikings. Civilisation is but skin-deep, and the restraints which conscience endeavours to place upon the human brute have snapped under the strain of events in China. And yet, although we have seized their capital, looted their palaces, and driven their Emperor and Empress and the whole

Court to seek refuge in a distant city, there are still people who consider that we have not executed sufficient vengeance for the mutiny of the Boxers and the killing of an Ambassador!

Massacre in Manchuria. But looting is by no means the only crime in which the Western world appears to be indulging in China, Military operations conducted against populations which refuse to be made to fight seem to be the order of the day round about Pekin. Prisoners are first ill-treated and then shot; women are given up to outrage; and every kind of horror prevails in the territory cursed by the presence of the European troops. From the Amur in Manchuria come melancholy stories of the massacre of the Chinese by the Russians, who at first appear to have been panic. stricken lest they should be kept out by the Chinese. All men, when confronted with the alternative to kill or be killed, prefer to kill; and the Russians, alarmed by the Chinese rising, appear to have killed some thousands of Yellow men. The greatest destruction of life seems to have taken place at Blagovestchenk, where the most astonishing stories have been current as to the cold-blooded fashion in which some thousands of Chinese were slaughtered by the Cossacks. These stories appear to have been greatly exaggerated. What happened, so far as can be ascertained from the conflicting accounts, was that a body of some 6,000 Chinese, whose presence in Blagovestchenk was regarded as a peril to the Russians, who had only a handful of soldiers to defend them, were ordered to cross the river. They were put on board rafts, some of which were overcrowded, and sank in the stream. The Chinese on the other bank, thinking that it was a hostile force advancing to attack, opened fire upon the unfortunate fugitives, so what with the river and the bullets of their own countrymen, the destruction of life was very great.

Russia's Opportunity. From the correspondent of the Novoe Vremya it would seem that the Russian soldiers killed out the Chinese inhabitants in several other villages. These stories may be exaggerated, or they may be false; but in any case they call for prompt investigation, and should it appear that the troops have got out of hand, it may be expected that stern punishment will be exacted for their misdeeds. Not only would such a course be demanded by humanity, but the Russian Government would be singularly blind to its own interests not to afford the other nations an example, especially England and Germany, which at present have very much need of it, of the severity with can proving

provi

Rec

the p over Liber but v chron see h been imagi profit put h like that, numb Minis broug Mr. I large body gover vious reign. new Cabin is n to w denti Cabi are] inner exect

> Mini Com neph a so and point

Lord

Char

with

with which a central Government can punish the unauthorised excesses of its subordinates in distant provinces.

still uffi-

the only

orld

ina.

inst

n to ners

n up

the

ean

lan-

the nic .

ese.

to ans,

nave

test

e at ries in in

by een

can that e in

the end put

and ink,

to so own

the

that

the

her

hey

npt ave ishnly

but

to an

at rity

At home the month has been chiefly devoted to a chorus of lamentation on the part of Conservative Unionists over the reconstituted Cabinet. Liberals as a rule have said little, but we have only to turn to the chronique in the National Review to see how bitterly disappointed have been the hopes of those who imagined that Lord Salisbury would profit by his victory in order to put his Cabinet upon a business-It is complained like footing. that, instead of diminishing its numbers, he has added a new Minister to the Cabinet, and so brought its total to twenty. Mr. Bryce says, it is now almost as large as a public meeting. Such a body is obviously a very different governing committee from all previous Cabinets of the Queen's reign. We are now witnessing a new evolution of Government by Cabinet. The large outside Cabinet is merely a deliberative to which are submitted confidentially the decisions of the inner Cabinet or executive before they are published to the world. The inner Cabinet sits in the larger Cabinet, but as an executive it is distinct. The real Cabinet consists of Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Lansdowne, with the possible addition of the Duke of Devonshire.

"The Hotel Cecil."

Another topic which has been much discussed has been the preponderating representation accorded to members of the house of Cecil in the new Administration. Lord Salisbury is Prime Minister; one nephew is Leader of the House of Commons, and First Lord of the Treasury; another nephew is President of the Board of Trade; a son-in-law is the First Lord of the Admiralty; and his son, Lord Cranborne, has been appointed Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the most important post outside the Cabinet. No one denies the influence of heredity, and everyone is willing to admit that Lord Salisbury's family is the most distinguished in Great Britain; but men are asking anxiously whether one family can be so pre-eminently distinguished that one-fifth of the Cabinet must be chosen from its ranks, while all the other families in the Kingdom must share sixteen seats between them, On the other hand, it is contended that Lord Salisbury is not justified in penalising his relatives merely because of their relationship to him. The country has a right to the services of distinguished men, even although they should be handicapped by being related by blood or marriage to the Prime Minister of the day. This, no doubt, is true, and there is therefore not very much substance in the growl at the promotion of Mr. Gerald Balfour, who has deserved much better of his country for his services as Irish Secretary than is generally recognised, at any rate by his own party.

A GEOGRAPHICAL TIEW OF THE ELECTION RESULTS IN 1920.

The Presidential Election in America,

The other scandal, which is much The more serious, is that connected with Contracts the name of Mr. Chamberlain. The Mr. Chamberlain. Morning Leader, in a series of articles published during the election, astonished everyone by demonstrating that if the law had been as strict concerning the holding of office in the Imperial Administration as it is under the Municipal Corporations Act, Mr. Chamberlain would be disqualified for life from taking part in public affairs. He, being a Minister of the Crown, is directly and indirectly interested as shareholder in various trading corporations which make their profits chiefly by Government contracts; and it is not merely Mr. Chamberlain himself who is thus implicated, but nearly every member of his family is also on the share list. There is no necessity for going into the details of these transactions. Mr. Punch summed them up when he said: "The more the Empire expands, the more Mr. Chamberlain contracts." No one imputes to Mr. Chamberlain any corruption; but there is no doubt that he failed to live up to the standard of Cæsar's wife which he himself, in the debate that took place upon Lord Rosmead's appointment to the High Commissionership of South Africa, laid down as obligatory upon all Lord Rosmead resigned his connection with financial corporations before he accepted his appointment; but even this did not satisfy Mr. Chamberlain. He thought that the taint might still cling to him. How much worse is it, then, when we find Mr. Chamberlain himself, or other members of his family, being large shareholders in corporations executing Government work? Mr. Chamberlain for a time kept silence under those attacks, but last month he wrote a letter in which he made matters rather worse for himself than before. The effect abroad is very bad, for the general impression was cleverly hit off by Caran d'Ache in a cartoon in which he represented Tommy Atkins in full uniform, every article of which, as well as every weapon in his possession, bore a tag professing to show that it was supplied by some one or other of the Chamberlain family!

The Policy Irish Party.

Mr. T. W. Russell, who has the Protestant farmers of Ulster at his back, has shaken the dust off his feet against the Government because they are not prepared to carry out his great compulsory scheme for the buying out of the Irish landlords, This is but one sign among others of the coming trouble in Ireland. Mr. George Wyndham, who was appointed Chief Secretary without a seat in the Cabinet, will probably be more in evidence next session than any other member of the Ministry. Unfortunately, however, for the Irish cause, the Nationalist majority appears to have decided to begin its operations by a culpable blunder. Before it was announced that Parliament would meet on the 3rd December they had summoned a National Convention in Dublin for the purpose of expelling Mr. Healy from the ranks of the Parliamentary Party. When the announcement was made that Parliament would be summoned, the leaders of the Parliamentary Party decided to go on with the Convention, and refused to come to Westminster. This, they imagined, would enable them to display their indifference to their duties in the Imperial Parliament, their contempt for the predominant partner, their protest against the Boer War, and their determination to make short work of Mr. Healy. In reality, no policy could be more directly calculated to defeat its end. If it is carried out, Mr. Healy will be the only Irish Nationalist in the House of Commons. His will be the only voice raised on behalf of Ireland, protesting against the increase of taxation necessitated by the South African War; he will be, for the time being, the Member for Ireland, the man who alone expresses the Nationalist feeling on a subject which is much nearer to the Irish heart at this moment than the reform of the Land Laws, Mr. Healy, therefore, will regain at a bound everything that he lost at the General Election. They may root him out of the Parliamentary Party in Dublin, but he will have established himself much more firmly as an indispensable member for Ireland than he has ever been before.

The Desertion of the Boers.

That, however, is a matter of Irish politics, which they can manage or mismanage, according to their own wisdom or unwisdom. But outsiders have a right to speak when, for the sake of a personal partisan advantage, they deliberately abandon a position of trust at a time of crisis. England is doing in South Africa exactly what she did in Ireland in 1798, and there are many who clamour that she should proceed further, and do in the Transvaal what she did in Ireland in the days of Elizabeth. A policy of devastation aiming at the extermination of a people by means of famine is being demanded by the enemies of the Boers. The Irish, with that fellowonly who in th It w as t wer whi out

L

feeli

lacl bef smi "gl his the the ent we tog

in sca

edi

eit

the hir

Wi W A m to

W if re as in u

> O L

ndlords. coming who was in the ce next Inistry. se, the ided to olunder. would oned a pose of Parlias made ders of ith the ninster. display mperial minant 1 their y. In ated to will be mons. alf of xation ill be. e man on a at this Mr.

ything y root out he as an ever ge or own siders sonal on a loing

Irish

she what olicy ople

d in the lowfeeling which makes men wondrous kind, are the only four score people in the House of Commons who can be depended upon to enter a solemn protest in the name of humanity against this horrible crime. It would be indeed a bad omen if, at such a moment as this, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Redmond, and Mr. O'Brien were to sell the pass, even to get Mr. Healy's scalp, which, as the result of such treason, will be further out of their reach than ever.

the Guildhall.

The only important political utterance Lord Salisbury of November was the speech made by Lord Salisbury at the Guildhall. It was a bad speech, betraying a total lack of appreciation of the greater issues which lie before his Cabinet. It must have been with a sardonic smile that he ventured to speak concerning the "glories" of the South African campaign. But he knew his public, and had no fear that they would discern the irony with which he spoke. With the "glories" of the campaign he coupled the great demonstrations of enthusiasm with which the populace in London had welcomed back the C.I.V.'s. The two go very well together, but Lord Salisbury displayed some hardihood in referring thus complacently to an orgy which had scandalised even the elect who sit in the Conservative editorial chairs. He gave us no light as to the future either in South Africa or in China, probably because the light was not in him, and when the light that is in him is darkness, how great is that darkness!

The Premier Lord Wolseley.

As to coming legislation, Lord Salisbury said nothing; but he showed unmistakably a tendency to deprecate any radical dealing with the Army. He winced a little under Lord Wolseley's recent hint as to the extent to which the Army had not been adequately supplied with guns and munitions of war by the refusal of the Cabinet to listen to his representations. This is a vein which may be worked with advantage, and Lord Salisbury hinted that if Lord Wolseley did not mind what he was about, revelation was a game at which politicians could play as well as soldiers. It is rumoured that Lord Wolseley intends to make a speech in the House of Lords, in which he will draw aside the veil which conceals the unedifying wrangles which have gone on at the War Office, and that in reply Lord Salisbury will remind Lord Wolseley that, however wise he may have been as to the need for more guns, no one could have been more utterly mistaken in his estimate of the forces requisite to overcome the resistance of the Boers than the Commander-in-Chief. The story goes that Lord Wolseley would not even believe the reports of his own Intelligence Department, and confidently anticipated that Buller's seventy thousand men would be sufficient to finish the campaign.

all round!

But Lord Salisbury did more than hold up a warning finger at Lord Wolseley. He indicated an unmistakable disinclination to permit any investigation into the maladministration and mismanagement which have characterised our South African campaign. He is all for letting bygones be bygones, and for passing a sponge over the slate. We went into the war in order to wipe something off the slate, and now it would seem, when we come out of the war, another slate is to be wiped clean, lest British prestige and the reputations of various British Ministers should suffer. All this is not a very hopeful look-out for those who clamour for the return of a strong majority in order that the Government might deal vigorously with Army Reform. Having got his strong majority, Lord Salisbury evidently intends to use it in order to hush things up and to muddle on just in the same way as we have been doing in the past.

In strong contrast to the political Lord Rosebery's speech of Lord Salisbury at the Guildhall is the inaugural address of Lord Rosebery to the students of Glasgow University on the occasion of his installation as Lord Rector. Lord Rosebery has seldom spoken better, and the concluding passage reached a height of fervid and majestic eloquence upon which he has never before ventured, and of which no other living Briton is capable. Speaking of the Empire, he said :-

How marvellous it all is! Built not by saints and angels, but the work of men's hands; cen ented with men's honest blood and with a world of tears, welded by the best brains of centuries past; not without the taint and reproach incidental to all human work, but constructed on the whole with pure and splendid purpose. Human, and yet not wholly human-for the most heedless and the most cynical must see the finger of the Divine. Growing as trees grow, while others slept; fed by the faults of others as well as by the character of our fathers; reaching with the ripple of a resistless tide over tracts and islands and continents, until our little Britain woke up to find herself the foster-mother of nations and the source of united empires. Do we not hail in this less the energy and fortune of a race than the supreme direction of the Almighty? Shall we not, while we adore the blessing, acknowledge the responsibility? And while we see, far away in the rich horizons, growing generations fulfilling the promise, do we not own with resolution mingled with awe the honourable duty incumbent on ourselves? Shall we then falter or fail? The answer is not doubtful. We will rather pray that strength may be given us, adequate and abundant, to shrink from no sacrifice in the fulfilment of our mission; that we may be true to the high tradition of our forefathers; and that we may transmit their bequest to our children, aye, and, please God, to their remote descendants, enriched and undefiled, this blessed and splendid dominion.

His Practical Suggestions. The address, as a whole, was a very useful dissertation concerning the obligations of Empire and the impossibility of maintaining it unless we put our best foot foremost, and realise the fact that we can no longer afford to play around and amuse ourselves. The new century summons us to a struggle for existence which will be much more serious than anything that we have hitherto gone through. Lord Rosebery said many wise and weighty things concerning our duty both in relation to education, commerce, and statesmanship, specially mentioning with approval the German plan of appointing a commission to hold an inquest upon any trade that was in a sickly condition—a method of procedure which I suggested Mr. Chamberlain might act upon when he became Colonial Secretary. Unfortunately in that respect he has not justified my charitable expectations. Lord Rosebery suggested that it would be well if our schools and universities paid less attention to Greek and more to modern languages; but the real difficulty, as Mr. Birchenough points out in the Nineteenth Century, is not so much our defective apparatus for teaching, as the lack of any appetite for learning or any enthusiasm for acquiring the weapons necessary for success in the battle of life.

Lord Rosebery's address has naturally stimulated the desire of many Political Position. Liberals to see him once more in the place which he abandoned. This seems a misreading of the significance of his utterance. Lord Rosebery is in advance of his party, in many very important things so much in advance that his position is much more that of a Cobden than that of a Gladstone. Unfortunately he has not Cobden's energy, perseverance, and self-sacrifice. He has got hold of two or three doctrines not less important than Free Trade. He grasps them firmly, but beyond emitting at long intervals an eloquent discourse, he takes no steps to rouse the public to the necessity of immediate action. This creates the impression that he is not in earnest about it. If he were, he would start some kind of modern counterpart to the Free Trade League, and stump the country. In dealing with Bulgaria Mr. Gladstone descended from the altitude of a Prime Minister, and became a Cobden for the nonce; and the way in which he worked up the Eastern Question from 1876 to 1880 was an example which Lord Rosebery would do well to follow. Unfortunately Lord Rosebery was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, and unless he is in harness (as he was in the County Council, or at the Foreign Office) there is little dogged, persistent continuity about his appearances in public.

Putting the Opposition on a Business Basis.

One of the most significant passages in his speech was that in which he bemoaned the lack of supremely capable administrators. Both in diplomacy and in almost every other department of national life, he declared that if the number of capable men were multiplied by forty, the supply would still be unequal to the demand. Mr. Gladstone felt the same, but with Mr. Gladstone this perception of the lack of supreme governing capacity among our people led him to shrink from unnecessary, and even sometimes from apparently necessary, expansion of the Empire. But although Lord Rosebery sees that we are wanting in the most essential element needed for governing an empire, he contents himself with calling attention to the fact, and then allows his name to be used in support of the Imperialism gone mad which has led to the annexation of the South African Republics. Is this what can be called running the Empire on a business basis? Lord Rosebery also exposes himself to a retort not undeserved. There is no doubt a lack of supreme governing capacity in many departments of State, but where is there any such exhibition of failure at the top as in the leadership of the Opposition? Under our system the Opposition is as essential to good administration as the Diplomatic Service, the Army or the Navy. Yet owing to the hopeless disintegration which followed the defeat of the last Liberal Administration, the Opposition is left practically leaderless. It may not be Lord Rosebery's fault, but it is certainly his misfortune that the Premiership should have been immediately followed by the general débâcle, The first and most urgent want of the country at this moment is neither capable Ambassadors, able Generals, nor Viceroys of It is the lack of an effective Opposition. Hence when the Lord Rector reads his admirable lecture to the British merchants, he provokes the response, "Physician heal thyself." Certainly no British commercial firm could be run in the way in which the present Opposition is managed, without being bankrupt in twelve months.

but

Bar ren ran Per

Lib to I Los in I sur Im

of its wa in im int

rei

the ch dis us ex

th wl are temple slot di lo na tu be

in uestion Lord mately in his in the ere is ppear.

ssages ich he emely th in ent of pable l still lt the f the eople omethe e are for lling o be olics. on a iself bt a oarttion the h has

s as atic the feat ion ord hat folost her of on. ble

no in out

the

Of course it would be unjust to hold Deliver him Lord Rosebery responsible for the the Roseberyites! extraordinary antics of the people who call themselves by his name;

but considering the loyalty of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman to Lord Rosebery, it would tend to remove much heart-burning on the part of the Liberal rank and file if Lord Rosebery were to give the Perkses, the Greys and Fowlers, and the Imperial Liberal Council a straight tip that he was in no mood to tolerate any monkey tricks calculated to embarrass Lord Kimberley and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in the discharge of their difficult duties. I am quite sure that Lord Rosebery has no sympathy with the Imperial Liberal Council in their desire to weed out of the Liberal Party all those who do not pronounce its shibboleth; but it is impossible to deny that the way in which they have been going on of late, both in public and in private, has produced a very bad impression, which in his own interest and in the interest of the party it is most desirable that he should remove.

One of the sensational incidents of Poison last month has brought forcibly home to the minds of the masses the the Pewter. extent to which their health and their lives have passed into the keeping of the The failure of an analytical chemist to discover the presence of arsenic in the sulphuric acid used for manufacturing the glucose and invert sugar extensively used in brewing has for a moment created a panic among the beer-drinkers of Manchester and the neighbourhood. Over 70 deaths have occurred, while nearly 2,000 persons have shown traces of arsenical poisoning. Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the teetotalers look on with grim and saturnine complacency; for, as Sir Wilfrid says, alcohol is only a slower poison than arsenic, and anything which discourages the consumption of alcohol tends in the long run to the health of the community. Unfortunately the present panic has only led to the substitution of diluted whiskey for beer as a popular beverage.

The elections for the London School Board followed hard on the heels of London Elections. the election for the Borough Councils. It is impossible to keep up public interest in elections when polls follow each other with such rapidity. In London we have had three contests, one after the other, in rapid succession—the General Election, the Municipal Elections, and now the School Board Election. The consequence is that there was a very small interest manifested in the result. As usually happens when the public is apathetic, the Moderate Party gained some slight advan-The Progressives are still in possession of a very small majority on the Board, but the Moderates made a net gain of three seats. Sir John Gorst still remains at the Education Department, and curiously enough, by recent legislation, it appears that he is in office for life. This is quite unforeseen; but it is very satisfactory, not only to Sir John Gorst, but also to those who recognise him as almost the only Conservative who has any interest in education other than that of securing the maximum of public money for the denominational schools, If Lord Rosebery would take his coat off and run a mission or a revival in favour of education, something might be done; but at present popular interest in the subject is at a low ebb.

This brings me to the last note Things to be Done which I shall write under the heading of "The Progress of the Next Century. World" in the Nineteenth Century.

Early in the New Year there ought to be published a handbook for reformers of all kinds, entitled "Things to be done in the New Century." The nineteenth left a vast mass of arrears. In nearly every department of national and local life there is any amount of work sketched out. The principles are settled, the plans have been drawn up, but there is a lack of energy to carry them out. It would tend to facilitate the task of reformers of all kinds if within the compass of a small volume we could have the unfulfilled programme collected together, in order that we may see what it is that lies before us, and to what we can most profitably direct our attention. One of the last things to be done this year by our Government is to nominate the representatives of Great Britain on the Roster of the Hague Tribunal of Arbitration. France has nominated M. Bourgeois, M. D'Estournelles, and M. Louis Renault. Spain, be it noted, has named her most highly respected public man, in the person of the Duke of Tetuan. Holland has chosen Dr. Asser, president of the Institute of International Law. From Russia come the names of M. Fritsch, president of the Senate; Count Mouravieff, Minister of Justice; M. Pobyedonostzeff, and Pro-Martens, the great authority on international law. From the United States are appointed ex-President Benjamin Harrison and Judge George Gray, formerly United States Senator from Delaware, Ex-President Cleveland was appointed, but declined. The British arbitrators ought to be named before the Twentieth Century.

DIARY FOR NOVEMBER.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

EVENTS OF THE MONI H.

Nov. r. The Earl of Minto unveils a statue of the Queen at Montreal.

The result of the elections for the Legislative Assembly of Victoria (Australia) is a defeat for the Ministry.

The following changes in the Cabinet are approved by the Queen: Lord Salisbury to be Prime Minister and Privy Seal; Mr. J. T. Ritchie, Home Secretary; Lord Lansdowne, Foreign Minister; Hon. St. John Brodrick, Secretary of War; Lord Selborne, First Lord of the Admiralty.

2. The Chinese Minister at Washington delivers an address on the situation in China to an enormous audience in the Carnegie Institut: at Pittsburg.

at Pittsburg.

Lord Beauchamp holds a farewell levée at Government House, Sydney.

A Carlist rising takes place in Spain.

The Belgian packet from Ostend communicates by wireless telegraphy throughout the voyage with the station at La Paune.

4. M. Loubet unveils a statue of President Carnot at Lyons.

at Lyons.

6. Polling for the President of the United States takes place. Mr. McKinley is re-elected by a majority of 137 in the electoral college as against 95 four years ago.

The French Chambers reassemble.

The Canadian Election takes place, resulting in a large Government majority, Sir Charles m a large covernment majorty, Sir Charles Tupper being defeated.

8. The French Chamber debates on the general policy of the Go-remment; a vote of confidence in the Cabinet is finally carried by 32 y votes to 22; a motion regretting the irregular surrender of Sipido to Belgium is carried by 306 votes to 236.

The General Election in Newfoundland ends,

The General Election in Newfoundland ends, Mr. Reid's party being hopelessly defeated. The German Chancellor intervenes in the Berlin criminal police case.

The Spanish Prime Minister announces that a Convention between Spain and the United States was signed in Washington, by which Spain sells the islands of Cag 1yan and Sibututo the United States.

The German Colonial Council begins its autumn Session under the Presidence of D.

autumn Session under the Presidency of D.:

Stuchel. Mr. Bryan issues a statement of his position and views.

and views.

Sir Redvers Buller arrives at Southampton.

Salson, who attempted the life of the Shah on August 2nd, is tried in Paris, and sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Sir Charles Tupper amounces that he is about to retire from public life.

21. Don Carlos publishes a letter in Spain disapproving of the present Carlist movement. Lord Clarendon, Lord Selborne, Mr. Gerald Balfour, and Mr. Powell-Williams are made Privy Councillors.

12. The Tsar, it is reported, is suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever.

The French Exhibition has $20,000 paying visitors. Three cannon shots at night amounce the close of the Exhibition.

The Gereak Chamber opens.

13. The German Colonial Estimates are laid before the Federal Council.

the Federal Council.

The French Chamber meets; there is a general discussion on the Budget; the afternoon sitting is devoted to the Drink Duties Bill.

14. The Reichstag is opened at Berlin by the he Reichstag is opened at Dernit by the German Emperor. serious railway accident takes place in France near Bayonne. Seventeen pas-sengers killed (among them Señor Canevaro, Peruvian Minister in Paris) and twenty are injured.

The German Reichstag meets to elect its President and two Vice-Presidents. Count
Ballestrem is re-elected President.

The Hanseatic Supreme Provincial Court, at Hamburg, quashes the order of the Lower Provincial Court; the 30 chests of gold taken from the Bundesrath will therefore be delivered to Messrs. Arndt and Cohn, the consignees in Hamburg.

woman throws a hatchet at the German Emperor at Breslau.

Count Reichstag as Imperial German Chancellor. here is a debate on Chinese affairs in the There is a debate French Chamber.

Photograph by

Prince Münster.

[Benque.

(Retiring German Ambassador to France.)

19. The Greek Chamber elects M. Dufides as its President.

President,
A new Ministry is formed at Melbourne under the premiership of Sir George Turner.
The Reichstag resumes the deb it on the Bill relating to the credit for the Chinese Exp dition,
M. Delcassé makes a statement of the Government's policy in China in the French Chamber

ment's p Chamber,

Mr. Horace Plunkett is entertained at a ban-quet in Dublin.

The debate in the Belgium Chamber on the extradition of Sipido concludes in favour of the Government.

The trial of the men belonging to the Penrhyn Quarry, for intimidation, is concluded at Bangor; four men are found guilty and fined various amounts, the others are dismissed.

2x. In the Court of Appeal Mr. Justice Farwell's decision in the Taff Vale Railway Case is overruled. The Justices decide that a Trade Union cannot be sued.

Union cannot be sued.

Large numbers of people wait for hours in the rain, on the quays at Marseilles, for the arrival of Mr. Kruger.

A cyclone bursts over the town of Columbia in Tennessee; fifteen persons are killed.

The British Minister orders the return of silver looted from the Chinese after the taking of Peking by the Allies. President Kruger lands at Marseilles from the Gelderland. In the Reichstag the debate on China is con-

Sir Redvers Buller is presented with a sword of Sir Redvers Buller is presented with a sword of honour at Exeter.

Master-Gunner W. H. Acheson, accused of giving false witness in the Dover Canteen Case, is honourably acquitted.

Further developments in the Penrhyn Quarry dispute; the manager issues a notice that the quarry will close altogether.

he French Chamber rejects the motion for the abolition of the Embassy to the Vatican by 239 votes to 193.
The steamer Monkshaven leaves the Carnegie works in America for Great Britain with a cargo of iron rails, via Lake Erie, the Welland, and St. Lawrence Canal.

The Debate on China is resumed in the Ger-land, and the Lawrence cannot have been man Reichstag. President Kruger arrives in Paris, and receives a most enthusiastic reception. He has a brief interview at the Elysée with President Loubet, who later returns his visit. A debate takes place in the Reichstag in reference to the sum of 12,000 marks Dr. Woedtke received from the Central Union of Industrialists in support of the Penal Servitude Bill. Count von Bülow speaks and condemns the official action.

There is a political crisis in Denmark in both Houses of Representatives on the Government's taxation reform.
A rising of Somalis takes place in British East Africa.

The Tsar's illness takes a decided turn for the better.

better.

Mr. Long, American Secretary for the Navy, issues his annual report.

27. President Kruger visits M. Waldeck-Rousseau and M. Delcassé, and is afterwards entertained at the Hotel de Ville. He receives an ovation from the students of the University of Paris.

versity of Paris.

A new commercial arrangement is entered into between Turkey and Bulgaria.

28. The students of the University of Paris ask M. van Hamel for information relative to the organisation of an International Students' petition in favour of arbitration as laid down by The Hague Conference.

The Governor of the Fiji Islands, speaking to the natives, strongly condemns federation with New Zealand.

The Roumanian Patliament opens with New Zealand.

The Roumanian Parliament opens.
The French Chamber unanimously adopts a resolution of sincere and respectful sympathy with President Kruger.
Lord Wolseley retires from the office of Commander-in-Chief.

Commander-n-Chief.

The School Board Election takes place in London. Progressives, 28; Moderates, 25; Catholics, 2. The Progressives therefore lose four seats and gain one.

President Kruger leaves Paris. The Tsar is reported convalescent.

The War in South Africa.

Nov. 1. The Boers capture an outpost of 90 men on the main line between Bloemfontein and on the main line between Bloemfortein and Kroonstad.

The funeral of Prince Christian Victor takes place at Pretoria with full military honours.

Lord Kitchener makes a night march and captures a Boer laager near Lyden-buwe.

530

De W hav neig Three Mr

A m loa Lord

Au Color hor the

De Phili The ! Ri Bo The W

> nei The no tra Lord The

The Lord vi The to Gen

8. Lord

or pl th

Phot

ce Farwell's way Case is that a Trade hours in the les, for the of Columbia e killed. urn of silver e taking of es from the nina is cona sword of accused of yn Quarry motion for he Vatican ain with a the Gerd receives He has a e Carnegie

President g in refer-Woedtke Woedtke of Indus-Servitude and conin both Govern-tish East rn for the e Navy,

Rousseau receives ered into aris ask

e to the tudents' king to deration mpathy ffice of lace in erefore dopts a o men takes ours.

h and

De Wet is reported to be at Frankfort and to have captured 800 head of cattle in the neighbourhood.

neighbourhood.
Three American-Irish carrying despatches for Mr. Steyn are captured at Lebombo.
A military traction engine drawing trucks loaded with stores is captured by the Boers, nine miles outside of Kimberley, without a chart being fixed. shot being fired.

shot being fired.

5. Lord Roberts sends a telegram to the various Australian Governments praising the Australian troops on their retun home.

Colonel Le Gallais surprises the Boers near Bothaville; he is heavily engaged for five hours, and captures eight guns and roo prisoners. Colonel Le Gallais is killed in the battle De Wet is reported to be in the neighbourhood of Rensberg Kop. Philippolis is re-occupied by the British.

The British troops in the Transvaal and Orange River Colony are very active and defeat the Boers on several occasions.

The Boers capture a waggon convoy near Warrenton.

Small parties of Boers are hovering in the neighbourhood of Kimberley.

14. The Chamber of Commerce at Port Elizabeth notify that no trucks being available, civil traffic in the Orange River Colony is at present suspended.

Lord Methuen's force captures a pom-pom from the Boers.

The Boers destroy four miles of railway between Kimberley and Belmont. Lord Roberts's horse falls under him, but he is not seriously hurt.

The Boers in the Orange Free Colony surprise an outpost of the Buffs and overpower them. Lord Kitchener returns to the Transvaal, after visiting Harrismith.

The British garrison at Dewetsdorp surrenders to the Boers—400 men and 2 guns.

27. General Delarey, with about 1,000 Boers, is opposed by General Clements near Rietfontein and his force dispersed. Lord Roberts reports to the War Office that a plot against his life has been discovered by the police at Hodoneschurg.

the police at Johannesburg.

A troopship, with the Household Cavalry and Canadian troops, arrives at Southamp-

Photograph by] [Contanni, Venice. Don Carlos.

(Pretender to the Spanish Throne.)

Crisis in China.

Nov. 1. The Imperial tombs are occupied by the Allies without opposition.

3. Lu Chwang-liu is appointed by Imperial edict President of the Board of Censors and President of the Board of Rites.

From Shanghai it is reported that confusion and disorganisation are the chief character-istics of the allied occupation.

In consequence of friction among the allied commanders at Shan-h: i-kwan, a staff officer of each Power is appointed to arrange a settlement.

7. It is reported that Ting-yung, Acting Viceroy of Chi-li, and the Tartar General Kuie-heng, and Colonel Wang Chau-me are shot at Pao-ting-fu by order of the Court-Martial.

8. The Russian flag is hoisted at Ching-wang-tao station.

Russian troops withdraw from Tien-tsin. Russia hands over the railway from Tien-tsin to Shang-hai-kwan to the charge of Count yon Waldersee.

The American Government decides to pursue ne American Government decides to pursue the same policy as hitherto in regard to events in China; the Legation guard will remain in Pekin, the rest of the American troops withdrawn to Manila.

11. The Foreign Ministers at Peking draw up a Note as to what terms should be demanded from China.

trom China.

The Chinese are profoundly stirred by the executions at Pao-ting-fit while peace negotiations are proceeding, and the execution of the acting Viceroy of Chi-li is a cause of intense indignation to the Chinese.

13. The Tartar General Szu-Chaun is nominated Governor-General of Manchuria, in deference to the Russian invitation to China to resume the civil government of that Province.

The Chinese Peace Commissioners are censured by the Empress for not preventing the despatch of foreign punitive expeditions.

The German Consul-General proceeds on board a man-of-war to Nanking; French, Russian, British, and Japanese warships are already

there.
Count von Waldersee receives Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang at Peking. 18. The German Government receives a letter from the Chinese Emperor, 20. The interest due on the German Chinese Loan is paid.

The American Cabinet discusses Chinese matters at great length, and notify their conclusions to the other Powers.

The Russian Minister at Peking intimates that Russia will insi-t on the amendment of the terms of the Note drawn up by the consent of Ministers at Peking.

SPEECHES.

Nov. 4. M. Waldeck-Rousseau, at Lyons, on Pre-sident Carnot and the French Republic.

Lord Curzon, at Rajkot, as to how to mingle Western and Eastern ideals in Indian educa-tion and life.

6. Mr. Brodrick, at Godalming, on the Army.

 M. Jounart, at Algiers, on the barbarism of wars of race and religion.
 Sir Alfred Milner, at Cape Town, on the state of the Colony.

9. The Marquis or Salisbury on the War Office, Colonies and Imperial Defence.

12. Mr. Asquith, at Westbourne Park, on School Board education.

 Mr. Choate, at Edinburgh, on the career and work of President Lincoln.
 Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, at Bristol, on the next Budget.

14. The Kaiser, at Berlin, on Chinese affairs.

15. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Dundee, on the Liberal Party and its duties at the pre-

ro. Professor Koch, at Berlin, on the means to prevent malarial fever. Lord Rosebery, at St. Andrews, on the Em-

Mr. Reid.

Whose contracts enabled him to practically control Newfoundland. In the recent elections Mr. Reid's party was defeated by a large majority.

Count von Bülow, in Berlin, on the Chinese Crisis.

21. Sir H. Fowler, at Wolverhampton, on the Liberal Party.

22. Sir Redvers Buller, at Exeter, on the War in South Af ica. President Kruger, at Marseilles, on the War in South Africa. Sir Charles Dilke, at Glasgow, on Labour representation.

23. Herr Bebel, in Berlin, on the German troops in China.
Count von Bülow, in the Reichstag, on China and the German Emperor's Speech.

President McKinley, at Philadelphia, on the policy of the United States implied in his re-election.

26. Mr. Hanbury, at Preston, on Agriculture in England.

29. Lord Crewe, at Leeds, on the Election campaign. Mr. Bryce, at Leeds, on Liberals and the War.

OBITUARY.

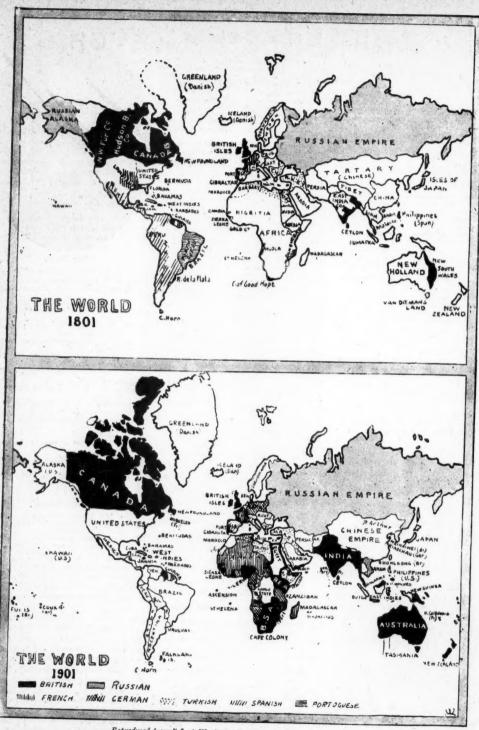

OBITUARY.

Nov. t. Mrs. Amelia Charles, 70.
2. Mr. William L. Strong (New York).
3. Professor A. W. Hughes, 39.
M. Pierre Veron (journalist.
Mr. Henry A. Harper, 65.
4. Mr. William Young (architect).
Mr. W. H. Griffin, C.M.G., 88.
8. The Maharajah of Patisla, 27.
2. Mr. Thomas Arnold (Dublin, 77.
Signor Giuseppe Marchiori (Rome).
M. Marcus Daly (New York.
M. Hector Leroux (painter), 71.
Mr. Henry Villard, 65.
15. Dr. John Cockle.
16. Professor G. F. Armstrong
Engineering, Edinburgh, 57.
17. Herr Heinrich Porges, 63.
18. Herr Ernest Eckstein, 55.

Armstrong Professor of

17. Herr Heinrich Porges, 63.
Herr Ernest Eckstein, 55.
18. Herr Ernest Eckstein, 55.
19. Prebendary Whittington, 23.
22. Sir Arthur Sullivan, 28.
Judge Young.
23. Dr. J. Mortimer Granville, M.D., 67.
Dr. Richard Neale, M.D., 73.
M. Valfrey (of the Paris Figaru).
24. Dr. MacGivern (R. C. Bishop of Dromore), 72.
25. Professor Offer (Lyons), 70.
26. Rev. Affred Peaches, 83.
27. Mr. Wilson (American Commissioner of Internal Revenue).

nal Revenue).
29. Sir George Wiffis,
30. Osoar Wilde (of Paris).

Reproduced from " Lest We Forget," Review of Reviews Annual.

of of spean it at In all ad

niı

Ch

the chi chi of the est proto-

like and ma gai the gur or min shij hur har smi

It is or to that immediately Cer Seel seel are sun

deg app its valu

ven

CHARACTER SKETCH.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

"Backward look across the ages, to the Beacon moments see,
That jut like peaks of some sunk continent above Oblivion's sea."—Lovell.

THE Nineteenth Century is leaving us—will soon have left us, and joined the procession of vanished centuries which stretch back into the infinite distance of the past. It is therefore possible to form some estimate of its character, to realise the Century as an entity, to speak of what it has brought us, what it has taught us, and what it has taken away. We still stand too near to it to see its effects in true perspective; but, now that it is at an end, we can for the first time speak of it as a whole. In common courtesy to a century which has been with us all our lives, we must pay it the compliment of a formal adieu.

THE DIFFICULTY OF THE CHRONICLER.

It would be curious and instructive to have a series of nineteen appreciations of the nineteen centuries of the Christian era written at the close of each, and to compare the estimate of the modern historian with the judgment of those who stood at the bier of the century whose character they endeavoured to sum up. It is safe to say that in very few instances would the contemporary chronicler be in accord with those who are in a position of looking back upon the past from the distances of a thousand years. In the thirty-eighth century, the estimate which posterity will form of the nineteenth will probably differ as widely from that which we are forming to-day, as the estimate of the first century formed, let us say by Gibbon, would differ from that of Tacitus.

This is the more probable because the men of to-day, like the Century of which they form a part, are materialised and material. The characteristic of the Century, palpable and obvious to all men, is that of enormous, unprecedented material prosperity. The greatest triumphs have been gained in the material sphere. The supreme outcome of the Century's labours is the production of a quick-firing gun capable of pumping tons of explosive shell over four or five miles of country at the rate of twenty shots per minute. It is the Century of the locomotive, of the steamship, of the dynamo. It is a mechanical Century. The hundred years are but as a pedestal for the man with the hammer. We have lived these last hundred years in the smithy of Vulcan rather than on the heights of Olympus. It is the age of Tubal Cain. But it is not in the steamship or the railway, but "in the thoughts that shake mankind," that centuries are apt to find their best title to posthumous immortality. And it is difficult to say at this moment by what "mankind-shaking thought" the Nineteenth Century will be chiefly remembered when it is gone. Certainly it is to the realm of thought that we must go to seek for things that endure. "For the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

IN EUROPE, THE CENTURY OF NAPOLEON-

Hence it is extremely difficult, not to say impossible, to sum up the character of the Nineteenth Century with any degree of accuracy. All that we can do is to note what appear on the surface to the observer close at hand to be its leading characteristics, its foremost men, its more valuable contributions to the world movement, without venturing to dogmatise as to the yet-to-be revealed significance of influences, tendencies, and individualities which are at work below the surface. If mankind gives the highest place to the Religious Teacher, it must be admitted that the aboriginal savage in man asserts himself by according an almost equally lofty position to the Warrior. It is not quite true, as the poet says, that—for the founders of religions are much more conspicuous than the conqueror. But the soldiers have succeeded in stamping their names in letters of blood illumined with fire upon most centuries. The Nineteenth is no exception to the rule. In Napoleon, whose career culminated and crashed in the first fifteen years of this century, we have a prodigy of war second to none in the annals of the human race. In the Pantheon of Warriors he holds his own with the foremost.

So, o'er-shadowing all the past, The conqueror stalks sublime,

Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon—a triple incarnation of Mars—are among the demigods of mankind. The Nineteenth Century, which in its opening years saw Napoleon at the zenith of his tremendous fortunes, witnessed at its close an astonishing revival of interest in his memory. This interest manifested itself in opposite directions. In France it revealed itself chiefly in destructive and deprecatory criticism; in England and the United States there was as strong a tendency to hero worship. The Chicago boy, who went to the Invalides because he reckoned Napoleon was the smartest man the whole world produced, summed up the estimate which American periodical literature has somewhat diligently fostered. Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon in St. Helena" may be regarded as the latest illustration of the renewed interest in "The Scavenger of God."

The French Revolution torpedoed the Federalism of Europe, but without Napoleon it would have exploded aimlessly. Napoleon was at once the steel case and the driving force which directed the revolutionary explosive to its goal. The old craft was patched up after the torpedo had burst, and kept floating for some years. But Napoleon had dealt it a death blow. It expired in 1848. Its shadow still haunts Austria, and Junkerdom, still unmindful of Jena, resents the triumph of the modern ideal. Nevertheless, it has triumphed. The principles of the French Revolution have made the tour of the world. France wrecked herself in the excess of her propagandist enthusiasm. But her sacrifice enabled her to dominate the century.

Even the great turn of the Wheel of Fortune which displaced France from the headship of Europe, was largely due to the influence of the Napoleonic ideal. To the supremacy of Germany the first Napoleon contributed a fact, the third Napoleon an ideal. The overthrow of Prussia on the battlefield of Jena and the restrictions imposed by the conqueror on the number of troops to be maintained under arms, led to the system of short and universal military service, which, in the capable hands of Von Moltke, became so irresistible a weapon for the defeat of Austria, and afterwards for the conquest of France. The force even more potent than the short Richard Cobden.

Karl Marx.

serv Aus rail pro pre tion mo to t who div cor ma Ta car est wh

are

Ea

Ni

be

the nu

alr

the ha

mi

las

mi

th

Michael Faraday.

GREAT MEN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

(From the " Review of Reviews" Annual.

service system in bringing about the unification of Germany was enthusiasm for the doctrine of nationality. This doctrine the third Napoleon took under his special patronage. He gave it a baptism of blood on the plains of Italy. In the hands of Prince Bismarck it was one of the most effective means that led to the proclamation of the King of Prussia as Emperor of Germany in the Palace of Louis Quatorze. Alike by direct action, and by no less direct reaction, so potent has been their influence upon the history of Europe that the Nineteenth Century may, in the Old World, be regarded as the History of France and Napoleon.

-ELSEWHERE, OF THE ENGLISH SPEAKERS-

So far as Europe is concerned. But Europe is not all the world—it is indeed every year becoming comparatively a less important portion of the world. Outside Europe, the most distinctive and remarkable feature of the Nineteenth Century has been the immense development of the English-speaking race. That race unhappily torn into two sections by the infatuated "loyalism" of the eighteenth century, has developed with extraordinary rapidity. The British Empire began the century by destroying the Parliament of Ireland. It has closed it by trampling out of existence the Parliaments of the South African Republics. From January 1st, 1801, when the Act of Union came into existence, to the present date, it has expanded its territory far in excess of its capacity for government, until now it is responsible for the protection of from eleven to twelve million square miles of territory, and for the good government of 400,000,000 of the human race. Of these teeming millions, however, 340,000,000 are coloured Helots, who are taxed and policed, but who are sternly denied any right to responsible self-government. The Englishspeaking, self-governing population of the Empire does not exceed 60,000,000, of whom 40,000,000 are in the United Kingdom and Ireland, say 5,000,000 in Canada, and another 5,000,000 in Australia and New Zealand. This represents the white man. The other 340,000,000 represent the white man's burden. That this burden is in excess of his strength is nowhere more frankly admitted than in quarters where any suggestion that it should not be increased is denounced as incipient treason.

The white population of the Empire at the beginning of the century was not 20,000,000. If it now stands at 60,000,000, it has nearly trebled itself in the course of the century. This rate of increase is, however, thrown into the shade by the immense advance of the United States, whose advent as the greatest of world Powers is the most conspicuous event of the closing years of the Nineteenth Century. In 1801 the population of the United States was 5,308,000. At the last census taken this year the population is 76,265,000. Of these, 8,000,000 probably are blacks. The white man in the United States speaks many languages, but his children all speak English. We may take it that, excluding coloured people in both Empire and Republic, the English-speaking race is now 125,000,000 strong, who reign supreme over native races of various colours, numbering 350,000,000. The English-speaking race, therefore, has outstripped all the races of European stock. If in Europe the century is that of France and Napoleon, outside Europe it is not less conspicuously the century of the English-speaking Empire and Republic.

-AND OF THE RUSSIANS.

There is only one other great racial phenomenon worthy to be mentioned beside the immense expansion of the English-speaking world as a distinctive characteristic of the Nineteenth Century, and that is the growth of Russia. The last day but one of the eighteenth century, the Tsar Alexander I. is said to have put forth the somewhat fantastic suggestion that, instead of deluging Europe with blood, the contending sovereigns should meet at St. Petersburg and settle their differences by single combat, their ministers acting as seconds. The proposal had no result, but it is curious that the Nineteenth Century should have opened and closed with the consideration of proposals by Russian Tsars devised with the avowed object of diverting war. A century ago, Russia was a comparatively unknown and barbarous region, whose total population was only 38,000,000. To-day, Russia is traversed from end to end by an excellent service of railways; in a year or two all the eastern and Australian mails will be dispatched by the Siberian railway; her Tsar has taken a noble initiative in promoting the most advanced ideas both as to the prevention and the humanising of war; and her population is now 120,000,000. Nor is this by any means the most formidable factor. Russia's natural drift southward to the Bosphorus being arbitrarily thwarted by England, who cast her shield over Turkey for her own reasons, was diverted eastward. The result is that Russia to-day is conterminous with Afghanistan and not many weeks' march from the border of India. She has tamed the Tartars of the Khanates, extirpated the slave trade, carried the railway within striking distance of Herat, and established herself as undisputed sovereign over the whole of Northern Asia.

THE AWAKENING OF ASIA.

In surveying the history of a century our attention is naturally attracted by the greatest masses of men. We are compelled to think in continents. It is possible that the future historian may point to the awakening of the Eastern nations as the most important—not, perhaps, the most advantageous—piece of work accomplished in the Nineteenth Century. The awakening of Japan was an affair of yesterday. The awakening of China has but begun.

THE SCRAMBLE FOR AFRICA.

not be ginning self in ase is.

se ad-reatest

of the

Bor the

At the 65,000.

te man out his

at, exlic, the g, who numtherek. If coleon, tury of menon racterwth of ntury, someluging should es by The reenth siderh the

Russia

egion,

o-day, ellent

now

After the awakening of the Far East must be mentioned the scramble for Africa. As late as the sixties African colonies were regarded as little better than an intolerable nuisance. From that time onward the process of partition proceeded at ever-accelerating speed, until at this moment almost every acre in Africa is in the possession or under the protectorate of one or other European Power. The hallucination of the Atlas will probably be the subject for much amused comment on the part of posterity. For the last twenty years of the century it dominated the peoples and the statesmen of Europe. This strange malady might seem to be more natural to the people of Laputa than to the practical, matter-of-fact European public, but it has raged with unabated fury for a quarter of a century. This hallucination was characterised by a curious confusion of ideas. Its victims imagined that in some mysterious way they became happier, and their empire became stronger, if they were allowed to take a paint-brush and colour the map of other continents with the same pigment which was used to demarcate the boundaries of their own country. The spectacle of a huge portion of the African or Asiatic map being painted red, green, or blue, as the case might be, exercised a soothing effect upon their nervous vanity, and operated as a kind of exhibitanting dream upon their national pride.

THE CENTURY OF THE STEAMSHIP.

The possibility of effecting these vast political changes on distant continents has been due to one of the most conspicuous achievements of the Nineteenth Century. The redistribution of the area of continents was rendered easy because the white man had previously conquered the sea. It is true that from the days when Solomon sent his argosies to Ophir, the sea had been the highway of travel, of trade, and of conquest. But not until this century was the subjugation of the sea complete. The wayward wind was always an element which in previous centuries constantly baffled the calculations of moderns.

The defeat of the Spanish Armada is but one of a vast number of similar great designs of ambitious statesmen which miscarried because they could not command the winds. The Nineteenth Century has not given mankind the empiry over the winds. The sceptre of (Eolus can be grasped by no mortal. But the century has enabled us by the aid of steam to be independent of wind or tide. It is difficult, not to say impossible, for the men of to-day to realise how great a change this has made, what an element of stability and certainty it has introduced into our communications over-sea.

THE SHRINKAGE OF THE WORLD.

The reduction of the duration of the Atlantic passage from twenty-six days to less than six, is no small achievement for a single century. It is part of that Titanic task

Napcleon Bonaparte.

Abraham Lincoln.

Prince Bismarck.

GREAT MEN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

(From the " Review of Reviews" Annual.)

of effecting the shrinkage of the world, which mankind neglected until the end of the eighteenth century, but at which it has been labouring ever since. It is a curious reflection that Louis XIV., whether on sea or on land, could not move more rapidly than Julius Cæsar, or, to go still further back, than Nimrod, or the Pharaohs of the first dynasty. During thousands of years no one broke the earlier records of human speed. No man could travel faster than a man could run, than a horse could gallop, or a ship could sail. But the Nineteenth Century has changed all that. The human race has become vastly more mobile. Man mounts a bicycle, and trebles his speed; climbs into a locomotive, and swoops across the country for hundreds of miles on end at over a mile a minute. At sea he has more than doubled his speed. The result is, that although space has not been abolished, every one is nearer neighbours with every one else. The world has become perceptibly smaller. Nations are to one another now almost as parishes were in the last century. It is true, as Mr. Havelock Ellis makes one of his Utopians remark somewhat bitterly, when speaking of the men of the Nineteenth Century: "Although it was the custom at that time to write letters, they had no international postage; and though they were always travelling they had no international coinage, and though nations were of more importance than we can conceiveand therefore the need of inter-communication a primary necessity—they had no international language. I do not see how you can speak of civilisation under such con-But that a conception like that of internationalism as a practical reality should have dawned upon the minds of men, was due to the success with which steam has been tamed and converted into the carrier of mankind.

THE VICTORIES OF SCIENCE.

Steam was in the ascendant from 1825 to 1875. From 1875 to the end of the Century electricity has been steadily Professor Alfred advancing to the leading position. Russell Wallace, in his most interesting book, "The Wonderful Century,"-a fascinating survey of a great scientific period by a great man of science, -maintains that, "to get any adequate comparison with the nineteenth century, we must take not only preceding centuries, but rather the whole preceding epoch of human history. Dr. Wallace hardly does justice to the discoveries and inventions of prehistoric man in his comparison between the achievements of the Nineteenth Century and those of all previous time. But his summary of "the theoretical discoveries of our time, which have extended our knowledge or widened our conception of the universe," may be quoted with advantage as a careful recapitulation by an eminent scientist of what science has achieved in the Nineteenth Century :-

1. The determination of the mechanical equivalent of heat, leading to the great principle of the Conservation of Energy.

2. The Molecular theory of gases.

3. The mode of direct measurement of the Velocity of Light, and the experimental proof of the Earth's Relation.

4. The discovery of the function of Dust in nature.

5. The theory of definite and multiple proportions in Chemistry.
6. The nature of Meteors and Comets, leading to the Meteoritic theory of the Universe.

7. The proof of the Glacial Epoch, its vast extent, and its effects upon the earth's surface.

8. The proof of the great Antiquity of Man.

The establishment of the theory of Organic Evolution.
 The Cell theory and the Recapitulation theory in Embryology.

11. The Germ theory of the Zymotic diseases.

12. The discovery of the nature and function of the White Blood-corpuscles.

DARWIN AND HIS INFLUENCE.

If the first part of the century was dominated by the genius of Napoleon, in its closing years the influence of Darwin was not less in the ascendant. The doctrine of evolution, with which his name is most prominently identified, may be regarded as the master dogma of the century. Its subtle influence is to be felt in every department of life. It has profoundly modified our conceptions of creation, and it is every day influencing more and more our ideas of morality. Men are asking, Why hesitate in consigning to a lethal chamber all idiots, lunatics, and hopeless incurables? And in the larger field of national politics, why should we show any mercy to the weak? Might becomes right. The unfit have no claim to survive. Wars of extermination seem to receive the approbation of nature. Mr. Rhodes is a Darwinian politician, although his application of the full dogma is checked by many considerations, some personal, others those of his environment. Nietzsche may be regarded as the first thinker to give the new tendency its full scope. We need not fear that mankind will take Nietzsche neat. But it seems by no means improbable that the twentieth century will be brought up in its earlier years on Nietzsche and water. The sun of the century rose, as it has set, in blood. It was the century of Napoleon and of Bismarck, nevertheless it was preeminently a humanitarian century.

HUMANITARIAN WARS.

Even its wars have been largely prompted by humanitarian emotion. The war for the liberation of Greece, which brought the Russians to Adrianople and sank the Turkish fleet at Navarino, was a war prompted by sympathy for the victims of Ottoman oppression. So, emphatically, was the war waged in 1877-78, as the result of the Bulgarian atrocities, and so, to come down to a still later date, was the American war for the liberation of Cuba. In all these cases the appeal was to the sentiment of pity and to the sentiment of justice. The waning of the force of this sentiment under the baleful shadow of the doctrine of, "Might makes right, the weakest to the wall, and to hell with the unfit," was conspicuously illustrated in the abandonment of the Armenians to the vengeance of Turk and Kurd, and cynically emphasised by the cordiality with which the Kaiser on his pilgrimage to Jerusalem tarried at Constantinople to eat bread and exchange compliments with the Great Assassin. The same doctrine was not less shamelessly invoked by many to justify the invasion of the territory of the Transvaal, and is even now brought forward to justify the attempted extermination of a nation and the extinction of an independent State, which they maintain has not justified its fitness to survive in the struggle for existence.

But it is not merely or even most conspicuously in wars that this humanitarian characteristic of the Nineteenth Century comes out in bold relief. Whatever evil deeds stand to its discredit, the Century can at least claim that it has given the death-blow to slavery.

RELIGION.

No survey of the history of the Nineteenth Century would be complete that did not bestow some attention to the drift of religious thought. The Century can hardly be described as par excellence a religious century. It has produced no great spiritual teacher, no Buddha, no

H

org Chr com The the bec: indi race eme pers pers the goa Dol soul befo

the

of i

and

White

by the ence of rine of y idenof the every d our encing sking, per all in the e unfit seem es is a he full rsonal, ay be ncy its take bbable earlier

entury

ury of pre-

w any manireece, ik the ed by So, result in to a

The The paleful t, the conf the , and h the h the Cons with t less on of ought they n the wars

eenth deeds h that ntury on to ardly . It a, no Mohammed, not even a Luther or a Loyala. In outward things the most notable achievement was the proclamation of the dogma of Papal Infallibility, which had as its counterpart on the other side the destruction of the temporal power of the Pope. The closing hour of the century is to witness a great watch-night service in St. Peter's at Rome, in which Leo XIII. will over the tomb of the apostles "unite two centuries in a solemn consecration of homage to Jesus Christ, the King of immortal ages."

A CHRIST-CENTRED CENTURY.

Herbert Spencer's conception of humanity as an organism without personality has enabled the Christian thinkers of the latter half of the century to present the Christian doctrine in a form which may more readily commend itself to modern students of social science. They contend that, as there must have been a point in the slow evolution of man from the brute when man first became human and acquired moral consciousness as an individual, so there was a moment in the history of the race when the New Man, or rather the new humanity, emerged, and, from being an organism unconscious of personality, acquired consciousness of unity and personality. This supreme moment, they contend, was the Incarnation. When God became incarnate man, the goal towards which the race had travelled through a Via Dolorosa of numberless æons was reached, and the Divine soul of the world was made manifest in Christ. As long before, the soulless brute became "man a living soul," so the race which heretofore had been an organism unaware of its personal unity was born anew with the Personality and the Soul, which was and is the living Christ of God. In Him were gathered up all the scattered rays of Deity which had gleamed through the darkness of the long past. Their source and focus, He became the Light of the World. He was revealed, what He eternally is, the Living Soul of Humanity-that humanity which, since His appearing, has shown itself as it is to-day, partly an organ responsive to His purpose, partly-perhaps preponderantly—a body of sin and death warring in all its members against the Soul which will some day bring all things to subjection unto its perfect Will. The vital religious movement of the century has been the dawning consciousness of the reality of the Christ-soul of mankind, the hope for the next century is that this consciousness will ripen more and more unto the perfect day.

THE COMING CATHOLICISM.

The foundations of the old faith have been shaken, and men's hearts do not exactly fail them for fear, but they are looking round for an impregnable rock on which to take their stand. They see clearly that a good deal of stubble, and chaff, and sand will have to fly before they can get down to bed-rock. Modern science has accustomed them to constantly verified and re-verified experimental demonstration of truth. The mind craves for as veritable a basis for the faith of the future. Is it possible that such a gift may be awaiting us in the century that is come? The hope that we may be on the eve of the discovery of a wider synthesis which will unveil to the wistful eve of man a real Catholicism, and display the essential unity which pervades all the religions of all the world, is in itself a prophecy of what may be in store for us. "God itself a prophecy of what may be in store for us. wills, man hopes," said the poet, and the mere aspiration after the advent of such a thing may be one of the agencies helping to bring it about. The remarkable gathering known as the Parliament of Religions, that met at Chicago seven years ago, foreshadowed the realisation of such an ideal. In the coming centuries it may be that the Parliament of Religions will loom more largely than the Œcumenical Council which decreed the infallibility of the Pope. The unity of mankind once recognised as the necessary correlative of the unity of God, and much at present chimerical becomes attainable. "One is your Father, and all ye are brethren," is the first article of the religion of the future. From that, all the rest may be deduced. Fatherhood in man alone can render possible the realising faith in the Fatherhood of God. Thus the mysterious law of wedded love, the infinite attraction of sex and its resultant in the mother and the child, is revealed as the primæval Sinai of all religions that have been, that are, or that ever will be. How dare I conclude this survey of the century and its teachings without saying once more what was given me to say years ago in Holloway Gaol, and saying it too with a conviction that grows deeper with advancing years: "Be a Christ!" In these three words are summed up the vital essence of the Christian creed, and who knows but that in the twentieth century it may be possible to advance some steps nearer to the realisation of that ideal Church—the Union of all who Love in the Service of all who Suffer?

GEORGE PEABODY.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

ROBERT E. LEE.

HORACE MANN.

PETER COOPER.

SOME PROMINENT AMERICANS OF THE CENTURY.

MASTER OF BRITISH MUSIC.

THE LATE SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

BY the death of Sir Arthur Sullivan, whose name has become a household word, British music and British musicians have sustained a severe loss. No contemporary British composer can boast such a brilliant and successful career as Sullivan has had from his earliest days. With his remarkable versatility and sweet melody he has been enabled to appeal to the ublic in almost every form of music-in the hymn, the anthem, the oratorio, the cantata, the simple song, the opera, and orchestral music—and it has been given to no other of our native composers to provide so much enjoyment and innocent delight to so large and mixed an audience. In which form of his art he succeeded best really matters little: some are more moved by the pathos of his songs, church music, and serious work;

others are inclined to believe he has achieved greater things for humanity in his tuneful light operas.

According to Mr. Willeby,

the magic of his music lies in its intense sympathy, its true sincerity of feeling, and probably he is right. In a brief sketch it is impossible to do more than indicate one or two landmarks in the composer's career. The short notice in Grove's "Dictionary" is, like the "Dictionary" itself, now hopelessly outof-date, but in "Masters of English Music," written a few years ago by Mr.

Charles Willeby (Harper and Brothers), Sullivan is accorded the place of honour, and more recently still, Mr. Arthur Lawrence has provided us with a "Life" (James Bowden). In addition, there are one or two interviews published in different periodicals, and "A Chapter of Autobiography" contributed to M. A. P. From these sources, it will perhaps be best to single out a few points of interest, letting the composer tell his story in his own words as far as possible.

"I SANG AND CONQUERED,"

When I was not more than four or five years old (says Sir Arthur), it became perfectly evident that my career in life must be in music and in nothing else.

My great ambition was to become a member of the choir of either the Chapel Royal or Westminster Abbey. My father did not think the education good enough, however, and opposed this wish. In vain I urged: "Purcell was an Abbey boy." "Yes," replied my father, "but Beethoven wasn't, nor was the Duke of Wellington."

I was sent to a school in Bayswater, and there worried my excellent old master until he consented to take me to see Sir George Smart, the organist and composer of the Chapel Royal. Dear old Sir George received me kindly, heard me sing "With Verdure Clad." in which I accompanied myself, patted me on the head, and sent me at once to see Mr, Helmore, the master of the Chapel, Royal boys. dragged my poor old master thither, was examined, sang, and promptly obtained the boon I coveted. an da A

do

let

R

ma

the

al

int

Be

alı

co

sti

an

me

th

Cı

in afi

of

he

m eff

th

no

Sp

afi

na

While still a choir-boy. Sir Arthur made his first attempts at composition-"O Israel" (song) and an anthem. In a letter written at the time, he says :-

When I had composed my anthem I showed it to Sir George Smart, who told me it did me great credit, and also told me to get the parts copied out, and he would see what he could do with it. So I copied them out, and he desired the sub-dean to have it sung, and it was sung. The dean was there in the evening, and he called me up to him in the vestry and said it was very clever, and said that perhaps I should be writing an oratorio some day. But he said there was something higher to attend to, and then Mr. Helmore said that I was a very good boy indeed. Whereupon he (the sub-dean, ex-officio Bishop Bloomfield) shook hands with me with half a sovereign.

Photograph by]

Sir Arthur Sullivan.

[Elliott and Frv.

Sir Arthur, it is said, always wore the coin round his neck as a talisman while composing.

FIRST MENDELSSOHN SCHOLAR.

When I was about fourteen (Sullivan continues) I heard that a competitive examination would take place at the Royal Academy of Music for a scholarship founded in memory of Mendelssohn.

There was a large number of competitors, as was only to be expected, and when I saw them I almost gave up all hope of success. However when it came to the last day of the examination, it was announced that the scholarship lay between the oldest and the youngest of the competitors. I was the youngest. The oldest was Joseph Barnby. During that long summer day Barnby and I were put through a most searching final examinaon. At the close the judges reserved their decision.
"We shall make known the result to-morrow," said one of "The successful competitor will receive a letter, announcing that he is the winner of the scholarship.

I spent the day in a fever of excitement. Every time I heard a knock at the door my heart was in my mouth. The day wore on, but still no letter. I was beginning to lose hope. At last, rat-tat! The postman's knock. It was unmistakable. I crept into the hall. The maid-servant passed by me, and went to the letter-box.

"A letter for you, Master Sullivan," she said.

I took it from her, tore it open, and then-I had won it! . I don't think I ever felt such joy in my life. I have that precious letter now, framed and hung on my wall, with other pleasant reminders of happy bygone days.

It was arranged that I should continue in the Chapel Royal, as my voice had not yet "broke," and pursue my studies at the Royal Academy at the same time.

I worked fairly hard, and in the following summer I received a letter informing me that in consequence of the progress I had made, my scholarship had been extended for another year. the end of my second year at the Academy, it was again allotted to me, in order that I might go abroad and study at the Conservatorium at Leipzig.

The training I received in Germany during the next two and a half years was invaluable to me. I went to Leipzig at a very interesting time. In England, before I left, nothing was right but Mendelssohn. At Leipzig I found a bitter war waging between the admirers of Mendelssohn and those of Schumann. Besides these, there were the partisans of Wagner, who were already beginning to insist that he was the greatest of all composers, past, present, and to come.

MUSIC IN ENGLAND IN THE SIXTIES.

When I returned to London in 1861, I found that musical opinion had not moved in any direction during the last two years and a half that I had been absent. Mendelssohn was still the sole representative of modern music that met with anything like cordial approbation.

Cipriani Potter was then at the head of the Royal Academy of Music. He was a fine musician, and had known Beethoven well. I came to him full of my ideas alout Schumann and Schubert and Wagner. Cipriani Potter was terribly disappointed in me.
"I'm very sorry about Sullivan," he used to say. "Going to Germany has ruined him!"

"But, Mr. Potter," said I to him one day, "have you ever heard any of this music that you are condemning?"
"Well—no, I haven't," replied he; "but—"

"Will you play over some of Schumann's symphonies with me? I have them arranged for four hands."

He willingly agreed, and I went to his home night after night and played them with him. At the end of three months he was a blind worshipper of Schumann. About this time, too, I made the acquaintance of George Grove, who was the secretary of the Crystal Palace, and of August Manns, the conductor of the concerts there. I showed them Schumann's First Symphony in B flat-and they were so struck that they gave it shortly afterwards at one of the Crystal Palace winter concerts.

Well, about this time music began to go ahead, and get out of the monotonous respectability that had kept it back for some time . . . We made music move in England, and put life into it.

OPUS I.

A bright future for Sullivan was predicted at Leipzig. The success of an overture and a string quartet which he composed at the Conservatorium, and the encouragement he received from Spohr, spurred him on to further effort. He would write something which should prove to the Mendelssohn Scholarship Committee that they had not misjudged his powers :-

My first published work was the music I wrote to Shake-speare's "Tempest," when I was eighteen years of age, and it was the performance of this work (at the Crystal Palace), a year after I returned to England, in 1862, which first brought my name before the public at all prominently. This was the great day of my life!

It was about 1872 that the Gilbert-Sullivan collaboration began. Fourteen operas are the outcome of this partnership. Most of them are too well known to call for any comment, but it is curious to learn that "Pinafore," one of the most popular, should have fallen flat in this country at first. In America it caught on at once. The music of this piece, generally thought to be so merry and spontaneous, was written during a most distressing illness. On the whole, "The Mikado" is perhaps the greatest favourite with the public; the composer's verdict was in favour of "The Gondoliers."

HOW THE MUSICIAN COMPOSES.

Each composer, no doubt, has his peculiar method of work, but the following account, given by Sullivan himself, of the manner in which his compositions were written will be of interest :-

Of course the use of the piano would limit me terribly, and as to the inspirational theory, although I admit that sometimes a happy phrase will occur to one quite unexpectedly rather than as the result of any definite reasoning process, musical composition, like everything else, is the outcome of hard work, and there is really nothing speculative nor spasmodic about it.

The first thing I have to decide upon is the rhythm, and I arrange the rhythm before I come to the question of melody. My first aim has always been to get as much originality as possible in the rhythm, approaching the question of melody afterwards. Of course melody may come before rhythm with other composers, but it is not so with me. If I feel that I cannot get the accent right in any other way, I mark out the metre in dots and dashes, and it is only after I have decided the rhythm that I proceed to notation.

My first work—the jotting down of the melodies—I term "sketches." They are hieroglyphics which, possibly, would seem undecipherable. It is my musical shorthand, and, of course, it means much to me. When I have finished these sketches the creative part of my work is completed. After that comes the orchestration, which is, of course, a very essential part of the whole work, and entails some severe manual labour. Apart from getting into the swing of composition, it is often an hour before my hand is steady enough to shape the notes well and with sufficient rapidity. When I have made a beginning, and with sufficient rapidity. however, I work very rapidly.

You must remember that a piece of music which will only take two minutes in actual performance—quick time—may necessitate two or three days' hard work in the mere manual labour of orchestration, apart from the question of composition.

The literary man can avoid sheer manual labour in a number of ways, but you cannot dictate musical notation to a secretary. Every note must be written in your own hand, there is no other way of getting it done; and so you see every opera means four or five hundred folio pages of music, every crotchet and quaver of which has to be written out by the composer. Then, again, your ideas are pages and pages ahead of your poor overworked

When the "sketch" is completed, which means writing, rewriting, and alterations of every description, the work is drawn out in so-called "skeleton score," that is, with all the vocal parts, rests for symphonies, etc., completed, but without a note of accompaniment or instrumental work of any kind, although, naturally, I have all that in mind.

Then the voice parts are written out by the copyist, and the rehearsals begin. On those occasions I vamp an accompaniment, or, in my absence, the accompanist of the theatre does so. It is not until the music has been thoroughly learnt, and the rehearsals on the stage, with the necessary action and "business," are well advanced, that I begin orchestration.

As soon as the orchestration is finished, the band parts are copied, two or three rehearsals of the orchestra only are held, then the orchestra and voices together, without any stage business or action; and, finally, three or four full rehearsals of the complete work on the stage are enough to prepare the work for presentation to the public.

boy." vas the ed my ntil he to see rganist Chapel George ard me Clad," d myhead, to see ster of

ys. master sang, d the r-boy. s first

tion-

nd an vritten ed my to Sir l me it id also copied what

So I desired sung, e dean g, and im in as very erhaps ratorio

d there attend re said d boy e (the Bishop is with rd that Royal nd his

ory of to be ope of aminaen the ingest.

er day minaone of

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

HOW TO MAKE PEACE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

POR the last twelve months the great problem of the day in Great Britain has been how to make war in South Africa. Ministers and nation are now waking up to the discovery that it is of even greater importance to find out how to make peace in South Africa. At present we have had nothing but a long scries of object-lessons as to how not to do it, and unless there is an immediate and total change in the methods adopted, we shall be discussing this time twelvemonth the same old question, without any prospect of coming nearer to a satisfactory result.

A YEAR OF ILLUSIONS AND DISILLUSIONS.

There are signs that at last the British public is awakening to a sense of how it has been befooled in South Africa. At every stage in the long tragedy of our recent South African policy, the British public has been deluded by false promises, and induced to part with its money on false pretences. If we look back for the last eighteen months we can see that every single assurance given to us by the Government has been falsified by events. Everything that we were told would happen has not happened. Never was a Government so loyally supported by a credulous nation. We have, indeed, lived through a period of illusion and disillusion. It might have been thought that the inadvertent confession blurted out by Mr. Chamberlain during the campaign—when he declared that he believed in his soul that, if only he could have convinced President Kruger that he was in earnest, there would have been no war-would have sufficed to wipe all the rubbish about the great Afrikander Conspiracy from the minds of his dupes. It is evident that, if the turning-point of peace or war was a conviction in Mr. Kruger's mind that Mr. Chamberlain was in earnest, he could not possibly have deliberately meditated a war single-handed against the whole force of the British Empire. Yet the public was proof even against that confession of fraudulent pretence, upon which our attack on the Transvaal was justified. "For faith, fanatic faith, once wedded fast to some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last," and the tenacity with which the British public has clung to the delusion under which it was led to make the war, has hitherto been proof against every demonstration of the falsity of the hopes based upon Ministerial assurances.

"THE UNENDING WAR."

Continual dropping, however, will wear away a stone, and the cumulative effects of the successive disappointments at last is beginning to make itself felt in the public mind. Nothing has done so much to drive the conviction home to the people that they have been outrageously deceived, as the evidence served up hot by the Ministerial papers morning and evening that the war, which they had been told was ended months ago, is still raging as fiercely as ever in South Africa. General Buller has come home, General Robert's is coming home; but they have left their task undone. Their failure is conspicuous in the eyes of all men. No amount of making believe can stand against such evidence as that afforded by the victory of Dewetsdorp that the war is not over.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC OPINION.

Equally mendacious, we are now beginning to discover, were the pretences of these returning generals that there was nothing left to be done in South Africa beyond mere police work-the repression of some wandering bands of bushrangers or brigands. It is now evident that the Government of the Dutch Republics exists, that we are face to face with a regularly organised army under orders of two generals of rare ability, and that we are as far off the effective occupation of the territories we have overrun as possible. The consequence is that there is a growing restlessness on the part of the general public and a corresponding feeling of anxiety and depression in Ministerial quarters. For evidence of this there is no need to go far afield. When we have journals which boasted that they had made the war, proclaiming in hysterical tones that the situation in South Africa is more dangerous and menacing than it has been ever since the famous week of last December, even the dullest man in the street begins to discern that he has been befooded. He is very far from being penitent. At present he spurns the very suggestion that the whole of the war from first to last has been a ghastly blunder and an inexcusable crime: but he is beginning to see that things are not going as he hoped they would go, and, what is worse, he does not see any chance of their improving in the future. So he is angry and irritated, and the December session of Parliament, which has been summoned for the purpose of providing more money for the insatiable maw of the war, is bringing his discontent and dissatisfaction to a head. Of course, he vows as loudly as ever that he will put it through, cost what it may: but a suspicion that the game is not worth the candle is beginning to dawn upon many minds hitherto impervious to any such suggestion.

THE POLICY OF DEVASTATION.

Nothing has done so much to develop this feeling and to quicken the sluggish conscience of the community as the evidence which has been published last month concerning the policy of devastation which is being pursued in the Transvaal. The ordinary British Philistine can tolerate a great deal, but it galls him to know that in the universal opinion of the civilised world, he is waging a war unparalleled for its barbarity since the devastation of the Palatinate. In his complacent Pharisaism he loved to imagine that he was setting an example to civilisation by the humanity and chivalry with which he was conducting operations; and to discover that the humanity and chivalry have evaporated, and that nothing is left but a ruthless savagery at which even Germans stand aghast, makes him very much inclined to swear at somebody. At first, of course, he swears at the pro-Boers, who, he maintains with plentiful lack of evidence, are entirely responsible for the prolongation of the war. If only all the pro-Boers in England, he tells us, could have been gagged, the war would have been over long ago. This is very complimentary to the influence of this outnumbered and feeble remnant, but unfor-tunately we cannot accept this tribute to our in-fluence which is absolutely non-existent. The real reasor what is bec prolon Boers Britain own p has be in the Comm 1 imes hellish South opens every things going South . there spect will e if we presen that someth be do wise th spread Colony shall 1 Africa.

THE O

to aver summa only wa to stop frankly our sir our st reparat mischie have do profoun ful to 1 which g affairs it has a to get o preser without than th prestige pletely doing a which w berlain we did t heart, e confessi repenta South A retain S doubtful

settleme mutual ago has reason why the struggle in South Africa has become what the Daily News calls an "unending war" is because every conceivable step has been taken to prolong the struggle, and to render it impossible for the Boers to reconcile themselves to the authority of Great Britain. The evidence supplied by General Roberts's own proclamations, supplemented and illustrated, as it has been, by the admirable letter from a British Officer in the field, which was published by the Stop-the-War Committee, and a letter which Mr. Morley sent to the Times, from Miss Cronje, have cast a lurid light over the hellish panorama which appals the gaze of mankind in South Africa. So it has come to pass that Parliament opens with an uneasy feeling, unuttered or unexpressed, in flageking b

Warrentin

Kimberle

| Sush of | Sungas Rote | |
| Oct | + Oct | Oct |
| Details | Color |
| Color | Color |
| Colo

Oct. Wepener

Springfontin Smithield
Od 15 Dethulie Roukin

Octio

things are not going well in South Africa, that there is no prospect that they will ever mend, if we go on the present tack, and that therefore something must be done, otherwise the war will spread to the Cape Colony, and we shall lose South Africa.

THE ONLY WAY OUT.

Now if we wish to avert this consummation, the only way in which to stop the war is frankly to confess our sins, retrace our steps, make reparation for the mischief which we have done, and be profoundly grate-ful to the Power which governs the affairs of men, if it has allowed us to get out of the present mess without other loss than that of our military reputation and our moral prestige. These have both gone by the board so completely that it will take many long years of patient welldoing and heroic effort to replace us in the position in which we stood at the time when suspicion of Mr. Chamberlain forced the Boers to present their ultimatum. But if we did that, did it frankly, boldly, and with a truly penitent heart, everything might be re-established. Short of such confession of sins and bringing forth fruits meet for repentance, I do not see any way of averting the loss of South Africa. We may, and I hope we shall, be able to retain Simons Bay and Capetown, but even that will be doubtful unless we promptly retrace our steps. A settlement which might have been worked to the mutual advantage of both combatants three months ago has now become impossible. So long as the combat

Westminster Gazette.)

was fought out between soldiers and burghers, in what may be described as legitimate warfare, there was always a possibility that an arrangement might be come to, which, while securing British paramountcy, would have left the Boers all that they wished in the way of independent local self-government. But the events of the last three months, and especially the wholesale burning of farmsteads and the war which is being waged upon women and children by the soldiers of the Queen, have, I fear, removed the realisation of this hope from the pale of practical politics. The torch of the incendiary and the dynamite so freely employed to devastate Boer homes have embittered the race-feud to such a point that it is doubtful whether even Mr. Rhodes, if he were restored to power and were to revert frankly to his old Afrikander · Dorigatha Oct.t. policy, would be · Hrusty's Fall Od 1. + Lypenburg Nooyth able to save the situation. At the same time, for the benefit OCT 12 Deptets How Preferia those who refuse Oct 12 Dujite most of the control of contemplate any retracing of our steps or any Sensor Resours D Possessor Was and Standard Nor of Ermold 2 Oct of Standard Nor of Ermold 2 Oct of Standard Nor of Ermold 2 Oct of Standard Nor of Ermold Nor of Standard Nor confession of our sins, or any restitution, it may be Mip R. Oct 16. worth while to consider what might be done in Maronson Touy

Mod 19 (Mollers Process

Col 30 + Oct 30

Mersburg (Mollers Process

Mov 19

Oct 30

Mersburg (Mollers Process

Mov 19

Oct 30

Oct 36

Mar 5 the way of pacification other than (Vryheid) the method which the Roman his-Jenetral Nov. 6 torian so bitterly satirised when he said: "They + FICASberg Nav. 6 make a solitude and call it peace." For myself, I have MAP abosing the present areas of disturb Transcall and Orange Mess Colony. Deep of a place is enclosed in a reclaim ion since the first week in October last, names are surmanuscled by a cross, actoo is indicated—distance or given (.) each case lines show the radiance. no hope, not the least, that anything which may done, short of doing right, honestly and fully and without reservation, and with the thankful has been left to us in which to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, will save our empire in South Africa.

heart that room

IS THERE ANY ALTERNATIVE?

But for those who have determined to persist in the annexation of the Republics, it may be worth while to consider any policy which has even an off-chance of securing the interests to defend which we went to war. That the present system of terrorism is hopeless need hardly be discussed. It was in June that Lord Roberts issued the infamous order which authorised the burning of all farms within five miles distance of any place where a Boer army interrupted railway or telegraph com-munications. To injure or to cut a telegraph is the most legitimate of all operations of war. Never before has any invader ventured upon so monstrous an injustice as the are ders every mind that r off have here neral and e of have war outh has even cern from very t to able orse, the nber r the maw ction t he cion g to such

not over.

here mere ds of

and y as onth eing itish n to orld, e the cent tting and era-but tand r at pronce. war. ould long e of

and

nforinreal

Photograph by a British Officer.]

Boer Farmhouse about to be destroyed.—Soldiers looting chickens.

that of holding the civil population in the neighbourhood responsible for the actions of an army in the field. Lord Roberts, "whose humanity is so well known," has been guilty of this atrocity, and he and Lord Kitchener have had nearly six months in which to enforce this savage edict, without any interference either from Government or from public opinion. The only possible justification for such savagery would be success; but this policy of devastation has not succeeded. On the contrary, so far from succeeding, it has emphasised our failure, and done more than anything else to swell the ranks of the Boers in the field against us.

WHOM ARE WE FIGHTING?

There are people in Africa with whom we cannot make peace. These people may therefore for the moment be left out of consideration. Our problem is not to deny their existence. It may even be, as some maintain, our duty to put them out of existence by the simple process of killing them off, as if they were mad dogs-a policy which finds great acceptance in many newspaper offices just now. But obviously the first thing is to reduce the numbers of those irreconcilables as much as possible by other means than that of slaughter. The reason why our recent policy stands condemned is because it proceeded upon exactly the opposite tack. It has from first to last played into the hands of the extreme irreconcilable Boer, and instead of endeavouring to reduce his numbers by policy, in order to facilitate the suppression of the irreconcilables by force, our administrators and generals have acted as if there was nothing they desired so much as to force every Boer in South Africa into the commandoes of Botha and De Wet. We have now various declarations from General Buller to the effect that the solid people who have a stake in the country are sick of the war, and that those who are carrying it on are the landless people who are penniless, and who are waging war to inflict, as Sir Alfred Milner says, the maximum injury upon the Empire. That may be so; but our policy ever since the occupation of Pretoria has been to drive the solid men into the arms of the desperadoes.

WHO IS IT THAT RECRUITS FOR THE BOERS?

This has been done in various ways, in the various methods which have been adopted for the purpose of crushing the rebellion by rigour. As Mr. We'sels, the Boer delegate in Europe, said the other day with perfect truth in Paris, "there would not be nearly so many men in the ranks of De Wet, if it had not been for your houseburning policy." As long as a farmer has anything to lose, he has an interest in sticking to his farm, and he has the strongest possible motive for wishing the war to come to an end as speedily as possible. According to some authorities who profess to speak confidently as to the number of burghers who are in this mood, ninety per cent. of the burghers of the wish for nothing so much as to stop the war, and get back to their pastoral avocations. But how have we been treating those ninety per cent. who are our natural allies, and whom it ought to have been our object to wean by every possible means from the fighting, irreconcilable section?

THE FATUITY OF OUR POLICY.

The answer to that question is to be found in Lord Roberts's proclamations, which, excepting the first, seem to have been framed for the express purpose of driving the maximum number of the 90 per cent. well-disposed Boers into the arms of the fighting minority. Lord Roberts began well; his intentions were good, although the methods in which he carried them out were mistaken. He announced that burghers who would take the oath of neutrality and give up their arms would not be interfered with. As he himself reports, a great number of the Boers responded to this appeal, gave up their arms, and came back to their families, and hoped that, for them, at least, the tribulation of the war was over. What happened?

THE ALLEGED OATH-BREAKING.

Although he had pledged the good faith of England to the non-molestation of these burghers, he lent himself to a policy which he may justify by what excuses he pleases, but which to the men who trusted his word appeared the grossest bad faith. No sooner had the burgher given up his arms, and seated himself on his farm, than his Kaffirs, who wished to curry favour with the conquering power, denounced their old master, and on no better evidence than the accusation of a Kaffir, parties of troops were sent out who seized the burgher who had surrendered, and carried him and his sons off to Bloemfontein, from whence they were deported to Ceylon. do not say that this was done in very many cases, but it was done quite often enough to fill the burghers who had taken the oath of neutrality with a conviction that they were dealing with a faithless power, and no one knew how soon his turn would come next. Burgher after burgher, after taking the oath of neutrality, was seized upon one pretext or another, and deported to Ceylon. Their neighbours, seeing that this process was going on, naturally felt that the promises of Lord Roberts were not worth the paper upon which they were written, and took the first chance of rejoining the commandoes still in the field. It may be said that this was a violation of their oath, but seeing that these oaths were sometimes extorted at the mouth of a revolver, and that the other party to the contract had repeatedly broken his undertaking b, depo than surpr on th to ret bad f were

Bu

situa

in th

of So

Emp

has 1 positi

we at

Weh

have army and the p other Kruge Gove about that opera occup annex Free territo our se peril o any of deporting the burghers on no better evidence of guilt than the unsupported word of their Kaffirs, it is not surprising that it needed comparatively little persuasion on the part of De Wet and others to induce the deserters to return to their ranks. Of course it may be said to be bad faith, but from the point of view of the burghers, they were not the first to begin the breaking of their word.

HOW THINGS STAND TO-DAY.

But it is not necessary to go into these matters. The situation in South Africa has arrived at a point when, in the interests of both combatants, in the interest of South Africa, and above all in the interest of the Empire, we should ask ourselves whether the time has not come for readjusting our policy to the altered position of affairs. It may clear the ground somewhat if we attempt to survey the situation as we find it to-day. We have now been at war nearly fourteen months. We have put forth our Imperial strength, concentrated an army of over 200,000 men in our South African Colonies, and have used this force with such effect that at the present moment we have destroyed all authority other than our own in the two Republics. President Kruger is an exile in Europe; the Boer Executive Government has ceased to exist; Mr. Steyn's whereabouts are not known; and we are officially informed that the war, since the suspension of regular military operations, is at an end. Nevertheless, although we occupied Bloemfontein and Pretoria, and have formally annexed both the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, there is not at present one square yard of territory, in either of the Republics, outside the range of our sentries, on which an Englishman can pass without peril of being shot. There is not a train passes along any of the railways that reaches its destination without having been under fire. Every day the rails are displaced, and the permanent way injured; and although these injuries are rapidly repaired, each accident of the kind emphasises the fact that our authority is strictly confined to the area within the range of our rifles. Within the Republics, it is not too much to say that universal anarchy prevails up to the very suburbs of Pretoria and Johannesburg. Industry is impossible; the resumption of operations on the Rand is out of the question; and every day brings us news of collisions with the hostile bands of Boers, the majority of which may be mere bush-ranging marauders, who prey impartially upon both Boer and Briton; but a nucleus remains, variously estimated at from 1,000 to 3,000 men, who constitute what may be described as the old guard of the Republics, Dopper Boers, who are regularly organised for war under the supreme control of the Commander-in-Chief, who directs their operations in accordance with a regular plan of campaign, and whose commandoes are usually accompanied by artillery.

Outside the Republic, we are maintaining day by day as prisoners of war, in St. Helena, Ceylon, and Cape Colony, a force of from 15,000 to 20,000 male Boers. In the Transvaal, under the protection of our camps, and at Port Elizabeth, we have great numbers of women and children, also held as prisoners of war, but of whose numbers no full return has yet been received.

In Northern Natal the hostile bands of Boers show sufficient activity to render the railway communications unsafe; and in the northern parts of Cape Colony great apprehension is expressed concerning a sudden descent of General De Wet for the purpose of war into the enemy's territory. Throughout the whole of Cape Colony there is universal agreement that the hostility of the Dutch colonists to the Imperial Government was

Photograph by a British Officer.]

The Boer Farmhouse Blown Up.

e authohidently
ers who er cent.
cansvaal as to to their w have ety per allies, we been possible irrecon-

ur. As gate in perfect

not be

ks of De r house-farmer interest has the wishing speedily

found cepting express 90 per fighting centions ed them ers who cir arms ports, a al, gave d hoped var was rland to nself to pleases, red the r given nan his quering better rties of er who Bloemvlon. I ses, but ers who on that no one er after seized Ceylon.

of their extorted party to king b, oing on, vere not ad took never before so intense; and although no active outbreak is apprehended everyone agrees that we may safely calculate upon our Dutch fellow-subjects adopting every method which the wit of man can devise for embarrassing, weakening and paralysing the Imperial authorities. The situation is declared by some to be worse than it has ever been since the war broke out, that is to say, it is more perilous to the Empire, and fraught with less hope for the future.

A WAR-SODDEN ARMY.

On the other side, we have an army of 200,000 men of whom the majority may be described as war-seasoned veterans, but who contain a minority of what may be described as war-sodden men who have lost the go, the elasticity, and the energy with which they entered upon the campaign; and as they cannot be relied upon for efficient service in the field, demands are being made for their immediate replacement by fresh troops from home. The cost of the war in actual money outlay, without reckoning any expenditure for wear and tear and the replacing of material and the preparations necessary for increasing the standing army, is £1,250,000 per week, or close upon £180,000 a day—a sum which those interested in statistics have ciphered out to amount to £125 a minute from week's end to week's end. The question for discussion among practical men who have to face the situation as it stands to-day, is whether this expenditure of £125 a minute brings us any nearer the goal which we have in view. I am expressing the opinion of many of those who have studied the subject closely for months past at the seat of war, when I say that instead of nearing our goal, it is at this moment receding further into the distance; and there is no reason to believe if we go steadily on on our present lines, that the situation will be any less serious twelve months hence than it is to-day.

THE ALTERNATIVE OF ATROCITY.

This is, indeed, universally admitted, but while everyone agrees that something further must be tried, there is no such agreement as to what that something should be. There are, roughly speaking, two alternatives. The first is that of resorting to increased severity. This finds favour chiefly with the military, and with journalists who have no stake in the country, and whose one idea of dealing with a difficult situation is to cry out for more and more rigour. "Brutality and Extermination" are the watchwords of this school, with "a free hand for Kitchener." Now that the rule "whenever you see a head, hit it," may be sound policy in some cases is not denied, but it is essential for the success of such a scheme that the head should stop in one place long enough to receive your blow. But that is precisely what it will not do. The more the country is denuded, the greater the difficulty of transport, and the greater the advantage of the more mobile and lightly equipped force. At present we fail to catch De Wet or to lay hands upon the Boer bush-rangers, for the simple reason that we are chasing a horse with an ox. The Boer travels light, and like the moss-trooper of the border, has no impedimenta beyond those which he carries at his saddle-bow; while the British column is tied by the leg to the ox-waggons which carry its supplies. But even if this were not the case, it should never be forgotten that we profess that we have gone into the country to stay there. A policy of scuttle is repudiated on all hands. Hence, while we may make a solitude and call it peace, it is not in our own interest to have a desert on our hands when we begin the work of reconstruction.

CAN WE KILL OUT THE BOERS?

This, however, might be a possible policy if we could exterminate the whole race-men, women, and children. To make thorough short work by reducing the personnel of the Boers to a vanishing point by the prolonged process of attrition recommended early in the war by Mr. Winston Churchill, is not a policy likely to commend itself to any party in this country at the present time. We came very near carrying it out in Ireland in the days of Elizabeth; but even there we left a remnant in the land sufficiently numerous to make the Irish question a perennial source of difficulty to the Empire. What Elizabeth's generals failed to do, Lord Kitchener is not likely to accomplish, even if he were given carte blanche to massacre the population and devastate the country. However attractive the policy of increased severity may appear to the unthinking, it will be found on examination to aggravate every evil from which we are at present suffering, while at the same time it will dangerously excite against us the opinion of the civilised world.

If, therefore, we cannot adopt a policy of atrocity with any hope of permanent or even temporary success, we are shut up to consider the other alternative.

SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

I now come to deal with the practical suggestions as to what might be done within the lines of the Government policy to improve the present difficult and dangerous position in South Africa. If it is to be taken for granted by those in whose hands the decision of the question lies, that the policy of annexation is irrevocable, and that never again shall we allow an independent authority to be established between Cape Colony and the Zambesi, we must ask, Can anything be done to bring the war to an end? The question then arises how can we best secure the acceptance of this irrevocable decision by the Boers who are at present in arms, and by their sympathisers in the Cape and Natal, from whom they receive unlimited moral support, and who may be tempted, if the struggle lasts much longer, to afford them support of a more material description?

OFFER TERMS FOR SURRENDER.

The first suggestion which I venture to make refers to the impolicy of confounding a determination to annex the Republics with a demand for the unconditional surrender of the Boers now in arms against us. Unconditional surrender sounds well in melodrama; but what practical advantage does it give us? Its disadvantage is obvious enough. A demand for unconditional surrender can be represented as involving a liability on the part of those who surrender to be sent across the sea to St. Helena or to Ceylon; but no one in this country would wish to maintain the whole Dutch population of the two Republics permanently at the expense of the British taxpayer. To board, feed, and clothe 250,000 persons in perpetuity at the Imperial expense is not a consummation desired by anyone. If, therefore, we do not intend to transport the Boers, why should we not say so? great American Civil War was fought to a finish, and General Grant summoned General Lee to surrender, he was met by a demand on the part of the Confederates for terms. Did he insist upon unconditional surrender? Nothing of the kind. General Grant at once responded to General Lee's appeal by writing out the terms upon which he was willing to receive the submission of the army of Northern Virginia. He demanded the surrender of all arms, artillery and public property in the possession of the army; and then he assure of the own hat Ap Secess standing mande the firm policy proclaim those with the second standing proclaim that the second standing proclaim the second standing proclaim the second standing proclaim the second standing proclaim the second standing st may be terms t insist politica Of c sugges to deal Boers 1 their ac that su comma conditi of the 1 to be Mr. Go of the a " Come overtur abando mercies May it stipulat

The

Havi now con and con they lay restorat scheme the Boe ment ag by offer Firstl assump territory such a con

internat

into reb Secor rebels is on more be purs persiste tion of granting despatc Ambass victions of copin in that nowada opinion he ough the cour insurger

assured every officer and soldier in the enemy's camp of their personal freedom and unmolested return to their own homes. On receiving these terms, their surrender at Appomatox Court-house followed, and the War of Secession came to an end. Why should we insist upon standing more stiffly upon our dignity than the Commander-in-Chief of the Northern Army? Is not, therefore, the first thing to be done to waive immediately that impolitic definand for unconditional surrender and to proclaim our readiness to grant honourable terms to all those who are in the field against us?

ould

ren.

unel

pro-

by

me.

lays

the n a hat

not iche

try.

nay

tion

sent usly

vith

we

s to

ent

osi-

by ies, hat

esi.

r to est

by neir

hey

be em

s to nex

nal

Un-

but dis-

on-ent in tch

the

ed.

the

by ort

the ish,

to

the mal

at

out

the

He

blic

he

DO NOT EXCLUDE THE LEADERS.

The second suggestion follows on the same lines. It may be said that there will be no objection to offer such terms to the rank and file of the Boers, but that we must insist upon exempting from any such offer all their political and military chiefs.

Of course, if this is insisted upon the value of the first suggestion falls to the ground. It is extremely difficult to deal with, or even to reach, the rank and file of the Boers now on commando. Our only chance of securing their acceptance of our offer, or even of making them aware that such an offer has been made, lies through their commanding officers; but if we insist as an inviolable condition that, while terms may be offered to the privates of the Boer army, their political and military chiefs have to be abandoned to our mercy, nothing can be done. Mr. Gould's admirable cartoon satirising the absurdity of the appeal of the European Powers to Prince Tuan to "Come and be killed," would apply equally to any overtures of pacification which were based upon the abandonment of the Boer chiefs to the uncovenanted mercies of General Kitchener and Mr. Chamberlain. May it not, therefore, be admitted that this impolitic stipulation or reservation will be withdrawn?

AMNESTY.

Having established these two preliminary points, I now come to the third, viz.: whether we can honourably and consistently offer to the Boers a general amnesty if they lay down their arms, including in its provisions their restoration to their farms, and the repudiation of any scheme of confiscation. It may be alleged by some that the Boers are rebels, and that it is not for the Government against which they are in revolt to bemean itself by offering amnesty. But,—

Firstly, the Boers can only be held to be rebels on the assumption that the proclamation of annexation in a territory which is not in our effective occupation, causes such a change in their status from the point of view of international law, as would convert legitimate belligerents into rebels; and,

Secondly, the policy of granting a complete amnesty to rebels is by no means unprecedented, and has been held on more than one occasion to be the soundest policy to be pursued by a sovereign Power embarrassed by the persistent opposition of its own subjects to the restoration of its authority. Those who protest against the granting of such an amnesty will do well to read the despatch which Lord John Russell sent to the British Ambassador in St. Petersburg, as embodying the convictions of the British Government as to the best method of coping with the Polish Rebellion. Lord John Russell in that despatch (which reads somewhat strangely nowadays) informed the Russian Emperor that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's advisers, the first thing which he ought to do in Poland to secure the pacification of the country, was to grant a complete amnesty to all the insurgents. The course which the British Government ventured to press upon the Russian Tsar in 1863 might reasonably be adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers in dealing with the quasi rebels of South Africa.

COMPENSATION ALL ROUND.

If this be admitted, the repudiation of confiscation follows as a matter of course, for it is indeed the corollary of the amnesty. To a landed Boer his estate is his country. To offer him an amnesty with one hand, and to confiscate his farm with the other, is to mock him with the shadow and deprive him of the substance.

Proceeding with my suggestions, I venture to submit that, if we decide to waive the demand for unconditional surrender, and are willing to proclaim a general amnesty and repudiate confiscation, it will be expedient to go a War to the bitter End.

Tommy: "Glad to stick up something hotter for a bit of a change, my lord."

step further, and, in the interest of the general pacification of the country, to proclaim that, animated by a sincere desire to induce both sides to agree that bygones shall be bygones, compensation should be made in full for all those who have suffered in war, whether British or Dutch. No doubt many objections can be raised to this by political pedants; but we are dealing with a grave problem which appears to be almost insoluble, and if we are to allow pedantic sticklers to interpose their veto; we may as well give up the whole business. Let us look at the matter from a practical point of view. Along the frontiers of the British Colonies, and over the whole area of the South African Republics, the war has resulted in wide-spread devastation. Dwelling-houses have been looted; the farming stock has been lifted; crops have been destroyed, and within the Republics a great number of farms have been given to the flames. Whether or not in every case such destruction of property was justified by the rules of war, or by the hard necessities of military operations, need not be here discussed. Rightly or wrongly, this work of devastation has gone on unchecked on both sides for twelve months and more. What we have now to do is to try and heal the wound. Why should we not propose, as part of our great pacificatory scheme, that all sufferers from the war shall be compensated; that every British colonist whose house has been looted by the Boer commandoes, or by the Kaffirs, who took advantage of the opportunities of war to possess themselves of the white man's goods, shall be re-established in his home, and that the same measure shall be dealt out to all the Boars who have suffered by the punitive operations of our armies?

WHAT WOULD IT COST?

I can well imagine the horror which will possess the souls of Treasury officials and of the high-flying lovalists at the proposal to compensate the Boers equally with our own colonists who suffered at the hands of the Boers. But it cannot be denied that, whatever guilt or criminality may attach to the rulers of the Republics, the rank and file of the population had no act or part in the decision that precipitated the war. But even if this is denied, we are not sitting as God Almighty on the judgment seat, meting out rewards and punishments according to the deserts of either party. We are face to face with a situation which tends every day to become worse, and which entails upon the British taxpayer an infinitely greater expense than would rebuild and refurnish every ruined homestead in South Africa. If the principle be once admitted, the question of cost will be seen to be comparatively insignificant. No precise information is accessible as to the number of farms that have been destroyed within the Republics; but judging from the information which has been permitted to leak out, it may be assumed that at least 1,000 farmsteads have been burnt. This wholesale burning of property has occurred solely in the Free State and in the southern part of the Transvaal. General Buller appears to have succeeded in carrying his operations through to a successful issue, without having found it necessary to resort to a policy of wholesale terrorism. Here and there a farmstead used as a fort or misused for the purposes of treachery may have suffered the penalties of war. But in the area of General Buller's operations it is not even alleged that any serious destruction of property has taken place. We may, therefore, take it that one thousand farms in the area of Lord Roberts' command represent all those which have been destroyed; while live stock and produce of about two or three times that number have been cashiered without payment, on one pretext or another, by the invading armies.

It is, of course, impossible to deal with this question of values, except on the broadest possible basis; but South Africans who have studied the subject have made an estimate that the average stock on a farm might be replaced for £2,000, while the farmstead and the buildings might be put up for half that sum. This would give us a total expenditure for restoring ruined homesteads of our unwilling subjects of £3,000,000 sterling. And another million for compensation for injuries inflicted upon our own colonists in the border districts, and we have a sum of £4,000,000 sterling, which, it is estimated, would go far to heal the scars inflicted by the war, and render it possible for the populations on both sides of the frontier to live and thrive on their own holdings.

Suppose that, instead of £4,000,000, it was twice that sum. What is £8,000,000 compared with the necessity of carrying on military operations on the present scale?

In less than two months, the whole of this £8,000,000 will be swallowed in futile chasings after De Wet and in punitive operations, every one of which tends to increase the number of desperate and homeless men who swell the commandoes against whom we are fighting.

WHY NOT EXPLAIN WHAT A FREE COLONIAL GOVERNMENT IS?

I have only one more suggestion to make in the present stage of affairs, because the first thing to do is to increase the number of those who are willing to lay down their arms, and to offer the greatest possible inducement to those who are fighting to reconcile themselves to the inevitable. But in addition to those practical, material inducements, it will be necessary to go to the uttermost in the way of political reconciliation. It is not necessary to go one hair's breadth beyond the pledges which we gave to the world as to our intentions when we entered upon this war. We stand pledged to concede to our willing subjects the liberty and privileges of self-governing British Colonies. To the majority of the Boers these are mere phrases. The majority of them have not the faintest idea of what a self-governing British colony is. If, instead of sending them to Ceylon and St. Helena, we could have shipped them to Australia or New Zealand, and allowed their leaders opportunity for studying in Melbourne, in Sydney, or in Wellington the full, unlimited liberty of independent, self-governing British colonists, something might be done in the way of dispelling the prejudices which make the average Boer regard the term "British subject" as the political equivalent of a Russian serf. What is necessary to do is not to extend our offers in the least, but to make it plain and clear to the understanding of the average Boer that, under the British flag, in South Africa he will be as free to govern himself or misgovern himself--if he so pleases as if he were still a citizen of an independent republic.

NOT "SUBJECTS," BUT "FELLOW-COLONISTS," WITH THEIR OWN FLAG.

What ought to be done is to call to our counsel as speedily as possible all the leaders of the Boers whom we can induce to enter into a conference with our representatives for the purpose of explaining to them exactly the kind of government which we propose to set up in their country, and to explain to them how much or how little it will differ from the government which we have overthrown. The experiment might fail, but it would at least enable them to understand what we meant to be at. It would also in any case be an indispensable preliminary to any system of pacification. For a time, no doubt, while the homesteads are being rebuilt, and the prisoners of war are returning from Ceylon and St. Helena, it will be necessary to have some form of military government; but it should be made plain to the Boers that this is a temporary expedient, and that as soon as the Burghers and the refugees have returned to their homesteads, they will be allowed to frame their own government on their own lines, subject always to the undisputed supremacy of Great Britain. Those who regard the supremacy of Great Britain. substance as more important than the names of thingswhich I take it to be the mark of a practical statesmanwould endeavour to soften to the uttermost the demand that the Boers should regard themselves as British subjects, being content to recognise them as fellow-colonists. The word carries with it no such sense of political servitude as is involved in the word "subject." The federation of South Africa might then be undertaken, and each of the five states in the federation could be freely allowed the same liberty of hoisting its own flag which is already possess instanc The object of the South muddli calls fo Ever bable t arms a has tw been o 'Neve the lea of real entitled govern verv Canadi opporte enjoyed thing, them s which ' they p might

Wei going in to an a high H institut races t the Out to abo belongi immedi a mili enormo an inde be unv not car last car

Why that of of thei the Ra provinc the Ora accordi of cour foreign the Br why sh Transv Austral selves? trouble of the

> Then Federal Dutch

possessed by Western Australia, to mention only one instance, of which there may be several.

00,000

and in crease swell resent

rease

their

ement

es to ctical.

to to ation.

d the

tions

ed to ileges

ity of them

ritish

nd St.

New

for

1 the rning

ay of Boer

uivaot to

and that.

free

eases

ublic.

unsel

Boers

ence

ining

1 we

n to vern-night

what n in-

For

built.

and form

nade

expe-

the

they

t on uted

the gs-

annand

sub-ists.

ervi-

ation

h of wed

eady

TH

AL

These, however, are matters of detail. The supreme object which we have in view is to secure the pacification of the country, with a view to the ultimate federation of South Africa. It is quite clear we cannot get there by muddling on our present lines. The situation is one which calls for a display of bold and generous statesmanship.

A MISSION TO THE BOERS.

Even if all these suggestions were acted up to, it is probable that the stalwarts and irreconcilables would remain in arms against us. Still, it must not be forgotten that De Wet has twice offered to surrender on terms which might have been conceded without any detriment to the policy of "Never again!" Further, it must be remembered that the leaders of the Boers have never had any opportunity of realising the kind of liberty to which they would be entitled if the two Republics were converted into self-governing colonies upon the Australian model. A very significant conversation is reported by a Canadian officer, who while in hospital took the opportunity of explaining to De Wet the liberties enjoyed by the citizens of the Dominion. The first thing, therefore, to be done is surely to make the Boers understand that we do not propose to make them serfs, but to give them a local self-government which would be indistinguishable from the liberties which they possessed under the Republic. With the mass of the Boers of course it is impossible to deal, but something might be done with their leaders.

WHAT IS IT THAT WE WANT?

We repudiated indignantly the accusation that we were going into the Transvaal in order to subdue the burghers to an alien yoke. On the contrary, we declared before high Heaven that our one object was to establish Liberal institutions in the Transvaal, and to secure to men of all races those equal rights which the Boers had denied to the Outlanders. Yet at present all that we have done is to abolish all political rights of every kind, whether belonging to the Outlanders or the burghers, and in the immediate future we hold out nothing before them beyond a military despotism resting upon the rifles of an enormous standing army which is to be maintained for an indefinite period in South Africa. The burghers would be unworthy of the name of Republicans if they did not carry on a struggle against such a destiny to their last cartridge.

WHY NOT?

Why should not some such settlement be proposed as that of allowing the Johannesburghers to have an Inferno of their own, within a ring fence, including the whole of the Rand and all the minerals as their own particular province, while we leave the rest of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State to be governed by the burghers according to their sweet will and pleasure? They would of course give up their artillery, they would have no foreign policy, and they would be integral portions of the British Empire; but, subject to those restrictions, why should they not, both in the Free State and the Transvaal, be left to govern themselves, just as the Australasians and the Canadians are left to govern themselves? Heaven knows, we do not wish to have the trouble of governing South Africa added to the burdens of the over-wearied Titan.

THE FEDERATION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

Then we could further hold out the prospect of a Federal Union, which would practically result in a Dutch South Africa. The majority of the electors of the Cape Colony are at this moment Dutch, and are likely to remain Dutch. Both the Transvaal and the Orange Free State would be Dutch States, and Rhodesia and Natal would be the only two Colonies in which there would be a British majority. Federation on the democratic principles which prevail in every other colony would result in giving a Dutch majority liberty to run the South African Federation upon its own lines. This, of course, is very abhorrent to those high-flyers who think that the great gain of the war is to establish the ascendency of the English-speaking race; but the British Empire has never rested upon race ascendency. The attempt to enforce race ascendency in Canada kept Canada in constant hot water, and the same-and much worse-results would follow in South Africa, where the bloody memories of this disastrous war are still fresh in the minds of the people.

THE TWO POLICIES.

We are face to face with a very clear alternative in South Africa. Either we are going to leave the white races to govern themselves on the basis of equal rights, and free representative government, or we are not. If we are, then Dutch ascendency in South Africa is certain; but if we can use the present moment in order to con-vince the Boers that we are honest in our professions, there is no reason why the Dutch ascendency in the African Federation should not be as beneficial to the Empire as French ascendency is in the province of If, on the other hand, we are determined to trample under foot all the principles of Colonial Government on which we have been acting for the last sixty years, and if we insist upon governing South Africa in perpetuity, under martial law, enforced by a hundred thousand bayonets, well and good. In that case there will be no peace in South Africa, and British authority throughout the whole country will extend just so far as the bullets of our garrisons reach, and no further.

HOW TO LOSE SOUTH AFRICA.

I do not put forward this alternative policy as certain to secure success. I only say that it has an off-chance of securing the acquiescence of the Dutch population in their inclusion within the limits of the British Empire. The policy at present in vogue has not even an off-Every day the war lasts, it increases and intensifies the bitter animosity between the white races, which, horrible anywhere, is unspeakably horrible when the feud is prosecuted in the presence of an overwhelming majority of Kaffirs. The suggested policy may possibly, nay even probably, fail. Personally I have no faith in anything short of an uncompromising confession of sin and making of restitution. There are those who do not believe that England is great enough and strong enough to dare to make such a frank acknowledgment of error. As for me, I have not so learned to despise my country. I do not see anything to be proud of in the greatness of an empire, if its very magnitude makes it afraid to act justly. But I admit that at present the conversion of our people is far from being complete. They are still in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity; their pride will not brook the suggestion of a humble confession of sin, and the making of compensation to their victims. But in that way, and in that way alone, do I see any chance for saving the Empire in The Policy of Devastation now in full South Africa. swing spells blank ruin. For the alternative policy which I have ventured to sketch it may be too late, but so long as it has even one chance of success, it is better worth while trying than persisting in the policy that appears to be modelled upon that of the Gadarene swine.

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE QUESTION OF ARMY REFORM.

THE EDUCATION OF OUR OFFICERS.

THE masters of our public schools have much to answer for in the spoiling of our officers, according to Dr. Miller Maguire's paper in the National Review on the military education of officers. He begins by ascribing the abolition of purchase and other army reforms to the moral effect of Sedan and the other victories of Prussian education over French ignorance. He deliberately affirms,—

On the whole, a large proportion of our young officers, auxiliary and regular, were in the seventies, as they are again, since the depreciated standard of the past few years, by far the most ignorant persons of their social class in Europe, Japan, our Colonies, or the United States. I am sorry to say that not less than fifty per cent. of our military candidates in 1874 and in 1899 were not eligible, by reason of ignorance, for situations in any city office, and would not be employed in any leading shop in any capacity above that of porter or sweeper.

The shock of German successes introduced a change. From 1872 till 1884 cadets on entering Sandhurst were very well taught indeed, and were rapidly gaining on German cadets:—

Simultaneously with the movement for the mental elevation of officers, the classes of population from which came the greater proportion of private soldiers were brought under the influence of obligatory primary education.

HOW THE CLOCK WAS PUT BACK,

But in 1884 the public schools, alarmed at the success of "crammers," whose pupils were defeating the public schoolboys in army examinations, and afraid of the menace to Greek and Latin composition and pure mathematics, in the stress laid by army examinations on English literature, history and science, put back the clock. Lord Salisbury opposed—and acquiesced. Dr. Maguire proceeds:—

Not only is the programme of preliminary general education for the Army behind the age and paltry to a degree, but the constant tinkering to which it is subjected renders systematic education and good sound training impossible. It varies with the whims of the officials.

BOY-OFFICERS, IGNORANT AND IMMATURE-

Two years ago military law and tactics were excluded from the military subjects. Before this blunder was rectified war broke out:—

Ignorant and immature lads were sent off as officers without any knowledge of the art of war, and very little practice in musketry or drill, to mutilation and death. Commissions were showered in all directions on over one thousand persons, of whom six hundred and fifty will probably prove themselves utterly unfit to retain their posts unless the War Office slurs over palpable incapacity in order to "save its face."

-COMPARED WITH AMERICANS OR GERMANS.

Yet, Dr. Maguire insists,- it is clear that for the future, if the English upper and middle classes are not as well educated before the age of twenty-one as are Germans, Japanese, or Yankees of the same rank and time of life, our Empire will be ruined, or, if preserved, only saved by Colonists, German immigrants, the pupils of "stickit ministers" from north of the Tweed, Irish "Intermediate" boys, and Jews.

At present-

an average West Point graduate could teach an average Sandhurst graduate every branch of learning that it becomes a young soldier or a young civilian to know, and a "one-year volunteer," so called, from Germany could teach nine-tenths of our Militia lieutenants both Tactics and Field Fortifications as things unfortunately now stand.

THE "SYSTEM" OF PIPE-CLAY AND RED TAPE.

Captain A. G. Boscawen, M.P., having served with the Militia on garrison duty, furnishes the National Review with "some personal impressions of the army." He observes as a feature of the South African war that "non-regulars appear to have done as well, and in some cases better than the regulars." It is hardly fair to lay all the blame on the stupidity of officers. The "system" is to blame. The Queen's Regulations include seventy rules as to dress, but never a single one about the actual fighting costume of the soldier. Four weeks in the year are assigned to field training, and four weeks to musketry. "Yet every day the men are had out and inspected by their officers to see if they have got all their straps on !" A Militia battalion having been lately embodied, its officers were ordered three times a week to practise the sword exercise-on the very day officers in South Africa were bidden never to carry swords in action. In three months the officers of the battalion had learned swordplay and goose step, the men practically nothing at all. The writer asks for root and branch reform; complete change of personnel, civil and military, at the War Office; red tape reduced; as little filling in of forms as possible; higher pay and a free outfit for officers; for the men, training in two points-how to shoot and take cover. He has also several suggestions for improving and making practical the training of the Militia.

DISCIPLINE NOT MARKSMANSHIP.

The most important article in the Cornhill for December is a reply by Colonel F. N. Maude to Dr. Conan Doyle's opinions on the reform of the Army. Colonel Maude is a resolute advocate of the old hammer and tongs method of warfare.

DISCIPLINE DECIDES.

He believes in discipline co-opposed to marksmanship, and thinks that the light losses of the British troops during the present war is due to the fact that the Boers had no discipline, while their individual marksmanship, as is always the case in war, was of little use. He says:—

The French are, as a nation, the worst individual shots in Europe; but in 1870, with a far inferior weapon—as regards sighting and rapidity of fire—they made far better practice against similar targets than the Boers. For instance, when the Prussian Guards blundered within range at St. Privat—by one of those accidents it is impossible ever to foresee or avoid—the French accounted for a larger percentage of men in ten minutes at 1,000 yards range, than the Boers did at Magersfontein at 200 yards in half an hour. Similarly they wiped out three batteries of the XIth Corps Artillery opposite Amanvilliers at 800 to 900 yards in less than half the time the Boers took to effect the same result on Colonel Long's batteries at 400 yards. Many other similar examples might be cited, but the explanation is the same in all cases—the French possessed discipline of a sort and the Boers had none.

THE "COVER" DELUSION.

The defect of the British army during the war, says Colonel Maude, was not its marksmanship, but its hesitation in advancing. All this was due to the insistency of the Press that the object of fighting was to hide yourself under cover, rather than to rout the enemy.

The Na outcry a losses, v during skins th

Paard put into under th could ev avoidanc quite une attack a snugly co induce t cowards, care of h Boer mo of Paard killed, b for some gone far

The It Provide of arman heaviest telligence tactics ar amount almost i which wa with what outposts, "We Colonel

Select

would be

Roy santly Ernest The w broidery the act an alre "The s ing, a t vards i Its exec some fi record o century, art of dated f learnt f connect conclus in Fran fourteer about n value of are of t least fift of the stitute a painted which s on almo

the Got

The Natal troops who arrived in South Africa before the outcry about "cover" begun fought brilliantly under heavy losses, whereas Lord Roberts's army, who left England during the "cover" mania, thought more of their own skins than of victory:—

Paardeberg was the blot on the whole war—that British troops put into an attack could be brought to a stand 'by something under three per cent. of loss was a possibility no English soldier could ever have dreamed of; and for that disgrace I hold the avoidance of loss and use of cover theory mainly responsible. I quite understand why Lord Roberts decided not to renew the attack after the first day; he knew that once the men were snugly concealed behind the ant-heaps, no power on earth would induce them to move forward. Not because the men were cowards, but because each was firmly convinced that by taking care of his skin he was showing rare adaptability in copying the Boer model the papers had taught him to worship. The capture of Paardeberg at the point of the bayonet might have cost us 500 killed, but it would have saved us the enteric epidemic responsible for some 5,000 lives, and would, as the Boers have since admitted, gone far to diminish the tenacity of their present resistance.

THE TEST OF LOSSES.

The history of centuries shows that :-

Militia

things

d with tional

army."

r that some air to nclude

about weeks

1 four

e had ve got been mes a y day

carry

of the p, the r root

d; as

and a n two also ctical

De-Conan

olonel

r and ship,

roops

Boers

iship, ys:-

ots in actice en the y one l—the 1 ten agersd out

man-

Boers

at 400

at the disci-

says

t its

the

as to

The

PE.

Provided there is any approach to equality in the conditions of armament, victory will fall to that side which will endure the heaviest loss without flinching, and possesses the requisite intelligence to assure combined action between its units; and all actics are based on the assumption that troops possess a certain amount of this endurance, which may be heightened to an almost incredible degree by the practice of certain exercises which we call drill, and which have nothing whatever to do with what volunteers call practical work, such as training at outposts, on the ranges, etc.

"We do not want more men, but better men," says Colonel Maude. But—

Selection by marksmanship judged by our Bisley standards would be utterly useless.

The Ancient Art of Tapestry.

ROYAL Tapestry at Windsor is the subject of a plea-santly instructive and well-illustrated paper by Mr. Ernest Jessop in the Pall Mall Magazine for December. The writer distinguishes between tapestry and embroidery by saying that in tapestry the picture forms the actual fabric, whereas in embroidery it is worked on an already existing material. He goes on to observe, "The so-called Bayeux Tapestry is not, properly speaking, a tapestry at all, but an embroidery some seventy yards in length and rather over half a yard in height. Its execution is of the crudest, but containing as it does some five hundred and thirty figures, it is a valuable record of the costumes, arms, and manners of the eleventh century, the period at which it was embroidered." The art of tapestry-making in Europe, the writer affirms, dated from the time of the Crusaders, by whom it was learnt from the Sarocens. Its chequered progress in connection with the British Court is then traced. In conclusion the writer notes that at the Gobelins factory in France "a weaver now possesses a choice of over fourteen thousand tones of colour, and can only make about nine square yards of tapestry in a year, the retail value of which is about £350. The looms and tools used are of the simplest description, but it is a matter of at least fifteen years' education to produce the combination of the artist's eye and the workman's hand which constitute a fine tapestry weaver." Yet an Egyptian fresco painted some 3,000 years before our era is still extant which shows "two girls working at a loom constructed on almost identical principles with those now in use at the Gobelins factory."

THE KIND OF MEN THE BOERS ARE

IN PRISON AND IN THE FIELD.

MRS. J. R. GREEN was fortunate in receiving a permit to visit the Boer prisoners in St. Helena. One lady, a member of the Society of Friends, who wished for a similar privilege, was peremptorily forbidden by the Colonial Office to set foot on the island, although she was much less suspected politically than Mrs. Green, whose views on the subject of the war are very well known.

Mrs. Green made good use of her opportunity. She went to St. Helena, and sojourned for a time in the midst of the Boer colony which has been established in the famous island prison of Napoleon. She has come back more enthusiastically pro-Boer than she was before she went, and that is saying a great deal. She writes with great restraint in the Nineteenth Century, but there glows between the lines which she permits herself to indite the fervour of a great passion for these victims of British policy. Of the Boers, she says:—

They received me with the utmost politeness and good breeding, and in all my intercourse with the farmers I found the simple and dignified courtesy of a self-respecting people.

FOREIGN TRIBUTES.

She conversed with Boers, old and young, rich and poor, and also with the foreigners, of whom there are many. She says:—

If we may judge of sincerity by the sacrifices men will make, they have given proof enough. All had risked in the cause of the Boers their whole possessions and their life. The foreigners were men whose words deserved attention. Not one of them, it must be remembered, was a mercenary. Not one had been a paid soldier.

She found these foreigners full of the praises of the Boers. One of them (? Captain Schiel), who had good reason to complain of their failure to support him, had no regret for having espoused their cause, and "in spite of all he would willingly go back to fight for a people with so superb a passion for freedom and so devoted a love of country."

The only fault they found with the Boers is that they are too good prisoners. They say that the Boergives his gaolers no trouble to speak of; that his camp is made hideous morning and evening when every tent group starts its own favourite psalms all at the same time, and the air rings with the discord; that he believes every word in the Bible; and that he complains occasionally that his defeat was a punishment for the unbelief of his Latin allies.

RELIGIOUS INTENSITY.

Psalm-singing at three o'clock in the morning, it must be admitted, is rather trying to people who wish to sleep. But Mrs. Green is much impressed by the sincerity and the simplicity of their religious faith:—

I have read and heard, as we all have, a cheap and vulgar mockery of the Boer religious services. But no observer can go to the Sunday gathering of the camp, and sit in the very midst of the people as I did, without seeing a sight that is not laughable—old, far-seeing men "waiting still upon God;" while on some, not all, but in truth on some of the younger faces (very poor men, I thought), there was an ecstasy of rapt entreaty for "a present halp in time of trouble."

men, I thoughtly, there was an ecstasy of rapt entreaty for a present help in time of trouble."

"How could you face war?" I said to a trembling old man of sixty-five, who had volunteered to fight. "I prayed to the Lord," he said; "I gave myself and my family to His care. And it was wonderful to see how He strengthened us. There was not a tear. One daughter carried my rifle, the other my bandolier, and my wife (she is sixty-three) carried my bag. They were all quiet; you would never have thought I was going away. I did a soldier's duty; I did what I had to do."

LED BUT NEVER DRIVEN.

She also has a good word to say, and says it wisely and well, as to the impolicy of exacting an oath of neutrality from the Boers until we were in a position to give them protection. Of the general character of the Boers she says:—

I spoke to a German of some tale of suffering. "Ah, that does not matter," he said, "they can bear hardship; but kindness is the thing they need. For they are a kind people." On one point they were all agreed: "You can lead the Boer by friendship; you can never drive him." The Germans realise, too, his quite extraordinary qualities as a pioneer in settling waste lands, and the use which might be made of this by sagacious governors.

The Boer had also, in the Scandinavians, Danes and Swedes,

The Boer had also, in the Scandinavians, Danes and Swedes, most loyal and understanding friends. But not more so, perhaps, than settlers of English blood gone to the Transvaal from America, the Cape Colony, and elsewhere. These were well-educated, upright, independent men, who could see with English eyes.

It is not surprising that she should say :-

There is many a true Englishman, who has reflected on the story of his own people, who, if he himself could see into the tents of the Boers, must feel grief and awe that sorrow of the quality there known should lie under the English flag.

A LINESMAN'S EULOGY.

An interesting pendant to Mrs. Green's article is the paper contributed by a Linesman to Blackwood's Magazine. He speaks as a soldier, and although he says many strong things concerning the lack of veracity on the part of the Boers, and complains much about their white flag, he vehemently denounces the calumnies to which they have been subjected in the London press. He says:—

Poor Boers! Yes, you must go under, you are an anachronism, a stumbling-block, a "black patch" upon the map of Progress; but before you disappear, hear a soldier confess that this is all that is amiss with you. !You are not vile, cowardly, or even more treacherous than a similar compounded olla podrida of undisciplined Europeans would be. You are not impossible. Nay, you are very possible indeed, and will, under cleaner rule, emerge from the pit into which you have fallen, to plant your ungainly, useful feet upon sunlit ground again. We have beaten you, but pride in the victory should be sufficient consolation.

The Linesman has wit enough to see the absurdity of charging with cowardice a handful of men who have kept the whole force of the British Empire at bay for more than twelve months. He says that individual cases of heroism are numerous, while they have shown evidence of collective heroism, withal, astonishing in a soldiery brought up in a school of pure individualism. Witness the staunch stand in the trenches at Pieter's Hill, under a rain of huge projectiles the like of which no soldier has ever seen before, or the dash upon Broadwood's guns at Tigerpoort, or the forlorn hope against Wagon Hill, when, if the British army had not been blessed with souls as bold, it had surely lost a division from its tafe keeping. The British army can ill brook such enemies being labelled "cowards."

DISCIPLINE "OF THE BEST."

What specially calls for his admiration is the maryellous manner in which the Boers have held together under the crushing blows of the closing period of the war. He says

There are not many instances in history of an army sustaining misfortunes so many and so grievous, and yet remaining an army. When we consider the composition of Botha's force, the perfect freedom of his men to come and go as they please, the certain safety for them if they basely go, the certain peril if they stoutly stay, that they stay and present front after front, endure smashing after smashing, is to my mind a spectacle as admirable as it is marvellous, and to a British soldier—who wants to get home—exasperating! The discipline that can do these things must be of the best, for meanwhile an article of the creed is jogging every conscience: the farm is going to rack and ruin, and another month's idleness for the plough means that most awful of catastrophes, a cropless spring.

Yet notwithstanding all this, he still thinks that the masses of the Boers, who, he says, are really a simple, pastoral people, are only fighting because they are told to do so. Surely this would be an even greater miracle than to suppose that they are fighting under the inspiration of a religious or patriotic idea?

THE LAWS OF WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. JOHN MACDONELL contributes to the Nineteenth Century a sensible and well-balanced article upon the usages of war, in which he discusses the bearing of the Hague rules upon the operations now carried on in South Africa. He begins by saying that he believes that no modern war has been prosecuted by both sides on the whole with greater humanity and stricter observance of the laws of war. This, however, only shows that Mr. Macdonell. although he may be a very good international lawyer, is very ill-informed as to what is actually going on in South Africa at this moment. He gives further proof of this when he says that "there have been on the whole remarkably few complaints about plunder." Considering that there is hardly a soldier or a war correspondent who has written home from South Africa who has not described the way in which whole districts have been swept of all their property, Mr. Macdonell would have done better to have confined himself entirely to a discussion of the legal aspects of the case, without venturing to pro-nounce upon questions on which he is evidently not informed. He calls attention to the significance of the proviso introduced by Colonel Schwazhoff by which the Rules are only to be observed so far as the military necessities permit. This has been eagerly seized upon by the Daily News to justify every horror that has been committed in South Africa. But, as Sir John Ardagh pointed out in his report, the over-riding of the regular rules was only reserved for extreme cases, and no one can pretend that a war between the British Empire and 15,000 armed farmers justifies the ignoring of rules, the observance of which might possibly be set on one side in a life and death struggle between two great nations of equal strength. This proviso equally applies to the poisoning of wells and the violation of women, as well as to the destruction of private property and the burning of homesteads; but the Daily News has not yet gone so far as to defend either of these old-time methods on the plea of military necessity. Mr. Macdonell thinks that it is very doubtful whether it is lawful to compel noncombatants to ride on railway engines. He also shakes his head over the exaction of the oath of neutrality, and he even goes so far as to say that if Lord Roberts exempted burghers who had taken a prominent part in the policy which led to the war, from the offer to return to their farms if they took the oath of neutrality, it seems difficult to justify this proclamation on military grounds. Mr. Macdonell notes that in some modern military writers there is an ecstatic glorification of war not to be found in older books, and a contempt for and impatience of humane measures. As Linesman, in Blackwood's Magazine, points out, newspaper editors in London have been much worse than the soldiers in their clamour for the trampling under foot of the stipulations laid down at The Hague for the humanising of war.

"Wi which country dead O an org: ghost? the Fon as usu Accordentirely of him top:

The must b election trusted, underst

Mr. indiscrethat the was a disloyare bench Banne adequathe was hamped Libera support Counce.

reconst.
crat is Govern race.
alternal
Mr.
Chance Ramss of a S placed just re
again,

top of promotic it bey chance deepe never for, sa for ev in oth

Party renour Ha Mr. M

But neglectin other But Lord

follow Mr. M The suppor

VIINA

A POLITICAL CROWNER'S QUEST.

o get hings

ed is ruin.

most

the iple,

acle

oira-

the

the uth

no

ole aws ell.

, is uth

his ole

ing

ho

de-

of

ter

he root

he

he

ry

on en

gh

ar

1e

re

S,

16

15

S

ie

S

1-d

n

n

THE POST-MORTEM OF THE LIBERAL PARTY.

"Who killed Cock-robin?" seems to be a question which may appropriately be asked just now, when the country, in an hour of crisis, finds itself confronted with a dead Opposition. How comes it that the Opposition, as an organised force in English politics, has given up the ghost? Two specialists are called in by the Editor of the Fortnightly Review to give evidence to the jury; and, as usual with specialists, they contradict each other. According to a Liberal (without adjectives), the fault is entirely in the leaders. The Party, as Dean Swift said of himself and of oak-trees, has gone rotten at the top:—

The real trouble is at the top, in the disintegration, and, it must be said, disloyalty among the leaders themselves. This election has largely been won, not because Ministers were trusted, but because the Opposition was neither trusted nor understood.

Mr. Herbert Gladstone committed the unparalleled indiscretion of proclaiming, before the first poll was taken, that the Liberal Party was beaten at the start; but that was a comparatively venial offence compared with the disloyalty of the other members of the front Opposition bench to their elected leader. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has done his best; but he has never been adequately supported, and "it is not only in the issues of the war and the tactics of the election that he has been hampered by those who should have helped." If the Liberal Party is to rise from the dead, C.-B. must be supported. As for the nostrum of the Liberal Imperialist Council, the Liberal without adjectives says:—

The attempt to merge Liberals by conviction in a new party reconstructed on Imperialist lines under Lord Rosebery as autocrat is hopeless. It ignores the essential meaning of party Government, and sets aside the strongest instincts of the English race. There must be, and, are, alternative convictions and alternative policies.

Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, writing upon "Lord Rosebery's Chance," gives exactly the opposite advice. In Dean Ramsay's reminiscences he records a shrewd observation of a Scotch idiot, when he saw a huge tombstone being placed upon the grave of a man, over whom they had just read the burial service. "If you ettle him to rise again, you're no his freend to pit so big a stane on the top of him." Mr. Marriott, however, is determined to promote the resurrection of the Liberal Party by burying it beyond all hope or recognition. Lord Rosebery's chance consists in sinking the party which he once led deeper than did ever plummet sound, so that it may never be seen again as an organised entity in the world, for, says Mr. Marriott, he must definitely break once and for ever with Home Rule, and he must be not less decisive in other directions:—

The first essential is that Lord Rosebery should cleanse the Party from the last taint of Little Englandism, and definitely renounce adherence to discredited traditions of foreign policy.

Having thus got rid of two-thirds of the Opposition, Mr. Marriott asks the very natural question :—

But if the Little Englanders be eliminated and the Nationalists neglected, can Lord Rosebery look for compensating adhesions in other directions?

But strange to say, he thinks that this is possible. Lord Rosebery must fill up the gaps in the ranks of his followers by calling the Liberal Unionists to his standard. Mr. Marriott says:—

There are two questions in particular on which many loyal supporters of the Unionist Government feel great and growing misgiving. They are the Temperance question and the Education question.

He thinks that if nothing is done for the temperance cause, in another five years there will be many Liberal Unionists who will become restive, and then—

Lord Rosebery will find a magnificent recruiting ground among discontented Unionists. None of the latter—so far as I can judge—want "Local Veto" in the Lawsonian or Harcourtian sense. Lord Rosebery may safely repudiate the legacy left to him by his whilom lieutenant.

He must further take up the reform of the House of Lords which, if unreformed, will perish, but "the application of the representative principle to the English peerage would go far to avert their doom."

Here is a pretty dish to set before a King! But does Mr. Marriott really believe that the Liberal Party will ever witness a joyful resurrection on any such lines as this?

ON KILLING HOME RULE WITH KINDNESS.

MR. HORACE.PLUNKETT writes very sensibly in the Nineteenth Century on "Balfourian Amelioration in Ireland." It is a defence of Mr. Gerald Balfour's policy of endeavouring to kill Home Rule with kindness, against which a certain impossible section of the Irish Unionists are in open revolt. This revolt Mr. Plunkett thinks was very uncalled for. The accusations brought against Mr. Balfour were unjust, especially in relation to the land question, and he is full of admiration of the way in which Mr. Balfour reformed Local Government in Ireland. Speaking of his Irish Local Government Act, he says:—

The effect of this great measure has, so far as it has gone, justified Mr. Balfour's hopes. It has thrown on the shoulders of the people themselves the responsibility of administering their own local affairs. The new bodies have, on the whole, fulfilled the preliminary work of reconstruction with intelligence and efficiency.

He regrets that the Irish claim for a Catholic University was not conceded, and says:—

I believe, from personal experience, that effort towards progress in Ireland will be truncated unless the claims of Roman Catholics in this matter are fairly dealt with.

Mr. Plunkett is naturally much pleased with the attempt which Mr. Balfour made to carry out the recommendations of the Recess Committee, and gives Mr. Morley credit for having supported the Balfourian efforts to improve the material welfare of the people. There are two passages in the article which well deserve to be borne in mind. The first, which may be respectfully dedicated to the special attention of the Editor of the Times and several English newspapers, is as follows:

It is regrettable that Irish outrages are given such disproportionate prominence in the English Press. If in a dairying district ten thousand cows were made tributary to creameries owned and worked harmoniously and successfully by organised bodies of farmers, they would, of course, escape notice. But if some fine night one of the herd lost its tail, she would for a season reflect the moral and social condition of Ireland under the policy of killing Home Rule with kindness.

The other is that which speaks of the success of the co-operative movement in Ireland. Mr. Plunkett says:—

I was personally convinced that one of the truly undeveloped resources of my country was the intellect of her inhabitants. Our success was great. There are up to the present time 469 registered societies scattered throughout every county in Ireland, with a membership of over 45,000 farmers and labourers, mostly heads of families; while many more are in course of formation.

A CABINET OF COMMONPLACE.

THE Fortnightly Review opens with an article signed by "Calchas"—whoever he may be—who thinks very little of the reconstitution of the Salisbury Cabinet. He declares that as the first Disraeli Cabinet was called the "Who? Who?" Cabinet, so this should be known in history as the "Why? Why?" Cabinet.

THE "WHO? WHO?" CABINET.

He tells the story of the "Who? Who?" Cabinet as follows:-

No Ministry, in a word, has had a more faltering welcome, whether from its own or any side, since Palmerston had his "tit for tat with Johnny Russell," and Lord Derby formed the mixed and hapless Government in which Mr. Disraeli was the one indomitable personality that Mr. Chambarlain is now. The story of the famous conversation in the House of Lords is perhaps rather well known than well founded. The Duke of Wellington, very deaf and within a few months of his death, was eager to know whom Lord Derby had got for his colleagues, persons for the most part so unfamiliar to fame that the Duke had increasing difficulty in catching their names. Mr. Walpole, Mr. Herries!—Mr. Henley, Sir John Pakington—until the repeated "Who? Who?" of the astonished listener rose in tones audible to the House and gave a name to an administration. It would not be proper to call Lord Salisbury's new Cabinet a "Who? Who? Ministry," but it might fairly be described as a "Why? Who? Ministry." The particular feeling of the nation at large as the appointments were announced was as inevitable as the exclamation of the Duke.

NOT A CABINET FOR A CRISIS.

He then proceeds to ask why this, that and the other Cabinet Minister occupies the particular post assigned to him, and professes himself to be unable to find the answer. He is particularly wroth at the appointment of the Earl of Selborne and that of Lord Lansdowne, and at the fact that Lord Salisbury has no less than three relatives in the Cabinet:—

The Cabinet, as a whole, may be summed up as experimental, undistinguished, and markedly below the high average reached by most Administrations in the Queen's reign; nor could the falling-off have appeared at a more untoward moment. All these things, in the general analysis of the composition of the "Why? Why? Ministry," might pass at ordinary times. They were not what the country expected in the dark hours of the war, when we declared that we were awake at last never to slumber more. This is not the sort of new Board of Directors called for to "put the Empire upon a business footing." No nomination was ever more amazing than that of Lord Lansdowne to the Foreign Office, and none would have been declared more unanimously to be disastrous if the country had not been assured that Lord Lansdowne's true position would be that of—Foreign Secretary to the Prime Minister.

THE VICE OF THE SYSTEM.

"Calchas" says that Lord Salisbury may have done the best he could with the material at his disposal, but that he ought to go further afield, and that Cabinet Ministers should be recruited from a wider range than from the very parrow circle from which they are all drawn at present:—

Our Government is, as a matter of fact, the least democratic in existence, and infinitely less so than that of China, where the whole intention is to disengage merit from the mass, though the system is wrong. There is no other civilised country, not one, where the pretensions of mere heredity are still so powerful or the influence of party obligations so stupid. There can be no doubt that if a thorough diplomatic training were often precedent, as it is sometimes subsequent, with us to a Parliamentary life, the gain to the nation would be of extreme value. The career of Sir Alfred Milner, which can scarcely fail to bring him eventually to the Treasury Bench, is the type which must become more frequent in the future.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE INNER CABINET.

"Calchas" also complains that a Cabinet of twenty is unwieldy, and is practically impossible as an instrument of executive government. The enlargements of Cabinets will lead, he thinks, to the evolution of a new smaller executive governing body:—

The Cabinet, as it nominally exists, will no doubt be ultimately replaced in recognition as in fact by some definitely smaller body competent to deal with administrative questions. A strengthened Committee of Defence, with the Foreign Secretary and the Colonial Secretary added, must become the real Cabinet in the natural course of Imperial development.

OBITER DICTA OF TRAVEL.

BY MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

THE Century for December has as one of its chief distinctions the first instalment of a series of travel papers by Mr. Augustine Birrell, entitled "Down the Rhine." His first visit had been before the Franco-Prussian War. Now he finds the Rhine completely "unfranked." One of the first stage-asides that greets us is this: "The charm of nature is her irresponsiveness. She answers you back never a word."

"A LITTLE FIGHT OF OUR OWN."

As the traveller reflects on the battlefields around Metz, he moralises as follows:—

It is not pleasant to recall our English attitude of mind toward the two most tremendous incidents of the latter half of our century—the American war and the Franco-German war. How we talked and moralised and preached while men lay bleeding! How we flaunted our sympathies and proffered our advice and flourished our supposed superiority! And then we wonder, when we have a little fight of our own, that Europe and America are not alike lost in admiration of our stoicism in disaster and our good taste in victory. Visit Gravelotte! It is worth a visit. On the 16th of August the French lost 16,000 men and 879 officers, and the Germans lost 15,000 men and 700 officers. On the 18th of August the losses were: French, 11,000 men and 600 officers; Germans, 19,000 men and 900 officers. Two days' work!

PLAIN SPEECH ABOUT LUTHER.

A visit to Worms elicits an estimate of character which will doubtless make Mr. Birrell suspect among all ultra Protestants:—

Henry VIII. and Martin Luther are not ideal sponsors of a new religion; they were both masters of Billingsgate, and the least saintly of men. At times, in 'reading Luther, one is driven to say to him what Herrick so frankly says of himself:

Luther, thou art too coarse to love.

Had Luther been a great soldier of fortune, his coarseness might have passed as a sign of the times; but one likes leaders of religion to be religious, and it is hard to reconcile coarseness and self-will, two leading notes of Luther's character, with even rudimentary religion. To want to be your own pope is a sign of the heresiarch, not of the Christian.

The Protestant suspicion, once aroused, will probably sniff with emphasis at a later aside. Speaking of the Paulus Kirche in Worms, Mr. Birrell says:—

A museum inside a Christian church is unexpected. Some day, perhaps, the tourist will discover a Christian church inside a museum.

The letterpress is prettily illustrated with sketches of the Rhine drawn by André Castaigne.

IN the November number of the New England Magazine Mr. H. C. Shelley has one of his interesting articles on famous homes. The present one deals with Penshurst Place, Kent, and Sir Philip Sidney.

bur con to r

stru

unle

Lea

pre

SOC

pai

the son

belo to to of p one hori offic thou natio one If mech

comp

and ratio

provi

Cabi who peop with said The same all the entire

Minis

and d perso

The tion of forme initia Spon passe main passe main itself. lost e the turne

A CRY FOR A NEW FOURTH PARTY.

THE inevitable has happened. The utter disorganisation of the Opposition and the overwhelming numerical preponderance of Ministerialists have made certain, sooner or later, a demand for the formation of a new party in the Ministerial ranks. In the National Review the demand is formulated by "Young England" with some brilliance, much feeling, and any amount of dash.

A REASON FOR THE "RECONSTRUCTION" FIASCO.

The writer is exceedingly wroth with Lord Salisbury over the fiasco of a reconstructed Cabinet. He has simply "hashed the cold mutton." The reconstruction has "already paralysed enthusiasm and promises to burke reform." "The Government has forfeited the confidence of the country." A shrewd hint is dropped as to recent changes:—

Mr. Chamberlain, with all the defects of his qualities, is still the one positive, progressive, purposeful force of statesmanship upon which the country can depend; but the obvious explanation of much that is remarkable in Lord Salisbury's Cabinet reconstruction lies in the desire to prevent Mr. Chamberlain's apotheosis, Mr. Balfour could not become Foreign Minister unless the Colonial Secretary were to become at the same time Leader of the House.

· ENGLAND SIGNING HER OWN DEATH-WARRANT.

The rearrangement is declared to have been "fatally below our need. The hope for England's future seemed to tremble on the level scale but yesterday. The balance of probability has dipped against us! There is only one bright spot which the writer can discern in the whole horizon. "The selection of Mr. Arnold-Forster as the official spokesman for the Navy in the House of Commons, though silencing him on military matters, is a positive national gain. He is the ewe lamb of the Empire." This one gain apart,—

If the Government could be left to its natural lethargy and mechanical routine as completely as before, and were not to be compelled to respond to the demand of the country for exertion and purpose on the part of its Ministers, then there could be no rational doubt that England had missed the last chance, lost the providential opportunity, and signed her own death-warrant in a fit of absence of mind.

"A PASSIVE DESPOTISM."

To prevent this catastrophe, the writer appeals from the Cabinet to the House of Commons: to the rank and file who hold their position not from a Minister, but from the people. As matters now stand, the Premier is charged with disregarding the spirit of the Constitution. He is said to exercise "a passive despotism":—

The most powerful majority Parliament has seen is at the same time the most mechanical—a crutch, not a medium. For all the individual or collective influence possessed now by the entire mass of private members behind the Administration, Ministers might as well sit with sheaves of proxies in their hands, and dispense their followers from the troublesome formality of personal attendance.

"DISINTEGRATION OF THE CONSTITUTION."

This unfortunate result is traced to the Unionist coalition surviving the immediate emergency for which it was formed. Under the stress of that emergency, "political initiative was relinquished to the leaders of the coalition." Spontaneous action was suspended. When the emergency passed, the new habit of dumb and docile obedience was maintained, with serious menace to our Constitution itself. The Cabinet, apparently aggrandised, has really lost efficiency. "The Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, the Treasury, the Admiralty, Pall Mall, all have been turned into watertight compartments":—

While the Opposition has returned to open chaos, the veil of Unionist unity has concealed a process which has amounted to something like the moral disintegration of the Constitution. This is a form of disorganisation which now threatens us with more serious consequence than any that can arise from the impotent incoherence of irresponsible Radicalism. . . The unexampled subserviency of the Unionist benches has made Ministers impenetrable to public opinion. It was mischievous in the past, and would be suicidal in the future, ruinous to the Party, if not fatal to the nation.

IS THE PARTY LACKING IN TALENT?

Ministers take their revenge by charging their followers with incompetence-a pleasant reward for heroic selfsuppression. There is, the writer affirms, as high an average of intelligence and spirit in the four hundred Unionist members as any party on either side ever possessed. But they need to be drawn out. Mr. Balfour, the writer laments, does not hold "the happy secret"—"Lord Beaconsfield's splendid way with young men." He forgets that the benches behind him are "packed with individuals as responsive to the least touch upon their personality as keys to the performer." There is a bitter reference to the ascendency of "family interest" in the Cabinet. Yet "all Ministers will ignore their followers, if allowed to do so with impunity." "Young England" sprinkles vitriolic phrases freely-"a comatose Cabinet, a lethargic majority," "the abject and characterless docility of the Conservative rank and file "; and so forth. The Party is adjured to break "this evil stupor." There is no terrible phalanx of genius to fight. Forgetting for the moment "the one ewe lamb" represented by Mr. Arnold-Forster, the writer exclaims :-

With the exception of Lord Salisbury, Mr. Chamberlain, and possibly Mr. Wyndham, there is not a single personality in the present administration whose disappearance would make the slightest difference to the prospects of the Party or the fate of the nation . . . Public life never offered more brilliant prizes to a Canning or a Disraeli or a Randolph Churchill than it does now to anyone capable of following in their footsteps. To some new man the future assuredly belongs. England is in the mood to surrender herself, not necessarily to a prodigy of genius, a Napoleon of politics, but to any man of marked independence, faith, and capacity.

THE TASK OF THE NEW PARTY.

There is a precedent not far to seek:—
To the Fourth Party, who attracted Lord Beaconsfield to the Peers' Gallery upon one of his last visits to the House of Commons, modern Conservative power owes its existence. Between 1880 and 1885 the English boroughs changed from Liberalism to Toryism—the most remarkable shift of political opinion during the century.

A Fourth Party is wanted to-day :-

The task of the old Fourth Party was to discredit the mischievous activity of a Radical Ministry, that of a new Fourth Party must be to goad the reluctant lethargy of a Unionist Administration into adequate action. Nothing but an independent spirit behind the Treasury Bench, pursuing what it believes to be the duty of patriotism with effective method and inflexible resolution, can compel the present makeshift Ministry to fulfil the expectations of the country. It is certain that unless a sufficiently strong and steady pressure can be applied from outside, our foreign policy will continue to be that of scamp and scuttle, our administrative habits those of shuffle and shirk.

Any group of Conservative members who may attempt to form an Imperial Vigilance Committee in the House of Commons will expect to be called "Alarmist"—the quack cry of the ignorant to the instructed, and of the stupid to the keen. But they will meet, as a matter of fact, with fewer difficulties than the old Fourth Party at the outset, and they will have themselves to blame if they fail to achieve even greater success in the end.

ty is ment nets aller

ions. reign the hief

itely

pers ine." Var. One The wers mind lf of war.

lay our n we
and n in
It is

hich altra of a the nch.

900

e is eness iders eness even sign ably the side es of igacles urst

.

THE FUTURE OF ENGLAND.

HER INDUSTRIAL DOOM BEING SEALED.

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE, in the Contemporary Review, forecasts the "Social Future of England." The people of England are, he argues, essentially undemocratic. "The serious decline of England as an industrial centre has begun." Germany and America have started their andustrial career with the new machinery; England is still hampered with the old. The advent of the Yellow Man into the competitive arena will still further lessen . England's industrial chances. Extension of Empire does not involve extension of markets; the whole tendency, especially under stress of the Yellow peril, is towards self-supporting communities. From the race for industrial supremacy England is bound to retire.

A PLEASURE-GROUND FOR THE RICH.

No longer predominantly industrial, England might, were she a democratic country, develop a vast peasant ownership like the French or Swiss. But the English tendency is not democratic, and is townwards. The other alternative, which the writer thinks most probable, is that England will become the pleasure resort, the historical museum, and possibly the academic centre of the Englishspeaking world. And what of the people of England?

The mass of English people, on this hypothesis, will more and more tend to be the ministers in some way of this new rich class of English-speaking peoples who will repair, for purposes of health or culture, to their ancestral seats.

Is there no Wordsworth to exclaim to-day, " It is not to be thought of . . . "?

A NATION OF SERVANTS.

Mr. Clarke calls attention to the steady growth of the servant class; the vast armies of the serving classes employed in the watering-places which line the coast; the servile population involved in the forest of hotels which have sprung up in Central London. The heavily burdened family estates in England can only find relief in two ways: "either marriage for money, or sale for money"; in either case, a rich establishment with an immense growth of the servile class :

For all these reasons England will certainly prove an attractive spot to the rich, whatever comes of her present industrialism. Situated as she is close to the historic lands of Europe, and yet nearest of all the lands to the American Continent, ships from all the world calling at her ports, with an old and well ordered society, a secure Government, an abundance of the personal service desired by the wealthy, a land of equable climate, pleasant if not grand scenery, a large and ample life organised for sport, amusement, and the kind of enjoyments pleasing to the leisured classes—how can England help being attractive to the wealthy people who speak her own language?

AN ATHENS FOR GREATER ENGLAND.

Then there are the historic interest and antique repose which clings to our most famous resorts. And Mr. Clarke suggests that English universities might by a judicious provision of post-graduate courses attract American and Colonial youth:

Indeed the quieter, less industrial England of the future might well be as Athens to the younger Roman Empire, a source of culture, a fountain of humanising influences. Heine feared with much reason the contagion of Anglo-Saxon vulgarity and philistinism; but in monumental England there is a virtue to counteract the crude self-assertion of young English-speaking communities.

So this is the prospect before the once mighty people of England! A nation of flunkeys and slaveys and caretakers and tutors! It is enough to make John Milton turn in his grave. Mr. Clarke proffers as some consolation that with the decline of industrialism will decline also the formidable nature of the problems of drink, housing, and population. In support of his diagnosis that neither economic conditions nor political convictions make for the democratic ideal, he refers to "the steady weakening of the House of Commons." That House is "now so weak that it is treated by Ministers with but slightly veiled contempt, and the House does not effectively receit." resist," and democracy in general is not making for parliamentary government.

THE CHURCH AND DOMINANT JINGOISM.

HINTS OF AN UNEASY CONSCIENCE.

AFTER the paroxysms of the khaki fever have passed there are signs, feeble and timid, of an uneasy stirring in the conscience of the bodies which may, for convenience sake, be collectively labelled Church. For example, the Church Quarterly Review, reviewing Mr. Lecky's "Map of Life," is roused to utter these misgivings:—

Those who are convinced of the justice of the English cause in South Africa, and of the high and honourable character of the motives by which the English commanders are actuated, and who, moreover, ungrudgingly admire the heroism which in some notable instances has lately been shown, may still find cause for suspicion and regret in the spirit which marks many of the newspapers and much of the conversation of to-day. For it is difficult not to be conscious of a lust of conquest and a disregard of right which would have applauded an unjust war of aggression hardly, if at all, less warmly than the unavoidable conflict in which we have been engaged. . . . Our conviction of the justice and the necessity of the war in South Africa does not lessen the gravity of our fear that there is a very dangerous tendency strongly and widely at work in English public feeling.

Better late than never; but better never late! Perhaps we may hope to hear more emphatic and official warning against this "very dangerous tendency strongly and widely at work" from the Anglican Communion which the reviewer so honourably represents.

THE ANTI-CHRIST OF THE COMING AGE.

"The Call of the New Century" as presented by a Nonconformist divine, Dr. Forsyth, in the Sunday at Home, suggests that the Nonconformist conscience may at last awake from its drugged slumbers. The writer's style is incisive and antithetic; so pitilessly and persistently antithetic as to become almost wearing. there is a moral and a religious intensity positively refreshing in these swollen days. The "call" is for a kind of man of deep spiritual power—of power to vanquish another type, the original of which will doubtless be apparent to all who are not admirers of the present Colonial Secretary :-

A type of man that looms masterful in the coming time is the man of keen, prompt and aggressive force, of indomitable, ungenerous, unideal will, without ethical, historic, or imaginative culture, of passionate egotism and insolent speech, of great resource and narrow, vulgar ambitions, of boundless prosperity without and invulnerable self-confidence within, of unscrupulous business, non-moral principles, and unspiritual joys. I speak of a spirit which may find its incarnation in the coming age.

THE Sunday Magazine opens with a fine reproduction of Halgate's "Reconciliation" as frontispiece. Rev. James Johnston sketches the life and work of Rev. T. Richard, whilom Baptist missionary, and now secretary to the society for diffusion of Christian and general knowledge in China-a "missionary statesman," who aims at the teachers. Rev. John Beveridge describes "A Girls' Home under the Aurora "-a Lapp Girls' Home, near the North Cape.

the t whic Revi so m his obsc selve East Ame Can the that Doo com Mah

> Ame diate

but

Prov " ph

plen

The

dull

his 1 M deal pers deal and view Chi has puni cate of in futu has qual

peop says A tion betw placi (2) num salar men' affai nece (4) t adm shou

bacl

its i press tion, coun vesse B

teed

the

Cris

THE OUTLOOK IN CHINA.

WHAT CAPTAIN MAHAN THINKS.

"ASIATIC Conditions and International Policies" is the title of a somewhat longwinded and unoriginal article which Captain Mahan contributes to the North American Review for November. Captain Mahan affects to deal so much with broad questions of international policy that his views upon immediate necessities are somewhat obscure: and beyond advocating co-operation with ourselves he says little if anything bearing upon the Far Eastern question as it immediately presents itself. America's duty to herself is to complete the Nicaraguan Canal and to increase her navy. The Yangtse Valley is the centre of her interest in China, for it is on that river that sea communications naturally end. The "Open Door" policy which America should support is most easily compassed in the central region of China. Captain Mahan sees "the hand of Providence" in the fact that America's acquisition of Hawaii and the Philippines immediately preceded the last outbreak of the Chinese question ; but like most of his school he is not content to rely upon Providence to complete the chain, and claims that the "physical weight" of a big navy is a necessary complement to Providence. At which Providence must smile. The rest of Captain Mahan's article is composed of the dull alternation of platitude and periphrasis with which his readers are familiar.

VIEWS OF MR. LLEWELLYN DAVIES.

Mr. Llewellyn J. Davies, in the Forum for November, deals with "The Taming of the Dragon." Mr. Davies is personally much better qualified than Captain Mahan to deal with China; but he runs to the opposite extreme, and looks at the question from the immediate point of view of a struggle between Europe and China, in which China is altogether in the wrong. At the same time he has the good sense to see that the present policy of punishing the Chinese people merely because we cannot catch the real offenders is an absurd one, "capable only of intensifying the anti-foreign bitterness." As to the future, he says that as America is the only power that has taken nothing from China it is she who is best qualified to allay the storm. He thinks that the Emperor should be reinstated, and the banished Reformers sent back to assist him. Reform would be welcomed by the people. As to the actual nature of the reforms he says :-

Among the things most seriously needed are: (1) the aboli-tion of the "kotou," which would lead to a freer intercourse between the Emperor and his officials, and would result in placing the Emperor in position to judge and act independently; (2) the sifting from the mandarinate of vast numbers of supernumeraries, who exist only for the purpose of drawing their salaries and of acting as drags to retard progress; (3) the payment to all officials of salaries sufficient for the conduct of the affairs committed to them, thus removing the present virtual necessity of levying unjust and irregular taxes or "squeezes";
(4) the reform of the Internal Revenue System, by the honest administration of which the Government might greatly increase its income; (5) the extension of the postal system; (6) a free press; (7) the establishment of a modernised system of education, open to poor as well as to rich; (8) the opening of the country to freer trade with foreigners; (9) navigation by steam vessels of all suitable waters.

But first of all the integrity of China must be guaranteed, and the universal discussion as to the partition of the Empire must cease.

HOW IT STRIKES SIGNOR CRISPI.

In the North American Review for November Signor Crispi has an article on "China and the Western Powers,"

the most interesting part of which is the conclusion, in which he predicts that Germany will continue her present active policy in spite of any obstacles :-

Among the European Powers now in China, the one which shows, for the moment, the greatest firmness, the strongest will, is Germany; because, aside from her strong impulse toward colonial expansion, she knows exactly what satisfaction she intends to get for the bloodthirsty insult she received. The treacherous assassination of a diplomatic representative cannot remain unpunished. "Wherever there is an Englishman, there is England," was said at the time of England's greatest colonial conquests.

William II. has used far more decided and severe language than this. He is a man of iron will and of noble feeling; and the powerful nation which, in such a short space of time, has risen to such power is with him, heart and soul. Of one thing we may feel sure; and that is that the subtle windings of diplomacy will not bend the German Empire to unforeseen and unbefitting renunciations.

That is the motto, that the programme, of this powerful sovereign. And after the insult offered in Peking to his country, he will rigidly carry that programme out. Of that I feel

As for Signor Crispi's own views, "an anachronism" and "a huge market" are his chief epithets for China. But though he has no pity or consideration for the Chinese, he maintains that European policy requires that their country should not be divided as booty of war. It must be forced to reform itself :-

China must cast off the garment of the barbarian, worn for centuries, and be clothed anew, since new times, new wants of humanity are knocking loudly at her doors; and, united to the other Powers, she also will be, when the time comes, an instrument of civilisation. Europe will not be repaid for her present action and the sacrifices it will necessitate by war indemnity or concessions of territory alone. But the opening of the largest market the world has ever known will be the certain means whereby all may harvest wealth in a future which the work of men and their governments will endeavour, in their own interests, to bring about as soon as possible. This accord will be rendered surer and firmer if the long, laborious and most difficult diplomatic work which lies before us be conducted in a spirit of moderation. One thing is certain, and that is that each nation must receive a reward in proportion to the sacrifices it has made.

Signor Crispi, like Captain Mahan, declares that in the coming century it is the Pacific Ocean with its shores and islands that will play the greatest part in the world's history.

CHECK CATHOLIC DICTATION.

The Contemporary has two articles on the Chinese problems. Mr. John Ross gives a valuable and comprehensive survey of Chinese foreign policy, recalling the time when Jesuit missionaries had won half a million adherents and the favour of the Emperor. That great opportunity they forfeited as a penalty for their political intrigues. In general, Mr. Ross declares :-

The Chinese have, therefore, every justification when, from their own experience—the only teacher available—they consider Europe as ever ready to resort to mere unprincipled brute force, without manners and without morality.

Mr. Ross exonerates Protestant missionaries from any responsibility for the recent massacres, but cites case after case to prove the arrogant and arbitrary interference with Chinese law and custom by the Roman Catholic clergy. He concludes :-

In order to guarantee permanent peace the Powers must not only so embody in the new Treaty their own claims as to secure the moral sanction of mankind, but they must take effectual steps to prevent the prostitution of their office and position by the Roman Catholic clergy, and to protect the Chinese magistrate from the injustice and indignity of feeling himself compelled ik of tion mes ard. the dge the ome orth

so the g, and either

ke for cening

low so lightly

ctively ng for assed ng in nience

e, the use in

of the l, and some se for newsfficult

ardly,

ch we d the ravity

and haps

ning

and hich

by a y at may ter's per-But vely

or a vantless

sent

s the able.

gina-

great

erity ilous

[.

to decide a case between native litigants against law and justice in order to satisfy the demands of any foreigner. To secure future peace the magistrate must have perfect freedom to judge and decide all litigation involving his own subjects, according to Chinese law, irrespective of creed and independent of the dictation or control of any external authority.

WHY NOT DENATIONALIZE THE MISSIONARY?

Louise C. Brown, also in the Contemporary, puts the problem how to avoid forcing religion on an unwilling people by aid of gunboats, and at the same time carry out the marching orders of the founder of Christianity. This is her solution:—

How can the two be reconciled? Briefly, I would say by returning to the methods of earlier missionaries. Those who feel the necessity of preaching Christ among peoples of other creeds, should do so at their own risk, leaving their nationalities behind them, together with the protection which such nationality carries with it. Thus they avoid the double danger of furnishing a casus belli to their own Government, and of bringing unmerited punishment on the people whom they wish to benefit.

Many foreigners live and trade in China without passports. They drop their Westernness and go about without fear. Why should not missionaries do likewise? Persecution on the ground of religious belief is to the Chinaman absurd: he is extremely tolerant of differences of belief; but "mistrusts Westernness with all his nature":—

A man living simply among the people, unconnected with any foreign Government, and amenable to the local magistrates and laws, would arouse no fear, and, from his very harmlessness, would run little danger.

CHINESE SUPERIORITY TO THE EUROPEAN.

The Government would surely agree to let missionaries drop their nationality. Let missionaries be regarded as Chinese subjects and no danger would accrue to other foreigners who still retained their old nationality. Missionaries would indeed be debarred from introducing Western reforms and civilisation. The writer retorts, Are these so valuable! and proceeds to say a good word for Chinese as against Western civilisation. Chinese society is free from our war of classes; it awards rank and position to individual literary attainment: and consequently "snobbishness, that blot on the Anglo-Saxon character all the world over, is markedly absent in China." As a result of preferment by literary merit alone, "a spirit of culture pervades even the masses of peasant population."

The writer warmly commends the wonderful simplicity of life which would make the Chinese a model for Lycurgus. At a time when Western complexity of life is all too burdensome, "we might rather in this matter learn something from China than insist on forcing our complex life with its multiplied necessities on her." The complex life with its multiplied necessities on her." land system of China is next held up for eulogy: peasant proprietorship, each family with its ancestral fields, each individual with his allotted share, has produced "a husbandry the admiration of the whole world." The writer applauds Chinese dress as superior to ours, and considers Chinese writing or "character" a great intellectual achievement; being a writing by means of symbols which represent ideas not sounds. In conclusion the writer meets the argument that few missionaries would be found willing to submit to the perils of denationalisation, with the fact that the mission which has most nearly followed these lines has had double or treble the number of volunteers during the last fifteen years.

In the November number of the Canadian Magazine, Mr. James Bain, Jun., Librarian of the Toronto Public Library, has a paper on the "Libraries of Canada."

THE CHIEF DANGER TO BRITISH TRADE.

MR. BIRCHENOUGH writes briefly but wisely in the Nineteenth Century on this subject, taking as his text Lord Rosebery's speech at Glasgow. Mr. Birchenough recently visited forty-two towns and cities on the Continent. He is a director of the Imperial Continental Gas Corporation, an institution founded with British capital, and worked with British brains. It has gasworks in most of the great cities on the Continent, and in nearly all of them the native workmen are managed by Englishmen. As a director of this Corporation, Mr. Birchenough has a good opportunity of seeing how things are going on the Continent, and he is much impressed with the fact that Germany is our most formidable competitor. Discussing the trade rivalry between Germany and Great Britain, Mr. Birchenough says:—

I believe, then, that the most threatening danger to British trade lies partly in the inadequate and antiquated educational provision which we make for our people, rich and poor, but most of all in the absence of the spirit which alone makes education of any value.

He points out that our trade is at least as important as our empire. One is impossible without the other, and he wonders whether there will ever be a great outburst of trade enthusiasm which will carry thousands of our youths into schools and colleges, as the recent outburst of the khaki fever sent thousands to South Africa. The following passage is not very pleasant reading:—

One can take the admitted defects in our military operations one by one and cap each with a similar defect in our commercial system. Is it the absence of scouting? We have in business the absence of knowledge of foreign languages and of efficient travellers, who are as much the eyes and ears of commerce assouts are of an army. Is it the absence of maps and of acquaintance with the enemy's country? We have the lack of knowledge of commercial geography and of the peculiar wants and tastes of particular markets. Is it want of ready adaptability to new and unexpected conditions in a campaign? We have the obstinate adherence to old methods and standard makes in markets which require special and individual treatment. But the similarity goes far deeper than this. In both war and commerce you have the same want of calculated foresight, of preparation in advance against all possible contingencies; the same sanguine conviction that it is no use looking too far ahead, that it will be time enough to deal with difficulties when they arise. And, most serious of all, you have in both the same absence of — may we not say prejudice against?—systematic professional training.

Intellectual Friendship and Marriage.

IT has been suggested that the title of the Wedding Ring Circle should be changed, for it stands in the way of the growth of the society inasmuch as its members are chary of showing the Post Bag Round-About to their friends and relations, and do not care to admit that they are members of what may be adversely criticised as a matrimonial bureau. The choice of a title that will meet the necessities of the case is difficult; but many have been submitted for approval, and readers of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS who have been interested in the paragraphs that have appeared from time to time concerning the Wedding Ring Circle, but who have felt a reticence of joining because of its title, may care not only to send for a copy of Round-About, but suggestions as to choice of a title for a society founded to bring together and interest lonely people in each other. The Conductor, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C., will send all particulars on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope. Amer Gabri whole Italy, nor p has r fruitle world count Tha instan a few discon A con darker light-l of pol grand, same a forty y exercis movin allied. fire of they w weake gone a In by he uncor Empi The be comby the traged glory. Queen eyes, t from to over a pugna vigor

her v

In conquivigore and s
Wh strugg arouse her? the ne is keep
At part,
Her I pose

were is the ignor count

It is a thick threat

UNREDEEMED ITALY.

PERHAPS the most notable article in the North American Review for November is that in which Signor Gabriele D'Annunzio sets himself to pick to pieces the whole social fabric and political administration of modern Italy. The article, which is entitled "The Third Life of Italy," is a very slashing one, and spares neither persons nor policies. Italy, says Signor D'Annunzio in short, has not been redeemed, and her union has been made fruitless by the methods of her rulers. He sees the whole world in intellectual and material ferment, while his own country alone of the favoured nations remains sterile:—

That which is taking place in Italy at the present day has no counterpart. There have been, in certain historical periods, instances of weariness and political hatred, but always limited to a few special classes; now, however, here in Italy the moral discontent is spread everywhere, over every class, in every place. A constant acrimony, a weary vexation, an unspeakable sadness darken and sterilise the entire life of the nation. The delightful light-heartedness of the Italian people, which withstood the test of political divisions and the stranger's rule, is all gone. The grand, heroic flame, which stirred the people together with the same ardour, is extinguished; and the Italians of to-day—after forty years of political unity-are intent on nothing else than exercising secret or open hostilities one against the other, or in moving their forces in contrary directions, even when they are allied. The national conscience, which had sprung up in the fire of the great revolution, in which all differences seemed as if they were fused like different metals in one furnace, has little by little, through bad systems of government, gone on growing weaker and weaker; and to-day it seems almost entirely to have gone astray.

CONTRAST WITH GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

In contrast with this dead picture the rest of Europe is vigorous and productive. Germany has revolutionised her whole life in thirty years, and England, threatened by her where her commercial supremacy seemed most uncontested, takes revenge by building up a great Colonial Empire and making a god of it:

The dream of this rapacious, insular soul is, in its vastness, to be compared only to the record of the undertaking accomplished by the Romans in Orbe. Out of the blood spilt in the Transvaal tragedy a violent fermentation arises, which maddens with glory. "Tu regere imperio populos." Each subject of the Queen has the image of the Oceanic Empire floating before his eyes, that Oceana, which in Froude's vaticinating book emerges from the depth of the seas and throws its immeasurable shadow over the depressed nations. No oracle was received by the pugnacious Hellenes with equal faith.

ITALY DEAD.

In all of this, whether in German factories or British conquests, Signor D'Annunzio sees the beating of a vigorous heart. The whole world is a chaos of ferment and struggle:—

What part, what destiny will Italy have in this formidable struggle? Will she again find her spirit? Will she shake and arouse to their very depths the dormant forces which might save her? Does she realise, in this moment of painful awakening, the necessity for sweeping away the mass of vile imbecility which is keeping her down?

At present, says Signor D'Annunzio, Italy can take no part, for she is dead; her statesmen have killed her. Her political constitution is framed for the express purpose of destroying the municipal governments which were formerly her chief glory. The executive Government is the common enemy, and her elective power blind, ignorant, and irresponsible. Anarchy pervades the country, and all public action is regarded as an evil:—

It is easier to obtain from the government a knightly order for a thief, than a small sum of money to strengthen an apsis which threatens to fall.

HER FUTILE FOREIGN POLICY.

When-

we pass from domestic to foreign politics, a still more miserable picture presents itself. Always hesitating, sometimes greedy, then timid, fluctuating between petulance and humility, scorned in every small or important event, they pass through a succession of sterile desires and sad renunciations, and appear to be forced to keep up a perpetual jig like those matrons of old whom Nero obliged to jump about in the circus. What part has Italy ever played in the Mediterranean, of which she is historically, geographically and ethnographically the Queen? In a few words, she has allowed every hope to be taken from her of extending her dominion over that little strip of shore on which she might still have cast her eyes from afar. Tunis, Cyprus, Egypt, Crete are fading away on the horizon.

Her navy, which should be her chief pride and mainstay, is useless, because of her inability to produce a merchant fleet:—

Italy—we must never tire of repeating it—will either be a great power on the sea, or nothing; and not merely a great naval power with warships, but with a number of merchant vessels, as in the grand old days of her maritime republics; as it is at sea that the supreme destinies of nations are to be decid. I. And the fibre of the Italian sailor is in truth so strong and pliant, that he can stand comparison all the world over, for his singular vigour of body and of mind.

But, more important still, she should be an agricultural power. Yet the State treats the great agrarian question as it treats the navy.

ITALY'S HOPE.

To save itself, Italy has but one hope-her new King.

The blood of Humbert I. has fallen like a sacred leaven on the Italian soil, to awaken a sudden fervor of noble aspirations and good will. An heroic spirit has arisen from the dead body of that King, who had witnessed with such grave sadness the decline of every ideal in that third Rome, which ought to have represented before the world the indomitable love of the Latin race for the Latin soil, and ought to have sent forth from its heights rays of the marvellous light of a new life.

But out of his dead body—carried down through the peninsula, along the Apennines, along the sea, as far as Rome, on a memorable wakeful night—an heroic spirit has arisen which seems to be stirring the national conscience. And now, the aspirations and the wills of those fervid men, who would all so willingly join the search after the last effigy of beautiful Italy, all converge in his heir, in the young Victor Emmanuel III.

Poets as Rhymers.

IT is an interesting addition which Mr. Frank Ritchie makes to the statistics of literature in his Longman's essay on "Rhyme." Here is an instructive example of his work:—

The comparative accuracy, as regards rhyme, of a dozen well-known English poets may be roughly indicated by the following table. The figures indicate the number of imperfect rhymes occurring in a thousand lines taken at random, and the correctness of the rhyme is judged by the standard of modern pronunciation, except in a few instances where it is notorious that the pronunciation has been changed:—

| Shakespeare, 55 | Tennyson, 32 |
|-----------------|---------------|
| Dryden, 47 | Byron, |
| Pope, 38 | Campbell, 28 |
| Cowper, | Moore, |
| Scott, 36 | Keats, 20 |
| Wordsworth, | Goldsmith, 11 |

Mr. Ritchie attempts the task of reducing imperfect rhymes to law. He finds that they occur between sounds that, though not identical, are phonetically allied according to his scheme of sounds.

n the

s text nough

the ental

ritish

works.

early glish-

ough ng on fact

Dis-

Great

ritish

tional

most on of nt as

and st of uths

the wing

tions.

ercial

iness

cient

ce as d of k of rants.

oility

the.

s in

But

com-

, of the ead.

they

ame

natic.

ling way

are hey

s a eet

ave

EW

phs

the of for of est

ray

on

THE NEW CHANCELLOR OF GERMANY.

A SKETCH OF COUNT VON BÜLOW.

IN order to depreciate Lord Lansdowne, the writer who signs himself "Calchas" in the Fortnightly Review devotes some pages to a glowing eulogy of the new great man in Germany, whom he contrasts with our new Foreign Minister, very much to the disadvantage of the latter. He says:—

The dynasty of the Bülows, in the first place, throughout its innumerable ramifications has been one of the most vigorous in Europe, and the name in Germany combines the prestige of the Churchills and Cecils here. The successor of Count Hohenlohe and fourth German Chancellor after Bismarck, Bernhard von Bülow, was born in Holstein, and is now fifty-one. We have not a single politician living—for Lord Dufferin's diplomatic experience came after and not before his Parliamentary success—whose training to the business of foreign policy will for a moment compare with that of the Kaiser's new minister.

Count von Bülow served through the Franco-German war, and there—in "Calchas'" opinion—came into touch with the realities of things which lie behind diplomatic verbiage. After the war was over,

Count von Bilow was attached to the staff of the Berlin Congress, where his father, with Bismarck and Prince Hohenlohe, was one of the three representatives of Germany. He was First Secretary at the Paris and St. Petersburg Embassies successively. He had been chargé d'affaires at Athens during the Russo-Turkish war. In 1888 he went to Bucharest, steeped himself in Balkan politics and managed the negotiations which resulted in the accession of Roumania to the Triple Alliance. His services were recognised by promotion to one of the first-class embassies, and in 1893 he succeeded Count Solms Sonnenwalde as Minister to the Quirinal.

He married an Italian wife, and would willingly have stayed in Rome, but he was too useful and too capable to be anywhere but at the centre, so he was summoned to Berlin in 1897 as successor to Baron Marschall von Bieberstein in the Secretaryship for Foreign Affairs.

"Calchas" is enthusiastic in his praise of the culture, the geniality, the trained capacity of Count von Bülow:—

He has the valuable temperament which is never out of humour no matter what may be the provocation. Robust, engaging, and discreet, he is supple with the suppleness of the tenacious wrestler, a happy but virile and positive personality to the finger tips.

What is still more remarkable, however, he passed through no orthodox Parliamentary process whatever, when he appeared before the Reichstag. Yet let us note all the more carefully the fact that he is unquestionably one of the best Parliamentary speakers in Europe. There is none more distinct and graphic, more persuasive in manner and matter, or breathing a more personal influence into studiously simple forms.

It is unfortunate, but in the interests of truth "Calchas" is obliged to admit that nearly all Count von Bülow's Parliamentary successes have been gained at the cost of England. He says :-

This country has never been spoken to, and has been rarely spoken of, in the tones which Count Bülow permits himself to use. In his masterly speech upon the new Navy Bill, he plainly hinted that Germany in the twentieth century was destined to succeed England in sea power, as England has succeeded Holland, and Holland, Spain. The case of the Bundesrath, however, is the more instructive. Lord Salisbury was driven to express his astonishment at the style of the two notes handed to him by Count Hatzfeld ton behalf of a Power with "which Her Majesty's Government believed itself to stand upon the friendliest footing." These communications were levelled at us in a dictatorial and even menacing tone, which Germany would not use to any other Power in similar circumstances.

The new Foreign Secretary, Baron von Richthofen, is not less distinguished.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN ALLIANCE ONCE MORE.

CAPTAIN GAMBIER'S NEW POINT.

CAPTAIN GAMBIER, who has long ago seen the truth about our relations with Russia, returns to the charge in the Fortnightly Review, furnished this time with a new argument. He says:—

The closer and more seriously this question of an Anglo-Russian friendship is studied, the more clearly does it stand out as the only possible guarantee of the peace of the world.

We all know that, but Captain Gambier's new point is that henceforth, when we say Russia, we have to remember that the word practically includes China. Now, if it was important to be on special commercial terms with Russia, it is immensely more important to be on good terms with Russia and China rolled into one. In this conglomerate our prospective customers cannot count much less than 580,000,000, with hardly a manufacturer amongst them producing the most ordinary necessities of life; the whole of this colossal population absolutely indifferent to war and glory, and only demanding to be left in peace.

If anyone denies that Russia means China, Captain Gambier tells them that—when Russia obtained the right to construct the Manchurian Railway and to form the Russian-Chinese Bank, this treaty practically signed the fate of China. The Russian Railway Concessions, by a cleverly introduced clause, have obtained what no other nation in the world has—that is, the right to work mines, not only in and near the railway, but all over China.

He dwells upon the immense resources of Siberia, and says that:—

Thus, under the fostering care of a wise Government, the prolific plains of Siberia are rapidly developing into the richest country in the world. Its area is greater than Germany, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Austria, Hungary, and Bavaria put together. It seems practically certain that in the course of a few years at least 80 per cent. of the whole tea and silk trade of China will reach Europe over these Russian lines.

He therefore renews his entreaty to our Government to make up to the Russians in a practical, businesslike way, and say to them :-

Our commercial interests need not clash. England and her Colonies require a market which you can give us, and we can absorb all the raw material you choose to send us. And, still higher than these material advantages, with Russia's millions of soldiers on the East and England's fleets on the West, we can compel peace, or, failing that, can starve and crush all the Powers of Europe that lie between us if they will fight.

As for the difficulties outlying between us, he does not think they are at all serious. He says :-

Friendship between England and Russia is not difficult, for the Government of Russia can, in the space of a week, alter the whole aspect of affairs by a simple mandate to her press. This is so clearly the case that it need not be argued.

Captain Gambier may somewhat exaggerate the extent to which China is in Russia's pocket, but there is no doubt in the least that our future trade relations with China would be very much improved if we established with Russia those good relations for which Captain Gambier pleads.

~~~~~~~~~~

THE Revue de l'Art has not yet exhausted the Department of the Fine Arts at the Paris Exhibition. In the November number the series of articles on Art is continued, and as soon as completed the special articles are to be republished in convenient volume form. The volume will thus form a charming souvenir of Art at the Exhibition.

THing in Siecle coura thin."

M. the P
Thi it is a from the fa ments this it sorts of lent to place to reg respondent.

itself,

one is

M.

The Color under upon prosp. It wis force result its pr

Ou

tralis

of fre

any rayou. Edito perso Rosel dange and t dobe Communication who fighti quite what not q

M. () their labo He s field.

Cam

man

of W the p const woul

M. YVES GUYOT ON ENGLISH PROBLEMS.

THE Humanitarian for December reports an interesting interview with M. Yves Guyot, the editor of the Swels, "the one man in all Paris who has had the courage to support England's policy through thick and thin."

A PLEASING ALTERNATIVE FOR THE PEACE CONGRESS.

M. Guyot thus put his view of the Transvaal debate in the Paris Peace Congress:—

This Transvaal question is a "question of sentiment." That is, it is a question which my colleagues at the Peace Congress studied from the objective point of view only. They would not look the facts in the face. Their resolution stated that the Governments of the South African Republics accepted arbitration; but this is not strictly correct. Arbitration was accepted, but all sorts of impossible conditions were made which made it equivalent to a refusal. Facts such as this I considered it my duty to place before the Congress. If, after hearing them, it continued to regard President Kruger's proposal to arbitrate as serious, the responsibility rested on its shoulders. The Congress placed itself, in fact, in the position of either dupe or accomplice, and one is much the same as the other.

A COMFORTABLE OPTIMISM.

M. Guyot cherishes the most robust optimism concerning the British Empire in England, in South Africa—everywhere. He declared:—

The future of the Transvaal will be that of any of the Crown Colonies of England. The country is bound to be prosperous under the wise rule of those British subjects who will be called upon to administer its affairs. Canada is successful; Natal is prosperous. Why should not the Transvaal be the same?... It will be necessary, naturally, for England to keep an armed force in the Transvaal for some years to come, but the inevitable result will be the pacification of the country, and consequently its prosperity.

CONSCRIPTION-A REMOTE DANGER.

Our Imperialism being English, not Russian, decentralised, not centralised, M. Guyot sees in it "a guarantee of freedom," no menace of militarism. He said:—

Conscription will not become a necessity for England. At any rate, it is not a Conservative Government which will give it you. Do you know, I am perfectly convinced—here the Editor of the Siècle spoke in a tone of seriousness—that the person, if anybody, to give you conscription would be Lord Rosebery, and some who now raise the cry of alarm. But the danger is remote. Army reform is what is required in England, and this, one of the lessons of the war, you will get when Lord Aoberts takes over the supreme command. You have in the Commander-in-Chief a true soldier. It is not every general who has had such experience as he. He really knows what fighting is, and just think of the generals there are (we have quite a number of them in France), who have never known what it is to command—except at the manœuvres, and that is not quite the same thing, you know, as ordering men on a battle-field. The way in which he has carried through the Transvaal Campaign has been most skilful, and you could not have a better man to put your army into a thoroughly efficient state.

BUYING LABOUR IN BULK.

Passing to questions between employers and employed, M. Guyot expressed surprise that employers, while buying their raw material in bulk, seemed unwilling to buy their labour in bulk also, as M. de Molinari suggested in 1842. He said:—

My solution to the problem is to form Commercial Societies of Work, based on M. de Molinari's theory, and formed after the pattern of the successful Paris Typographical Society. Easily constituted, since they need very little capital, these societies would supply one thing only—the work of their members.

They undertake to do certain work for a fixed price and during a certain period of time. The experiment has been made both at Antwerp and at Paris, and found to succeed.

To take the case of the Paris Typographical Society. Say you require a newspaper printed. Instead of making an arrangement with a foreman printer for a staff of men, you treat with a delegate of the society. The price you pay is higher than that of other printers; but the increase is justified by the guarantees of security and professional skill which are given. Anxiety as to details is reduced to a minimum.

This Society of Work of M. Guyot has a resemblance to the Russian Artel.

RUSSIAN DISSENTERS.

THE Creeds of Tsarland are being sketched by Mr. Ernest W. Lowry in the Gentleman's. In the December number he describes many of the vagaries of Russian Dissent. He mentions the White Doves, or self-made eunuchs. They have generally large (adopted) families, rarely engage in manual toil, are great pawn-brokers and moneylenders, never drink alcohol, never gamble, and are generally honest. Many Russian financiers are well known to be adherents of this emasculated sect, and even offer rewards or employment to candidates who will submit to self-mutilation.

STUNDIST WORSHIP.

Of the Stunda, the largest and most rapidly developing faction of Nonconformity, now extending everywhere except in the extreme north and north-east, he says:—

The Stundist organisation is much like that of the "Low Church" division of Protestantism, save that it has no ordained clergy, a body whom it regards as a somewhat expensive and distinctly unnecessary luxury, and replaces by elected elders, who lead the very simple services, at which any man or woman who feels called upon to do so may say what he or she will. These gatherings are more prayer-meetings than services, for there is no "Form of Prayer to be used," but simply informal prayer, praise, and song, in the best room of a farmhouse, though, now that the Government are not so strict in their search after heretics, regular wooden "meeting houses" have appeared in some of the Stundist villages. The meeting is almost a family gathering, for all are addressed as brother or sister, and kisses are exchanged before the congregation take up their places on the wooden seats facing one another. One member gives a short address, and invites discussion upon it, another a long extempore prayer, then all join in singing hymns from their "Voice of the Faithful," a book which owes much to Ira D. Sankey's "Sacred Songs," and of which some numbers are translations. The worship over, the meeting becomes a social gathering, and a pleasant afternoon is passed in talk; indeed, it is not always easy for the stranger to mark distinctly where service merges into entertainment.

STUNDIST MORALS.

The Stundist's wife, like that of the Old Believer, is in every sense the partner of her husband, both in matters relating to the household, to that larger household the village commune, and to the Church. In this matter nearly all the dissenting sects join hands, for while the wife of the Orthodox Mujik is generally downtrodden, and when her menfolk are at home sullen and silent, the dissenting woman is generally distinguished by superior intelligence and thoughtfulness, can nearly always read and write, and often it is to her that the children owe their education. Like the Dukhobortsy and the Old Believers, the Stundist's character for honesty and sobriety causes him to be sought after by employers and looked up to by fellow-workers, but, alas! hated by the "Pope" of the commune. They are prompt taxpayers—one of the greatest virtues required of the Mujik; are in no way antagonistic to the powers that be, save in their bitter cry for religious freedom—that freedom which Russia, tied by her holy "Synod," finds it impossible to give.

iore.

a new

Anglo-

point is rememow, if it ns with n good In this manussities of different captain churian treaty Railway btained right to Il over ent, the to the n Gerty, and t in the ea and lines.

and her we can id, still ions of we can all the es not alt, for ter the This extent is no with ished ptain partthe cons are The rt at

VIIN

"SHE IS SUCH A PERFECT GENTLEMAN."

"A RADICAL Lady of the Last Generation" is the title which John Fyvie gives to his Temple Bar review of the biography of the wife of the historian Grote. She was undoubtedly a striking character.

A HISTORIAN'S COURTSHIP.

The course of her love did not run smooth. Young George Grote was deceived by a rival into believing Harriet Lewins to be already another's, and his father opposed the match. At last the obdurate parent promised his consent at the end of two years. What follows will be scarcely credible to the average love-sick swain; but it was indubitably and romantically a love match :-

The young people set about conducting their love-making after a fashion entirely their own. They seldom met, but Grote set her themes on various subjects, gave her books to read, and required her to send him a digest of them. They kept diaries for each other's benefit, and she seems to have set earnestly to work to prepare herself by serious study to become his companion and a sharer in his intellectual interests. His diary, as transmitted to her from time to time, contained entries such as the

"Friday, March 26th.-Rose at 6. Read and meditated Kant for some time; wrote out my observations of foreign trade. Between 4 and 5 some more of Kant. Dined at ½ past 5; played on bass for I hour; drank tea and attempted to read some Kant in the evening; but found my eyes so weak that I was compelled to desist, and to think without book. Bed at II.

"Saturday, March 27th.-Rose at 6. Finished my remarks on foreign trade and enclosed them to Ricardo. . .

A woman who can carry on a courtship on Kant's philosophy and Ricardo's economics is certainly a rarity. A LEARNED "FRIGHT."

As was to be expected, her eccentricity extended to her dress :-

One friend remembers her as always, when in town, wearing short skirts, no crinoline, white stockings, and high shoes. But Fanny Kemble seems to have been most impressed by her passion for discordant colours. "The first time I ever saw her she was dressed in a bright brimstone-coloured silk gown, made so short as to show her feet and ankles, having on her head a white satin hat, with a forest of white feathers; and I remember her standing, with her feet wide apart and her arms akimbo, challenging me upon some political question, by which and her appearance I was much astonished and a little frightened. One evening she came to my sister's house dressed entirely in black, but with scarlet shoes on, with which I suppose she was particularly pleased, for she lay on a sofa, with her feet higher then her head, American fashion, the better to display or con-lemplate them." In the country she adopted another, equally eccentric, style of dress, going about with a man's hat on her head, a stick in her hand, and a coachman's box-coat, of drab cloth, with manifold capes, over her short petticoats.

"THE FEMALE CENTRE OF THE RADICAL PARTY."

Nevertheless she kept a brilliant salon :-

It was at a dinner-party at Sydney Smith's that Fanny Kemble first met Mrs. Grote, and found her to be one of the cleverest and most eccentric women in London, "the female centre of the Radical party in politics—a sort of not-young-or-handsome feminine oracle, among a set of very clever, half-heathenish men, in whose drawing-room Sydney Smith used to say he always expected to find an altar to Zeus."

AS SHE APPEARED TO SYDNEY SMITH.

Sydney Smith took to her immensely at first sight, and in his own way told her so. He wrote to invite her to "a real philosophical breakfast, all mind-and-matter men," and assured her that, "if she honours him with her notice, she will find him a theologian and a bigot, even to martyrdom; and that, if she comes to hear him preach at St. Paul's, she need have no delusive hope of a slumber, for he preaches violently, and there is a strong smell of sulphur about his sermons." Yet he could not refrain from poking fun at both Mr. and Mrs. Grote: "I like them, I like them," he used to say. "I like him, he is so ladylike; and I like her, she is such a perfect gentle-

HE WAS "SO LADYLIKE."

Mr. Grote was afflicted with even more than feminine modesty. He imagined that no publisher would publish the History at his own risk. His wife conducted the negotiations for him. His one hope, on hearing that John Murray had undertaken this tremendous hazard, was that "the poor man" would not be a loser :-

Mrs. Grote was in the habit of telling a number of anecdotes illustrative of her husband's simplicity and utter unconsciousness of his own celebrity. Walking in the park, he would perhaps notice that one or two persons looked at him with some attention. He would at once turn to his wife in alarm. "Have I got any dirt on my face, Harriet? Is there anything the matter with my hat?"—and he would clutch his headgear with both hands.
"What on earth are those people looking at me for?" And she would calmly reply, "Because you are George Grote that's all!"

AN EXEMPLARY HOUSEKEEPER.

Yet this grotesquely-dressed woman, student of philosophy and economics, business manager of her husband, head of a brilliant literary salon, was also an admirable housekeeper :-

"She knew how everything should be done, from the darning of a sock to the building of a house; and she could generally show a better way of doing most ordinary things." One of her favourite maxims was—"The household virtues are the basis of everything." And she was a great stickler for order and "SUFFERED FOOLS—NOT—GLADLY."

Her biographer can be readily believed when she says, "You feared her till you loved her," for she had a caustic

Her acquaintances were frequently ticketed off with significant nicknames; a subservient wife was called the "doormat," a young amateur was a "dab," and certain types of character became "the porcelain woman," or "the pinchbeck man." She is reported to have habitually used strong language to her servants. Lady Eastlake merely says that she called a spade a spade . . She had once prided herself to Sydney Smith on her patience in enduring bores. "That may be, my dear Grota," said he, "but you do not conceal your sufferings." Towards the end, however, she grew more tender and tolerant, and the state of the production o enduring even bores without betraying it. But she never lost her wonderful freshness.

Where Christmas Gifts are Most Needed.

WHEN this number of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS reaches its readers, Christmas preparations will be in full swing. Amongst the many who read it there must be some who would gladly make their own Christmas happier by ensuring the happiness of some one else. There is a dark and pitiful corner of London where all such efforts would be a veritable embodiment of the Christmas message of "Goodwill to men." Little children who lack, not merely toys, but shoes and garments and food; old men and women who bear the double burden of age and poverty; widows and the sick without the necessaries of life-to these, if they are to know any glow of Christmas joy, there must be given coals, beef, garments, boots, toys, etc. All such gifts—or, better still, the money to purchase them—will be welcomed by F. HERBERT STEAD, Warden, Browning Settlement, York Street, Walworth, S.E. THE C THE

"WEAT Review, a For Mr. unfolds b him in th few writer study the Continent deal with advantag more trou the Unit countries to the ad solved in

> Mr. Da down the to be dor I. In t indictable right of fre of making of work. 2. Ther the laws a 3. Furt

HOW One of paper is fide seek present p says :-

He wor police or des and him free r any class of society it. For t workhous as exist in under eith

If this tion in who at 1 is mixed job. Ha ceeds to what is a

Outsid workhou where pe colony. of peopl Whoev

Whoev restrain fi oversight Whoev that he public he responsib Any fe systematic Any pe

THE COMING TRIBULATION OF THE TRAMP.

THE TASK FOR THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

"WEARY WILLIE" does not read the Fortnightly Review, and for his own peace of mind it is just as well. For Mr. W. H. Dawson, in a very admirable article, unfolds before his eyes the tribulation that is awaiting him in the twentieth century. Mr. Dawson is one of the few writers upon social questions who take the trouble to study the problems which they discuss in the light of Continental experience. This article of his upon how to deal with the tramp is an admirable illustration of the advantages of this method. The tramp presents an even more troublesome problem in the United States than in the United Kingdom, and social reformers in both countries will read with delight Mr. Dawson's report as to the admirable manner in which this problem has been solved in Germany and Switzerland.

FIRST THINGS TO BE DONE.

Mr. Dawson is very explicit and very clear. He lays down the law in no uncertain fashion. The first things to be done he sets forth as follows :-

I. In the first place make vagrancy and loafing generally indictable offences. In sympathy with this measure restrict the right of free migration in the case of the destitute to the extent of making it dependent on police permission to travel in search

2. Then make severer, and what is more important enforce, the laws against begging and penniless wandering.
3. Further, and particularly, abolish the Casual Ward.

HOW TO DEAL WITH THE BONA FIDE WORKMAN.

One of the most sensible suggestions in Mr. Dawson's paper is that in which he proposes to deal with the bond fide seeker for work, when he has lost the lodgings at present provided for him in the casual ward. Mr. Dawson

He would be expected to legitimise himself by means of a police or properly-attested private certificate asserting his bona fides and his destination, and his labour passport should secure him free right to lodging and food on the way, for if there is any class of men whom it is the interest—not to say the duty of society to help it is those who honestly seek work and pursue For them housing might be found in proper quarters at the workhouse or in decent houses of call and night shelters, such as exist in Germany and Switzerland, and these might be placed under either municipal or police control.

If this were done, society would have little compunction in dealing drastically with the incorrigible loafer, who at present escapes unwhipped of justice because he is mixed up with honest workmen on the lookout for a job. Having thus cleared the ground, Mr. Dawson proceeds to tell us what should be done here by describing what is already done in Berlin and in Berne.

A GERMAN LABOUR COLONY.

Outside Berlin there stands what is described as a workhouse; but as in England a workhouse is a place where people do not work, it is better to call it a labour colony. This colony is provided for the following classes of people :-

Whoever wanders about as a vagabond.

Whoever begs or causes children to beg, or neglects to restrain from begging such persons as are under his control and oversight and belong to his household.

Whoever is so addicted to gambling, drunkenness, or idleness that he falls into such a condition as to be compelled to seek public help himself or for those for whose maintenance he is

Any female who is placed under police control owing to systematic immorality

Any person who, while in receipt of public relief, refuses out of sloth to do such work suited to his strength as the authorities may offer him.

Any person who, after losing his past means of subsistence, fails to procure a livelihood within the time allotted to him by the competent authority, and who cannot prove that in spite of his best endeavours he has been unable to do so.

All these people may be taken up in Germany, and sent to gaol for a longer or shorter period—and after the period of detention has been served, may be handed over to the State (as distinguished from the Communal) Police Authority, which may sentence them to be detained for any period, up to two years, in a workhouse, or to be employed, under police control, upon public works during the same period.

TWO YEARS' HARD LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. Dawson says :-

It is a first principle of the workhouse that all men of healthy body and mind sent thither shall be employed on the irrigation works several miles away, which are the culmination of Berlin's great sewage system, and at the time of my visit 665 men, out of a total of 1,617 inmates of all kinds, were engaged upon these works. The less robust and the older men are employed variously in and about the house, as in shoe-mending, tailoring, carpentry, locksmithry, and wood-cutting, while the women are engaged in sewing for a host of municipal institutions. The discipline in force in the workhouse is strict, and in certain eventualities rigorous.

The result, he declares, is admirable.

THE EXAMPLE OF SWITZERLAND.

This, it may be said, is all very well for despotic Germany. No one would be so hard-hearted as to doom even the most incorrigible tramp to two years' hard labour from five o'clock in the morning till eight o'clock at night. So Mr. Dawson turns to Switzerland, and describes the municipal labour colony of the city of Berne, where a somewhat similar system prevails, with the most excellent results :-

These are the words of the Director of the institution, as spoken to myself:—"The people come here as a rule miserable and unhealthy, low and wretched, worn out by careless living and bad food, but they soon become new creatures." They do not all turn out saints by any means, but the large percentage of wastrels won back to sobriety and industry will be held far to outweigh the net maintenance expenditure of £5 a head a year which is incurred on their behalf by those who believe with John Ruskin that the making of men and women, or the re-making if need be, is one of the most lucrative businesses in which a State can engage.

A Library for Thirty Shillings.

MANY people have derived pleasure and benefit by subscribing to our library, but there are many living far from free libraries and book-stores who have no means of gratifying their desire to keep themselves acquainted with the literature of the day. Others wish to be able to read entertaining stories and novels during the long winter evenings, but do not care to purchase the books outright. It is to these that the Circulating Library boxes come as a They will be sent to the most remote village or to a suburban club, and whoever has once subscribed continues to do so. The price at which a box can be obtained is thirty shillings a quarter.

A cheaper series has also been issued at thirty shillings the half-year, sixty books being contained in a box. The books have been carefully selected, and comprise all branches of literature-poetry, history, travel, biography, fiction, illustrated magazines, etc.

Lists and full particulars may be obtained from THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS CIRCULATING LIBRARY, Temple House, Temple Avenue, E.C.

XUM

umber. mell of refrain I like e is so gentle-ninine ublish d the that azard, cdotes usness erhaps ention. ot any ith my hands. And rote-ohiloband, rable

urning erally of her basis r and says, ustic ficant t," a nan." o her ade a th on

dear ngs."

rant,

r lost ches ing. who by is a orts

nas ick, old and s of nas ys, ase

en,

THE STATE AS MONEY-LENDER.

THE woes which the farmer suffers at the hands of the money-lender form the burden of well-nigh universal lament. Russian mujik, Indian ryot, American corngrower—all join in bewailing the pitiless power of Shylock. Our Australasian fellow-subjects, however, are not in the chorus. They have hit on the idea, Why not be our own Shylocks? The Hon. W. P. Reeves, Agent-General for New Zealand, tells in the National Review how they have carried out the idea. "Colonial Governments as Money-lenders" is the title of his paper.

"ADVANCE, AUSTRALASIA"-NEW STYLE.

Forty years ago, he says, it was quite a common thing for farmers and flockowners in Australasia to pay fifteen per cent. for advances on their wool, sheep, or crops. From 1850 to 1870 mortgage rates varied from nine to seven, by 1890 from seven and a half to six on the cream of landed property. But as prices fell lower, cheaper money became a necessity, and in the bad times, 1893-95, the farmer's cry was loud and bitter. In four colonies — New Zealand, South Australia, Western Australia, and Victoria—the Government, being able to borrow more cheaply than the private citizen, came to the rescue and passed certain Advance Acts whereby the State became money-lender. The private usurer found an effective competitor.

THE NEW ZEALAND SCHEME.

The New Zealand "Advances to Settlers Act," passed in 1894 at the instance of Mr. Ward, now Minister of Railways, constitutes an office under a superintendent and a board composed of leading Civil Servants. Mr. Reeves says:—

This Board met for the first time on the 23rd February, 1895. The borrowing of three millions of money was authorised by Parliament to provide the Office with loan capital, and a million and a half was borrowed in London in the spring of 1895. This money the Office proceeded to lend out on first mortgage on land used for farming, dairying, or market-gardening. Urban and suburban land used for building and manufacturing may not be taken as security. Nor is any lending done on personal property . . The Superintendent of the Office has no power to authorise a loan; only the Board can do that, and before the Board grants the money it must examine not only the report of its own valuers, but the independent valuation of the land made by the Government Land-Tax Department . . . The first attraction of the Office to the small mortgagor is the low fees it charges for inspecting and valuing.

In five years £2,137,000 has in these ways been lent, out of which £340,000 has been repaid. At the end of March of this year the Superintendent had the agreeable duty of reporting that all instalments of interest and principal due to date had been collected, "no sum remaining outstanding on March 31st, 1900." Only one farm seems to have been foreclosed on during the five years of the Board's operations, and that the Superintendent was able to sell without loss. Of the advances made it is recorded that 63 per cent. were applied to paying off mortgages already existing which had been bearing a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent.

THE BUSINESS DONE.

The largest loan permitted is £3,000, the smallest £25. In March this year the Office had no securities lying on its hands—a very satisfactory outcome of five years' work:—

The figures of the Board's business for the five years ending with March, 1900, were: Loans applied for, £3,711,000; loans granted and accepted, £2,179,000. The number of applications made was 10,995; the number granted, 7,448. There were, therefore, from first to last, rather more than 3,500 disappointed would-be borrowers. Of these, 1,004 had their applications granted in part, but were dissatisfied with the sum offered them, and preferred to decline it altogether.

MOSES AND SOLON REDIVIVI.

A special feature is the system of instalment loans:—
This not only provides the means for tempting the farmer to borrow, but the machinery for extricating him from the grip of his indebtedness. Therein it differs from all other mortgage systems of which I have heard, unless, indeed, it may be said to aim at somewhat the same object as the Jewish Jubilee and the famous enactment of Solon. Under the instalment system the borrower pays 5 per cent. interest; but his yearly payment is actually at the rate of 6 per cent., I per cent. of which goes to a sinking fund to repay the principal of the debt. Thus seventy-three half-yearly payments discharge the debt in thirty-six years

The South Australian Act limits the repayment by instalment at periods varying from  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to 21 years, and asks only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. interest. Mr. Reeves reckons that the total amount now advanced in the four colonies must be well above £4,000,000. "It is common knowledge that the operation of the lending laws has been coincident with a marked fall in the rates of interest."

There is one obvious moral gain attending this reform, which Mr. Reeves naturally does not mention. It must tend to the elimination of the Shylock type of man.

Growth of Socialism in America.

MR. MAURICE LOW, chronicling American affairs in the National Review, reports from the general figures of recent elections that the Socialists have made gains. They refused to coalesce with the Democrats, and ran a Presidential candidate of their own—Eugene Debs, leader of the great railway strike. "Men who keep in touch with organised labour say that Socialism is spreading," and is stronger in the older settled communities of the East. Mr. Low goes on to mingle narrative and prophecy:—

In Massachusetts the Mayors of two important cities, avowed Socialists, were elected; and in New York Socialism is a factor, trifling, of course, at the present time, but still a factor. The trend of American thought is toward Socialism, although many men who are unconscious Socialists-if the expression is permissiblewould be horrified at the mere suggestion. But when you see the efforts being made toward the municipalization of public utilities-the ownership of gas and waterworks by the community and the agitation in favour of Government ownership of telegraphs and railways, an agitation not confined to merely visionary cranks, one is forced to the conclusion that it is significant of the spread of Socialist doctrines. It has been predicted that the next contest in this country, although not necessarily the next campaign, will be a death grapple between Individualism and Collectivism, not precisely the Collectivism of Karl Marx, but a rational Socialism in accordance with modern requirements. This, of course, is a projection into the future, and merely interesting as a philosophical speculation, yet the fact should not be overlooked that the causes which contributed to McKinley's election—the multiplication of trusts, the accumulation of colossal fortunes by a small number of men, and the control of transportation facilities—are doing more than anything else to make thinking men believe that the only remedy is to be found in enlightened Socialism.

THE Sunday at Home closes the century with a number bright inside and out. Mr. Cousins' article on Protestant Madagascar under the French flag and Dr. Forsyth's "Call of the New Century," claim separate notice. There are other missionary papers dealing with evangelism in England, Turkey and China.

"A of an e Noven United made vears. increas more t finance accour messag reply r while f operati more preced

The of the

Mr. comme trade of rail beg

the nun

estimat 1,659,0 sevente century increase 2,789,0 1850, increase 1860, the

The similar steam t 5,814,0 increase 1860, s

THE INDUSTRIALISED WORLD.

(1) A CENTURY OF COMMERCE.

"A CENTURY of International Commerce" is the title of an excellent article in the North American Review for November, in which Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the United States Bureau of Statistics, sums up the progress made in trading between nations in the last hundred years. In that period, while the world's population has increased less than 150 per cent., its trade has increased more than 1,000 per cent. "Steam, electricity, invention, finance, and peace," are the five magic words which account for this unparalleled increase. A business message which formerly took a year for despatch and reply may now be answered in a few minutes and hours, while finance has simplified and accelerated all mercantile operation, and peace, in spite of all our wars, has been more prevalent in the present century than in any preceding one.

HOW TRADE HAS GROWN.

The following is a condensation of Mr. Austin's table of the increase in the world's trade in 100 years:—

by 1870, steam tohnage was 3,040,000, and sail had dropped to 13,000,000; by 1880, steam had become 5,880,000, and sail 14,400,000; by 1890, steam had reached 9,040,000, and sail had dropped to 12,640,000; and, in 1898, the steam tonnage was estimated at 13,045,000, and the sail tonnage at 11,045,000. The rapidity of growth of steam transportation, however, can only be realised when it is remembered that the steam vessel, by reason of its superior speed, size, and ability to cope with all kinds of weather, is able to make four times as many voyages in a year as a sailing vessel, and that, in comparing the steam tonnage of the late decades with the sail tonnage of the earlier ones, the former must be multiplied by four to give it a proper comparison with the unit of sail tonnage.

Mr. Austin says that the amount of gold in Europe in 1492 was not more than 60,000,000 dols., or less than the fortune of several individuals at the present day. At present the yearly production is five times as great, and as a consequence 95 per cent. of the world's commerce is carried on between nations who employ a gold standard. Mr. Austin naturally devotes a special page to a summary of America's part in the general progress. He says:—

While the total commerce of the world has grown from

						_	Com					SHIPPING.
Year. 1800 1850 1898	640,0			,000,			Aggregate. Dollars. 1,479,000,000 4,049,000,000			II	Sail. Tons. 4,026,000 11,470,000 11,045,000 I		Steam. Tons. None 858,000
1090		• •	1,500	,000	,000	 1	9,915,000,		13.2/	11	,045,00	0 1	3,043,000	03,200,000
Year. 1800		•••		•••			Railways Miles, None		Telegraph Miles, None	15.	•••	Cables Miles, None		Area. Cultivated. Acres. 360,000,000
1850							23,960		5,000			2		-
1898							442,200		933,000			168,00	0	861,000,00
Year.				P	Cotte roduc Poun	tion.		Co. Produ Tor	ction.		Proc	Iron luction.		Gold Pro- duction of Decade ending with year, Dollars,
1800			0.0	5	20,00	00,00	o	11,60	00,000	•••	46	000,000		128,464,00
1850				1,4	35,00	00,00	0	81,40	00,000		4,4	22,000		363,928,000
1898						00,00		610.00	00,000		37.1	50,000		1,950,000,000

WHAT STEAM HAS DONE.

Mr. Austin traces in detail the effect of each of the five commerce-producing factors which he mentions upon the trade of the world. Take railways, for example:—

The application of steam to transportation of merchandise by rail began in England in 1825, and in the United States in 1830, the number of miles of railway in the world in 1830 being about 200. In that year the world's commerce, according to the best estimates obtainable, was 1,981,000,000 dols, as against 1,659,000,000 dols. in 1820, an increase in the decade of barely seventeen per cent., while in the preceding decades of the century the increase had been even less. By 1840, railways had increased to 5,420 miles, and commerce had increased to 2,789,000,000 dols., an increase of forty per cent. From 1840 to 1850, railways increased to 23,960 miles, and commerce had increased to 4,049,000,000 dols., a gain of forty-five per cent. By 1860, the railways had increased to 67,350 miles, and commerce to 7,246,000,000 dols., an increase of seventy-nine per cent.

The application of steam to sea transport has had a similar effect:—

The first steamship crossed the ocean in 1819, and the total steam tonnage affoat in 1820 is estimated at 20,000 tons, against 5,814,000 of sail tonnage. By 1840, steam tonnage had increased to 368,000, while sail had grown to 9,012,000; by 1860, steam had reached 1,710,000, while sail was 14,890,000;

1,479,000,000 dols, to 19,915,000,000 dols, that of the United States has increased from 162,000,000 dols, to over 2,000,000,000 dols, while the ratio of increase in exports of domestic merchandise is even much greater.

(2) How JAPAN HAS FARED.

The North American Review for November contains another commercial article, which is important both for its contents and its authorship. Its title is "The Industrial Revolution in Japan," and its author Count Okuma, formerly Japanese Prime Minister. The revolution which he describes is that caused by the struggle of the Japanese, after their entry upon European ways, to readjust the balance between imports and exports. While Japan remained a hermit nation, she was able to supply herself with everything necessary; but the political and social revolution led to a demand for a thousand articles of European origin which the native manufacturers were unable to supply. Thousands of Japanese workmen were therefore thrown out of employment, and the whole industrial system of the country had to be modernised to restore the balance. But to do this, workmen had first to be trained; and Count Okuma says it is the lack of trained intelligence which is still most severely felt in Japanese ations them,

er to tgage id to d the n the ent is es to entyyears

and that must edge dent

orm, must es in es of ains. ran bebs, p in eades of and ctor, trend men ole i see ublic comit is been not ween vism with the , yet con-

, the men, than nedy

d to

h a e on and rate

with industrial life. But in spite even of this the adjustment of industrial institutions is now an accomplished fact. Count Okuma quotes the match industry as one of the greatest successes. The Japanese not only supply their own requirements, but export matches to Corea, Siberia, China and India, to the value of 7,000,000 yen. Twenty years ago the cotton spinning industry employed only 20,000 spindles; to-day it employs 1,300,000, while the woollen factories of Tokio and Osaka import in raw wool to the value of 4,917,763 yen. The following table shows the increase of Japanese exports in ten years:—

IN THOUSANDS OF YENS,

	x889.		x897.		1898.
Habutaye	804		9,530		12,055
Other silk piece goods			186		573
Silk handkerchiefs	2,104		3,390		3,555
Cotton piece goods	143		2,512		2,691
Carpets	54		973		850
Matches	1,137		5,641		6,273
Flowered matting	166		1,232		3,938
Cotton yarns			13,490		20,105
Porcelain and pottery	1,449		1,819		1,989
Lacquer	589		767		783
Straw braid	146		3,181		5,981
Umbrellas	26		628		687
	6,618		43,349		59,480

A FREE TRADE POLICY.

Now that Japan has gained tariff autonomy, and can impose what duties she will, what will she do with it? Count Okuma does not think that, for the present, she will resort to Protection:—

She is aware that, for the development of her resources, she is indebted to the free trade system, and she will remain a willing instrument for benefiting other nations through it, as well as herself, In this she finds the means of repaying her indebtedness to the Western nations—especially to the United States, which first introduced her into the family of nations—who imbued her with the spirit of modern civilisation, and gave her whatever she has needed for the invigoration of her national life.

The Progress of Madagascar.

WHILE we are lost in admiration of our own genius for developing conquered lands, we ought to have some regard left for similar work done by other nations, even though the nation in question be French. We have shown an ignoble disposition to grudge our neighbours their Colonial expansion and to question their Colonial abilities. We shall do well to heed the testimony given by Rev. W. E. Cousins, of the London Missionary Society, writing in the December Sunday at Home on Protestantism in Madagascar under the French flag. His first chapter deals with "suspicion and opposition." He speaks of the delight the Malagasy subordinate officials show in their French uniform, and of their keen appreciation of the "liberal salaries paid regularly month by month, an experience absolutely new to government officials in Madagascar." He goes on:—

Great material changes are taking place. Roads and bridges, telegraphs and telephones, are bringing distant parts into closer relation to one another. Postal communication has been greatly facilitated. A good police force has been organised, and the general administration has been much improved. The law courts command the respect and confidence of the natives because of the impartiality of the judges and the prompt despatch of business; and an admirable system of land registration has been introduced. In brief, we may say that, under its new government, Madagascar has in five years made more rapid advance than could have been hoped for in a century under the sluggish and unprogressive ways of the Hova government.

"THE SOCIAL ENGINEER."

MR. W. H. TOLMAN writes in the Century on "What more than Wages?"—a question often put now by working men. He mentions a new avocation to which he gives the name of "social engineer." He says:—

An employer doing a business of half a million asked the writer if he could commend to him any young man or woman, preferably some one just graduated from college, hence of trained intelligence, who could go into his establishment with the status of a private secretary, for the sole purpose of studying and advising, by personal contact with the working staff, so that the employees could be made of more value to themselves, in the first instance, and to their employer, in the second.

m

li

th er

m sp

Sa

to w

no

Wa

gr

m

me al

to wl

cu

H

bo

go yea

an wh

pla

any

Ele

Mr. Tolman was asked by another firm for hints towards industrial betterment among their men. His many suggestions were encountered with the retort: "We are too busy—we must do our own work."

"Of course you are too busy," I said, "and for that very reason you need some one on your staff whose sole business will be the planning and direction of movements to improve industrial conditions. In other words you need a social engineer.

Social engineering, accordingly, is a new profession, and the above facts show that there is already a demand for experts in this line. Will the members of the profession be recruited from our colleges?

Recent appointments by Mr. Lever, at Port Sunlight, and by Mr. Rowntree, at York, show that the movement is crossing the Atlantic to our own shores. He refers to Port Sunlight, with its "individual homes" for the wage-earners. He mentions Ludlow, Peacedale and Hopeful as types of American industrial communities. A new type he finds in Vandergrift, which in 1895 was 500 acres of fields and meadows:—

The lay-out of the town was planned by one of the most eminent landscape architects in America, while the water and lighting systems are ample and perfect. All this development was planned and executed by the company, who started their new works at Vandergrift in 1895; to-day there are nearly five hundred homes, five churches, one school, and a casino.

Mr. Tolman then goes on to show that "investment in the manhood of employees does pay, because a more vigorous man can do more work, a more conscientious man will do more conscientious work, and a more intelligent man will do more intelligent work?"

Here is a novel idea :-

An American manufacturer, who employs a young woman to devote her whole time to work for and among the women of his factory and the neighbourhood, has installed her in a house which is a kind of social centre. The kitchen, dining-room, bedroom, and bath-room, and her private apartments, have been fitted up simply, yet with all the necessities of home-keeping, for the express purpose of serving as an object-lesson for prospective couples, so that they may know just what will be necessary for their own new home and what is the cost of each article. In addition to the demonstration of what a home needs in the way of furnishings, a superb opportunity is afforded of showing that for the same amount of money wall-paper may be bought of a colour and design that will harmonise with the carpet, and that the furniture will fit in with both; in other words, that the beautiful can be combined with the useful, to the heightened charm of each, at no greater expense.

Employers with a conscience in the matter will be glad to know that "there is an organisation in New York which is collecting, by photographs, diagrams, reports, documents, whatever is being done by employers for employees."

SPOKES FROM "THE HUB."

"THE Beacon of American Literature—Boston," is the subject of much interesting gossip by Mr. Douglas Sladen in the Leisure Hour for December. Mr. Sladen went to Boston in 1888, but recalls incidents of an earlier date.

Zhat

ork-

he

the nan.

e of

with ying

that

the ints

His

ort :

very

will dus-

the ts in

from ght,

ent

s to igeeful

new cres

nost

and nent heir

five

in ore

ous

tel-

n to his ouse

een

for tive

for

In wav hat of a hat

the ned lad

ork

rts,

for

"SWEET REASONABLENESS" GONE SOUR.

He tells curious incidents of two celebrated English visitors, men of letters certainly, but hardly men of manners. He says:—

When I knew him (Holmes) . . . . the great centre of literary life in Cambridge was the hospitable house of Mr. Houghton, the publisher, where so many notable English authors have been entertained, two of whom, Dickens and Matthew Arnold, gave mortal offence within these walls. For Matthew Arnold's special delectation, Boston beans, which are prepared with bacon and are so identified with Boston literary life and Boston Sabbaths, had been provided as an entric. Instead of being pleased, he was very sarcastic, and said it was an outrage bringing a dish which smelt like that into polite society. This took place at a dinner-party, and his onslaught outraged everyone present except the host.

DICKENS'S LOSS OF TEMPER-AND OF MUCH BESIDES.

One is scarcely less sorry to read this about Dickens:—Dickens's ebullition of temper, which cost his heirs and assigns so dearly, took place in the library. Mr. Houghton said to him that, as he could not prevent other houses republishing Dickens's works without payment, since there was no copyright, he could not afford to pay him more than a five per cent. royalty, but he was prepared to pay that. It was at a time when the American greenback had been terribly depreciated by the war. Dickens completely lost his temper, and said, "Well, if you won't give me more than that, I don't want any of your dirty money. It is not worth anything, anyhow." When Mr. Houghton told me this story he added that, just for his own satisfaction, he had always kept an account of the money that would have been paid to Dickens and his heirs, and it amounted to a good many thousand pounds.

"THE AUTOCRAT'S" ONLY REVENGE.

In pleasant contrast to these instances of British boorishness is the story which Oliver Wendell Holmes told when sitting in his library taking a cup of tea:—

"Look at this, Mr. Sladen," he said, showing two newspaper cuttings pasted side by side; "that is the only revenge I ever took." The first of the cuttings was a virulent review of Holmes's "Dorothy Q.," published when it first came out. The success of the poem was instant and absolute. Some busybody told Dt. Holmes who had written the review. The merry, good-hearted little man took no notice of it at the time, but years later, when he came upon a paragraph in another paper announcing the failure and suicide of the man who had written the review, he cut it out and pasted it alongside of the review.

A SMART JUVENILE REJOINDER.

A very ancient excuse for defective table manners was very properly snubbed by a small juvenile, to Dr. Holmes' great delight. Mr. Sladen, after recounting another incident, goes on:—

It was almost immediately after this that he had the passageof-arms with my boy, who was then about seven years old, which tickled him so immensely. The child was in his natural place—near the refreshment table. "Why don't you help yourself, little man?" said the Doctor. "Because I haven't any fork," responded the child. "Never mind, fingers were made before forks." "But not my fingers!"

These are a few samples of a most entertaining essay.

MR. ARTHUR H. U. COLQUHOUN gives, in the Canadian Magazine for November, a short account of eight General Elections in Canada between the years 1867 and 1896 inclusive.

THE FUTURE OF NEW ZEALAND.

SIR ROBERT STOUT, Chief Justice of New Zealand, contributes to the Australasian Review of Reviews an article upon "New Zealand in an Island Federation." Sir Robert Stout maintains that "from the very oarly days of the colony settlers dreamed great dreams of their civilising mission in Polynesia. There are now in the colony large and valuable reserves set apart by the Government fifty years ago, for educational purposes in which the trust . . . runs as follows: 'In trust for the education of children of our subjects of all races, and of children of other poor and destitute persons, being inhabitants of islands in the Pacific Ocean.'"

In order to fulfil that trust, the New Zealanders are casting covetous eyes at the Fiji Islands. Mr. Seddon would breakfast off Fiji, lunch off Tonga, and dine off the Cook and Savage groups. The New Zealand House of Representatives has already passed a resolution asking Fiji to enter into the political system of New Zealand, on which proposal Mr. Chamberlain has at present put down his foot. It is 1,140 miles by sea from Auckland to the capital of the Fiji Islands. The people of Fiji, through delegates and by petitions, asked in 1884 and 1885 to be annexed to New Zealand. In 1885, two Samoan chiefs came to Auckland on the same mission. The Colonial Office turned a deaf ear to their warnings, and Samoa was in 1889 partitioned between Germany and the United States. In 1890 the British resident appointed to the Cook group was selected by the New Zealand Government. What is now proposed is the formal annexation of the Cook group, and of some adjacent islands that have been under British protection and management for some years.

New South Wales, which does four times as much trade with the Fijis as Auckland, protests against the proposed extension of New Zealand's sovereignty. Against this, Sir Robert Stout protests. He reminds them that New Zealand paid part of the cost of annexing New Guinea, and now that she is undertaking at her own expense the government of islands in her range of influence, is it too much to ask Australians to assist her with kindly recognition?. The Hon. W. McMillan, in a brief paper following Sir Robert Stout's, says he thinks that the difference of opinion between New Zealand and New South Wales concerning Fiji "may possibly be one of the first of the Imperial difficulties arising out of the growing nation-hood of Australasia." Mr. McMillan thinks that New Zealand is pursuing a wicked and selfish policy in standing outside Federation. She simply desires to get all the advantages of commercial reciprocity without any of the responsibilities arising out of politica lconnection. "Australia," he declares, "will not receive New Zealand into the Commonwealth unless she subscribes to all the vital provisions of her vital constitution, and not only makes herself one with her in trade and defence, but one with her . . . in her political destiny."

THE Rivista Musicale Italiana, a solid quarterly, is to be congratulated on the completion of its seventh annual volume. Its articles, which are in Italian or French, deal exhaustively with topics of musical interest. The notice of Enrico Bossi's work in the current number, for instance, runs to about forty pages. One of the best papers in the same number is that (in French) on Caron de Beaumarchais, by H. Kling. The notice of Perosi's "Massacre of the Innocents," contributed by E. Adaïewsky, is also written in French.

. PREHISTORIC CRETE LAID BARE.

It is an interesting link between the remotest eld and the latest present, that the action of the Concert of Europe in freeing Crete from the unspeakable Turk has directly forwarded the discovery of the oldest civilisation in Europe. Mr. D. G. Hogarth gives in the Contemporary a most instructive account of the recent exploration of Crete, more particularly of that conducted by himself and Mr. Arthur Evans. On the Kephala Hill, at Knossos, they came upon a great quantity of "pre-Mycenaean" pottery, marked by novelty of form and "startling elegance." Mr. Hogarth says:—

The art, which could produce these elaborate vessels in Crete early in the second millennium before the Christian era, was certainly in some respects not behind the art of contemporary craftsmen in the Egypt of the Twelfth Dynasty.

A NEW LITERATURE UNEARTHED.

In March, while exploring the remains of a great palace, they came on the first example of the most epochmaking of the objects found on Kephala, namely, "a small wedge of hardened clay inscribed with half a dozen symbols of the undeciphered linear script, which is now known to be the long-looked-for medium of written communication in the prehistoric Ægean":—

Three days later' more such wedges were discovered, and thereafter, as the soil deepened towards the north, clay documents appeared daily by tens and twenties, till in certain chambers and galleries in particular the tale, not only of wedges, but of larger tablets with many lines of text, had to be reckoned by hundreds. Many were found lying packed together as in boxes whose sides had long ago rotted away; others, permeated by wet, had coagulated into lumps, hardly to be divided.

"THE OLDEST THRONE IN EUROPE."

Mr. Hogarth goes on to describe, deep sunk and approached by a stairway, the most remarkable group of chambers yet laid bare:—

The central one, paved and frescoed, but much damaged by fire, contains a large sunken bath or tank with stone balustrade and descending steps, and, facing it, a stone bench running round the northern wall, broken in the centre by a singular throne in grey gypsum. The seat is shaped to human convenience; the high back, resembling that of an old English chair, is scolloped round the edge, and the legs, shown in relief on the supporting block, are ornamented with truly Gothic crocketing. What purpose, ritual or otherwise, the tank may have served, what king and council sat over against it, we can only guess; but there is no doubt that, as Mr. Evans says, this is the oldest throne in Europe.

"LADIES IN PUFFED SLEEVES" B.C. 2000!

The frescoes discovered amid these ruins, says the writer, "make a strange revolution in our idea of pre-historic art in Greek lands":—

One would have said the painters of early Hellenic vases had been at work. Crowds of semi-nude youths, shown in delicate profile; red-skinned and black-haired warriors hurling darts; ladies in puffed sleeves and flounced skirts in animated conversation on balconies; façades of buildings, apparently palaces and shrines—these are the subjects drawn in with a sure brush, among brilliant rosettes, sprays, and geometric patterns.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURIES B.C. AND A.D.

Here is a pretty reminder from the twentieth century before Christ to the beginning of the twentieth century after Christ:—

The Knossos palace shows a civilisation which reached the highest point attained by archaic art in painting the human form, in modelling plaster, and in carving stone vessels. In treating hard orems in intaglio, it equalled the finest Phoenician craft of later times, even as, at Mycenæ (to which countless links of fabric, style, and pattern relate the Knossian palace finds), its metallurgy equalled the finest Egyptian; while in the realism and life of its style, it excelled all its eastern rivals and teachers. We have now, under our hand, over a thousand written documents of a civilisation which a short time ago was thought to have possessed no writing system at all, and it is most probable that many of these, when deciphered, will serve to justify us in calling the "Mycenæan" Age, not prehistoric, but historic. We see the king inhabiting in Crete a vast palatial building adapted for the storage of immense wealth in kind, and, so far as all appearance goes, not in any way fortified. His life was led, not behind ramparts as at Mycenæ, but in open security, though his dynasty had ousted another, possessing a very high antecedent culture, refined to the verge of decadence. Relations with other shores, especially the Egyptian, were open and frequent. Objects of art, like a diorite statuette of Twelfth Dynasty type, came from the Nile to Crete, and pottery went from Crete to the Nile. Moreover, strong influences of style passed to and fro, for the paintings of Khuenaten's town at Tell el Amarna are as parallel to the Knossian as the foliated lamp of Knossos is to the capitals of Egyptian colonnades. Direct evidence has at last been obtained as to the racial type and the speech prevailing in the prehistoric Ægean area; and a great accession to previous evidence on religious practice and cult affinities.

The article ends with a vivid sketch of the Psychro Cave, the supposed seat of Zeus' fabled birth, with its subterranean lake and beautiful tracery of stalactite roof.

THE AUTHOR OF THE EIGHT HOURS' DAY.

THE eight hours' movement has won actuality enough in home-lands to make its Colonial origin of something like Imperial interest. The series of "Capitals of Greater Britain," now being sketched in the Pall Mall Magazine, reaches this month Wellington, N.Z. Mr. Tom L. Mills, in the course of his well-written paper, recounts the beginnings of the reform:—

A modest and now much-defaced marble tablet over the meagre drinking fountain outside the city's Free Public Library is the very slight tribute paid by Wellington workers to the man whose forethought won for New Zealanders, and other colonials, the eight-hour workday. Samuel Duncan Parnell, a carpenter, London-born—who never owned allegiance to a trade's union—single-handed, when first he set foot on Port Nicholson's beach, stipulated for, and eventually obtained for himself, and afterwards established and fostered for the benefit of his fellows, the practice of the principle of equal division of the twenty-four

"Eight hours' labour, Eight hours' rest, Eight for recreation And what seemeth best."

There has been much argument in the Colonies and Great Britain upon the origin of the shorter workday, and it was not until a short time before his death that Parnell himself established his claim as the founder of the movement, and the present writer has independent evidence supporting the claim. Parnell fought in the workshop and at mass meetings on Petoné Beach, Wellington, for the principle during the time between February 7th and March 7th, 1840; he made it the custom of his trade and other trades in Wellington; it spread to other parts of the colony, thênce over to Victoria; and he lived to see the establishment of an annual Eight-hour Day (Labour Day) set apart as a State holiday in the land of his adoption, and died in Wellington in 1890 in his eightieth year.

Perhaps the name of Parnell will some day, when the claim of Labour to Leisure has been more universally recognised, suggest rather Eight Hours and New Zealand than Home Rule and Ireland. Certainly Samuel Duncan has achieved more than Charles Stewart.

has I does organ and been enough the "age o "a I His e is wal It this alarm the pl As a suppose which what a gushin And we do

tion t

marty

of oth

Philist

which of the the sta among Divini hood. We help sa to dea be (an cannot handle of suc appeal obviou Christ

no otl

human

Thi

Introd that a conte uncea transf not us differe other results guishi Divini in the what v withou by the fact in the D outwa

in the

was in man."

intens

A TOO ANXIOUS REVIEWER.

s of

), its

alism

hers. itten

was

it is

will pre-rete

im-

goes, parts

ined pecilike

Nile

ver.

gs of the ls of ined

oric

hro

its oof.

igh

ing

of all om

nts

the

ary

nan als,

ter,

n--- ch,

ter-

WS,

our eat

b-

the

m.

né

en

of er

see ty)

he lly

a-

el

THE enthusiasm to which the Church Quarterly Review has been stirred by the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play does infinite credit to that pious and decorous and erudite organ of Anglican opinion. The writer of the "study and appreciation" of the peasant drama has evidently been profoundly thrilled by what he saw, and he is man enough not to be ashamed of his emotion. He sees in the "Play" a "fragment of mediæval life," a glimpse of the age of faith, "astonishing, fascinating, unique," and also "a living comment on the ancient classical drama." His eulogy of the actors and of the author of the drama is warm and generous.

It is a pity that the writer should have intruded on this gracious mood of mind with a wholly gratuitous alarm about the orthodoxy of a certain guide-book to the play which is issued from this office. He says :-

As far as the text is concerned, the English world must, we suppose, be grateful to Mr. Stead; for his is the only book which gives the German and English side by side . . . But what are we to say of the Introduction? It is well meant, in a gushing, sentimental fashion. But the taste of it!.

And one expression keeps recurring and recurring about which we do not know what to think-is it meant to convey a suggestion that, after all, the interest of Calvary was only that of a martyrdom, differing in degree, not in kind, from the sufferings of other good men? Or is it pure ignorance of theology, with a Philistinish misapprehension of all that the Ammergauers intend, which makes him say to his readers that "that is the great gain of the Passion Play. It takes us clear back across the ages to the standpoint of those who saw Jesus the Galilean as but a man among men. It compels us to see him without the aureole of Divinity, as he appeared to those who knew him from his boyhood, and who said, 'Are not his brethren still with us?'"...

We are most anxious to be just to Mr. Stead, but we cannot help saying that he sadly mistook his vocation when he attempted to deal with the Passion Play. Whatever his own beliefs may be (and into these it is no business of ours to inquire), of this we cannot acquit him-that if he holds the Christian faith he has handled it with the presumption of gross ignorance. The results of such handling on the uneducated, to whom alone he can appeal, can only be to lead them to believe that the most obvious gain from the Passion Play is that it strips the legendary Christ of a divinity whose ascription to His Person has served no other purpose than to obscure the completeness of His humanity.

This is surely sheer perversity. The whole drift of my Introduction was to insist upon "the miracle of miracles," that a martyrdom which from the standpoint of Christ's contemporaries was "merely a passing episode in the unceasing martyrdom of man," should have actually transformed the world. "Why, I ask. Why,"—I do not use the phrase, but my meaning is clear,—"if it only differed in degree and not in kind from the sufferings of other good men," did the Crucifixion have such immense results? Surely the reviewer is capable of distinguishing between "the aureole of Divinity" and the Divinity itself. The "gain" referred to consists plainly in the reproduction of the actual, the representation of what was really obvious to the senses of contemporaries, without the phenomenal accretions which were added by the adoring fancy of later times. This reversion to fact inevitably drives the mind of the spectator to seek the Divinity not in any sensuous show or fantastic outward label, but where alone it can be found in the moral and spiritual personality clothed as it was in "the form of a servant" and "in fashion as a man." It is precisely because the play recalls with intense vividness "the form of a servant" and the "fashion as a man," that it forces us to realise what Power and Grace resided within that lowly exterior. For, as I said in the "Introduction," not until we start low enough do we understand the heights to which the Crucified has risen. It is only after realising the depth of His humiliation, we can even begin to understand the miracle of the transformation which He has wrought.

May the kindly and reverent heart of the reviewer be reassured, and help to widen the too ecclesiastical "head of him"! It is impossible to preface every reference to things sacred by a solemn recitation of the ecumenical Creeds. Life is too short.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL AIDS.

A FEW months ago, it will be remembered, a Bill was introduced into the House of Lords which, if passed, would have enabled the British Museum authorities, not only to disperse the collection of provincial newspapers among local authorities, but to destroy "printed matter not of sufficient value to justify its preservation." Fortunately, Mr. Sidney Lee and others came to the rescue in the Times; the Bill was withdrawn before it reached the House of Commons, and we hope one more national disaster has been averted. Meanwhile the British Museum authorities are contemplating the preparation of a subject index to the contents of the library. been a long-felt want, and now, when the printing of the catalogue is approaching completion, seems the time to put it in hand. The proposal, however, comes as something of a shock to "A Scholar," and a discussion of the question is opened in the Times. In this case the Times, which took a very enlightened view of the British Museum Bill, sides with "A Scholar," and thinks "it is quite safe to say that the time is not yet ripe for the compilation, in the interest of the average reader." How the library and readers have got on so long without a subject-index passes conception. Surely it is not too much to ask the national library to make its contents as widely known as possible; and the most natural means of performing this function would seem to be the issue of model and complete classified catalogues and subject-indexes, not merely for use in the British Museum Library itself, but for the use of students and other libraries.

Meanwhile we gladly recognise any enterprising individual effort which comes to our aid on however small a scale. Mr. Alfred Cotgreave, of the West Ham Public Libraries, is to be congratulated on the successful completion of his "Contents-Subject Index to General and Periodical Literature." Though compiled originally for the use of the Public Libraries of West Ham, the library authorities, we are glad to learn, have decided to publish an extra number of copies, so that readers elsewhere may benefit. What a long-felt want such general indexes have been is well known to those who have occasion to get up special subjects at short notice. The classified catalogue, admirable and useful as it is, takes little note of the separate contents of books; the "Contents-Subject Index," on the other hand, makes these a leading feature. An equally important feature is the inclusion of a very large number of articles in periodicals, presumably all to be found on the shelves of the West Ham Libraries. A supplement at the end of the book fills up a good many omissions in the earlier part of the Index, and brings the work down to about the middle of 1900. The whole runs to some 750 pages and may be purchased from Elliot Stock for 10s. 6d.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

A NEW FLAG FOR AUSTRALASIA.

THIS is a print of the suggested flag for Australasia, which won the prize of £25 offered by the Melbourne Evening Herald for the best design for a federal flag. It is flaunted in colours on the cover of the Australasian Review of Reviews for October, and a very showy flag it is. The five stars of the Southern Cross appear in clear relief upon a red background, and the flag itself is not unlike a blend of the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes. Mr. Fitchett, editor of the Australasian of Reviews, is Review now offering a prize of £50 for the best design for a federal flag. The competition is open to the whole of Australasia, and the six Australian prime ministers of the federating colonies have undertaken to act as judges. The competitors may decorate the flag with what they please, whereas in the Melbourne journal it was stipulated the federal must include the Union Jack and the Southern Cross. In the REVIEW OF REVIEWS competition, competitors can festoon the flag with kangaroos, if they please; but in that case it is to be feared the six Australian premiers would not award All designs the prize. must be sent in not later than February 1st. If, in the opinion of the judges, no better design than that which carried off the prize in the Melbourne competition is submitted, the £50 will not be awarded, but a consolation prize of £10 will be paid to the designer of the flag judged to be best among those sent in. Mr. Fitchett hopes that this competition will have the effect of "giving birth to a flag which will hold a proud and longenduring place amongst the flags of the civilised world."

The Australian Review of Reviews is already becoming like a bumper filled with foaming Imperialist champagne. In view of the coming of the Duke of York, the new Australian flag flames upon the cover, and many pages of the magazine are devoted to a discussion of how to celebrate the coming of the royalties. It is proposed that a flagstaff should be erected upon every State school, and that when the Federal Parliament is opened, the Duchess of York should press an electric button, which would give a signal which would run over the whole continent, and simultaneously the Union Jack would be hoisted to the music of cheering crowds over every State school and every public building in the colony. The Australians are already laying in flags, so that an export trade in Union Jacks ought to be a good line for some houses in the City. It seems that the shadow of Federation is already evoking the purely professional politician. Busy lawyers or great merchants who reside in Brisbane or Perth are already discovering that it would be blank ruin for them continuously doing parliamentary work in the new capital. Queensland wants to send Sir Samuel Griffiths as her representative, but he is Chief Justice, and he naturally does not wish to leave his well-paid life post to undertake temporary duties in the Federal Parliament. The colonies have been holding a secret conclave to discuss the Federal tariff. It is understood that they are unanimous in favour of taking the Victorian tariff as the basis for the Federal tariff, lowering some of its rates and raising others, and putting raw materials mainly on the free list. The chief difficulty is the question of sugar. It is expected that the other colonies will insist upon forbidding the importation of coloured labour, but as a condition they are suggesting that a duty of £4 per ton on cane sugar, with a heavy preferential rate as against beet, would be the least compensation that would suit Queensland, and it would appreciably raise the price of sugar all over Australia. It is interesting to note, in view of the strong line which the Australians have taken as to the alleged illtreatment of the blacks of the Transvaal by the Boers, that the Governor of South Australia, Lord Tennyson, has found it necessary to remind the world that the Australians themselves are guilty of abominable iniquities in relation to their black people. Lord Tennyson asked a meeting of the Aborigines' Friendly Association:—

Are you aware that black women in the Northern Territory have very insufficient protection by law from, I am sorry to say, the brutality of some of the lawless white men there, and suffer accordingly? Are you aware there is a great deal of illicit trading in liquor with the blacks there, which ought to be stopped, and which is ruining them body and soul? Are you aware of what your late Chief Secretary stated last year in Parliament, that the blacks are even now being carried away from their tribes by white men into virtual slavery? In God's name I hope South Australia will awaken to a truer sense of the responsibility that she owes to these black fellows, and that she will put down with a strong hand these abominable iniquities.

Mr. For certain the text whole; whole; suggestive science itself me Australia at the rich Kaffirs.

orders p favour. new Lice in each hotels. Party de have por for sellin be no o pressed The d capital o it must bala, wh present which is "a perf clear ai which is the thro granite, future ca

DR. A narrow si on the si of the con besides Yet as t makes r philanth "THE His contentury fi the work crowning successor usually let he goes ments, a large mi left Cut just as maintain he rem now condoes, an the two Republifor possi

The growth of

Mr. Fitchett thinks that Lord Tennyson's words are certain to be taken up in England, and perhaps made the text of undeserved reproach to the Colonies as a whole. Far be it from us to reproach the Colonies as a whole; only if I might be permitted to make a humble suggestion, it would be perhaps as well if the higher conscience of the Australasian community were to make itself more effective at the outposts of white colonies in Australia before sending contingents to teach the Boers at the rifle's mouth the right way of dealing with their Kaffirs.

The Queensland Assembly has amended its standing orders providing for closure if thirty members are in its favour. In New Zealand Mr. Seddon has introduced a new Licensing Bill, dividing the colony into nine districts, in each of which a three-fifths majority may close all hotels. In Victoria the programme of the Temperance Party demanded that a majority of half plus one should have power to reduce or absolutely prohibit the facilities for selling drink in each locality, and that there should be no compensation after three years' notice for suppressed licences.

The discussion as to the site of the new Australian capital continues. It must be in New South Wales, and it must not be within a hundred miles of Sydney. Bombala, which is a seaport of its own, a two-fold bay, is at present first favourite. After Bombala comes Orange, which is 192 miles west of Sydney, and is said to have "a perfect climate, with cool nights, bright days, and clear air." Another place that is spoken of is Vass, which is also 192 miles distant from Sydney. It is on the through line to Melbourne, and has ample deposits of granite, marble and limestone, from whose quarries the future capital can be built.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

DR. ALBERT SHAW has a large harvest to garner in narrow space in his December number. He has to gather in the significance of such notable events as the returns of the American Census, the Presidential election, and the constitution-making convention in Cuba. He has besides to say a farewell word to the departing century. Yet as though by rebound from recent political strain he makes room for articles of scholarly biography and social philanthropy.

"THE CROWNING ACHIEVEMENT" OF THE CENTURY.

His chronique begins with a note of peace. He says:—
It is not improbable that, when the events of the nineteenth century fall into their true places in the perspectives of history, the work of the Hague Peace Conference will appear as the crowning achievement of the period, and its best legacy to its successor. An event like the great conference at The Hague usually lacks full contemporary appreciation.

He goes on to insist on the pacific value of large armaments, and suggests that if the United States had had a large military force a few years ago, Spain would have left Cuba without fighting. He says, "It is in our day just as necessary and just as honourable for a nation to maintain an army as for a city to have a police force." He remarks on the probability that the British Islands now contain two or three million more people than France does, and hints that the best guarantee of peace between the two nations, and the greatest kindness to the French Republic, would be for England to prepare energetically for possible attack.

THE AMERICAN CENSUS.

The Census report leads Dr. Shaw to refer to the growth of the people who speak English as one of the things of prime significance in the nineteenth century. He remarks on the evenness of the growth of population in the United States. The centre of population, which has been moving westward for one hundred years, has remained almost stationary since 1890. It was then a little to the east—it is now a little to the west—of Columbus, Ohio. (Strange that the centre of the greatest people of the New World's discoverer.)

Dr. Shaw diagnoses the national verdict in the Presidential election by saying "this was not a year for party politics; nor was it a time when the country could possibly afford to repudiate either its financial decisions of four years ago, or its actions on the larger stage of the world's affairs subsequent to the Spanish War."

CUBA AND CANADA.

"The Cuban Republic—Limited" is the title and pith of a paper by Mr. Walter Wellman. He best describes the arrangement projected for Cuba by saying that Cuba will be to the United States as Canada is to the United Kingdom, save that Cuba will choose a president instead of having a nominal governor-general appointed by the paramount Power. The Convention now at Havana is said to give signs of accepting this scheme. Secretary Root, whom the writer calls the Father of the new Cuba, selected the following franchise for the Cuban people:—

Any Cuban (or any Spaniard who has renounced allegiance to Spain) may vote provided he is twenty-one years old, has resided in the municipality thirty days immediately preceding registration, and possesses any one of the following additional qualifications:—(1) Ability to read and write; (2) ownership of real or personal property to the value of 250 dols., American gold; (3) service in the Cuban army prior to July, 1898, and honourable discharge therefrom, whether a native Cuban or not.

The Constitution agreed upon by the Cuban Convention will not become law until signed by the American President. His veto would compel the Cubans to try again until he was satisfied.

FOUR FIGURES OF THE CENTURY.

Mr. Charles Johnston, late of the Bengal Civil Service, contributes an eloquent estimate of Max Müller. The great philologist, it is pointed out, taught human kinship through kindred speech:—

Most of all, he worked for the good of the Indian Empire, by infusing into the minds of her future administrators a respect for her ancient tongues and a living interest for the obscure idioms of a hundred furtive and backward peoples, who hide in the jungles and among the hills of that land of marvels, and who owe it chiefly to him that they are recognised as members of the great human family, as part and parcel of articulate man.

Mr. Johnston concludes with a noble peroration :--

Gladstone did much to humanise the policy of the world's most extensive empire; to reconcile was his dearest ambition, rather than to over-rule. Bismarck moulded together into one body, with a single heart, the fragments of a scattered people, showing us the vast power that lies in unity. Darwin, lovable and humble, broke down the barriers that cut us off from the lesser races of the world; broke down the barriers of time, and showed us the one Life surging for ever through all living creatures. Max Müller, accomplishing a like task for the invisible world, threw down the partition walls between peoples and tongues, making all the children of men once more akin in thought, as Darwin had shown them kindred in blood; and, lifting the mists from bygone ages, showed us the community of our speech, our thought and aspiration, with the word long hushed on lips of vanished races, of men whose name memory has ceased to whisper along the deserted corridors of time.

alians are in Union es in the ss already y lawyers erth are for them w capital. s as her naturally to leave ife post colonies

Federal

a secret uss the s undere unanif taking ff as the ral tariff, its rates ers, and terials ree list.

ortation, but as are sugar, erential t, would insation Queensarpre-orice of e other ornce of stralia. The note, and line is have ged ill-acks of any the overnor and it ralians elation to say,

I suffer
f illicit to be re you rear in away God's
of the tat she ties.

ting of

OTHER ARTICLES.

Hezekiah Butterworth remarks on "the old age of New England authors," and quotes one of them who

A literary life, without dissipations or selfish competitions and ambitions, tends to extreme old age. It is not difficult to explain why this is so. Nothing brings contentment like creative work, and a life for influence and contentment is true

There are two social articles. "Making a Way out of the Slum" is a title given to Mr. Jacob A. Riis' description of the Hirsch Colony at Woodbine, which is successfully transforming Russian Jews into contented agriculturists. Lillian W. Betts tells the working of a women's "town and country club," originated by a New York settlement. It has given tenement families not only a closer reciprocal life, but through its country home, and family holidays arranged at different times, it has also supplied the element of rural recreation.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE December number is distinctly alive and actual. "Young England's" cry for a New Fourth Party will probably make most stir. Mr. Reeves's record of "The State as Moneylender at the Antipodes" may be found to contribute more material progress. These, along with Mr. Boscawen's and Dr. Maguire's indictment of our military "system," claim separate notice.

ENGLISH JUDGESHIPS PARTY PRIZES!

A writer signing himself "E," after an admiring tribute to the unimpeachable impartiality of Her Majesty's judges, goes on to lament that judgeships are almost exclusively given as a reward for Party services, and lie as much in the hands of the "Whips" as the Chancellor's. As a consequence our judges are declared to be very defective in legal erudition: "The ordinary judge, from the Lords downwards, would be puzzled by even such a ludicrous test as the solicitors' final examination." Of our present Bench, "some of its judges are destitute of all but a slight smattering of legal knowledge; others are acquainted with the 'Annual Practice' and a textbook or two." If this be so the writer may well exclaim, "The system is essentially rotten." This is the cure he recommends :-

The remedy, therefore, must be drastic and speedy. The only sure and effectual way to deal with this anomalous evil is to take away the legal patronage from the Lord Chancellor and place it in other hands. And whose? Well, I would tentatively suggest that a committee of judges and barristers should be appointed for the express purpose of nominating the highest and lowest judicial officers for the consideration of the Crown. If this were done, the canker of Party politics would cease to gnaw at the effective administration of the law.

GERMAN AND ENGLISH CHILDREN COMPARED.

Miss Catharine Dodd compares German and English school-children on the strength of 196 German and 600 English answers to her two questions: "Which would you rather be—a man or a woman—and why?"
"Which man or woman of whom you have ever heard or read, would you most wish to be-and why? Fifty per cent. of the girls wished to be like Queen Louise and forty per cent to be like the holy Elizabeth of the Wartburg. "The German boy's heroes are chiefly inspired by the military spirit, the scholarly ideal, and hatred to England." Bismarck, Blücher, the Kaiser, and Frederick the Great are their chief military heroes. Several would like to be President Kruger because he had won three battles over the English: "it is a glorious thing to beat the English." In general Miss Dodd allows the German teaching of history and literature to be more systematic than ours; but the pious, domestic, and subordinate character of the German woman is extolled at the expense of her individuality. "Our girls are at least allowed to develop naturally and to think independently." The The German boy is "a person of character, of aspirations and dreams ":-

The English boy is far below him in aspiration, yet in the matter of forming a healthy judgment the English boy is-immeasurably his superior. . . The German boy does not play; he has no playground. He becomes introspective and argumenta-tive at an early age. While the English boy is a healthy young barbarian, the German boy is rapidly becoming a mature thinker. The English boy passes out of his stage of barbarism and becomes almost civilised in time, but the German boy never civilises. At best the German man is still half-child, half-philosopher, and often whole pedant.

This criticism will be felt by many readers to be itself a judgment on the English type it applauds. "The German boy never civilises," forsooth!

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY'S CHARACTER.

Mr. Maurice Low finds the secret of Mr. McKinley's triumph in the impossibility of Mr. Bryan. He has no high opinion of the victor +

Mr. McKinley is neither a Lincoln nor a Jackson nor a Hayes. He is an amiable, well-meaning, pious, but weak man. His amiability is the reason of his weakness. He is toofond of peace, and of having everybody around him content and happy, to exert the force which the President must frequently display. He has been too much the friend of his friends. He has paid an over-exaggerated deference to public opinion, which has led him to subordinate his own convictions and to yield his scruples because he thought the public differed with him. Hence his administration has been marked by vacillation, by timidity, and by negation. Yet, as things go, he has been successful,

The President will not, Mr. Low thinks, make any great use of his "sublime opportunity." "Peace, prosperity, contentment, are the symbols of the McKinley faith, and the greatest of these is prosperity."

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Arthur Galton deplores the bad habit of the last fifteen years or so, that Australian Governors should spend a great deal more than their official salaries; and urges that the new order now being set up should do away with this abuse. Coulson Kernahan discusses the question, "Is Emerson a Poet?" and answers Yes and No—in effect, "sometimes." "He was never more than a notebook draughtsman." Major C. B. Mayne objects to the proposal to make church parade optional in the army. He regards it as part of the homage and service due from the nation to its supreme Ruler and Governor, and would make the attendance of officers compulsory too.

THE Humanitarian for December is distinctly above the average. Quoted elsewhere are M. Guyot's remarks on English problems, and Professor Ferrero's on criminals and savages. Mr. Andrew Merry puts forward a very strong plea for cheap lodging-houses for women, with no more exacting standard of character than is maintained at the Rowton Hotels for men. Dr. Axon asks, are more boys than girls born? and quotes a variety of statistics to prove that there is an excess of male births. But as there is an excess of male mortality in infancy, there are more females than males from childhood to old age.

rath

with who som

defe

and The poli

Fo of say

not rec nat mo

for reli

the

and

W

abl

wo

do occ

Ce Th

COI

ab

VO bv

Bu is of th

th ob

hi

ap

pr

ca

SO

it

ar

lil

to C M

sh

A

tr

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

Blackwood's Magazine is a good number, although rather overladen with articles about the war. It opens with a paper upon Army Organisation, written by one whose object is to point out—some radical defects in our present system of training and administration, being absolutely convinced that unless these defects are remedied, all attempts at reform in other directions, and all increase of expenditure, will in the end prove unavailing. The root of the whole matter is—the assumption of the offensive policy for our home army.

WANTED-AN ASIATIC OFFICE.

The last article deals with the organisation of the Foreign Office, and recommends that the administration of our empire should be remodelled. The writer says:—

The official divisions into Foreign, Indian, and Colonial do not, in fact, correspond with the natural divisions, and any recasting of the offices concerned should be based upon the natural rather than the artificial classification. What seems most urgently needed, and it has been pointed out repeatedly for years past, is an Asiatic department which would relieve the Colonial Office of the charge of Hongkong, the Straits, Borneo, New Guinea, and other distant possessions, and the Foreign Office of China, Japan, Corea, Persia, etc. With such a distribution of labour each department might be able to train its staff and concentrate its efforts on its appropriate work, which might then have some chance of being efficiently done. The India Office would have its hands quite sufficiently occupied with India proper, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Ceylon, which is by nature a pendant to the Indian peninsula. The Colonial Office would be enabled to do more justice than it possibly can at present to the great and growing English communities in the three Continents before mentioned.

The best paper in the magazine, however, is an admirable ghost story, one of those weird tales which make you feel creepy all over. It is entitled "The Watcher by the Threshold," by John Buchan. Whoever Mr. Buchan may be, he is a man who knows his subject, and is not writing out of his own imagination. It is a story of the haunting of a living man by a kind of evil spirit, the suggestion being that it is the disembodied spirit of the Emperor Justinian, who for some strange reason obsesses a commonplace Scotch squire, and nearly drives him mad. But the tale must be read in its entirety to be appreciated. The Psychical Research Society might profitably address an inquiry to Mr. Buchan, for I do not remember in any of their annals having come upon any case in which the invisible control was physically quite so vigorous.

THE AMENITIES OF MODERN CONTROVERSIALISTS.

The Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, M.P., who writes "Musings Without Method," will have to look to it or else in future he had better alter the title of his article to "Musings without Manners." He used to write like a gentleman; he seems to have got tired of it, and to have relapsed into the old style of Maga when Christopher North used to rule the roast. In this month's Musings he devotes a couple of pages to my recent broadsheet on the way in which we are waging war in South Africa. He is pleased to impute to me an indifference to truth, and then by way of setting me a good example, he charges me in the most offensive way with palming off upon the public an elaborate fraud, of which I am quite incapable. He denies the existence of the British officer in the field, whose description of the house-burning now carried on in South Africa has roused so much indignation throughout the land. I am sure I need not assure my readers, or even Sir Herbert Maxwell, that he is what he professes-an officer holding her Majesty's commission, and now in command of Her Majesty's troops at the seat of war. He is every whit as honourable a gentleman as Sir Herbert Maxwell himself, and he has done good service both to the Army and to the Empire by affording information-first-hand information—as to the policy of devastation which is now being carried out in the Transvaal. Sir Herbert Maxwell further comments unkindly upon what he regards as my indifference to sifting truth from falsehood, and then forthwith, without having taken any pains whatever to ascertain the accuracy of his information, that I have recently stated that I regretted being an Englishman. I have never expressed any such regret. The origin of the story was a misrepresentation of a remark which I made at the Peace Congress at Paris, to which even Sir Herbert Maxwell could not have taken any objection. I was speaking to a representative of the friends of peace from all nations, and I prefaced my remark by saying that I owed them an apology for venturing to speak about peace, being an Englishman, as my country at this moment was waging what I regarded as an unjust war. As this was the only foundation for the statement made by Sir Herbert Maxwell, I think he will admit, being a gentleman, that an apology is due from somebody else in this matter. It does not matter to me very much what Sir Herbert Maxwell says, but I would submit to him whether the passage with which he concludes his observations is quite worthy of his pen. So, Mr. Stead, he

So he is no more than a curiosity, an interesting specimen of cannibalism who has rarely satisfied his rapacious maw. Let us, then, put him in a glass case with a pin through his back, label him in the best Latin that entomology affords, and straightway forget all about him and his unhappy appetite.

To call a person who differs from you in politics a cannibal is only worthy of the literary bargee. At the same time, as he brackets me with Charles James Fox, whom he describes as the first of the cannibals, I think I may almost accept the epithet as a compliment.

Harper's.

Harper's Christmas number contains much picturesque variety. "The Pilgrimage of Truth," by Erik Bögh, is done from the Danish into English by Mr. Jacob Riis, and illustrated by Howard Pyle. Truth fares forth from Fairyland to the earth-world, to be welcomed and then renounced by king, priest, philosopher, and mob, and only accepted by the fool. Victor Hugo's love-letters continue. The editor insists on their superiority to the The Brownings mixed much else beside Brownings. their mutual passion with their letters; Hugo's were pure love alone. The comparison once challenged will, we fear, turn the scale of interest in favour of the Brownings. There are several specimens of Victor Hugo's work as an artist presented by Mr. B. Constant. Dr. Carl Peters relates the evidence which he has found for the identification of Ophir with Furd on the Zambesi. Parents come in for some shrewd, almost mordant remarks by E. S. Martin. He says, for example: "Fathers have their uses in families, uses besides that of providing. "Undoubtedly it is the duty of every father to do what he can to supplement the schoolmasters, doctors, ministers, and others on whom the protection and guidance of the fatherless devolve."

h: "it
general ory and out the
of the
of her ved to
The
ns and ot play; umentayoung mature rbarism y never d, halfitself a erman

in the boy is nor a weak is too-ent and quently which which eld his him. on, by s been e any prose last hould; and ld do es the noteo the army.

Kinley

bove narks ninals very h no nined more ics to

there

more

YIIN

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE Fortnightly Review for December is a very excellent number. It contains a new feature in the shape of the publication of the text of Mr. J. M. Barrie's play "The Wedding Guest." There is a short story by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, entitled "St. Gervase of Plessy," and two very carefully written literary reviews, one by Mr. Stephen Gwynn, dealing with "The Autumn's Books," chiefly novels, and the other by Mr. Aflalo, entitled "The Sportsman's Library—Some Books of 1900." There is also a very brief paper describing Macterlinck's latest dräma "Bluebeard and Aryan; or Useless Liberation."

THE CYCLIST SOLDIER.

Mr. H. G. Wells, forsaking his familiar field of scientific romance, shows in this paper that he is not less capable as a merciless critic. He takes as his text the second Cyclists' Handbook, published by the War Office, which he subjects to the most scathing criticism. His article is capital reading. Sir John Ardagh had better withdraw the old one, and ask Mr. Wells to write a new second guide. Mr. Wells makes merciless fun of the present little handbook, and then presents the public with a sketch of the way in which he would use the force of 1,500 cyclists. Mr. Wells may be all wrong, but there is no doubt that his picture of what might be done by such a force equipped and organised as he describes, appeals very strongly to the imagination of the ordinary man. Imagine, he says, what a cyclist force of 1,500 men, capable of moving 12 miles an hour, and of covering 120 miles in a day, could do :-

The cyclist section could creep like a noiseless snake all round the outposts and make a spluttering of shots here, and anon, a spluttering ten miles away—it would, for all practical purposes, be a twenty-three barrelled Pathan sniper in seven-league boots. It could hide as no cavalry could hide, do evil and presently get away faster than ever cavalry rode.

THE KAISER'S MOUSTACHES AND SPEECHES.

Mr. Ludwig Klausner-Dawoc's paper upon the Kaiser opens with the remark that—

Nobody will deny that the German Emperor is the most interesting sovereign alive, perhaps one of the most interesting monarchs in the history of the world.

It is difficult to say whether Mr. Klausner-Dawoc is qualifying to be prosecuted for lèse-majesté, for he suggests that the Kaiser is too much a Jack-of-all-trades to be master of any; and in the course of his article he gives us a new piece of information to the effect that the famous turned-up moustaches of the Kaiser are now turned down, for, says Mr. Klausner-Dawoc:—

Alas! The new Moustache à la William II. has already gone, and will not rival in history the Henri Quatre, the beards and moustaches of Napoleon III., Victor Emmanuel, etc. The Emperor has got tired of turning his moustache upwards, and the thousands of captains, lieutenants, heroes of the Stock Exchange and other young men are left in the lurch—most of all the hairdresser who had invented a sort of machine to force the moustache to take the unnatural but imperial flight skywards, and who named his machine "Es ist erreicht" (it is achieved), which is now a byeword in Germany.

As for the Emperor's speeches, over which Mr. Klausner-Dawoc groans and is troubled, he says:—

William II. does not so much speak as an Emperor, scarcely as a political or public orator, but more as a poet who is under the influence of his inspiration and carried away by it, by his rhymes and rhythms. The fact is that, when speaking, he delights, as poets do when they are writing, in hyperboles, metaphors, and all sorts of exaggerations, and he thinks as little as a poet does that his words will always be taken literally.

At the end of his article, however, he lights on the safe side, and it is to be hoped that the writing of this passage may be regarded as an extenuating circumstance should he ever have the ill-fortune to be prosecuted for poking fun at the Kaiser:—

Mystic as he may seem—we ourselves don't quite believe in his mysticism, which very likely, too, is only a means to further his ends—he is above all a modern sovereign, a thoroughly modern man, so much so that he even gave university privileges to technical schools, that he is about to modify classical learning in the high schools, and that not one year has elapsed since he ascended the throne without a law being passed in favour of the working classes.

A NEW ATTACK ON THE COUNTY COUNCIL.

The London Countý Council has been so much attacked for doing too much, and going too fast, that it is quite a welcome change to read Mr. C. S. Jones's article in which he roundly assails them for doing too little. His subject is the housing question, and he declares that the net result of their activity in this matter is—that the Council has displaced, or helped to displace, about 15,000 persons, and has re-housed 11,000. In fact, the result of ten years' work at a cost of over a million sterling has been to render 4,000 persons houseless.

He presses strongly for the building of houses in the outskirts of London, and he accuses the Council of resorting to every subterfuge and excuse to escape doing their plain duty.

The last stage of the Council is not much better than the first. A month or two ago the Housing Committee cheerfully asked for half a million to deal with an insanitary area in St. Luke's. About three thousand persons are to be displaced, about four thousand are to be re-housed. In other words, another half million is to be spent in providing extra accommodation for a thousand persons. It is, of course, useless to ask the Council how many more could be provided for, were the half million spent in buying, and building on, the vacant land.

THE DOOM OF THE SCOTCH UNIVERSITIES.

"Mair siller! Mair siller!" is the cry of Dr. William Wallace in his paper on "The Scottish University Crisis":—

A lump sum of not less than £1,500,000 is required to place all the Scottish Universities in such a position that their Degrees would be regarded as of equal value with those of England, Germany, or even of America.

If they do not get this money, either from the State or from some munificent millionaire, Dr. Wallace tells them the fate of these institutions will be sealed. They may drag on for many years of inglorious life, giving second-rate degrees to second-rate students. But they will have lost their place in British education and the national life of Scotland.

THE PRICE OF IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Mr. Edward Salmon, in an article entitled "Imperial Federation; the Condition of Progress," tells the Britons at home that Imperial Federation cannot be had except at a price, which, it must be admitted, he puts pretty high. First, we must diminish to some extent our insular freedom of action. Secondly, we must give up the superstition of Free-trade. Thirdly, we must consent to Home Rule. Fourthly, we must allow India some half-adozen members as representatives in the Imperial Parliament. If we think protection plus Home Rule and Parliamentary representation for India are not worth conceding, then, he tells us, that the greatest "secular agency for good now known in the world," as Lord Rosebery described the Empire, will go to pieces. Dissolution seems unavoidable.

THE academiderating John Requestion historic England

" A policy. notably ments of Cabinet subject of So the authorit while th decision writer t Russia, with the her reso Western East. first nec meaning of crippl

Mr. Samuel its value complete strong e conduct self-den Gardine and did did not. extrao knowled Gardine fact of the Mr. Ga Cromwe Mr. Mor justified employs force to when it for takir objects Constitu utterly o prematu of our comparis a positio

Mr. W Crucifixion is to him suffering, fice. He war. Fit powerful

the meth

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

fe

ge ld

it

o e THE general complexion of the December number is academic, with theology and philosophy as preponderating tints. Separate notice has been taken of Mr. John Ross and Louise Brown's papers on the Chinese question, as also of Mr. Hogarth's explorations in prehistoric Crete and of Mr. Wm. Clarke's social future of England.

WHY RUSSIA " VACILLATES."

"A Russian Publicist" discusses Russia's foreign policy. He refers the alleged vacillation of Russia, notably in Chinese affairs, to the water-tight compartments of Russian administration; there being no common Cabinet or Premier, each Minister goes his own gait, subject only to the Tsar.

So the Minister of War telegraphed, with the Tsar's authority, the annexation of the right bank of the Amur, while the Foreign Minister formally declared Russia's decision not to take any part of Chinese territory. The writer urges that peace is an economic necessity to Russia, that the Foreign Office needs to be in close touch with the Finance Ministry, and that in order to develop her resources Russia needs freedom and alliance with the Western peoples far more than mere extension in the Far East. He considers that Count Lamsdorf, though at first necessarily reserved, has now put his foot down, meaning resolutely to carry out his predecessor's policy of crippling the influence of the military party.

IN DEFENCE OF CROMWELL.

Mr. John Morley's Cromwell is examined by Mr. Samuel Gardiner, with much generous recognition of its value. But Mr. Gardiner remarks on Mr. Morley's complete ignorance of manuscript sources, and takes strong exception to Mr. Morley's suggestion that Oliver's conduct was "oblique" in appearing to consent to the self-denying ordinance. The facts, according to Mr. Gardiner, go to show that Oliver was perfectly sincere, and did think of retiring from the country over-sea. did not, as Waller said, believe at that time he had "extraordinary parts." Though this want of selfknowledge may seem almost incredible, yet, Mr. Gardiner urges, "it will have to be taken as the root-fact of the situation." Mr. Morley, it would seem from Mr. Gardiner's criticism, has not sufficiently accepted Cromwell's humility. Mr. Gardiner does not feel that Mr. Morley's horror at the employment of force is quite justified in the case of Charles's death. The policeman employs force to arrest the criminal, the judge employs force to execute the murderer; the army did no more when it set up the court which sent Charles to the block for taking up arms against the nation. Mr. Gardiner objects to Mr. Morley's statement that the British Constitution has proceeded on lines that Cromwell utterly disliked. He argues that Cromwell attempted prematurely to bring into existence the main principles of our present Constitution. Mr. Gardiner closes by comparing Cromwell in politics, with Bacon in science: a position not shaken by the fact that modern men reject the methods of both.

THE CROSS THE SECRET OF WAR!

Mr. W. W. Peyton continues his sermon on "The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation." The Cross is to him the revelation of evolution through effort, battle, suffering, which in ethics is service and in religion sacrifice. He proceeds to illustrate his thesis by the present war. Fifty thousand slain soldiers "have contributed a powerful service of suffering to the mission of Britain and the progress of the Boer." Mr. John Morley's denunciation of this "hideous carnage," its "horrid waste" and "hellish panorama" is traced by the writer to the "humanism which pulls down the altar of sacrifice and puts up another to the Unknown God." This is the rhetoric with which he would correct Mr. Morley's:—

All our colonies have wakened up to this Imperialism. It makes a noble spectacle, perhaps the noblest of this century, this army of ours in South Africa, and its chivalrous Commander, and the ambulance, and the hospital, and the graves of peer and peasant on the African sands. We look on your graves, ye martyr soldiers, as the silent bivouac of the eternal that was in your service, and the shroud of the African dust quivers with the boundless hope that was in it, and glitters with the gold of the crown you have received. We shall find strength for our service in the tale of your martyred blood, which will live in the storied urn of a nation's grateful memory. You have made dearer to us the land of our fathers, and greater the empire they founded, and dearer and greater the Fatherland elsewhere which you have won in agony and blood. The rapture of the battle is your hymn now in the unseen.

Apparently Moloch has annexed the Cross.

A WORLD WITHOUT RELIGION.

Mr. Goldwin Smith closes the century for the Contemporary with a doleful wail over the decadence of religion. He essays a bold task—nothing less than a general survey of the whole field of the science of religion, from its dim origins up to Christianity; and all, all pronounced untenable, with perhaps a saving clause for the faith of Zoroaster. Rome in her latest dogmas has openly broken with reason. Criticism has destroyed the infallible book on which Protestantism was based. Even the evidence for theism is destroyed. "Science has substituted evolution for creation, and evolution of such a sort as seems to shake our belief in a creator and directing mind." Philosophy shows a first cause unthinkable. Scepticism is rife in all classes: atheism is making way among the quick-witted artisans in all countries:—

The churches and the clergy of late have, perhaps, been giving the believer in righteousness and humanity reason for grieving less at their departure; flag-worship and the gospel of force can be as well propagated without them; yet their departure simply as moral and social organisations would leave a great void in life, and it is difficult to imagine how that void could e filled.

The tendency of all thought is towards the belief in "a universe without guidance or plan, the relation of man to which can never be known." He concludes by insisting that "our salvation lies in the single-minded pursuit of the truth. Man will not rest in blank Agnosticism: he is irresistibly impelled to inquiry into his origin and destiny." There are, as perhaps the writer will later show, other "irresistible impulses" which offer clues.

OTHER ARTICLES.

From this groan of terror and despair it is pleasant to turn to Mr. Massingham's "Philosophy of a Saint," as he describes Tolstoy's "Life," with its glorification of love as the law of our being. He quotes the sage's saying, "Go on loving and loving more, and you mix more with the eternal movement of life." Mr. H. Graves exercises powers of abstruse reasoning on "A Philosophy of Sport," and insists on recreation without reference to earning a livelihood as its principal element. M. Schidrowitz "dreams" that the outcome of the Austrian deadlock is the assumption by Franz Joseph of absolute power. The Austrian Kaiser is not older than William, King of Prussia, on the battle day of Sadowa, "and William reigned twenty-two years after that victory."

THE MONTHLY REVIEW.

THE Monthly Review begins in its usual academic way. The editorial articles are entitled "A Possible Party," "Science in Politics," and "England and Germany."

"THE IMPOSSIBLE PARTY."

The "possible party" is merely "Liberal Imperialism" as understood by Sir Edward Grey. Only such a policy can be successful, says the editor, forgetting that the first duty of Liberals is not to attain success, but to deserve it.

SCIOLISM IN POLITICS.

"Science in Politics" is merely a translation of unnecessary length of a Daily Mail leader into the academic tongue. It is the ordinary, vulgar, short-sighted Plea for Ferocity in dealing with the Boers, enforced by the usual Jingo sneer at "Lord Roberts's clemency," though where the clemency came in it is difficult to see. Jingoism is always odious, but when it masquerades in the garb of philosophers it is doubly so.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

The writer of the article on "England and Germany" says:—

The interest of Germany would seem to be to keep things as they are. The "Open Door" not only suits her commercial interests, but also preserves for her the possibility of extending her political power, if that should become desirable. If once China were split up into protectorates or the like she would be driven either to take a share herself, with all the disadvantages of that course, or else to submit to be altogether ousted.

The Anglo-German Agreement, says the writer, is not a victory for either Power, but an agreement "equally advantageous to both."

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF PITT.

Lord Rosebery pieces together with a commentary the correspondence between Pitt and Lord Auckland, on the subject of Pitt's "love episode" with Miss Eden. It was Pitt's ruined fortune and impaired health which prevented his marriage. The correspondence with Lord Auckland is written in the formal style of the last century, and does not even mention the lady by name, nor does it throw much light on the actual state of Pitt's feelings.

FIELD GUNS.

"Galeatus," writing on "Field Guns," makes the following statement as to the number of guns actually possessed by the Boers:—

Of modern material there were some twenty Krupp field guns and four 4'7-in. Krupp (not Creusot) howitzers. There were sixteen Creusot 14'33 lbs. field guns, and four Creusot 15-cm. guns (Long Toms), and four 7'5-cm. Maxim-Vickers, two of them taken by the Boers at the time of the Jameson Raid. These were all the modern-type guns (except the considerable number taken from us, and about thirty-five 1-pr. pom-poms) of which the two Republics could dispose. The French field gun which the Boers used had the French service calibre of 2'95 in., with a 14'33 lbs. projectile and a velocity (on paper) of 1837 ft. The maximum elevation allowed by the carriage is stated at 20 deg., and the range of the projectile at eight kilometres, or 8,747 yards. Simple calculations prove that this range is exaggerated, and that the probable maximum would not exceed 7,800 yards.

MOROCCO IN PERIL.

Mr. H. M. Grey contributes an article entitled "A Coming North African Problem," in which he deals with French encroachments on Morocco, and predicts trouble in the future. Morocco is the only North African State which has not fallen under the dominion of foreigners; but it is in a rapid state of decay, and when the French have established a belt of empire from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, Morocco will be hemmed in on all sides. The usual remedy of the alarmist is to seize something; and if war should break out between France and Morocco, Mr. Grey advises that we should seize Tangier! But as Mr. Grey describes the South African War as "suppressing the Boer revolt," he is not likely to have a very clear idea as to the relative importance of events.

INTERNATIONAL ETHICS.

Mr. L. Villari deals with the question of how far Christian and private morality should be employed as standards in international relations. His conclusion is that the moral law in politics must be modified by expediency.

AN IMPERIAL FLAG.

Mr. W. Laird Clowes pleads for the institution of an Imperial flag which all British subjects will have a right to fly. In England we have nothing equal to the Tricolour or the Stars and Stripes, but only half-a-dozen flags each restricted in use to a different class. Mr. Clowes thinks that the simple St. George's Cross would make the best flag for the Empire, and that it should have precedence over the existing flags, which should, however, be maintained.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. William Archer, writing on "An Academy of the Dead," lays down the laws which should regulate burial in Westminster Abbey if it should be enlarged, or in any national Pantheon that may be established. Edith Sichel writes on "The Religion of Rabelais"; and Mr. R. E. Fry on Giotto. Mr. Anthony Hope's novel, "Tristram of Blent," is continued.

THE WOMAN AT HOME.

THE Christmas number of the Woman at Home is filled out to twice its usual size—inflated by an enormous "patriotic" article on "Women who are Serving the Empire." No doubt, but so are many other women, regularly and consistently, and not by fits and starts. The Empire-servers, who are well sketched by Sarah Tooley's pen, include among others Lady Newton, Lady Wantage, Lady MacCormac, Lady Randolph Churchill, Mrs. and Miss Baden-Powell, and Lady Sarah Wilson, besides many widowed wives of those who went to the front—Mrs. G. W. Steevens, Lady Symons, and Mrs. Wauchope.

THE DOMESTIC SERVANT QUESTION AGAIN.

This eternal question is again discussed in the current number of this magazine. Lady Laura Ridding, Mrs. R. W. Perks, and Miss Marion Leslie give their experience. Lady Laura complains that—

Domestic science is a rarely studied accomplishment in the farm labourer's cottage, while it is from those homes that girls, gloriously ignorant of the remotest notion of how to make a bed, clean out a room, mend a garment, dust, bake, wash or iron, are perpetually sent forth to service by their mothers with one golden rule to direct them in all their experiences—i.e., "Not to let themselves be put upon!"

And adds, most justly, that "in no other line of life does raw, unskilled labour fetch such high market value."

Mrs. R. W. Perks remarks that it seems impossible to impress upon young servants that they must fit themselves for their duties. The frequent listlessness and anæmia of servants she attributes to the fact that "the strain of the present board school work is too great for their strength," often underfed and poorly clothed as they are. She says, however, "The truth is that the

which have A bein Hen with work almo mais bute in the flirta dom

flirta educ ever John serva that whice very to we on canada appr squa

Cha

forti they an torp Th mear for o prop but south and light and on J ways island 8-inc small wate Fren in wa

M

tion

H
the sor cobear hum to the Nob

his v

domestic servant nowadays expects to enter service without any preliminary knowledge, and demands the wages which a far more experienced girl would a few years ago have asked."

All agree, especially Miss Leslie, that "the stigma of being a 'servant' rankles in the mind of 'Mary Jane.'" Hence her self-assertiveness, her confusion of impudence with independence, and her vulgar contempt for honest work. Miss Leslie, however, points out that while it is almost impossible to get a kitchen-maid, the nursery-maid's position was never more popular. This she attributes to the fact that nursery-maids get plenty of variety in their lives, outdoor exercise, plenty of chances for mild flirtations, and no rough work. She scoffs at the "over-education" bogey, and cites the case of Scotland, where every girl has been soundly educated since the days of John Knox, and where there are still plenty of good servants to be had. Her paper is one of the most sensible that has ever appeared on this subject.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE last number which will be issued of the magazine which takes its title from the Nineteenth Century is a very good one. Its editor, however, gives us no hint as to what he is going to call his review next year. To keep on calling it the Nineteenth Century would be rather an anachronism; and the title Twentieth Century is already appropriated, though it is possible its proprietor may be squared.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS IN WAR TIME.

Sir W. Laird Clowes has discovered a use for the Channel Islands. He does not think they are worth fortifying for their own sake; but he does think that if they were provided with a few big guns, they would form an invaluable place of refuge for torpedo-boats and torpedo destroyers. This is his programme:—

The anchorages have to be protected; a depôt (by which I mean stores, magazines, and an adequate repairing establishment for destroyers) has to be created somewhere within the area; a proper day and night signalling system, not only within the area, but also north-eastward to the Casquets and Alderney, and south-eastward to Jersey and the Ecrehos, has to be arranged and got into working order; and a certain number of search lights have to be provided, both as part of the signalling system and for those purposes of defence for which search lights are more particularly employed.

The protection of all the anchorages could be secured by guns on Jethou, Herm, and Sark. If the necessary "battery railways" were laid down in Herm along the highest part of the island, and in Sark along the island's entire length, about three 8-inch and half-a-dozen 6-inch quickfirers, with, of course, smaller weapons, should suffice to render the whole extent of water between Guernsey and Sark secure from any sudden French raid, and therefore a safe resort and place of refreshment in war time for destroyers and their people.

"DARWIN'S BULLDOG."

Mr. Leslie Stephen publishes an admirable appreciation of his friend Professor Huxley, of whom he says:—

He made original researches; he was the clearest expositor of the new doctrine to the exoteric world; he helped to organise the scientific teaching which might provide competent disciples or critics; and he showed most clearly and vigorously the bearing of his principles upon the most important topics of human thought. His battles, numerous as they were, never led to the petty squabbles which disfigure some scientific lives. Nobody was ever a more loyal friend. But he was a most heartily loyal citizen, doing manfully the duties which came in his way and declining no fair demand upon his co-operation.

MOSQUITOES AND MALARIA.

Prince Kropotkin writes one of his admirable papers on recent science, in which he tells us all about the progress that has been made in the investigation of the nature of the Röntgen rays, and also of the Bequerel radiations, which have for the last four years eclipsed even the Röntgen rays themselves. The concluding part of his paper is devoted to an account of the patient and elaborate investigations which have been made to discover the connection between mosquitoes and malaria. The following passage is an excellent illustration of this painstaking, laborious modern scientist:—

Dr. Ross conducted his inquiry in South India in a truly admirable scientific spirit. For two years in succession he used to breed mosquitoes from the pupæ and to feed them on the blood of malaria patients, hunting afterwards in their organs for a parasite similar to the malarial "hemamœba" of man. He had already dissected a thousand of the brindled and grey mosquitoes—but in vain. One can easily imagine what it means dissecting a thousand gnats under the microscope, hunting for parasites in the epithelial cells of the gnats' intestines. And yet Dr. Ross did not abandon his work. At last, in August 1897, he found in two individuals of the large dapple-winged species epithelial cells containing the characteristic malarial pigment.

THE FRENCHWOMEN OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Lady Ponsonby gives us the first half of a paper in which she draws a parallel between the Frenchwomen of the eighteenth century and the women of our own time. It is entitled "The Rôle of Women in Society." It is impossible to summarise it, but the following extracts give a hint, at least, as to the drift of a very charming essay. In France, in the eighteenth century, Lady Ponsonby points out:—

the rule of women became the principle on which rested not only the government of the family, but also the control of the State. The woman who could reign undisputed over husband, lover, or king was unable to cope with the attack on Society by the new destructive forces of the intellectual world, and fell into a more and more hopeless condition and became a helpless prey to her nerves. This downward course was marked by stages which have a strange likeness to phases of social life in England at the present day.

The reader will await with interest the next number, to see how the parallel will work out in the twentieth century.

ARE WE REALLY A NATION OF AMATEURS?

Sir Herbert Maxwell replies to Mr. Brodrick's paper in the last number of the Review, and indignantly repudiates the accusation. He contends that—there are no signs of decay—no abatement of zeal—no withering of fidelity—in the public services, and that it is an ungracious and discouraging deed to undermine the repute of those who are spending their lives in maintaining the national honour.

~~~~~~

THE Graphic "History of the South African War" (5s.) will probably be read by many who will never so much as look at the more serious narratives of the war. There are about 300 illustrations in the book, which are extremely well reproduced. The general letterpress is by Wentworth Huyshe, but readers will probably turn with greater interest to the special chapters, contributed by writers who have been at the front. The sieges of Ladysmith, Kimberley and Mafeking, and the march to Bloemfontein, have special chapters. Sir Howard Vincent writes on the Volunteers in the Campaign, and Sir W. MacCormac on the Care of the Wounded in the Field. All the 108 pages are of interest, and the book will form an attractive Christmas gift.

ow far yed as sion is by ex-

of an a right colour s each

l sides.

thing;

e and

African

kely to ince of

SPIZE

thinks e best edence mainof the irial in in any

Edith

d Mr.

novel,

ome is armous ag the comen, starts. Sarah Lady rchill.

Vilson,

to the

Mrs.

urrent Irs. R. ience.

girls, nake a ash or rs with s—i.e., of life

ble to thems and "the at for ed as

at the

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE Westminster could not, of course, close the century without promulgating afresh its favourite prescription for most social distempers. Father Ambrose, in advancing his scheme for the industrial development of Ireland, prefaces it with a general demand for "the single ownership of the land."

IRISH LAND-NATIONALISATION via C.C.

But the reverend gentleman, who is also a County Councillor, has induced his own County Council to press for a scheme of agricultural development on a national scale. As reported on by the Council engineer, it includes river regulation, land reclamation, erection of piers and har-bours, light railways, taking in of slob-lands, and replanting vast cattle ranches. In Limerick it would involve improvement of rivers to prevent destructive floods, at a cost of £120,000, and reclamation of mountain bogs by means of lime, at a cost of £100,000. Father Ambrose quotes from the Land Commissioners' Reports, and shows that under the Purchase of Land Act from 1885 to 1900 land has been purchased in Ulster at 18'2 years' purchase, in Leinster at 17'1 years, in Connaught at 16'6 years, and in Munster at 15'9 years. This supplies a basis of induction for the price of contemplated acquisitions. He urges all County Councils to press for similar national and local schemes. He says: "The Government has provided about £50,000,000 for land purchase. Comparatively few millions given for purchase coupled with improvements would be of incomparably more benefit to the country." This action and suggestion by a priest forms a valuable commentary on the dread of priest-rule "loudly cherished in some quarters.

IRELAND LOOKING UP.

"How is dear old Ireland?" asks Mr. Thos. E. Naughten in "The Independent Section." He thinks the question may be safely answered in a cheerful spirit. He rejoices in the downfall of priestly domination which the clerical dead-set against Parnell after his divorce began, and which the defeat of Tim Healy's party in the recent elections signalised. The triumph of the United Irish League under William O'Brien the writer regards as "a triumph of anti-clericalism." He pronounces compulsory land-purchase the only Irish question of importance likely to be dealt with in the next Parliament. He sums up the situation by saying:—

There is much matter for congratulation in the Irish life of to-day, and, if we have some dark clouds hovering on the horizon, we have also many encouraging rays of light. There is a decided tendency, growing in force every day, to drop the old shibboleths and settle down to a sensible policy of industrial achievement. We have plenty of resources which only need development, and signs are not wanting that the time for their development is near at hand. One hundred years ago Ireland was a scene of direst misery and wildest disorder. To-day she is holding up her head with the buoyancy of youth, and forging her way through the waves of discord to the haven of prosperity and peace. One hundred years hence she may have reached the port in safety.

"THE FIRST INTEREST OF THE EMPIRE."

Mr. Walter Sweetman puts forward a very mild "plea for the Orange Free State." He is bold enough to argue that "the first interest of this great Empire is justice, while the second—just because it is the most prosperous Empire—must be peace." He says—

It seems very shocking that our honest young soldiers should have to go on killing these worthy farmers, and burning their houses, and starving their families to death, simply because the British voter, who sits at home in ease, will not be contented with any form of peace that does not insist upon the annihilation of these little States, one of which, at least, has done no wrong.

go

CO

M

wit

Sig

Po

In

Me tro

dis

and hea

mo

hav

bec bru Bri

ind

COL

nat

wa

tha

an

on no

rea

ma

to-all

al

the div

An

ba tha

cai

spa

lor

su

wh

sin

Go

The Orange Free State has "done no wrong," because it has only stood honourably by the alliance formed with the Transvaal—an alliance permitted and almost as much as suggested by the Convention of 1884.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION AND PHILOSOPHY.

Mr. Horace Milborne recounts in a very suggestive article what a French critic, M. Fouillée, has to say on Secondary Education. What Lord Rosebery has recently said about the removal of Greek from the list of compulsory subjects adds interest to M. Fouillée's remarks on classical studies:—

"I am convinced," he says, "that these studies will only be saved by giving up Greek almost entirely for the great majority, by simplifying the study of Latin and treating it from a literary standpoint, and, finally, by extending to all some training in scientific, moral, social, and philosophic studies"... The recommendations of M. Ribot's Commission, lately published, tend in the main in the direction above contemplated. The modern side is to receive a more practical and scientific and a less literary bent. The classical side is to aim at a practical mastery of the tongues and conversance with the literatures, neglecting, philological and grammatical pedantries. The Commission has, however, recommended by a majority of one vote that Latin and Greek should still be obligatory for entrance to the legal and medical professions, in this apparently running counter to the views of their distinguished president. A course of philosophy forms the crown and completion of both trainings alike.

The French Chambers of Commerce have answered Government inquiries, on the whole, in favour of maintaining classical studies, and of giving modern studies a more practical bent. The Laval Chamber of Commerce pressed strongly for the study of philosophy!

ROBERT BURNS AND LANDLORDISM.

Mr. William Diack writes on Burns as a social reformer, a phase of the poet which he feels to have been overlooked—nay, even wilfully suppressed:—

Burns must speak. . . . The corruptions of the kirk and the petty tyrannies of Scottish landlords are alike condemned in the most scathing terms. Many of those stirring rhymes have been ruthlessly suppressed by his timid, time-serving editors, who feared either to ruffle the political waters or to call down upon themselves the ire of offended landlordism. Chambers, Currie, and even Hogg, one and all suppressed them. Even yet—curious to relate—while his attacks on the elders and ministers of the Scottish Kirk are freely admitted into his works, his equally sarcastic onslaughts on the landlords and statesmen of his time are still tabooed by his publishers. In the selected editions they never find a place; in the "editions for the people" they are conspicuous by their entire absence.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. G. P. Gooch contributes a very lucid survey of the situation in Austria in view of the coming elections. The alternatives set forth are modified extension of Home Rule by districts to Bohemia, or repetition of the existing deadlock, which latter would lead in turn to personal rule by the Emperor, or the introduction of something approaching to universal suffrage in place of the present class franchises. Mr. A. E. Maddock pleads for proportionate representation. Honora Twycross urges that we set ourselves against the reign of force, and uphold ethical against cosmical tendencies.

In the December Young Man Mr. Arthur Mee runs in rapid review the men of the Empire in Africa. He describes Mr. Schreiner as "the noblest Roman of them describes Mr. Hofmeyr he names "the Bismarck of South Africa."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

tion

ng.

use ith ive

on itly

rks

ity,

ary

in

m-

in ern ess

ery

ng

as.

tin

gal

to hy

ed

n-

a ce

al

ve

he

1e

en

10

n

e,

is

of

ed

ie

S

The North American Review for November is a very good number, and contains the usual crop of distinguished contributions. I have dealt elsewhere with Captain Mahan's "Asiatic Conditions and International Policies," with Gabriele D'Annunzio's "Third Life of Italy," with Count Okuma's "Industrial Revolution in Japan," with Signor Crispi's article on "China and the Western Powers," and with Mr. O. P. Austin's "Century of International Commerce."

PEACE ON EARTH.

The Baroness Von Süttner has a hopeful article on "The Present Status and Future Prospects of the Peace Movement." The Transvaal War and the Chinese trouble, tragic as both are, are neither of them causes for discouragement:—

The progress of the war in the Transvaal has shown, forcibly and terribly, what a false relation the possible advantages of war bear to its positive disadvantages. Fifty thousand of her youth, healthy and vigorous youth, has England lost in the past ten months; sixty-one million pounds sterling of her national wealth have been wasted; the respect and sympathy of the world have been recklessly sacrificed; the character of the nation has been brutalized by the passions aroused; and freedom, the pride of the British people, freedom of speech, as well as freedom of the individual, has been imperilled, for even now the spectre of conscription is raising its head. The fruits of half a century of national education have been destroyed in this one attack of war-fever.

In short, if the war could not be avoided, it was best that it should teach all would-be aggressors that such antics do not pay. The moral of China is a different one. In the union of the Powers the Baroness sees the germ of the future United States of Europe. There is nothing like optimism.

HAVE AMERICAN WOMEN DEGENERATED?

Flora McDonald Thompson says, Yes. She has been reading De Tocqueville and contrasting his idyllic picture of marital felicity in the United States with the state of affairs to-day. De Tocqueville's American woman was first of all domesticated and constant, and, having once become a wife, never turned back:—

So far from the modern American wife steadfastly pursuing the road to domestic happiness without ever turning back, divorce statistics have determined that the actual number of American women, during twenty years, who set out on the road to domestic happiness and did turn back, or were sent back, is 328,716. Of this number 67,685, or about one-fourth, turned back from causes involving immorality of woman, and in more than half the given instances of marriages dissolved for this cause, the law fixed the blame on the wife.

But it is hardly fair to set statistics against impressions.

MOHAMMEDANISM IN PROGRESS.

The third article on "The Great Religions of the World" is "Mohammedanism," by Mr. Oskar Mann. It is a very interesting paper, which only considerations of space prevent me from quoting at length. Both in Asia and Africa Islamism is rapidly gaining adherents, no longer by the sword, but by means of the merchant and missionary, who apparently are a great deal more persuasive than their Christian rivals. In India, Mohammedanism is successful by reason of its democratic basis, which revolts against the tyranny of caste. Among the less civilised races of Africa its success is due to its simplicity:—

"There is no God but God, and Mohammed is the Prophet of God." The convert need only believe these two sentences, and he is at once a Mussulman. After learning this simple confession of faith, he then needs only to fulfil the following five practical duties: (1.) Recital of the Creed; (2.) Observance of the five appointed times of prayer; (3.) Payment of the legal alms; (4.) Fasting during the month of Ramadhan; (5.) The pilgrimage to Mecca. And every convert has equal rights with all other members of the great community. In regard to the faith there are no distinctions; for did not even the Nubian, Muhammed Ahmed, rise to be the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedans?

TELEPATHY versus SPIRITISM.

Professor J. H. Hyslop deals with M. Flournoy's use of telepathy to explain the phenomena recorded in "From India to the Planet Mars." He will not admit M. Flournoy's theory that telepathy is a natural and rational explanation, whereas spiritism is supernatural. He maintains that there are circumstances in which spiritism is easier to believe in than telepathy:—

Besides, even as a conceded process telepathy is not anything that is known in the usual sense of that term. It is only a name for certain facts which require a causal explanation. It is convenient for limiting evidential claims, but it is not explanatory. But now, if telepathy be once granted as a fact, no matter what conception we take of it as a process, we have a phenomenon of the transmission of thought independently of the ordinary impressions of sense, and we should be violating no scientific principles if we supposed that, under favourable conditions, a transcendental consciousness might be able to intromit a message into a living mind. After telepathy is admitted, it is but a question of evidence to settle whether we are probably in communication with a discarnate spirit.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. J. J. Benjamin Constant describes "The Wallace Collection," and pleads incidentally for the more frequent visiting of England by foreign students of painting. Mr. J. W. Hales writes on Chaucer; and Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer on "New York and its Historians."

The Windsor.

THE chief feature of the Windsor Christmas Number is the splendid profusion of pictures, notably the eighteen reproductions of Mr. S. E. Waller's celebrated paintings. In the reading matter Mr. Rider Haggard's incident of African history will probably claim most attention. It occurred twenty years ago, when he was in Pretoria. An old Hottentot washerwoman told him of the carnage at Isandhlwana, three hundred miles away, only two days after it took place, and two days before the official news arrived. How the old lady came by her news he leaves unexplained. He gives a thrilling account of a later alarm—that the Zulus were marching straight on Pretoria and of the frenzied preparations made to ward off the danger, which proved to be quite imaginary. Among other difficulties, he had to mount his volunteers on untamed horses, with consequent casualties of a serious

Mr. T. A. Talbot recounts the exploits of "Lonely Voyagers," men who have succeeded or failed in the attempt to cross sea or ocean alone.

~~~~~~

WHAT is a criminal? asks Professor Ferrero in the December Humanitarian, where he is writing on criminals as a reversion to savage type. His answer is rather a wide one. He says:—

"The criminal is a man who works irregularly and capriciously, whose position in modern civilized life is a false one, for, above all, civilization claims from man prolonged efforts of methodical work, the individual discipline of the caprices of indolence and alacrity. Hence the origin of crime will be found especially in this failing, which is both an intellectual and moral one.

THE FORUM.

THE Forum for November opens with two now belated articles forecasting the result of the Presidential Elections. Mr. Charles Dick gives the reasons "Why the Republicans should be endorsed;" and Mr. C. A. Towne the "Reasons for Democratic Success." I have dealt elsewhere with Mr. L. J. Davies' paper on "The Taming of the Dragon."

MOUNTED INFANTRY IN WAR.

Mr. A. M. Low blossoms out as a military expert. "Four Legs instead of Two" is the title of the article, in which he claims that the warfare of the future will be carried on by mounted men and not by infantry. Such, he points out, is the lesson of the Transvaal War; but he forgets that mounted infantry was found indispensable in South Africa only because the Boer forces were similarly composed. Why it should be necessary in a war between armies of equal mobility it is difficult to see.

TRUSTS AND THE PUBLIC.

Mr. G. E. Roberts asks "Can there be a good trust?" and answers, "Yes, when the extra profits of the trust arise from improved methods or organisation, and not out of the pockets of the public,"—in other words when the trust does not exclude competition. He instances Mr. Carnegie as a manufacturer who has paid as good wages and charged the public no more than others:—

The Mergenthaler type-casting machine, which in the last ten years has practically done away with ordinary type-setting, furnishes another illustration of the same kind. Fortunes have been created by it, and yet the cost of printing has been so reduced that, through it and new paper-making machinery, daily newspapers, magazines and books have been placed on every working-man's table. Perhaps the illustration will be more impressive by anticipating a step of progress not yet made. It is said that 85 per cent, of the energy in coal is lost in combustion. Now if Mr. Edison or someone else could reverse the proportion so that 85 per cent. could be utilised and only 15 per cent. lost, what would the invention be worth to society? What ground is there for saying that fortunes made by this class of service are obtained without the giving of an equivalent?

BREAD AND BREAD-MAKING.

Mr. H. W. Wiley, writing on bread-making at the Paris Exhibition, deals with the very common delusion that home-made bread is the wholesomest:—

The domestic baking of bread is to be deplored. Breadmaking is as much of an art as tailoring; and we have as much a right to bread made by experts as we have to coats and gowns fashioned by tailors. In fact a "ready made" suit keeps you warm even if its fit is not faultless; but bread badly made has not a leg on which to stand.

He adds that not more than 25 per cent, of the bread consumed in America is properly made, the remainder being innutritious, uppalatable, or indigestible.

THE INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT.

Major Arthur Griffiths writes on "The English Intelligence Department," the origin and organisation of which he describes. As to its part in the preparations for the present war, he says:—

Within the knowledge of the present writer the fullest, the most accurate information was on hand on all these points. This has now been abundantly proved by the documentary evidence since seized at Bloemfontein and Pretoria. The figures produced by the Intelligence Department before the war have since been exactly verified. The numbers that could be put into the field, the details of artillery, the character and calibre of the guns, the amount of ammunition, large and small, were rightly stated. Now, however, the Intelligence Department is willing to admit that it credited the Boers with just one more Creusot gun than they possessed, and over-estimated the stores of Mauser cartridges, which were enormous, but not quite so large as reported.

MOROCCO.

Mr. Budget Meakin writes on "Yesterday and To-day in Morocco." The historical part of his article deals chiefly with American relations; but I quote his summing up of the character of the Moors:—

Bigoted and fanatical the Moors may show themselves at times, but they are willing enough to be friends with those who show themselves friendly. And, notwithstanding the way in which the strong oppress the weak, as a nation they are by no means treacherous or cruel; on the contrary, the average Moor is genial and hospitable, does not forget a kindness, and is a man whom one can respect. Yet it is strange how soon a little power, and the need for satisfying the demands of his superiors, will corrupt the mildest of them; and the worst are to be found among those families who have inherited office.

THE IRON TRADE.

Mr. Archer Brown, in a paper on "The Revival and Reaction in Iron," points out that the fall in prices during this year is only a temporary one, and bound to end in a rise. The consumption of iron grows not at the normal rate of population, but in an accelerating ratio. American ship-building and the rebuilding of the bridges on the southern railway lines will be the chief factors in the iron trade of the coming years.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Sir Robert Stout compares the new Constitution of Australia with that of the United States, Mr. Ferris Greenslet writes on Chaucer.

Ueber Land und Meer.

An extremely well-illustrated number. An article upon "London Street Arabs" is illustrated with good reproductions of Edith Farmiloe's charming sketches which we see in the Studio and in Christmas bairns' books. The article upon the Army and Navy exhibits at the Paris Exhibition is illustrated by good photos of different buildings without much regard for the text. The photos in the description of Palermo are very fine, as are those in Mr. R. Wischin's article upon "Historical Monuments in Asia." The account given of the dirigible balloon of the young Brazilian engineer, Santos-Dumont, seems to point to the fact that but for the unfortunate accident to his steering apparatus, he would have sailed round the Eiffel Tower and won the prize of 100,000 francs for that achievement. According to the photographs it would appear as if the daring aeronaut ran a pretty considerable risk each time he ascended. There is an interesting photograph of Count Zepplin's airship soaring far above Lake Constance on its third and most successful trial. The four large plates are well printed.

The Girl's Realm.

THE Christmas number of the Girl's Realm is a very good one, containing, among other articles, an excellent interview with Miss Maud Earl, the well-known dog artist—remarkable as an instance of success in career into which she was forced against her will. The "Career for Girls" dealt with is medicine. Another interesting article is on "picture postcards."

TH

On circle high loadi The the i betwe the i outpu vario coal a meth is no other write which sea vario and of pa coal much 330 t with 1 trimn

> Mr the le paper He co which Creus chief instea usual, He co firema no fe four-w weigh latter Mr. T lost hi huge structi

Mr. on the in Ital system the lin railway by the

Mr. tube Is upon 'Reduce article
Plant.'
"The
and M.
Princip

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE.

the

1 the

and were

-day

leals

ning

es at

y in y no

Moor

is a riors,

ound

and iring

in a rmal

rican

the iron

n of erris

upon epro-hich

ooks.

the erent

notos

those nents

on of

as to nt to

d the

that vould

rable

sting

bove

trial.

ellent

dog areer

areer

sting

THE November number contains many useful articles, most of which are interesting to the ordinary reader.

LOADING AND TRANSPORT OF COAL.

One of the chief topics of discussion in engineering circles, and indeed in many other places just now, is the high price of coal. Mr. Seaton Snowdon's article on the loading of sea-borne coal is therefore very opportune. The supply of American coal to England is largely on the increase, and it is probable that the deficiency between supply and demand will be met rather by the increase of imported coal than by an augmented output from British mines. Mr. Snowdon describes the various types of vessels that are now used to transport coal across the Atlantic, and the great improvement in the methods of loading them. Almost the whole of the coal is now carried in self-trimmers (collectors of dues and other interested parties call them cargo-cheaters). The writer describes these ships, and the principles which govern them, in detail. All of them are good sea boats with increased stability. Amongst their various improvements may be noticed better ventilation These ships are loaded by means of patent coal cranes, which not only load in the coal much more quickly, but the coal is shipped in a much better condition. The average rate of coaling is 330 tons an hour, and a self-trimmer which is loaded with these cranes does not require a single man below for trimming purposes. Truly a wonderful change.

A MONSTER ENGINE.

Mr. Charles Rous-Martin continues his article upon the locomotive exhibit at the Paris Exhibition. His paper deals chiefly with the development of compounding. He concludes with a description of the huge locomotive which has been built by Messrs. Schneider and Co., of Creusot, and which was exhibited in their pavilion. Its chief peculiarity, besides its great size, is that the driver, instead of controlling his engine from the footplate, as is usual, has a windcutter cab in front of the smoke-box. He communicates by means of speaking tubes with the fireman who occupies the footplate. The locomotive has no fewer than fourteen wheels coupled, has a leading four-wheeled bogie and a trailing six-wheeled one. It weighs eighty-one tons exclusive of the tender, which latter runs on two bogies. The engine is designed by Mr. Thuille for swift international trains. The designer lost his life during some preliminary experiments with his huge creation. Mr. Rous-Martin thinks it is deficient in structural strength.

ELECTRIC TRAMWAYS IN ITALY.

Mr. Enrico Bignami contributes an interesting article on the growth and present position of electrical tramways in Italy. He describes the methods in use, the different systems of supplying power, and the general practice on the lines. It appears that there are 154 miles of electric railways in the country, the greater part of which is by the trolley system.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. Thwaite discusses the vexed question of the water-tube boiler for naval services. Mr. M. Cokely writes upon "Piece-work as an Agency in Machine Shop Cost Reduction." Mr. H. G. V. Oldham contributes a further article upon "The Centralisation of the Steam Condensing Plant." Mr. Hugo Diemer continues his papers on "The Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop," and Mr. A. G. Charleton writes upon "The General Principles of Successful Mine Management."

CASSIER'S MAGAZINE.

THE November number is a very good one, and lack of space alone prevents me noticing several articles at greater length.

A RUSSIAN PETROLEUM PIPE LINE.

The transport of the oil obtained from the wells at Baku on the Caspian Sea to the ports of the Black Sea has until this year been largely done by road. The great range of the Caucasus so effectively divides the northern from the southern railway that communication between the two was impossible, save by means of the famous Gorgian military road, one hundred and forty miles long, which connects Vladikavkas on the north with Tiflis on the south. This road climbs to a height of seven thousand feet, and is frequently impassable because of the snow. The railways have now, however, been connected round the extreme eastern end of the range. A pipe line has been constructed from Michaelovo to Batoum. It is made of eightinch steel pipe, which has been submitted to very severe tests before being placed in position. At this time, when our papers are making so great an outcry against the contracts for rails and rolling stock for South Africa being given to American firms, it is interesting to note that although a bid of less than 3s. a foot for the pipe was received from an American firm, the Russian Government gave the contract to a Russian works at 8s. a foot. The line follows the railway track, and is buried at a depth of about one foot. The capacity of the pipe is forty-eight thousand gallons an hour. Michaelovo is four hundred and eighteen miles from Baku. The oil is brought there in tank cars, and is then discharged into large reservoir tanks, from which it is pumped through the pipe to Batoum. Mr. Foster, the writer of the article, remarks on the fact that American engineers and methods have been employed throughout in the construction of

THE PIONEER OF HIGH-PRESSURE STEAM.

Mr. A. Titley gives an interesting account of Richard Trevithick and the work he did at the beginning of this century. The general public knows little of him, although he was the first to recognise the advantage of high-pressure steam. His road locomotives, pumping machinery and dredging appliances made him famous, but financially he was a failure. He superintended the putting up of his machinery in South and Central America, and went through at least one revolution. He was away altogether eleven years, and on his return to his native county of Cornwall he was received with the ringing of church bells and universal joy. Amongst these hardy miners, who realised more promptly than any others the value of steam power, he was always a great favourite, and went by the name of "Captain Dick."

SMOKELESS CITIES.

Mr. William H. Bryan, in his article on smoke abatement, says:—

It may be safely said that any city may control its smoke. The means are ready at hand. Furthermore, such means are to be had in some variety, and their use imposes no undue hardship on manufacturers, either in first cost, restriction of output, or material increase of cost.

He then proceeds to describe these means, the success of which will be heartily welcomed by all.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. W. H. Tapley describes the great advance made in the use of electricity in the printing office. Mr. W. D. Wansbrough, in a descriptive article on Continental steam practice, rightly bewails the absence of British exhibits at the Paris Exhibition.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

THE Cornhill for December contains one article of general interest, and with that—Colonel Maude's views on the Transvaal War—I have dealt elsewhere.

WHY THE LEGATIONS ESCAPED.

The best of the other papers is that in which the Rev. Roland Allen describes some of the "Causes which Led to the Preservation of the Pekin Legations." Judging from the narrative it was pure luck and not foresight which saved the legations. The bringing in of the native Christians was due to a generous desire to save them, and was regarded as a disadvantage; but, as things turned out, without their help the legations would have fallen. There were nearly 4,000 natives in the defended area, yet the besieged never suffered from serious privations. It was chance that intervened here also. A large Chinese grain shop was discovered in Legation Street which had been replenished only a few days before. Mr. Allen says that on many occasions the Chinese would have destroyed the legations. They were often on the point of success, but lack of persistency or ignorance of the true position, forced them to abandon their advantages, and to change the point of attack.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

Mr. G. M. Smith, of Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., describes his first meeting with Charlotte Brontë. The following is his description of the effect which the reading of "Jane Eyre" had upon him:—

After breakfast on Sunday morning I took the MS. of "Jane Eyre" to my little study, and began to read it. The story quickly took me captive. Before twelve o'clock my horse came to the door, but I could not put the book down. I scribbled two or three lines to my friend, saying I was very sorry that circumstances had arisen to prevent my meeting him, sent the note off by my groom, and went on reading the MS. Presently the servant came to tell me that luncheon was ready; I asked him to bring me a sandwich and a glass of wine, and still went on with "Jane Eyre." Dinner came; for me the meal was a very hasty one, and before I went to bed that night I had finished reading the manuscript.

Of the authoress personally, Mr. Smith says :-

My first impression of Charlotte Brontë's personal appearance was that it was interesting rather than attractive. She was very small, and had a quaint old-fashioned look. Her head seemed too large for her body. She had fine eyes, but her face was marred by the shape of the mouth and by the complexion. There was but little feminine charm about her; and of this fact she herself was uneasily and perpetually conscious. It may seem strange that the possession of genius did not lift her above the weakness of an excessive anxiety about her personal appearance. But I believe that she would have given all her genius and her fame to have been beautiful. Perhaps few women ever existed more anxious to be pretty than she, or more angrily conscious of the circumstance that she was not pretty.

COLONIAL SERVANTS.

Lady Broome, writing on "Colonial Servants," tells an amusing tale of a Zulu girl, introduced to civilisation at a very early age, whom she engaged as a servant. On being brought to London she took to English ways as if she had never known anything else. But on her return to Natal—

Maria's kinsmen came around her and began to claim some share in her prosperity. Free fights were of constant occurrence, and in one of them Maria, using the skull of an ox as a weapon, broke her sister's leg. Soon after that she returned to the savage life she had not known since her infancy, and took to it with delight. I don't know what became of her clothes, but she had presented herself before my friend clad in an old sack and with necklaces of wild animals' teeth, and proudly announced she had just been married "with cows"—thus showing how completely her Christianity had fallen away from her, and she had practically returned, on the first opportunity, to the depth of that savagery from which she had been taken before she could even remember it. I soon lost all trace of her, but Maria's story has always remained in my mind as an amazing instance of the strength of race-instinct.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. S. G. Tallentyre, writing on "The Road to Knowledge a Hundred Years Ago," describes the methods of education then prevalent. Mr. A. M. Brice tells the story of the "Amazing Vagabond," Bamfylde Moore Carew, who flourished in the first half of the eighteenth century.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

THE Nuova Antologia (November 1st) gives prominence to the annual address recently delivered at Ravenna to the "Dante Alighieri" Society by its venerable President, Professor Pasquale Villari. This society exists for the patriotic purpose of encouraging the study of the Italian language among Italians living beyond the frontier, and is steadily increasing in numbers and in influence. To English people the interesting portion of the address is that which refers to Malta. Mr. Chamberlain having ordained that Italian is to be no longer the official language of the island, and that it is to be gradually replaced by English, the Dante Alighieri Society has stepped in to voice the almost unanimous opposition of the islanders to the proposed change. A successful meeting was held to protest against the exclusion of Italian from the schools, and a special committee was formed to agitate by all lawful means against the change. Professor Villari also points out that the English Government refused to submit the question to a popular vote, while not a single candidate at the recent election for the legislative council dared to pronounce himself in favour of the suppression of Italian.

The same subject is touched upon at the close of an otherwise friendly article in the Rivista Politica e Letteraria, "From Rome to London," on the choice of an ambassador to the English Court. The anonymous writer declares that Mr. Chamberlain has raised a hornet's nest about his ears in Malta, and warns England to act with prudence in the language controversy, for any troubles in Malta will re-echo in Italy, and would put a severe strain on the friendship which has been felt hitherto for England.

The Civilla Cattolica (November 3rd) publishes an article strongly urging the creation of an international tribunal both as a means of preventing war and of restraining the despotism of Governments. Of such a tribunal it naturally considers that the Pope should be the president. It expresses the conviction that the dawning century will see the inauguration of such a tribunal, and points to the Peace Conference at The Hague as the greatest step towards a higher civilisation that has been taken in the last half-century.

The Rassegna Nazionale (November 16th) prints a short article by the Senator G. di Revel, expressing sympathy with the Boer people in their distress by denouncing Kruger as the sole author of the war which has ended so disastrously for his country, and expressing the hope that, should he come to Italy, no ovations will be made on his behalf.

Among literary articles this month we may notice an excellent sketch of Rossetti in Flegrea (November 5th), and another in the Antologia (November 16th) on Charlotte Brontë, by Professor Segré.

In politicare of that attent Napodiscu Hugu M. Josep that rathe divor vivid

Of

Fren

the r surpr

lently

found so co

made the b

asked prese great of So -the the t and Calva rather plicat of ke to Fra fellow pointe the c emigr was g confor or to 1 do so. Hugu souls v mined any le it was consci being terribl and it led to Franc

Leszcz King him a she wr her as penned went o

Yet

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

In the Revue de Paris for November contemporary politics are left severely alone; on the other hand, there are two contributions of the highest historical interest—that in which M. Masson, the great Buonaparte authority, attempts to tell the story of all that led to the divorce of Napoleon and Josephine, and that in which M. Lemoine discusses the relations of the French bishops and the Huguenots at the close of the seventeenth century. M. Masson takes the very worst possible view of Josephine's character; he even goes so far as to say that very soon after her marriage to Buonaparte, she, rather than he, was already contemplating the idea of a divorce.

THE FRENCH BISHOPS AND THE HUGUENOTS.

Of more interest, perhaps, to English readers is the vivid account of the relations which existed between the French bishops and the Huguenots thirteen years after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Greatly to the surprise of Louis XIV. and his advisers, the task of violently converting the Huguenots into good Catholics was found to be anything but an easy one, and those who were so converted did not prove very desirable citizens. was then, after years of ineffectual effort, that the King made up his mind to hold a general consultation with the bishops as to what must be done. Each bishop was asked to furnish a report, and these, which have all been preserved, make very curious reading. According to one great ecclesiastic, whose diocese covered a large portion of Southern France, there were three types of Huguenots the gentlemen, who had practically no religion at all, the tradesmen, who took their religion more seriously, and the peasantry, who were ardently attached to Calvanism, and who were willing to suffer anything rather than give up their faith. The question was complicated by the fact that the Huguenots were suspected of keeping up connection with foreign relations inimical to France. Several bishops more enlightened than their fellows greatly regretted the revocation of the Edict, and pointed out that all those Huguenots who were a credit to the country, rather than give up their religion had emigrated to England and other Protestant countries. It was generally admitted also that those who outwardly conformed should not be compelled either to attend mass or to receive the sacraments unless they were willing to do so. But every bishop had his own theory as to how the Huguenots were to be treated; the kindly and charitable souls wished to try persuasion, not force; the more determined and self-willed ecclesiastics wished to go almost any length. There seems to have been one moment when it was absolutely decided to allow universal freedom of conscience. But Louis XIV. had an intense dislike to being made to go back on his word; accordingly, the terrible responsibility rests with him and with him alone, and it was his dislike to own himself in the wrong which led to endless difficulties and to the disappearance from France of some of her worthiest sons.

A TOUCHING STORY.

Yet another historical article concerns Stanislas Leszczynska, the father of Louis XV.'s Queen. Although married to the King of France when still a child, Marie Leszczynska never forgot her home or her father, the King of Poland. Scarce a week went by but she sent him a present; on Mondays, Wednesdays and Saturdays she wrote him long letters, and he on his side wrote to her as constantly some of the most charming letters ever penned by a father to a daughter. The correspondence went on for upwards of forty years, and once every twelve months the King Stanislas spent a few days at Versailles. The queen always remained, even after sixty, the exiled king's adored child. His death was very tragic; on February 5th, 1766, he being at the time eighty eight years of age, he was severely burnt; and after lingering something like a fortnight, during which time he constantly wrote to her bright, cheerful letters in order that she might not know his terrible condition, he died. Marie Leszczynska only survived him two years, and their correspondence is now about to be given to the world for the first time.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Other articles consist of an account of Mr. McKinley, by M. Viallate; of Vicomte de Reiset's somewhat dreary during the Monarchist emigration which took place in 1815; Madame Darmesteter attempts to give her French public some idea of what manner of man was William Makepeace Thackeray, and Comte Remacle devotes many pages to telling the story of a Provençale vendetta.

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

WITH the exception of Captain Gilbert's careful and elaborate account and criticism of the South African campaign—his present chapter, the nineteenth, only brings the story of the war down to the arrival of Lord Roberts in South Africa—the Nouvelle Revue has no article of really topical interest. We have noticed elsewhere the amusing pages that may be fairly entitled "The Duellist's Vade Mecum." The Alpine climber will find something to amuse him in M. Picard's two articles entitled "Milord Mont Blanc," for in it the French Alpinist gives a very good all-round account of the giant of the Alps regarded from the historic, the picturesque the mere tourist, and the serious climber's point of view.

A valuable contribution to the history of the Revolution is published in the first November number—namely, a touching account of the famous revolutionary, the Conventional Le Bas, written after his death by his widow, Elizabeth Duplay, who was at one time the bosom friend of Robespierre's sister Charlotte. In these pages is given a very pleasant picture of Robespierre, and one that does not at all bear out Carlyle's famous description of him

No French review is complete without a slice of foreign travel. M. de Raulin, who is apparently a French naval officer, publishes his notes of a journey from Algiers to Zanzibar. He has, however, nothing very new or very interesting to say, for it requires the pen of a Pierre Loti to make this kind of journal really interesting.

M. Depasse discusses continental trade unions in relation to French law, especially with reference to the "Conseils du Travail," that is, the great conferences where both workmen and capitalists are equally represented, and which, though now sanctioned by the State, were organised before they were in any way recognised officially. M. Delines tries to explain to his readers the inner workings of an American presidential election; and he acknowledges in the first few lines of his article his indebtedness to Mr. James Boyle's excellent article lately published in the Nineteenth Century. M. Lemaigre discusses "Quo Vadis," a book which, as the French critic points out, has far exceeded in circulation any novel of Zola's or of Ohnet's.

Temple Bar for December—an exceptionally interesting number—contains a study by G. Serrell of Lucy, Countess of Carlisle, Strafford's friend, and warner of the five members, a riddle-soul which attracted Browning's Muse.

and she ne depth ne could a's story
of the ng how

Knowhods of ells the Moore hteenth

romin-

avenna nerable society e study ond the and in rtion of amberger the to be lighieri nimous age. A hast the all comagainst hat the on to a ce recent mounce see of an Lettere of an nymous aised a warns control Italy, shes an national and of such a ould be nat the such a at The ilisation orints a pressing ress by r which pressing ons will otice an er 5th), 6th) on

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

M. BRUNETIÈRE'S review for November fully maintains its high reputation. We have noticed elsewhere M. Leroy-Beaulieu's article on the Chinese problem.

THE CONGO FREE STATE.

M. d'Ursel contributes to the first November number an account of a visit which he paid to the Congo State at the beginning of this year. Although M. d'Ursel had previously been concerned with the administration of the State in Europe, this was his first visit to the Congo. He was told by the Belgian officials that the natives had a delightful time, and were much happier than the whites, for they worked very little, and all their wants were fully provided for. Most of the tribes are still cannibals, not because there is any lack of other food, but owing to the idea that in eating a person one is doing him honour; thus a brave enemy will be eaten on the theory that his warlike qualities are assimilated by those who eat him. M. d'Ursel adds that the whites are very seldom eaten, only about a dozen cases in twenty-five years being known, though he apparently does not see that this fact reflects somewhat upon the bravery of the Belgians. M. d'Ursel describes the missionaries, notably those at Boma, and the difficulties which confront the good priests of the various Orders in dealing with people who are characterised by the most primitive instincts, and have no conception of Western morality. The missionaries mainly devote themselves to the children, and this plan also meets with the approval of the State Administration. M. d'Ursel visited a school near Boma where 400 children are being educated to become, some soldiers, some labourers. They are easily taught to drill, and the various forms of artisan's work did not appear to be beyond their intellects. These youths are married as much as possible to the girls who are educated by the Boma nuns. The priests and nuns have an apparently adequate organisation of hospitals and dispensaries, each of which bears the name of the town or province in Belgium which subscribed for it. The Administration appears to regulate the importation of alcohol with considerable strictness; the import duty is very high, and the sale of spirits is forbidden in the whole of the Upper Congo. As regards the reported cruelties of the officials, M. d'Ursel points out that there are black sheep in every body of men; but he declares that abuses when proved are invariably remedied, and that officials guilty of wrong-doing are punished.

THE FRENCH BUDGETS OF THE CENTURY.

M. Roche has an article, full of statistics, in which he traces the development of French finance as exhibited in the annual Budgets throughout the nineteenth century. His aim is only to furnish facts which may be interpreted according to the various needs of the political historian, or the social philosopher. It is a striking fact, as showing the growth of expenditure in France, that the nineteenth century began with a Budget of rather over £33,000,000 sterling; while the twentieth century will begin with a Budget of £161,000,000—an increase of nearly five-fold.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

The Vicomte de Vogüé contributes an interesting survey of the Exhibition which has just closed. Apart entirely from its subject, the article is an admirable example of a most beautiful literary style. M. de Vogüé explains very justly the events which militated against the success of the Exhibition, notably the Boer War, which aroused British susceptibilities; the murder of King Humbert; and finally, and perhaps the most important of all, the crisis in China. It is wonderful in the circumstances that the Exhibition was so magnificently successful. It was opened long before it was really ready, while the financial arrangements were injured by excessive speculation. M. de Vogüé seems to think that of all the nations who came to Paris bringing the varied fruits of their art and their industry, none furnished more marvellous lessons than Japan. The delicacy and originality of her art were an old story; but the practical craftsmanship and the triumphs of the Japanese in agriculture, engineering, and so on, were new.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned one by M. Lévy, full of interesting statistics, on metals and coal; a study of the School of the Trocadéro by M. Talmeyr; and some recollections of New Granada by M. d'Espagnat. In his Political Chronicle M. Charmes makes a very natural but none the less amusing blunder when he imagines that Mr. Chamberlain's speech at the Fishmongers' Company was addressed to a "very popular" audience, presumably Billingsgate fishwives!

The Pall Mall Magazine.

WITH the December number the editorship of Lord Frederic Hamilton comes to an end. The proprietor and staff take the opportunity to express their high apprecia-tion of his services and their regret at his retirement. His last number will perhaps impress Puritan readers with its too much flavour of the gruesome and uncanny, and its decided dash of the erotic. They may not quite relish Mr. Wm. Waldorf Astor's "Pharaoh's Daughter," a piece of fiction which sets forth how Moses was the offspring of an amour of the princess with a priest of the sun-god masquerading as the sun-god himself. But there are several good articles, notably those by Mr. Tom Mills on Wellington, N.Z., and by Mr. Jessop on Royal Tapestry at Windsor, both of which claim separate notice. Mr. F. H. Skrine unearths a "Seventeenth Century Ollendorff," a conversation book in French and English. which sheds valuable light on London life under the Merry Monarch. A quaint little poem, which is elaborately illustrated by H. G. Fell, is contributed by Marvin Dana. It is entitled "Woman." Each stanza begins "God was a wondrous worker," and recounts the story of Creation in its successive stages. The last stanza, which departs rather widely from the Hebrew tale of the rib, gives the point of the whole piece :-

God was a wondrous worker, And He took the heart from His breast And made a Woman, Nor laboured again: He had wrought His wonderful Best.

The Women of the Salons are still being cleverly portrayed by S. G. Tallentyre in Longman's Magazine. The salon selected for the December issue is Madame Geoffrin's, and is described as "one of the wonders of the social world." Madame was daughter of a valet de chambre; uneducated; not beautiful; bourgeoise; wife of a wealthy but stupid old ice-maker; of irreproachable virtue; who, in an aristocratic age, when virtue was out of fashion, had flocking to her rooms savants, philosophers, artists, nobles, princes, ambassadors, politicians, reformers. She "had the supreme art of making others talk their best."

Zerr Fiel long his lance chri Chin he u who is nothe Mili He way a reintel

exte

milit

auth

noth

very

that Dav child It look: Briti power all or the r Euro

Russ

and

Mincre porti He : Cana of tin short wher it is i

the p in th
He d has very Ameris as he is one.
where apply of Co colon

item statis upon priate

GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Nord und Süd.

THE November number has as frontispiece a portrait, very well reproduced, of Count Waldersee. Gebhard Zermin contributes what he calls a life sketch of the Field-Marshal. It is, however, little else save a rather long drawn out chronological survey of the chief events in his life. The introduction gives an account of his immediate ancestors, and Mr. Zermin then passes on to describe the christening of the future leader of the allied forces in China. The chief item of interest in his boyhood is that he used to p'ay with Prince Frederick William of Prussia, who was later the second Emperor of Germany. There is nothing remarkable in his career until just before the outbreak of the Franco-German War, when he was Military Attaché to the German Embassy in Paris. He then sent a report to his Government, dealing with the way in which war should be waged against the French, a report which shows him as a very observant and intelligent observer. His advice was acted on to a great extent, whilst that given by Colonel Stoffel, French military attaché in Berlin, was totally ignored by the authorities in Paris. Of personal information there is nothing; the only mention made of his domestic life is that he married an American, Mary Lee, daughter of David Lee of New York, in his 43rd year. He has no

It is instructive for Englishmen to read how a German looks at things which he himself usually only sees through British spectacles. In an interesting article upon World powers and languages, Mr. Karl Walcker gives a brief survey of the position of England, Russia, and Germany all over the world. He gives statistics of the growth in the numbers of the various people speaking the four great European languages.

The numbers speaking the English language have increased between 1800-1880 by 546 per cent., the Russian by 200 per cent., the German by 84 per cent., and the French by 26 per cent.

Mr. Walcker then proceeds to explain that the great increase in English-speaking folk does not mean a proportionate increase in the strength of England herself. He says, for instance, that the total independence of Canada, South Africa, and Australia is merely a question of time. He points out that "the more England, in a short-sighted way, has tied up her forces in South Africa, where she has created a new Ireland, the more impossible it is for her to equalise things with Russia in China."

In endeavouring to show that the German tongue is really much more widely used than would appear from the percentage of increase, he mentions that the Germans in the States are increasing, and will continue to do so. He does not seem to see that although the German vote has a great influence on a Presidential election, the very fact of their surroundings compels the German-American to learn English; and as time goes on English is as much the language of the German-American, and he is as good a citizen of the United States as any one. Mr. Walcker also points out various other places where German emigrants settle, but the same arguments apply there as in the United States. When speaking of Colonies, Mr. Walcker remarks that as German colonial expansion only began in 1884, they form another item not reckoned in the percentages. A study of the statistics of German Colonies makes the remarks he gives upon French colonial possessions seem singularly appropriate to those of Germany. He says: "It is a well known jest to say that the population of a French colony consists chiefly of officers, soldiers and officials." He discusses the Chinese peril, but says that the Boxers will be obliged to go down before modern civilisation, they can do nothing against the united forces of the great Powers. Mr. Walcker evidently does not agree with Sir Robert Hart, the greatest Chinese expert living, in these matters.

Deutsche Revue.

Professor Dr. G. M. Fiamingo writes a sensible article upon the strife that is going on between the Vatican and the Quirinal. He describes the various attempts that have been made to bring about a better understanding, all of which attempts have failed. But, says Dr. Fia-mingo, although it is good policy for the Pope to make himself out as a much ill-used prisoner in the Vatican, whose land has been forcibly taken from him, those advantages which his present position gives him very much outweigh any benefits he might win by a return to temporal power. When the Pope was a temporal sovereign he was get-at-able by other temporal sovereigns, but having lost-his land he gained immensely morally, and Bismarck's remark on the situation is true enough. The great Chancellor said, during his quarrel with the Pope: "Yes, if the Pope were still a Western power I should soon settle this affair. A few grenadiers at the gates of Rome would suffice." But, as it was, Bismarck was powerless. The writer also points out that the acquisition of the few square miles which the Papal See is supposed to be longing for would mean the sacrifice of nearly a million pounds per annum. Peter's Pence, which was started in order to enable the Pope to live without being beholden to the Italian Government, bring in nearly a million yearly; but if the land were regained the excuse for levying the contribution would be gone. Dr. Fiamingo is very positive that no reconciliation will be effected, and equally sure that the Papal See knows very well that it is better off as things are now than it ever was before.

WHY ENGLISHMEN ARE DISLIKED.

Lord Newton contributes a paper which must be rather strong reading to Germans. The writer is not particularly successful in answering his own question, but he points to the Jameson Raid as the first cause of the present dislike, and to the Transvaal War and Fashoda as adding to that feeling. He complains that our position is not understood as regards the war. We do not want goldfields, he says-we had to defend ourselves from being driven from South Africa. No wonder the editor puts in a footnote to explain that the views of the Deutsche Revue are by no means those of Lord Newton as regards the war. The article concludes with a regret that on the Continent everyone seems to regard the British Government as a sort of Machiavellian machine, working ruthlessly on a fixed policy of acquisition. His remarks are peculiarly adapted to the way in which most of our papers seem to regard the Russian Government, and Lord Newton's remark that this attitude of foreign nations towards us is simply laughable is also very applicable to our own position.

THE PIGEON POST.

The Deutsche Revue is altogether a very good number indeed. Lack of space prevents my noticing the other articles, of which the most interesting is a description of the Pigeon Post, which was started during the siege of Paris by Gambetta. The article is by Gross, captain of the air-ship department.

most ful in cently ready, excesof all fruits more and pracese in s and ro by anada le M. e less Chamwas mably

Lord or and recia-ment. adders anny, quite ter," a sthe of the there

Tom Royal notice. entury aglish, er the ch is ed by tanza es the last .

w tale

everly azine.
dame ers of alet de; wife hable

hable is out ilosocians, others

CASSELL'S.

Cassell's Magazine for December is a beautiful Christmas number. Its principal attraction undoubtedly consists in four Rembrandt photogravures—Sydney Muschamp's "Ordered South"—showing mother, wife and child decorating the portrait of the absent soldier; Gilbert Foster's "Garden of Lyonesse," with the exquisite girl-figure in the foreground; Henrietta Ronner's "Our Play-room," the play-room being a basket full of lovely kittens frolicking over their young mother; and Charles Padday's naval battle-piece "Worsted."

WAGGISH SIR WALTER.

There is plenty of good reading matter. Sir Walter Besant describes Christmas in Old London with much sympathy and humour. This is how he tells us of a potion for the season:—

You would like to try an Apple Florentine next Christmas? Pray do. If it were revived, it would probably become once more a national dish, popular especially with Temperance Societies. Take a large pewter dish; fill it with good baking apples; put in plenty of sugar and lemon; cover it with pastry. When it is baked, take off the cover, pour in a quart of well-spiced ale, cover it up again, and serve.

SAILING OVER ICE 100 MILES AN HOUR.

Beckles Willson gives an enthusiastic account of ice-boats and ice-boating. He declares "the rare exhilaration that tingles one's every nerve when guiding a mighty ice-boat over smooth ice in a stiff wind is unequalled by any other experience in the whole world." An ice-yacht will outrun the fastest express train; it sweeps past at 90 to 100 miles an hour. An average ice-boat measures over all 46 feet, with a sail-area of over 430 feet, and a weight of between eight and nine hundred pounds. Sometimes the speed is so great that "the skeleton craft are lifted from the ice and fairly fly for yards through the air."

As though by way of contrast to this Canadian winter sport, Mr. W. B. Wollen, R.I., gives a lurid and almost gruesome sketch of "Christmas at the Front" last year, by Modder River. It was an unpleasant mixture of heat, ennui, sandstorm, dust-covered food, and flies.

M.P.'S AND THEIR CLOTHES.

T. P. O'Connor and Harry Furniss between them supply a humorous sketch of the gradual relaxation of Parliamentary rigour in the matter of dress, from the tophat and black dress-coat of twenty years ago. Mr. John Martin, an Irish member, is credited with departing from the top-hat in the seventies and, in defiance of private remonstrances from the Speaker, sporting a low-crowned white hat. Then Joe Cowen came with soft black hat; then Parnell's Irishmen; then the Labour member and Keir Hardie; and the sartorial strictness of St. Stephen's was gone for ever; all of which has significance for the grave sociologist.

Gentleman's for December is full of piquant and curious matter. Mr. Lowry's "Faiths of Tsarland" asks for separate notice. Mr. Allingham's "Weather Causerie" introduces the staple topic of English conversation into "Magazinedom" very pleasantly. Mr. Harold Bretherton treats of dialects as they are allowed conventionally to appear in literature, from Shakespeare to the Kailyard School, and says some things that are smart and biting and true. Miss Emily Hill makes the alarming announcement that "we are threatened with a revival of snufftaking," and goes on to tell many stories of snuff and snuff-takers. There are other very readable papers.

The Church Quarterly.

THE last Church Quarterly Review of the century bears deepening impress of the devout and scholarly though narrowly Anglican mind behind it. The article on Ritschlianism and Church doctrine would move a German theologian to fits of laughter, from its grotesque inability to apprehend and still more to appraise the work of Ritschl. The poor reviewer, turned adrift on these unknown seas, with little beyond his Anglican "Church doctrine" to guide him, is indeed to be commiserated. The criticism of the late Principal Caird's fundamental Christianity is, on the other hand, decidedly pertinent, though evidently disposed to shy at anything and everything that smells of Hegel. A discussion of the New Dictionary of the Bible ends with a characteristic expression of discontent at "the allotment of many articles on biblical theology to writers who have long ago formed conclusions which are at variance with the teaching and organisation of the Catholic Church." This, mind, in criticism of a work edited by a Presbyterian divine! Elsewhere in these pages attention is called to the reviewer's alarm concerning the orthodoxy of our Passion Play guide. But in spite of these little blemishes, the net impression left by the periodical is religious rather than ecclesiastical, and is consequently more edifying and less exasperating than one expects from a Church print. There is generous appreciation of Mr. Lecky and of the late William Morris. Of John Wiclif it is suggested that he, the great opponent of pluralism, was himself one of the greatest of pluralists. Dr. Gasquet's theory that the old English Bible was not the work of Wiclif, but of the Catholic Church in England, is stated, for subsequent criticism. The highest praise is given to Mr. Gannon's Irish History. The Christian World anthology of views on the Atonement is vigorously and not unfairly dis-

Maemillan's.

Macmillan's for December is unusually interesting. Most likely to attract attention is "A Regimental Officer's" estimate of the Reservist in war. He frankly confesses that before the present war he was, like most of his class, sceptical as to the worth of the Reservist. He has found out his mistake. The real weakness of the Reservesystem is the non-commissioned officer, who, had he excelled as such when a coloursman, would probably not have returned to civil life, and is declared to have proved disappointing. But the Reservist private is pronounced an agreeable surprise; his conduct excellent in camp, on march, in discipline, in action; and his firing superior to that of the Boers!

"Weathering an Earthquake" at Charleston in August is graphically, at times almost breathlessly, and often humorously described by A. M. Brice.

The impressions of Klondike left upon Mr. C. C. Osborne, which he now draws to a conclusion, are not so unfavourable to the climate as might have been expected. The great mortality is attributed not to the climate, but to careless and insufficient feeding and clothing, as well as to dirt. Autumn and spring are set down as delightful: the weather in September, March and April as the most beautiful he had ever experienced. He felt the silence of the region most painfully. But in fine he pronounces the country to be a very good one, and capable of being made to support a large population.

LE

p centur which reside ment counti must l is it i taken in the which modifi tortois learn t of thou but th schools In the less la necess of othe For increas and the for ext peace, been desolid publish an Int German national young acquaint facilitat those ti

corresp initiate promote This the nature success especial operate change At 1

At property a correst young German computer sporadic Mieille result the are corring more is from a learning learning the sporadic from a learning more is from a learning the sporadic from a

In the the co-o German Hartman this Ann with war

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-KURITING.

NTERNATIONALISM, or to use a higher term, the promotion of good feeling between the peoples, is the most pressing duty which lies before us in the new To dispel the ignorance and misunderstanding which at present render it almost impossible for the residents in one country to form an unprejudiced judgment concerning the actions of the residents in another country, is to promote internationalism, and this end must be sought not by one method, but by all. Especially is it important that the good work should be under-taken among the young. The old have grown up in the midst of prejudices which have caked hard, and which in many cases can no more be removed or modified than you can remove or modify the shell of a tortoise by tickling it with a feather. They can neither learn the language, accustom themselves to the manner of thought, nor realise the environment of the foreigner; but the new generation which is springing up in our schools offers more plastic material upon which to work. In their case also it is possible to reinforce the more or less latent desire for fraternal union by the practical necessity of familiarising themselves with the knowledge of other languages than their own.

For some years past the system of international correspondence between scholars in various countries initiated by M. Mieille has been carried on with everincreasing success in France, Germany, North America, and this country. But in view of the increased urgency for extending and developing all agencies making for peace, friendship, and international intercourse, it has been decided to put the whole matter upon a more solid and permanent foundation. There will be published at Easter next year the first number of an International Annual in three languages, English, German, and French. There is at present no international periodical issued for the purpose of accustoming young scholars in various countries to form those acquaintances which are so much to be desired both for facilitating the acquisition of a language and for forming those ties of sympathy and friendship which do so much to promote the amenity of intercourse between the peoples.

This first Annual will, of necessity, be very much of the nature of an experiment; and it will depend for its success upon the degree of support which it may receive, especially from teachers and those who have already cooperated with us in promoting this international interchange of correspondence.

At present there are no fewer than 8000 persons, chiefly pupils, in schools in this country, who carry on a correspondence more or less regularly with as many young friends in France and Germany. Between Germany and France the number of correspondents is computed to be still larger. Thus the more or less sporadic but natural growth of the idea mooted by M. Mieille some years ago has produced the satisfactory result that thousands of persons in the three countries are corresponding with each other, and not only acquiring more facility in the use of a foreign language, but, what is from a general point of view of still more importance, learning to realise the existence of living human beings with warm human interest in other countries than their own.

In the production of this Annual I am glad to have the co-operation of M. Mieille as French editor, and in Germany my esteemed collaborator will be Professor Hartmann. I sincerely hope that the announcement of this Annual and the publication of the first number will be followed by a great extension of the system, which is eminently simple, and which experience has shown is followed by the best results, both educational and otherwise.

By way of encouragement to the scholars themselves I have resolved to offer one hundred prizes, or rather presents, these presents to consist of books in the three languages chiefly concerned, about thirty for each country.

The head teacher in each school upon the lists of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, Revue Universitaire, and those of Professor Hartmann is asked to send in the name of the pupil considered by him or her as most deserving as regards continuance in regular careful correspondence and general character. As only ninety books are available for France, Germany, and England, it follows that only one name can be sent from each school, and that even then age and length of correspondence must be taken into consideration. Only pupils who have corresponded at least one year are eligible.

The names to be sent in to the three different centres not later than the first week in February.

CONTENTS OF ANNUAL.

As the book is intended to be interesting to all concerned it must contain—

- cerned it must contain—

  1. A sketch of the scheme in the three principal languages.
- 2. Accounts of school, home, or neighbourhood, from the scholars themselves, with photographs, if the school has a sufficiently able amateur. These accounts are, of course, to be sent by the teacher, one from each school. One scholar, however, may write the account—another photograph; these accounts may be in own language. Age of writer must be given, and other particulars.
- 3. Original letters from scholars in the language of the foreign correspondent.
- 4. If possible a story from a famous writer in each country.
  5. A list which will contain the name of each prize winner and accepted contributor, with name of school and teacher.
  - 6. Some details of the exchange of homes.
- Accounts by scholars of favourite school games.
   Jokes, conundrums, etc., translated from foreign journals

Contributions for Annual; letters, accounts, written in German, photographs, must be sent to Professor Hartmann, 2, Fechnerstrasse, Leipzig, Germany. Those in French to M. Mieille, 59, Rue des Pyrénées, Tarbes, France. Contributions in English to be sent to the office of Review of Reviews, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, endorsed "Languages." Teachers are asked to send anything which interests their scholars.

Two copies will be sent free to the schools which are on the Correspondence list of the Revue Universitaire, REVIEW OF REVIEWS, and Professor Hartmann's lists; one for the teacher, and one for the school library. It will also be sent free to those scholars who correspond, if applications are sent by the teacher with 2½d, for postage. All prize-winners and accepted contributors will receive a free copy also. To others the price is 1s. post free.

We earnestly ask those teachers who are interested themselves and have interested their pupils in international correspondence to tell their pupils about the project, and that we shall be glad to receive any accounts they like to send us. We cannot promise to publish every such contribution, as our space will be limited to thirty pages, and therefore a selection will have to be made. Possibly in some cases such an account might be suggested to a promising pupil as alternative to the usual holiday task.

turv

larly

ticle

re a sque

the

t on ican

com-ird's

edly

hing

f the istic

nany

ago

the sby-

on is doxy

hese

the

and ating

e is late

that ne of

the

f the uent

non's riews

dis-

sting.

er's "

esses

f his e has erve-

d he y not have pro-

nt in firing

ugust

often

C. C.

ot so ected.

e, but

s well

light-

is the

t the e he

, and

Reproduced from "Lest We Forget," Review of Reviews Annual.

D it wi new . Forg My i would would signif teent first o chara deals rapid the h conta teent all th within about easily time > the fa " Bac Tha

remei It als treati world

It i appre portra subjec of the before for the selecti among had n centur should Of the cu * " L by post,

SOME BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

LEST WE FORGET.*

A KEEPSAKE FROM THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

DO not think that I have ever written a book which has interested me more than my new Annual. If it interests the reader as much as it interested the writer, it will certainly have a phenomenal success. For my new Annual is quite unique. It is entitled "Lest We Forget: A Keepsake from the Nineteenth Century." My idea was to provide the reader with a volume which would be exactly what its name implies, that is to say, it would be a permanent aide-memoire for all that is most significant and interesting in the history of the Nineteenth Century. It is divided into three parts. first deals with the movements of the century, and is a character-sketch of the last hundred years. The second deals with the personalities of the Century, and passes in rapid review the men and women whose lives have made the history of the Nineteenth Century. The third section contains a carefully compiled chronology of the Nineteenth Century. It is, of course, impossible to mention all the incidents in the history of the last hundred years within the compass of our Annual. But it contains about 1,500 of the more important dates. They might easily have been multiplied to 15,000, but at the same time it is not probable that more than 150 will be remembered after the lapse of another hundred years. It also contains a summary of about twenty of the great treaties by which from time to time the map of the world has been remodelled. I have taken as my motto the familiar couplet of Lowell's :-

"Backward look across the ages, and the beacon moments see,

That like peaks of some sunk continent jut through Oblivion's sea,"

It is not merely an aide-memoire, and a chronology, an appreciation, and a character sketch. It is also a portrait album. It is chiefly in the selection of the subjects for portraits that my interest in the compiling of the Annual was excited, for if you think of it, the task before me, as editor, was to construct a Temple of Fame for the Century, and the task before me was really the selection of those who were worthy to be remembered among the Notables of the Century. If only we had had nineteen similar books, one for each of the nineteen centuries, of the Christian Era, with what interest we should turn over the pages of this unique collection!

Of course I make no pretension to be qualified for the custodian of such a Temple of Fame. The work ought to be done by a committee of experts, not by a single individual working at high pressure, endeavouring to rake together, in a fortnight, the accessible portraits of those whose names are familiar at least to the British public, even if he had nothing else to do. But as a matter of fact, I have seldom been so driven, having had not merely to bring out the REVIEW OF REVIEWS in the same time, but also to prepare my l. test par phlet on the war, "How Not to Make Peace," hich had to be written and published before the derite on the Queen's Speech. Nevertheless, such as it is 't has the field to itself, for it has no rival and no compet or.

I have divided the No bles into two categories. There are those of the first t. tht, who have figured most conspicuously in the Century. To each of these I allotted a full page for their portrait. The others are groups and categories, and as there were two hundred of them, it was necessary to print them small, so that several could go on a page. Few more interesting discussions than those which took place as to the right of the Notable to a full page or to a part of a page, could be imagined. In some cases Notables had to be left out, for the simple reason that I could not lay my hands upon a suitable portraitone of those accidents which often determine the survival of historical personages in the records of their time. Here is the list of those whom I have selected as "the full-page Notables," the selection being made with a view to covering as wide an area as possible, both geographical and intellectual :-

The Queen's portrait I print as a frontispiece, for her reign has covered more of the Century than that of any living Sovereign.

After her come Napoleon I., Metternich, Stein, Goethe, Sir Walter Scott, Cobden, Mazzini, Alexander II., Abraham Lincoln, Bismarck, Moltke, Gambetta, Gladstone, General Gordon, the Empress of China, the Mikado of Japan, Nicholas II., Darwin and Pasteur.

At the beginning of the Century, keepsakes were a great feature in Christmas literature, but they lost their vogue many years ago. I hope that this venture of mine may revive their popularity, for "Lest We Forget" is a veritable keepsake for the Century, and I can imagine no more seasonable and permanently useful Christmas present than "Lest We Forget." The worst of most Christmas Annuals is that they perish with the using, and by February no one remembers that they existed; but the value of the Nineteenth Century keepsake will increase year by year, rising in value as the events of which it treats fade into the distance.

<sup>* &</sup>quot;Lest we Forget." REVIEW OF REVIEWS ANNUAL. One shilling; by post, 18, 3d.

THE LIFE OF ABOUR RAHMAN, AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN.*

THE Monthly Review recently published as an article some extracts from this remarkable book. I noticed it at the time in the REVIEW OF REVIEWS, and now I am very glad indeed to have the two volumes, clearly printed on good paper and illustrated with excellent portraits of the Amir. It is not often that an Oriental sovereign writes the history of his reign while he is still in the zenith of his power. That Abdur Rahman has done it entitles him to our gratitude and appreciation. He has a very pretty wit has the Amir, and his Oriental fashion of illustrating his story by apologues and fables is a welcome change to the Western reader. One of his illustrations is so felicitous that, although I fear it is told in order to attack the policy with which I have always been identi-fied, I cannot resist quoting it here. Speaking of those who maintain that there is no need to be perpetually worrying about the alleged designs of Russia upon India, the Amir says :-

This reminds me of the pigeon, who, seeing a cat coming towards him, closed his eyes, thinking that if he did not see the cat, the cat would not see him. But the cat did see him, and caught him, and ate him up.

THE GOAT, THE LION, AND THE BEAR.

This illustrative style is one great characteristic of the Amir as a historian. For instance, it pursues him even into his dreams, for he says:—

There is a saying that the cat does not dream about anything but mice. I dream of nothing but the backward condition of my country, and how to defend it, seeing that this poor goat, Afghanistan, is a victim at which a lion from one side and a terrible bear from the other side are staring, and ready to swallow at the first opportunity afforded.

The first volume, with which we need not concern ourselves here, is chiefly biographical, and the first part of the second is descriptive of the way in which he governs his country; but the latter part of the second volume is devoted to an exposition of his political ideas.

The Amir of Afghanistan.

We hear the bleating of the goat as he turns alternately from the lion to the bear, and wonders whether his horns will grow sufficiently sharp to enable him to keep them both at bay. Of the two, as this book is published in English, it is not surprising to find that he has most distrust of Russia; but he is by no means satisfied with England. He quite appreciates that he is much better off with Russia on the other side than he would be if he were left face to face with England, and no Russian bear on the northern horizon. The natural policy, therefore, of the goat when he addresses himself to the lion is to do everything he possibly can to foment hatred and distrust of that terrible bear who is looking over his northern frontier. Probably, if the Amir were to write in Russia, he would present us with the other side of the shield, and Russians would be edified with the exposition of the perfidy and insatiable ambition of Great Britain.

A SLICE OF BITTER MELON.

In this book he even ventures to tell the English lion pretty plainly how much he is disap-pointed in him, especially because of our stolid refusal to allow him to send an ambassador to London; but with the address of a true courtier, he follows up this frank expression of his disappointment by one of his charming apologues. He exhorts sors not to take any serious offence on account of this refusal :-

For we must remember the story of the lover who used to get a sweet melon from the hands of his beloved every day.

She used to take great pains to cut it into tiny little slices, and place it upon a costly porcelain plate, when he visited her. One day it happened that she got hold of a very bitter melon by mistake, and as she had not tasted it herself, she put it before him, as usual. The man went on eating it, without saying a word about its bitterness. When the last piece only of the melon was left upon the plate, one of his friends came in, and took it up to eat it, but finding it so bitter, asked his friend why he had not told his beloved of the bitterness of the melon. He answered that it would have been most ungrateful, after having eaten a sweet melon every day for months, to grumble about a bitter melon which he had only to eat once. This, of course, endeared him more in the eyes of his idol.

So we are evidently left to infer that England will be discove of his s

more t

In hispeaks which father, it was against period Afghan had rec "It" that is that a life for the father than th

to write
Of of Lytton
the pre penden not car for ins here a with ar says, n
They

dreamin

want p

a few awoke, again, h

whateve was too Wha of Tur togethe telegra "The s this ab

The to the when s afterwa attribu beyond says, l Afghar althougonly foother cohave dbut the I cann

He cerning forces 100,000 week, 2 Russia must k his life

Divine

4

* "The Life of Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan." Two vols. 23s. With portraits, maps, and illustrations. (John Murray.)

more than ever devoted to Abdur Rahman when she discovers with what good grace he accepted the refusal of his son's request.

tely

orns

hem

l in dis-

with vere

on

, of

do rust

over tier.

the rite

ould

the

the ans

vith

the ati-

of

TER

he tell lion

low

ap-

im,

to end to rith

rue ows

es-

ap-

e of poorts

esiny

on re-

emver

reet

s of

ay.

and

)ne

nis-

im.

ord

vas.

to

not red

a

ter

red

be

CRITICISM OF ENGLISH POLICY.

In his criticism of English policy in Afghanistan he speaks some unpalatable truths. The first Afghan war, which was undertaken in order to dethrone his grandfather, was a step for which we had no justification, and it was not honest to put our puppet upon the throne against the wishes of the Afghan people. The second period of our passive policy culminated in the third Afghan war, which was undertaken because Shere Ali had received a Russian emissary.

"It is a curious thing," remarks the Amir naïvely, "that England did not ask Russia for an explanation of her conduct in giving protection to Shere Ali, and in interfering with Afghanistan; but they punished Shere Ali for this, though Lord Lytton himself had ordered him to write letters to General Kaufman."

Of course the Amir equally disapproves of Lord Lytton's policy of partition, and although he approves of the present policy of subsidising Afghanistan as an independent kingdom, he is disappointed to find that it is not carried out to the extent it ought to be. He ought, for instance, to have his ambassador in London. But here again he winds up the expression of his differences with another apologue. His sons and his successors, he says, must not complain:—

They must remember the story of a person who was dreaming that God offered him some pence. He said, "No, I want precious stones." Then God offered him silver coins. The man still insisted on precious stones. He was then offered a few gold coins, and he demanded more. All at once he awoke, and found he had nothing at all. So, closing his eyes again, he stretched out his hands again, and said, "Give me whatever you like. I will take it and be thankful." But it was too late. He got nothing.

A NOVEL TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

What the Amir would like is to see a Triple Alliance of Turkey, Persia, and Afghanistan, closely united together, with their capitals connected by railways and telegraphs, as a strong wall in face of Russian aggression. "The sooner the English Government take steps to bring this about," he says, "the better."

The Amir speaks with a tone of absolute conviction as

The Amir speaks with a tone of absolute conviction as to the certainty that Russia intends to devour Afghanistan when she can, and India, Persia and Turkey immediately afterwards, from which it will be seen that the Amir attributes to Russia an inordinate appetite, altogether beyond the possibilities of her digestion. His policy, he says, has been dominated by this conviction. "The Afghan people," he says, "should understand that, although the Russians have left Afghanistan alone, it is only for a season," as they are waiting for his death or some other convenient time. "I am sorry," he adds grimly, "to have disappointed my Russian friends so many times, but they must not blame me for this. It is not my fault. I cannot die to please them, death being fixed by the Divine will."

READY FOR RUSSIA.

He talks biggity, as Brer Rabbit would say, concerning his ability to defend Herat against the whole forces of the Russian Empire. He says he can mass 100,000 fighting men at Herat in the course of a week, and can stir up the whole of the Mahometans in Russian Turkestan. Considering this, Russian officials must know that it is impossible to attack Herat during his lifetime, "because I am prepared to give them a very warm reception." He has also employed thousands of men for twelve years in building a great fortress at Dehdadi for the fortification and protection of the province of Bokh. It is also mounted with the best quick-firing guns. Having fortified Herat and Bokh, Russia turned her attention towards Bavakshun borders, in answer to which challenge he acquired Kaffrerestan, and prepared himself to meet the Russians in that quarter also. Now that the Russians are exhibiting an activity in the direction of Persia, he is going to pay earnest attention to the south-west border, between Herat and Kandahar. "No matter in what direction the Russians move, I, being informed by my spies, send double the number of soldiers to be ready for them, whenever they come too near." The goat evidently feels it useful to advertise to the bear how very sharp are his horns, and how strong is his neck.

WHAT ENGLAND OUGHT TO DO.

Years, however, must elapse before Russia makes any attack on his territory, but that it will come some day he is quite certain. Therefore he drops a few necessary hints as to what we ought to do in order to protect our buffer State from Russian aggression. England and Afghanistan must be firm allies, for India would become ungovernable if Russia were at Herat. He is quite sure that Russia will never attack Afghanistan so long as England is prepared to back the Amir through thick and thin. His second hint is that Russia will never stop moving forward till England stops her; and here again comes the inevitable apologue:—

When a spring of water first breaks through a small hole, it may be stopped by a finger being placed upon the hole; but it cannot be stopped by putting an elephant before it when it is too large to be stopped.

The third hint is that England must stump up more money, more arms, and more munitions of war to strengthen the Amir and his successors. It is very interesting to note the emphasis with which he insists upon the determination of the Afghans not to allow any English to enter their country, even for the purpose of defending it against Russia. He says:—

The only time that the Afghans would willingly admit the English army into their country would be when they had been decisively and officially defeated by Russia, and could not stop her from having their country by any possible means; but as long as the Afghans can fight for themselves, they ought not, they would not, let one soldier of Russia or England put his foot in their country to expel their enemy, as it would be impossible to get rid of the army which they themselves had invited to help them, who would always have the excuse of remaining, by saying that they were keeping the country peaceful.

If Russia and England were to partition Afghanistan, the poor goat tells the lion that the bear would get all the juicy bits:—

The countries on the west of the Indo Koosh are the richest and the most fertile provinces of Afghanistan, while those of Jellalabad and Kabul, which would fall to the share of the English, are scarcely rich enough to pay their expenses.

His fourth suggestion is that we should promote the Triple Alliance of which I have already spoken, and the fifth is that England and Afghanistan should both work towards making their subjects rich and contented, keeping an army sufficient to oppose the advance of an enemy, "just as taking a tonic is better than taking medicine after falling ill." By way of a friendly hint to the rulers of India, he tells them that the Russians are much our superiors in promoting intermarriage and social intercourse between themselves and their Oriental subjects. The Anglo-Indians and the Indians in India are always aloof from each other.

THE AFGHAN WASPS.

I must finish this brief notice of this interesting and amusing book by quoting the Amir's honest advice to the Russians, which he offers them "as their true friend," being under heavy obligations to them and owing them a debt of gratitude. He tells them that if the attempt were made to invade India, the result would be the ruin of Russia, and is sure to end like the following story:—

A man was very thin, and his wife was anxious that he should become a little stouter. This man was very fond of playing with wasps' nests, though his wife had often told him not to do so. It happened one day that the irritated wasps attacked him, and stung him most fearfully. When he reached home he was quite swollen, and stout and full in the face. His wife, who was very pleased at this change in his appearance all at once, asked him how he had managed it. He answered that he had been bitten by wasps, and that he was in terrible pain. His wife began to pray: "O Lord, make the pain go, but let the swelling remain!" But, unfortunately, the contrary was the result; the swelling soon went down, but the blood-poisoning remained. This will be the end of Russian attempts to invade India: that they will not be able to take India, and the pain and sufferings of the terrible war would remain to add to their sorrow."

Perhaps more to the point is his pregnant remark that if Russia attempted to acquire Afghanistan, "she would be under the same disadvantage as was Henry I. of France at the time of the war between France and Spain: if too large an army was sent, the men would die from scarcity of food; and if they sent too small an army, it would be conquered by the enemy."

VINDICATION.

Whatever we may think about his views as to the policy of Russia and the way in which it should be met. there can be no doubt that it would be difficult to frame a more crushing condemnation of the Beaconsfield-Lytton policy of 1878 than that which is to be found in the pages of this convinced believer in the dangers of Russian advance. What they did, he tells us, was the very thing of all others most calculated to promote Russian interests, and to weaken British dominion in So Mr. Gladstone and all others kept saying nearly every day from 1878 to 1880, but at that time we were regarded as traitors and pro-Russians. Now that the Amir of Afghanistan, in the very midst of his exhortations as to the danger of Russian aggression, finds it necessary to brand the Beaconsfield policy as the most advantageous of all to Russian designs, it is possible that some of our demented Jingoes may take thought and learn.

The Temple Classics.

It would be difficult to discover a more useful and acceptable Christmas gift than the series of "Temple Classics" published by Messrs. Dent and Co. All the books issued by this firm have a wonderfully dainty appearance and are invariably well printed. The volumes are only  $6\frac{1}{4}$  in. by 4 in., a size which is quite a relief after the many large books published week by week. Thanks to the able supervision of Mr. Gollancz, possessors of these delightful books may be certain that the letterpress is equal in merit to the mechanical get-up. The series, in whole or in part, may be recommended to those desirous of giving useful pleasure to their friends.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE AT THE HAGUE.

By F. W. Holls.

When I was at The Hague last year I wrote a book describing the Conference from day to day, and embodying a narrative of what the Conference did, and setting forth what was necessary to give effect to its provisions. The book was translated into French, and was put into type eighteen months ago. Since that time the Dutch printer has been struggling with the French proofs. He is still struggling. The century will close before the book appears, and at the present rate of progress I am afraid that the next century will also close before my poor book sees the light. I therefore gratefully welcome the book which Mr. F. W. Holls has written, and Messrs. Macmillan have published, entitled "The Peace Conference at The Hague, and its Bearings upon International Law and Policy."

I had the pleasure of making Mr. Holls' acquaintance for the first time at The Hague. He was one of the halfdozen indispensable men in that great international parliament. He came to The Hague practically unknown to any one outside the United States. He had not been there two days before he impressed M. de Staal with the conviction that he was destined to be a very important member of the Arbitration Commission, and before the Conference closed he had not only justified M. de Staal's prescience, but he had created for himself an international reputation which this book will go far to consolidate and confirm. Mr. Holls, who is the son of a famous American philanthropist, had distinguished himself in the States by the prominent part which he took in the literary propaganda of the Republican Party which secured the first election of President McKinley. He was the personal friend of two men-one, Dr. Albert Shaw in America, the other the Hon. Andrew D. White, United States Minister at Berlin; and they knew him and appreciated the services which he could render in such a Conference. Hence it was that Mr. White found himself supported at The Hague by Mr. Holls, as Secretary of the American Delegation. Mr. Holls was a lawyer, and so was Lord Pauncefote. They worked together admirably. Mr. White left the burden of the work to Mr. Holls, who responded nobly to the opportunity. Not merely as a jurist, but as a diplomatist, Mr. Holls rendered yeoman's service to the cause, especially by way of removing the prejudices of Germany. His father was a German, and German is one of his mother tongues. Hence when Mr. Holls undertakes to write the story of the Peace Conference, he writes it as a man who was on the inside track from the first, and who can say concerning the Commission which framed the Arbitration Convention "quorum pars magna fui." Of this, however, there is little or no mention in the book, and therefore it is the more incumbent upon one who was present and saw how things went, to bear public testimony as to the credentials which Mr. Holls has for producing such a work as this.

Mr. Holls has another great qualification for writing about The Hague Conference, and that is, that he sincerely and honestly believes in it; believes that it has done a great work, and is destined to win much greater popular approval than has yet been accorded to it. In his preface he frankly avows his conviction that "the Peace Conference accomplished a great and glorious result, not only in the humanising of warfare and the codification of the Laws of War, but, above all, in the promulgation of the Magna Charta of international law, the binding together of the civilised Powers in a federation for justice, and the establishment of a Permanent International Court of Arbitration."

It prese depre I agr cular anim from A jou lines. of th throu their the in the ( might agree d'Enc in wh own s In Confe

the department of the departme

given

apper

HE office (Daw shoul its pi their a rés charr worke two p on m be re gift-b get-uj Fre volun of wh as m

reade than the meserials "Life Arma

The '

The Sunda the set Tissot it seen firm to others

and th

It is curious, but very natural, to those who were present at The Hague, to find Mr. Holls repeatedly deprecating the mistakes of so-called "friends of peace." I agree with him in the main, although on the one particular occasion on which he singles me out for special animadversion I naturally dissent, although not so much from his point of view as from the question of policy. A journalist and diplomatist naturally work on different lines. It was Mr. Holls' cue to minimise the importance of the Commissions d'Enquête, in order to slip them through without allowing their real importance to alarm their possible enemies. It was my business to magnify the importance of the Commissions in order to prevent the Conference dropping the clause altogether, as it might very easily have done. As Mr. Holls entirely agrees with me as to the importance of the Commissions d'Enquête, the only difference is as to a matter of tactics, in which each of us might perfectly well be right from his own standpoint.

In addition to the report of the discussions of the Conference and the text of the Conventions, which are given both in French and English, we have in an appendix a general report of the American Commission upon the work of the Congress, with special reports by the delegates most concerned in each of the three departmental Commissions.

The book is clearly printed, and is likely to take its place as a standard work of reference in the English language on the subject.

E.

book

em-

to its

, and rench

close te of efore

s has titled rings

tance half-ional

un-

had

Staal

very and titied

mself

ar to

of a mself

hich

was

w in nited l ap-ch a nself

f the d so ably.

who

as a lan's

the and Mr.

Con-

rack mis-rum r no cum-vent,

Mr.

iting

he ater

In

ious

the

the law,

era-

nent

SOME ANNUALS.

HERE is the seventh special Annual issued from the offices of that enterprising paper the Photogram (Dawbarn, Ward and Co., 3s. net). All photographers should possess themselves of this Annual and learn from its pictures and letterpress how to perfect themselves in their hobby. This book is no dry text-book, it is rather a résumé of the year's work all over the world—most charmingly illustrated with the best photograms of the workers of all lands. Out of the one hundred and ninety-two pages there are not thirty without an illustration, and on many pages there are two pictures. The Annual may be recommended to the general public as a most charming gift-book for Christmas, as its illustrations and excellent get-up will always give pleasure.

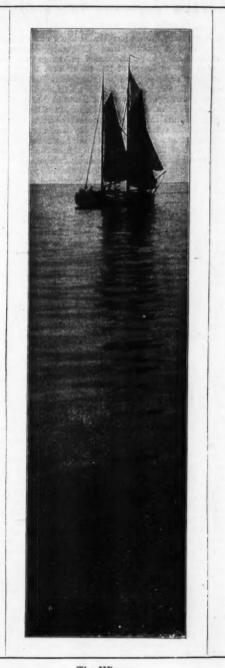

From Messrs. Isbister and Co. come the annual volumes of the Sunday Magazine and Good Words, both of which quite sustain their high reputation, and will give as much pleasure to their possessors as in past years. The volumes are attractively got up, and though they contain 836 pages and 860 pages respectively, they are very handy and neat books. The price of each volume is only 7s. 6d.

The Quiver yearly volume forms a bulky book of 1,152 pages, illustrated with about 800 illustrations. Those readers who appreciate serial stories will find no fewer than six in this volume. About forty stories supply the needs of such readers as prefer short stories to serials. Of special interest are the chapters of the new "Life and Work of the Redeemer," by the Archbishop of Armagh, the Rev. Professor Marcus Dods, D.D., and others. Messrs. Cassell and Co. publish the volume, and the price is 7s. 6d.

The most striking feature of the annual volume of the Sunday at Hôme (Religious Tract Society, 7s. 6d.) is the series of six coloured reproductions of pictures by Tissot. These are remarkably well reproduced, although it seems a pity that it is necessary to go to a French firm to obtain such satisfactory results.

The Wherry.
By Th. and A. Hofmeister.

(Reproduced by permission of the Editors of "Photograms of the Year 1900.")

FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO.

AFRICA FROM SOUTH TO NORTH.

It is certainly curious, as Mr. Rhodes remarks in his preface, that a youth from Cambridge during his vacations should have succeeded in doing that which the ponderous explorers of the world have failed to do. It has been reserved for two young men, Mr. Ewart S. Grogan and Mr. Arthur H. Sharp, to be the first to make the journey of Africa from South to North. Until a couple of years ago the track of Mr. Rhodes' great transcontinental railway had not even been traversed throughout its entire length by any single white man. The achievement was a plucky one, and receives the commendation of Mr. Rhodes in a brief preface, itself prefaced with a regret "that literary composition is not one of my gifts, my correspondence and replies being conducted by telegrams." Mr. Rhodes feels encouraged to push on his schemes for railway and telegraph, and declares that he does not intend to be beaten by the legs of a Cambridge undergraduate. The two travellers record their experiences and adventures by the aid of the pen of one of their number. Mr. Grogan has practically written the whole of the book, which bears the appropriate title of "From the Cape to Cairo" (Hurst and Blackett, 21s. net). Mr. Sharp only contributes one chapter. The volume is profusely illustrated and contains several useful maps and an index.

THE THRILL OF ELEPHANT-HUNTING.

The young explorers seem to have enjoyed their trip immensely, despite the many inconveniences of Central African travel. Perhaps it is too much to expect that in describing their experiences Mr. Grogan should always keep within the bounds of good taste, but under the cir-cumstances, he might have omitted the sneer at the literary productions of "missionaries and week-end tourists" on the subject of Africa. A large portion of the book is filled with descriptions of big-game shooting, which compensated the travellers for numerous hardships and difficulties. But for the chance of a shot at lions. elephants, and hippopotami, they roundly declare no earthly consideration would induce them to put a foot a mile south of the pyramids. They found hon-hunting the prettiest sport, and elephant-hunting the most wildly exciting. In many parts of Africa the elephant has been practically exterminated, but on the Congo and Upper Nile immense herds are still to be found. mental strain of hunting an elephant in a forest is so great that Mr. Grogan does not believe any one could stand it for any length of time. The following extract is taken from a graphic account of an elephant hunt :-

Occasional sounds indicate the brute's whereabouts, and gradually one draws closer and closer. Then suddenly all is quiet again; he has caught a puff of wind, or maybe heard a twig crack. Inch by inch one crawls closer, watching for a moving leaf, listening for a rustle, anything to indicate the exact position; nothing but that leafy curtain and the imagination: one feels that he is straining for a sound, that he is on the alert, and one knows that at any moment that awful silence may become a very pandemonium. Still on, pausing and holding one's breath at every step. Hark! a low gurgle! It cannot be more than ten yards away. Then the top of a sapling sways violently to and fro, snaps with a sharp report, and crashes to the ground; again all is quiet, then the slow munching sound shows that he is feeding. There is not a breath of air. Try as one will not an inch of him is visible; he is not six yards away. A playful zephyr fans the cheek; a whirlwind of sound like a bursting engine makes the very trees shudder. Crash! The whole forest seems to bulge and rend asunder; a geam of white, a wicked red eye, a mass that fills the world, then bang! bang! The trees are still swaying, the forest swaying, an avalanche is running amok; crash after crash, short snappy cracks and fearful rending sounds gradually merge in the swish-like driving hail, which slowly dies away.

A SAVAGE ORGY.

. Mr. Grogan describes a festival on elephant meat in the district immediately south of Albert Nyanza. He had shot an elephant just before dark. The following morning he went to see his victim. A weird and gruesome sight met his eyes. Hordes of savage Baleggas had swarmed down from the hills and were feasting upon the huge carcass:—

A weird sight it was; stark naked savages with long greased hair (in some cases hanging down on their shoulders) were perched on every available inch of the carcass hacking away with knives and spears, yelling, snarling, whooping, wrestling, cursing and munching, covered with blood and entrails; the new arrivals tearing off lumps of meat and swallowing them raw; the earlier birds defending their courses in the form of great lumps of fat, paunch and other delicacies; while others were crawling in and out of the intestines like so many prairie marmots. Old men, young men, prehistoric hags, babies, one and all gorging or gorged; pools of blood, strips of hide, vast bones, blocks of meat, individuals who had not dined wisely but too well lay around in bewildering profusion, and in two short hours all was finished. Nothing remained but the gaunt ribs like the skeleton of a shipwreck, and a few disconsolate-looking vultures perched thereon.

The picture is graphic, if horrible; but the performances of the Balegga are pleasing in comparison to the horrors perpetrated by the Baleka further south.

DEVASTATED BY CANNIBALS.

The whole district of Mushari lying between Lakes Kivu and Albert Edward has been devastated by this horde of Congo cannibals, who have literally devoured the land and its inhabitants. Every village has been burnt to the ground, and everywhere the travellers saw skeletons in postures which told terrible tales of horror. A district of about 3,000 square miles in extent has been depopulated, devastated, and converted into a howling wilderness. Mr. Grogan does not believe that two per cent. of the thousands of inhabitants have survived the massacre and famine. In Kishari and Kamerouse there is not a single soul. These human hyænas attacked Messrs. Grogan and Sharp, but a few well-directed shots, put them to flight. On reaching the spot evacuated by the cannibals a hideous nightmare of horrors was revealed. Mr. Grogan sets them forth in the following fashion:—

Item.-A bunch of human entrails drying on a stick.

Item.—A howling baby.
Item.—A pot of soup with bright yellow fat.

Item.—A skeleton with the skin on lying in the middle of the huts; apparently been dead about three months.

Item.—A gnawed thigh bone with shreds of half-cooked meat

Item.—A gnawed forearm, raw.

Item.—Three packets of small joints, evidently prepared for flight, but forgotten at the last moment.

Item.—A head with a spoon left sticking in the brains.

Item. - A hand toasting on a stick.

Item.—A head, one cheek eaten, the other charred; hair burnt, and scalp cut off at top of forehead like the peel of an orange; one eye removed, apparently eaten, the other glaring at you.

Item.—Offal, sewage.

Item.—A stench that passeth all understanding, and, as a fitting accompaniment, a hovering crowd of crows, and loathly, scraggy-necked vultures.

Sick with horror, the little party travelled from sunrise to sunset to escape from this death-stricken land, Mumm to and the lar Yet thi suppos official

Mr. admini Germa he wou Africa. method them is

It w between of the unassur whose causal 1 of perfe a minu clearing service being o Above no fuss. the oth armed very w about i visaged and eve an arm Yet mo had be disagr For in Lake They year ris out the the app they ar by the and die them by

The

of their Biti mosqu experi It w set and piled a greennative went having have b to ente poison possibl mornin had be

The insect urine figure Mummies, skulls, limbs, and putrefying carcasses washed to and fro in every stream. An insufferable stench filled the land, concentrating round every defiled homestead. Yet this territory is within the Congo Free State, and is supposed to be efficiently administered by Belgian officials!

still nok;

unds

dies

t in

He

ring

rue-gas

pon sed

vere

way

ing, the nem

of

irie

one

but ort

ribs

ing

mthe

ces

his

red een aw

or.

en

ng

er

he ere

ed

ots.

by

he eat

or ıt.

an

THE SILENT BRITON AND THE FUSSY BELGIAN.

Mr. Grogan has an utter contempt for Belgian administration, but is filled with admiration of the German system. If the missionaries could be eliminated he would be better pleased with British rule in savage Africa. He draws a striking contrast between the methods of the British and Belgian official as he saw them in practice:—

It was instructive to mark the characteristic distinction between Mr. Rhodes' telegraph expedition and the expedition of the King of the Belgians. On the one hand was an unassuming handful of men (without a single armed man), whose very existence might easily have been overlooked by the causal passer-by. Yet behind them lay many hundred of miles of perfected work that brought the far interior of Africa within a minute of Cape Town; before them stretched an arrow-like clearing to Tanganyika (200 miles long) waiting for the transport service to bring poles and wire. Quiet men, rotten with fever, were being carried to and fro, inspecting, measuring, and trenching. Above their base floated a diminutive Union Jack; no pomp, no fuss, not even a bugle; yet all worked like clockwork. On the other hand, a huge camp, thundering with the tramp of armed men, uninhabitable from the perpetual blare of bugles, a very wilderness of flags. Gorgeous and fussy Belgians strutting about in uniforms, screaming and gesticulating, with a few sadvisaged Englishmen doing the work—piles and piles of loads and ever those bugles. It resembled the triumphant march of an army through the land, and the cost must have been appalling. Yet months after they had eventually arrived at Nitowa, nothing had been accomplished.

AFRICAN PESTS.

The book is full of interesting passages describing the disagreeable accompaniments of travel in Central Africa. For instance, there is the Kungu fly which is peculiar to Lake Nyassa:—

They resemble small may-flies, and at certain seasons of the year rise from the water in such stupendous clouds that they blot out the whole horizon. Seen in the distance they have exactly the appearance of a rain storm coming across the lake. When they are blown landwards they make every place uninhabitable by the stench which arises from the countless millions that lodge and die on every inch of sheltered ground. I myself have seen them lying a foot deep in a room, and I was told that they are often much worse. The natives sweep them up and make cakes of them.

Biting and poisonous ants are another pest, but the mosquito is the great enemy of man. Describing his experiences in Dinka land, Mr. Grogan says:—

It was absolutely necessary to turn in half an hour before sunset and to make all the preparations necessary for the night. I piled all my belongings round the edge of my net and kept a green-wood fire burning at each end; then I lay inside, smoked native tobacco, and prayed for morning. As soon as the sun went down, the mosquitoes started operations. It was like having a tame whirlwind in one's tent. They could not possibly have been worse. Every night two or three hundred contrived to enter my net; I have no idea how. The most pernicious and poisonous kind was a very small black mosquito that might possibly have penetrated the mesh. I used to turn out in the morning feeling perfectly dazed from the amount of poison that had been injected during the night.

The natives protect themselves against this maddening insect by smearing a paste composed of ashes and cow's urine all over their bodies. Their tall, gaunt, grey figures present a very remarkable spectacle. They also line their huts with a deep layer of burnt cow-dung, in which they lie.

Such are a few of the delights of African travel as described by Mr. Grogan. For a full and particular account the reader must turn to the book itself.

Balegga waiting for Elephant.
(Illustration by courtesy of Messrs. Hurst and Blackett.)

GIFT-BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS.

The Book of King Arthur and his Noble Knights.*

THIS is a charming volume, daintily got up and beautifully illustrated, a fitting casket for jewels culled with loving hand from one of the treasure houses of the world's romance. Mr. Hales, in his introduction, makes the long unidentified author more distinctly visible to us. Malory was born in Warwickshire. He fought in the Wars of the Roses, took part in an expedition to France, attached himself to the fortunes of Warwick the Kingmaker, and was flung into the Tower, where he wrote the " Morte D'Arthur," which is one of the most famous of the prison books of the world. " Don Quixote," "Pilgrim's Progress,"

"History Raleigh's of the World," and the "Morte D'Arthur" all owe their origin to the imprisonment of their authors, who little realised what was the real reason of their being locked up. Miss Macleod has done her story-telling brightly, lightly and well. It is no easy task to handle Sir Thomas Malory's prose, as there are passages in the old book which children would not understand. Miss Macleod has appreciated the difficulties, the limitations and the opportunities of her task. She has selected as the stories for the telling, "King Arthur,"
"Sir Lancelot of the Lake," "The Boy of the Kitchen," "The Forest Knight," "King Fox," "The Quest of the Holy

Grail," and "The Death of Arthur."

In "Heads or Tails," by Harold Avery (Nelson, 5s.), we have more than a school-story. The hero, George Hyde, is forced to leave school and take to business life. The first part of the book deals with the school adventures of George Hyde. The second sees him in an office, and quickly involved in difficulties. His firm dismiss him for a fault largely due to the influence of bad companions. An uncle comes to the rescue and helps him to regain the straight road. The whole story is not without its moral, and the first part leads one to hope that there may be a revival of those really healthy school stories to which Talbot Baines Reed accustomed us.

A school tale of a different type is "Tom Andrews" (Stock, 5s.). This story deals with board-school life and is written by the Bishop of Poplar, E., who evidently has an intimate knowledge of the board-school boy. The hero of the tale is Tommy Andrews, "a sturdy, active boy, with fair hair and honest grey eyes, just turned thirteen and in the sixth standard." The tale of how Andrews spent his time until he became an apprentice in an engineer's shop is full of interest, though it is doubtful if it will appeal to other than boardschool boys.

litera

and deals

his p

and

with after the l had throu

Some

plent unde

excit

the i

Char

well part

Stab

there

the h adve

trave

ings

Rour

coinc

have know

may

Cona

Taco

Bulle

the i may boys.

"To

Read

eage

pen,

in th

and prese

draw the r

M

In

Me

Mi

In his book "Adventurers All" (Nelson, 2s. 6d.), K. M. Eady writes a story of adventures in the Philippine Islands in war time. There is plenty of excitement in the book, and the local colour is good. The illustrations will help to attract boys to read the book. Among other incidents the fight under Admiral Dewey in Manila Bay is described.

"Aliens Afloat"
(Stock, 6s.) is a story of the sea in which the author tells how the British Magic set sail from London for Sydney manned by a foreign crew, and what befell her in the Southern Ocean.

The story is well told, and there are many exciting moments in store for the reader of this book.

Evelyn Everett-Green, in "After Worcester" (Nelson, 5s.), describes in a fascinating story the exploits of two young cavaliers who had great difficulties in effecting the escape of the young king after the battle of Worcester. Basil Conningsby and Upton Coghill, the two young men in question, together with other Royalists, ultimately succeed in their object, although the greater part of the book describes their failures to arrange a successful flight. They having then accomplished their mission are promptly captured by the Parliamentary soldiers and sent to Newgate. They are eventually liberated by Cromwell, thanks to the efforts of their lady-loves.

Illustration from "King Arthur and His Noble Knights." By courtesy of Wells, Gardner and Co,

* "Stories from Sir Thomas Malory's 'Morte D'Arthur,'" by Mary Macleod; with introduction by John W. Hales, and illustrations from drawings by A. G. Walker, sculptor. (Wells, Gardner, Dalton and Co.)

of various strange infants known as "Goops," and are intended to impress the value of politeness on children. The verses are not so uniformly clever as one might expect, remembering some of Mr. Bur-gess's work in "The Lark" in San Francisco. The following are a few of the lines accompanying the illustration we reproduce:-"The Goops they lick their fingers,
And the Goops they lick their knives;

They spill their broth on the table-cloth,
table lead disgusting

Oh, they lives!"

Mr. Hume Nisbet contributes two books to Christmas literature, both of which are published by Frederick Warne and Co. In "Kings of the Sea" (3s. 6d.) the writer deals with pirates and their adventures. To quote from his preface: "There are Spanish castles, heavy galleons, and gold galore in the sunny climes which I describe, with black-hearted demons and honest British bull-dogs after them." "Hunting for Gold" (3s. 6d.) is a story of the Klondike, and full of excitement. Mr. Nisbet has had the advantage of obtaining much local colour through a friend of his who knows Klondike well. Some interesting facts are to be found in this book and plenty of exciting episodes.

Mr. Edgar Pickering's romance of the great Civil War under the title of "The Dogs of War" (Warne, 6s.), is an exciting and well-told tale. It begins in 1636, and follows the fortunes of the hero until the execution of King Charles. On the second page of the story Oliver Cromwell comes on to the stage and occupies an important part of the pages in the book.

Messrs, Frederick Warne also publish a story by Gordon Stables, "Travels by the Fireside" (3s. 6d.), in which there is much adventure in many lands, although the hero does not leave Scotland. The writer puts the adventures into the mouths of two brothers, who have travelled far and wide, and who fill in the winter evenings with reminiscences. R. Overton's "A Chase Round the World " (3s. 6d.) contains many most marvellous coincidences and considerable movement.

In "Venture and Valour," Messrs. W. and R. Chambers have made a collection of a number of short tales by well-known writers. Among the contributors may be mentioned G. A. Henty, A. Conan Doyle, G. M. Fenn, W. W. Jacobs, Gordon Stables, and F. T. Bullen. Such a list of names ensures the excellence of the volume, and it may safely be recommended to all boys. Messrs. Chambers also publish "Tom's Boy," by the author of "Laddie." Readers of the latter will welcome eagerly another book from the same pen, and they will not be disappointed in the adventures of "Tom's Boy."

Mr. Gelett Burgess in his "Goops and How to be Them" (Methuen, 6s.), presents a series of very curious drawings and verses. These deal with the manners, or rather lack of manners, English children will probably welcome this book with open arms, and will treasure up the "Goops" with the Golliwogs" in their hearts.

Messrs. Warne and Co. are to be congratulated upon having introduced a decided novelty into their children's painting books. This takes the form of a loose palette of cardboard upon which are eight little circles of water-colour paints. These should be sufficient for the colouring of all the pictures in the book. Careful instructions are printed on the back of the palette. This step in advance should make the books very popular, and by next year Messrs. Warne and Co. will probably have devised some means of supplying a paint-brush with the books, as well as paints.

From this firm come also children's picture books entitled "Animals at Home" and the "A.B.C. of Fairy Tales," in both of which books children will find much pleasure. Their price is 1s. each, or on linen 2s.

A pleasant reading book comes from Messrs. Blackie and Son entitled, "Our Darling's First Book," bright pictures and easy lessons for little folk. Many of the illustrations are very clever, and all interesting enough to tempt the most wayward child to read in order to discover their meanings.

In "Snowflakes and Snowdrops" children will find a book of delightful verses by Annie Matheson, charmingly illustrated by F. Carruthers Gould and Winifred Hartley

(R. Brimley Johnston, 4s. 6d. net).
"Father Tuck's Annual" is always a great favourite with those children fortunate enough to possess it. This year's volume is quite equal to the other excellent numbers, and contains many stories and poems. The chief charm,

"Carriage Folk." Reduced Sketch from "Peccallili," by courtesy of Grant Richards.

there

ries to rews "

fe and ly has The active urned

d in dard."

how t his ecame

in an op is rest. ubtful

eal to oard-

"Ad-

(Nelstory

n the nds in ere is ement

d the good.

s will

boys

book.

inci-

under

y in y is loat "

is a

a in uthor

ritish

from dney reign

hat

the

ean.

well store

lson,

two

the,

ster.

oung the ssful

are

and by

however, lies in the black-and-white illustrations, among the contributors being those clever artists H. Cowham and Louis Wain. From the same firm comes "Who Killed Cock Robin?" in their Nursery Series, and "The Story of Moses," told in pictures and pleasant, simple letterpress by Katie Magnus.

A marvellous shillingsworth of pictures and reading is T. Nelson and Son. There are 128 pages in the book and over 80 illustrations.

In Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co.'s children's book, "In Pinafore Land," by Flora Klickmann, there are many excellent illustrations. Some of the line drawings of children by H. Cowham are very clever.

A really useful and beautifully got-up book for children is "Fairies," by Mary Tudor Pole. The book is illustrated by the author with charming sketches of flowers and simple out-of-door objects. Children will love to read this book, and, reading, will gain much useful know-ledge all unconsciously. "Fairies" may be recommended to all as an excellent Christmas, New Year, or birthday gift to children. The publisher is Albert Broadbent, of 19, Oxford Street, Manchester, and the price is 2s. 6d.

We are glad to be able to supplement our notices last month of several children's books by reduced reproductions of illustrations from four of them. These are "Peccallili," by Mrs. Farmiloe, published by Mr. Grant Richards; "Wyemarke and the Mountain Fairies," published by Messrs. Duckworth.

Mrs. L. T. Meade gives a very fascinating story in "Seven Maids" (Chambers, 6s.). The scene is laid in a country rectory in Devonshire, and the daughter of the rector tells the story. The opening chapters describe the advent of four girls to the rectory, by whose tuition the slender finances of the household are to be increased. Two of these girls are Americans, and Marjory, the narrator, takes a violent dislike to them. She, however, by a series of indiscretions, gets completely into their power, and obeys them implicitly whilst hating them cordially. The tale tells how things went from bad to worse, until finally Marjorie runs away. She is found by Julia, one of the Americans, and after confessing all her faults becomes firm friends with her. The illustrations are by Percy Tarrant.

Illustration from "Snowflakes and Snowdrops." By couriesy of Mr. Brimley Yohnston.

Illustration from "Wyemarke and the Mountain Fairies." By courtesy of Messrs. Duckworth and Co.

L. E. Tiddeman, in "Celia's Conquest," relates in simple manner the fortunes of four children whose father disappeared in Africa and left them unprovided for with an English lady. The conquest in question is that of Celia's over herself. From being a self-willed thoughtless girl she becomes the heart and soul of the little family. The way in which the quiet unassuming Miss Helsham manages to control the wayward girl is well told. The illustrations are by G. Wilson, and are hardly as good as usual. (Chambers, 2s. 6d.)

Miss Haverfield writes a bright little tale called "Rhoda" (Nelson, 2s. 6d.). The story treats of the doings of five girls whose father left them almost penniless at his death. Being too proud to accept any help offered them they disappeared to London, where they took a small house. Inci-dentally the three years' hire purchase system comes in for severe handling in the course of the narrative. Rhoda, the eldest sister, falls ill and troubles begin in the household. Everything is straightened out at the end.

The story of the French Revolution is graphically told by Eliza F. Pollard in "My Lady Marcia" (Nelson, 5s.). An English orphan girl, Marcia Oldham, is the heroine. She was living with her aunt, who had married a French nobleman, when the Revolution broke out. The family fled to Paris, only to fare even worse there than in the country. Harold Boughton, an English youth, comes over to France to assist Marcia, and in doing so goes through the Reign of Terror. The scenes in Paris at that time are well described. The story is full of stirring incident.

Mrs. L. T. Meade, in "A Sister of the Red Cross"

Nels her s settin which office Capta and i the p nate sister Mrs. to a remo confe

CH Chris peopl Mess the n to the this ' bette from cards tive t after be co direc Year

MI which page and of P from to n sketo indes posse prete and read of Lo of th

> Eng read man time illust char

T of le sugg tion writt train (Nelson, 3s. 6d.), introduces the siege of Ladysmith into her story. The war itself, however, while supplying the setting, has really little to do with the interest of the tale, which deals with the troubles of various young ladies and officers. Two sisters are in love with the same man, a Captain Keith. The elder is a sister of the Red Cross and is loved by the said Captain Keith and the villain of the piece, Major Strauss. Keith, by a series of unfortunate circumstances, becomes engaged to the younger sister, who naturally enough refuses to give him up. Mrs. Meade works out the tangled skein of love and hate to a successful conclusion, the major being opportunely removed by the aid of a Boer shell, but not until he had confessed his crimes.

Christmas Cards.

CHRISTMAS would not be Christmas if it were not for Christmas cards. However much the world may progress, people never tire of their old friends of the festive season. Messrs. Raphael Tuck, who have done so much to raise the making of Christmas cards to a fine art, are well up to their standard of excellence in their selection of cards this year. They have happily recognised that there are better and more attractive cards than could be obtained from the indiscriminate use of khaki. As it is, there are cards to suit every taste, and many of them are so attractive that it is probable they will be found in homes long after Christmas is past. Messrs. Raphael Tuck are to be congratulated upon the success of their efforts in the direction of providing really artistic Christmas and New Year's cards.

The Life of Paris.

MR. RICHARD WHITEING'S sketches of Parisian life, which for some time past have been appearing in the pages of a monthly magazine, have now been collected and published in book form under the title of "The Life of Paris" (Murray, 6s.). We have quoted from them from time to time as they appeared, and it is unnecessary to notice the neat little volume at any length. The sketches convey a much better impression of that almost indescribable charm of Parisian life which is the peculiar possession of the French capital than many a more pretentious volume. Mr. Whiteing knows his Paris well, and is able to share much of his knowledge with his readers. A companion volume from his pen on the "Life of London" would be a welcome addition to the literature of the great metropolis.

A Cyclist's Note-Book.

A DELIGHTFUL little diary of a year's cycling all over England by Mr. A. W. Rumney. That it is eminently readable goes without saying, but besides that there are many useful hints for would-be tourists, and indeed long-time cyclists could read it with advantage. Some of the illustrations are very pretty and help to complete a very charming little volume. (Johnston.)

The Natural Way of Learning a Languago.

THIS little sixteen-page pamphlet on the natural way of learning a language contains some valuable hints and suggestive ancedotes; for example, the author's difficulties in correcting the wrongly-learned pronunciation of a certain consonant. The pamphlet was probably written as a corollary to that on his system of memory training. (C. L. Pelman, 70, Berners Street, W. 1s.)

BOOKS RECEIVED.

ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.

Coir Stanton (Edited by) Ethical Democracy. Essays on Social Dynamics. cr. 8vo. 361 pp Hecklethorn, C. W. London Memories, social, historical, topographical. cr. 8vo. 374 pp
James, Henry. A Little Tour in France. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. cap 4to. 270 pp(Heinemann) net 10/0 Maryon, Maud. How the Garden Grew. cr 8vo. 255 pp
Maryon, Maud. How the Garden Grew. cr 8vo. 255 pp Nutt, Alfred. Cuchulainn, the Irish Hercules. Paper. 52 pp. (D. Nutt)
net o/6
Roose, Pauline W. The Book of the Future Life. cr. 8vo. 275 pp. (Stock) 6/0
Spofford, Ainsworth Rand. A Book for all Readers. cr. 8vo. 509 pp.
The Rubaivat of Omar Khayyam, translated by Edward Fitzgerald, with a commentary by H. M. Batson, and a biographical introduction by E. D. Ross, cr. 8vo. 283 pp(Methuen) 6/o Wallace, Alfred Russel. Studies, Scientific and Social. 2 vols.
cr. 8vo. 532 pp. and 535 pp. Illustrated(Macmillan) 18/0 Whiteing, Richard, The Life of Paris, cr. 8vo. 261 pp(Murray) 6/0
,

HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL.

more than the contract the cont
Australasia, British Empire Series. Vol. IV. I. post 8vo. 364 pp. (Kegan Paul) 6/0 Cave, Henry W. Golden Tips-a description of Ceylon and its Great Tea Industry. med. 8vo. 474 pp. illus Sampson Low net 16/0 Cramb, J. A. The Origins and Destiny of Imperial Britain. l. cr. 8vo.
315 pp
Froude, J. A. Two Lectures on South Africa. l. cr. 8vo. 124 pp.
(Longmans) net 2/6
Grogan, Ewart S, and A. H. Sharpe. From the Cape to Cairo. Illustrated by A. D. M'Cormick. cr. 4to, 377 pp. (Hurst and Blackett) net 21/0 Hutton, W. Holden. Constantinople, the Story of the Old Capital of the Empire. cr. 8vo. 340 pp Kinahan, J. From the Front, cr. 8vo, 62 pp. (Marshall Bros.) net 1/0 —China. Translated by Richard Davey. cr. 8vo. 299 pp. (Heinemann) Macdonald, Donald. How we kept the Flag flying—the Story of the Siege of Ladysmith. cr. 8vo. 303 pp(Ward, Lock) 6/o
Murray, James. Life in Scotland a Hundred Years Ago. cr. 8vo  (A. Gardner, Paisley) Satchwell, Saddler Sergeant. On Active Service. Paper. 99 pp.
(Camperdown, Victoria) 1/6
Terry, C. Stanford. The Rising of 1745. c.: 8vo. 322 pp(D. Nutt) 3/0
Terry, C. Stamord. The Rising of 1745. C., 8vo. 322 pp(D. Natt.) 3/0-

MISCELLANEOUS.

	*
Arnold-Forster, H. O. The London School Atlas. dy. 4to. 48 maps. (Cassell and Co.)	16.
Bhagaxan Das. The Science of the Emotions, cr. 8vo. 183 pp.	10
	14
(Theosophical Phy. Soc.) net 3,	16
Champtassin, F. P. de. French Lessons in French. l. cr. 8vo. 56 pp.
(Cassell) 2.	10
Downes, R. P. Woman, her Charm and Power. cr. 8vo. 361 pp.
	16 ,0
Horseman, Farmer Hardy. The Wife to Wed. fcap. 8vo. paper. 146 pp.
	10
	16
Leland, Chas. Godfrey. The Adornment of the Home. Paper. 24 pp.
	16
McMellan, Margaret. Early Childhood. cr. 8vo. 211 pp	6
	10 0
Rumney, A. W. A Cyclist's Note Book. cr. 8vo. 321 pp
(W. K. Johnston)
The Swearer's Prayer. Paper. 95 pp(R. T. S.) net of	16
Tolstoy Leo. How I came to believe. Paper, 64 pp
Free Age Press) o	12
Tolstoy, Leo. The Slavery of our Times. Paper, 126 pp	13
	1-
(Free Age Press) 1/	10
Westcott, J. H. Selected Letters of Pliny. cr. 8vo. 285 pp	1
(Putnams) . 6	10

POETRY.

Ashton, Ethel. Wings. cr. 8vo. 168 pp	ul)
Poetry. l. cr. 8vo. 538 pp. (Smith Eld	er) 7/6
Poetry, I. cr. 8vo, 598 pp. Lindsay, Lady, The Prayer of St. Scholastica, and other poetr, 8vo, 166 pp	ns. net 3/6
Pitchford, J. W. Deerleap Dusk. cr. 8vo, 8o p.p
Wynne Charles W Songs and Lyvies or Street Songs and Lyvies	. K)
Wynne, Charles W. Songs and Lyrics. cr. 8vo. 9r pp(Richards)	net 3/6

in ther

with

t of less nily.

am

The

l as lled

of

em

l to ıciem the and is hi-

a "

cia her ien

to

he

th,

in he ed.

s"

BIOGRAPHY.

Bacon, J. M. By Land and Sky. l. cr. 8vo. 275 pp(Isbister) Dunlop, Robert. Dani: l O'Connell and the Revival of National Life	2/6
in Ireland. l. cr. 8vo. 393 pp	5/0
Higgins, Miss H. R. Autobiographical Sketch: "Yet will I Trust Him." cr. 8vo. 95 pp	1/6
323 pp(Dent) net	4/6
Mitchell, P. Chalmers, Thomas Henry Huxley. cr. 8vo. 237 pp (Putnam)	5/0
Robinson, Sir John. A Lifetime in South Africa. 1. cr. 8vo. 418 pp. (Smith Elder)
Scott, W. R. Francis Hutcheson. l. cr. 8vo. 296 pp(Cambridge University Press)
The Life of Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan. Edited by Mir Munshi, Sultan Mahomed Khan. 2 vols. med. 8vo. 2)5 pp and 319 pp. Illustrated	20/0
Whitten, Wilfred. Daniel Defoe. cap 8vo. 117 pp (Kegan Paul)	34/0

FICTION.

Agnes, Orme. Love in our Village. cr. 3vo. 368 pp (Ward, Lock) Astor, W. W. Pharaoh's Daughter and Other Stories. cr. 8vo.	6/0
235 pp (Macmillan)	6/0
Broughton, Rhoda. Foes in Law. cr. 8vo. 358 pp(Macmillan)	6/0
Chatterton, G. G. Straight Shoes, cr. 8vo. 304 pp(J. Long)	6/0
Cleeve, Lucas. Yolande, the Parisienne. cr. 8vo. 314 pp. (J. Long)	6/0
Darrah, Cyril. His Only Son. 160 pp. cr. 8vo
(Hood, Douglas and Howard) net	1/0
Dawson, A. J. The Story of Ronald Kestrel. cr. 8vo. 312 pp
(Heinemann)	6/0
Forbes, Hon. Mrs. W. R. D. A Gentleman, cr. 8vo. 330 pp	-/-
(Murray)	6/0
Hallifax, Sydney. Annals of a Doss House. cr. 8vo. 201 pp	0/0
	- 16
(Geo. Allen)	2/6
Harris, Joel Chandler. On the Wing of Occasions. cr. 8vo. 320 pp.
(J. Murray)	6/0
Hewlett, Maurice. The Life and Adventures of Richard Yea and Nay.
cr. 8vo. 423 pp(Macmillan)	6/0
Ingold, John. Glimpses from Wonderland. cr. 8vo. 287 pp
(J. Long)	6/0
K. K. K. The Living Remnant, and other Quaker Tales. cr. 8vo.
167 pp(Headley Bros.)	3/6
Lloyd, J. H. Stringtown on the Pike. cr. 8vo. 414 pp. (Hodder)	6/0
Tong I Luther The Fox-Woman, cr. 8vo. 208 pp (Macqueen)	6/0
Lubin, David. Let There be Light. cr. 8vo. 525 pp (Putnam) Phillips, Vere. Poor Miss Smith. paper. gr pp (Drane) Pinkerton, T. The Ivory Bride. cr. 8vo. 312 pp (J. Long) Pool, Maria L. Friendship and Folly. cr. 8vo. 302 pp (J. Long)	6/0
Phillips Vere Poor Miss Smith paper or pp (Drane)	1/0
Diskaston T The Lyong Reide or tun are pp. /I Long	6/0
Del Mais I Estadolis and Calle on Sus and I I I I	6/0
Pool, Maria L. Friendship and Folly. Cr. 8vo. 302 pp (J. Long)
Rayner, E. Free to Serve. cr. 8vo. 435 pp (Putnam)	6/0
Silberrad, Una L. The Lady of Dreams. 1. cr. 8vo. 418 pp
(Heinemann)	6/0
Steel, F. Annie. The Hosts of the Lord. cr. 8vo. 344 pp
(Heinemann)	6/0
Stuart, Esmie. The Strength of Straw. cr. 8vo. 368 pp(J. Long)	6/0
Tytler, Sarah. John Keir of Craig Neil. cr. 8vo. 335 pp
(J. Long)	6/0
Tompkins, Elizabeth K. The Things that Count. cr. 8vo. 383 pp.
(Putnam)	6/0
Tolstoy, Leo. Work While Ye have the Light. Paper. 64 pp
(Free Age Press, Maldon, Essex)	0/3
Treherne, P. From Valet to Ambassador. cr. 8vo. 247 pp(Sands)	6/0
Tulie. A Study of a Girl by a Man. cr. 8vo. 240 pp	-, -
(Walter Scott) net	2/6
Winchester, M. E. A Romance of the Unseen. cr. 8vo. 330 pp	-10
(Digby Long)	6/0
	0/0
Zangwill, Israel. The Mantle of Elijah. cr. 8vo. 424 pp.	61-
(Heinemann)	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Acland, A. H. Dyke. Working Men Co-operations, cr. 8vo. 165 pp.
Blackmore, R. D. Dariel. cr. 8vo. 505 pp(Sampson Low)	2/6
Edersheim, Rev. Dr. The Temple. cr. 8vo. 414 pp(R.T.S.)	5/0
Elliott, Mary. The Rose: The Daisy; The Crocus; The Cowslip;
The Old Woman and Her Pig; The Three Wishes. cap. 8vo (Cornish Bros., Birmingham) each	1/0
Holycoke G. I. The Co-operative Movement To-day or 8vo	1/0
Holyoake, G. J. The Co-operative Movement To-day. cr. 8vo.	2/6
Lorris, W. and Clopniel, J. The Romance of the Rose. Vol. II. Temple Classics. cap. 8vo. 258 pp.	- 1
Marsh, R. Curios: Some Strange Adventures of Two Bachelors.
Paper, 128 pp(T. Long)	0/6
Macaulay, Lord. Essays. Temple Classics. cap. 8vo. Vol. III.
372 pp(Dent) net	1/6
O'Moore, MacCarthy. Tips for Travellers. cr. 8vo. 158 pp. (Stock)
Phi. Rho. Chi. Advice to Twentieth Century Business Juniors. With Hints for Seniors. 90 pp(H. Marshall) 0/3 and	1/0
Scott, Rev. T. The Force of Truth. cap. 8vo. 140 pp(R.T.S.)	1/6
The Alleged Haunting of B - House. cr. 8vo. 243 pp(Pearson)	2/0
Vasari, Giorgio. The Lives of the Painters, Sculptors and Architects.	10
Vol. III. Temple Classics, 301 pp. cap. 8vo(Dent) net	1/6

REFERENCE.

Book Prices Current, 1960. Vol. XIV. 1. post 8vo. 731 pp(Stock) Dennert, Dr. E. Plant Life and Structure. cap. 8vo. Illustrated.
tis pp. Dent net	1/0
Hutchinson, H. N. Living Races of Mankind. Parts II. and III.	-,-
Illustrated (Hutchinson) net each Hommel, Dr. Fritz. The Civilisation of the East. cap. 8vo. 14r pp.	0/7
Hommel, Dr. Fritz. The Civilisation of the East. cap. 8vo. 141 pp.
Illustrated(Dent) net	1/0
Neumann, B. Paul. The Boys' Club: A Manual of Suggestions for	1
Workers. l. cr 8vo. 184 pp(D. Nutt	2/6
Rewntree, J. and Arthur Sherwell. State-Prohibition and Local Option. cr. 8vo(Hodder and Stoughton) net
Option. cr. 8vo(Hodder and Stoughton) net	1/0
Swete, H. B. Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek. 1. cr. 8vo.	- 15
592 pp	7/6
of its members. paper. From the Times. 356 pp(Macmillan)	1/0
(Co-operative Union, Manchester
	. )
312 DD(Hodder)	6/0
Whates, A. The Third Salisbury Administration, med. 8vo. 531 pp.
(Vacher) net	15/0

RELIGIOUS.

Adams, Rev. John. The Mosaic Tabernacle. Paper. 112 pp. (T. and T. Clarke)	0/6
Carpenter, W. Boyd, D.D. The Religious Spirit in the Poets. cr. 8vo.	-,
247 pp	5/0
l. post 8vo. 648 pp	7/6
l. post 8vo. 648 pp(Nisbet) Marsh, F. E. The Christian Worker's Equipment. l. cr. 8vo. 330 pp.
(Marshall Bros.)	6/0
Munhall, L. W. Furnishing for Workers, cap 8vo. 103 pp
Webb-Peploe, Rev. Within and Without. cap 8vo. 9r pp

THE RUSSIAN REVIEWS.

Istoritcheskii Vyestnik-St. Petersburg. A. S. Suvorin.	Oct.
Memories of the Crimea in 1855. Count E. E. Kamarovsky. The Quincentenary of Cracow University. G. A. Vorobiof. On the Manchurian Frontier, I.—V. I. P. Yubatchef.
Nov.

Nov.
On the Manchurian Fronties. Continued. I. P. Yubatchef.
Memories of the Turkman Steppe. S. A. Gunaropulo.
Lomzha. G. A. Vorotiof.
The International Women's Congress in Paris. E. A. Tchebishef-Dmitrisf
The Starophriadtsi on the Us. A. S. Sherstohitoff

Russkoe Bagatstvo	).—:	ST. I	PETEI	RSB pt.	URG.	SPASSKAYA 1	HIGKAV.
Proprietorial Peasantry	on	the	Eve	of	the	Emancipation.	111.	19

Psychical Automatism in the "New Art."	L. Scheinis.
The Condent of Delanting of Condent II C	Li. Ochemia.
The Greeks in Palestine and Syria. K. S.
Letters on the Famine. A. V. Panof.
English Imperialism, "Dioneo."

Societies, Secret and Legal, in China. F. Ceroni.

Oct.
Proprietorial Peasantry on the Ignatovitch.	Eve	of the	Emancipation.	Continued.

Notes on Manchuria. A. I. Types of Capitalist and Agrarian Evolution. Concluded. V. M. Tchernof.

Mir Bozhl.—St. Petersburg. Ligovka, 25. Oct.
The Moral System of Utilitarianism. Prof. Tchelpanof.
The Paris International Congress on Labour Legislation. I. M. H.
Goldstein.

Goldstein,
George Sand and Her Time, Continued, Ev. Degen, Anthropological Sketches, Prof. A. F. Brandt,
China and the Chinese, Continued, T. Bogdanovitch, Transformism and Darwinism. Continued. Ernst Haeckel, Nov.

The Modern Industrial Crisis. M. Tugan-Baranovsky.
The Moral System of Utilitarianism. Continuad. Prof. Tchelpanof.
Anthropological Sketches. Continuad. Prof. A. F. Brandt.
China and the Chinese. Concluded. T. Bogdanovitch.
F. Lassalle. Peter Struve.
Transformism and Darwinism. Continued. Ernst Haeckel.

Russki Vyestnik.-Moscow. Malaya Dmitrofka, 23. Oct. The Ancient Normans. II.—Prehistoric Ships. E. L. Markof. Fiscal Reform and Popular Agriculture, V. P. Kh. Schwaneboch. Giacomo Leopardi. V. F. Savodnik.

Fiscal Reform and Popular Agriculture, VI. P. Kh. Schwaneboch.
Count A. K. Tolstoy and his Poetry. Prince D. N. Tsertelof.
The Ancient Normans. III.—The Home of the Vikings. E. L. Markof.
Naturalism and Faith. A. M.
Moscow Sanitation for Fifteen Years. Concluded. A. G. Petrovsky.

Emile

Archi Architec

Illu " To bi purpose display A New trat

Frontisp Adolf H " Adolf

Albi Ca

penetrate, Tempera Of 'Kerc The Rub " The te (4) Spinel,

The Pari Lambeth

Art Henri M: "nic Br

Vells-The Art S

A. G. Ra

Rembrand Musc Foste Play-

An Interv Illusti

Victor Hu

The House Old Chelse Brac. Louis Seize

Aston Hall Ruskin, Ar

ART IN THE MAGAZINES. TELL

Architectural Record. -Oct.

1/0

0/7

1/0

2/6

1/0

7/6

1/0

6/0

15/0

0/6

7/6

6/0

ct.

i-f

17/ 1

Ī.

rnof.

H.

of.

Emile Wauters as a Painter of Architecture. Illustrated. G. Sérae.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel Street, Strand. 18. Nov.

Architecture on the Stage; "Julius Cæsar" at Her Majesty's. Illustrated. J. A. Marshall.

"To bring his work into unison with that of the poet should be the main purpose of the scenic artist: and this will hardly be done by a learned display of multitudinous detail, but rather by an effect of refined simplicity."

A New Scheme of Arrangement for Sculpture Galleries. Illustrated. Balkeley Creswell.

Albi Cathedral, Illustrated, H. C. Corlette.

Art Journal.-H. VIRTUE. IS. 6d. Dec.

Frontispiece: "The Pest in Rome," after Adolf Hirémy-Hirschl. Adolf Hirémy-Hirschl. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern.

"Adolf Hirémy-Hirschl is one of the ablest artists modern Austria can show. There is no artistic department into which he has not tried to penetrate, for his interests are wide and eclectic, as is also his culture."

Tempera Painting. Illustrated. Ugolin Allan. Of 'Kerchiefs. Illustrated. Mrs. Bruce Clarke.

The Ruby. Illustrated, G. W. Thornley.

"The term 'ruby' is commonly applied to six different variaties, classified as follows according to their value: (r) Burmah, (2) Siam, (3) Ceylon, (4) Spinel, (5) Balas, (6) Cape."

The Paris Exhibition. Illustrated.

Lambeth Palace. Illustrated, Francis Watt,

Artist .- 9, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET. IS. Nov.

Henri Martin. Illustrated. B. K.

"hic Industry at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated, W. Fred. Bridgen, Illustrated, L. J.

Armand va Waesberghe. Illustrated.

vells-Champney. Illustrated. S. C. de Soissons,

Bookman .- AMERICA. Nov.

The Art Students' League of New York. Mary Twombly.

Canadian Magazine.-Nov.

A. G. Racey, Cartoonist. Illustrated. F. C. Smith.

Cassell's Magazine,-Dec.

Rembrandt-Photogravures:— "Ordered South," after S.
Muschamp; "A Garden of Lyonesse," after Gilbert
Foster; "Worsted," after Charles M. Padday; "Our Play-Room," after Henriette Ronner.

Girl's Realm.-Dec.

An Interview with Miss Maud Earl; a Famous Dog Artist. Illustrated. W. Pain.

Harper's Monthly Magazine. - Dec.

Victor Hugo as an Artist. Illustrated. Benjamin Constant.

House.-H. VIRTUE. 6d. Nov.

The House at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. Old Chelsea and Old Worcester China. Illustrated. Bric-à-

Louis Seize Furniture. Illustrated. Connoisseur.

Aston Hall. Illustrated. Connoisseur.

International Monthly.-Nov.

Ruskin, Art, and Truth. J. La Farge.

Magazine of Art.-Cassell. 18. 4d. Dec.

The Harris Library and Museum, Preston. Illustrated. W. B. Barton.

"In the year 1877, Mr. Robert Edmund Harris, of Preston, bequeathed a large fortune to the town in which he had lived and died. Amongst the benefactions derived from this bequest is the Harris Free Public Library

The Vicissitudes of the Lothair Crystal. Illustrated. W. H. J. Weale.

Gems of the Wallace Collection. Continued. Illustrated. M. H. Spielmann.

Chinese Architecture. Illustrated. Rev. W. Hopkyn Rees. The Grand Prix for Painting at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. H. Frantz.

Edouard Lantéri, Sculptor. Illustrated. A. L. Baldry.

The Vaughan Bequest. Illustrated.

Recent Acquisitions in the Print Room, British Museum.

Recent Acquisitions in the Thin Island, Illustrated, W. Roberts, Supplements:—"An- Idyll of Spring," after Alfred East;
"The Pearl of Great Price," after Sir J. E. Millais; and "The Duet," after E. Lantéri,

Monthly Review.-Dec:

Giotto, Illustrated, Roger E. Fry.

North American Review.-Nov.

A Glance at the Wallace Collection. J. J. Benjamin Constant.

Northern Counties Magazine .- Dec.

Mediæval French Art at the Paris Exhibition, R. E. Fry.

Poster .- I, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND. 6d. Oct.

H. G. Ibels. Illustrated. H. R. Woestyn. Parliamentary Election Posters. Illustrated.

Herbert Walmsley's Theatrical Posters. Illustrated. J. Francis.

"Cribbing." Illustrated.

F. A. Nankivell. Illustrated. S. C.

Quiver.-Dec.

Rembrandt-Photogravures :- "The Christmas Dole," after J. Clarke; "Home at Last," after G. G. Kilburne. Some Pictures of Home Life by English Artists. Illustrated. A. Fish.

Scottish Review .- Oct.

Quentin Metsys. Ina Mary White.

Strand Magazine,-Dec.

The Most Beautiful Women in Painting. Illustrated, F. Dolman.

"Scriously," says Sir L. Alma Tadema, "the trouble in respect to your question is that there is a fashion in beauty, as in most other things. The beauty of one age is not that of another. I suppose that few of us to-day would admire Agnes Sorel, although there is ample testimony to show that she was considered a most beautiful woman by her contemporaries. Even the beauty of the last century, of which Reynolds, Gainsborough, and other English painters have left so many examples, is not altogether pleasing to the present generation."

Sunday Strand .- Dec.

Bertel Thorwaldsen. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.

"The Thorwaldsen Museum in Copenhagen is a unique tribute to the genius of one man, and worthy of the fame of the greatest sculptor of modern times. The frescoes on the outside of the building illustrate the chif events of his career, the spacious halls and galleries of the interior contain the entire collection of his marbles, some hundreds of statues and groups in all, and the rooms above enshrine the relics of his home. Thorwaldsen was in his sixty-eighth year when he saw his sacred marbles placed in the Frue Ki'ke. The remainder of his life was passed in his native city directing the erection of the Museum which his countrymen built for the collection of his works. He wore his laurels with the humility of true greatness. His last work was a bust of Luther, and a cast of the unfinished model is in the Museum, the actual impress of the master's hand being visible upon the clay which he was moulding."

Windsor Magazine. - Dec.

S. E. Waller and His Art. Illustrated. G. F. Maynard.

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Ainslee's Magazine,-International News Co. 10 cents. Nov. Allistee S magazine.—INTENATIONAL NEWS CO. 10 cents. Nov. Yankee Millionaires in South America. Illustrated. D. White. Chinese Parties and Their Leaders. Illustrated. I. T. Headland. The Battle of the Cities. Illustrated. A. I. Street. Russia's March to the East. Illustrated. Anna N. Benjamin Mr. Gerry and His Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Illustrated. J. H. Adams.

American Journal of Psychology.-Kegan Paul, 1 dol. 50 cents.

Creeping and Walking. A. W. Trettien.

Discrimination of Clangs for Different Intervals of Time. F. Angell.

The Apperception of the Spoken Sentence. W. C. Bagley.

American Journal of Sociology .- LUZAC. 35 cents. Nov. The Saloon in Chicago. R. L. Melendy.
The Moral and Social Tasks of World Politics ("Imperialism"). Dr. P. A. W. Small.

The Moral and Social Lasks of World Politics (*), M. Maurenbrecher. Prison Laboratories. C. R. Henderson. The Scope of Sociology. Continued. A. W. Small. Social Control. Continued. E. A. Ross. The Courts and Factory Legislation. G. W. Alger. The City Council of Berlin. E. J. James. Anglo-American Magazine.—60, WALL STREET, New YORK. 25 cents. Nov.

The True Motif of Russo-American Diplomacy.

Hawaii First. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. E. S. Goodhue.

The Elections in England. D. E. F.
The Evolution of Political Ideas. A. E. Davies.

How Certain Hebrews wandered to Britain. Rev. M. W. Spencer.

Notes of a Canadian Abroad. David Glass.

Quivera; the History and Legends of an Ancient American Kingdom.

Continued. E. E. Blackman.

Antiquary .- Elliot Stock. 6d. Dec. Neolithic Man; His Ideas and Their Evidences. Rev. H. J. D. Astley. The Manor-Lords of Hurstmonceaux. Illustrated. S. Beach Chester. Diary of Journeys in England and between Ireland and England, 1761-1762. George Bowles.

The Burh at Leicester. Illustrated. I. Chalkley Gould. Prisoners of War in England a Century Ago. Rev. G. N. Godwin. Hut-Circles at Auchingaich Glen, Dumbartonshire. D. MacRitchie.

Architec ural Record.-14, Vesey Street, New York. 25 cents. Oct.

An Idyll of the Renaissance, Illustrated, Marie D. Walsh.
The Palace of Fontainebleau. Illustrated, Russell Sturgis.
Modern French Architecture. Illustrated, A. D. F. Hamlin.
American Architecture as opposed to Architecture in America. Illustrated.

Ernest Flagg.
The Tiffany House; Illustrations.
The Residence of O. G. Jennings; Illustrations,

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street. STRAND. 18. Nov.

Architecture in South Africa. Concluded. A. H. Reid. St. Magnus, Kirkwall. Illustrated. A. S. Dixon. The Forum To-day. Illustrated. Maud Brettingham.

Arena. - GAY AND BIRD. 25 cents. Nov. The Negro Vindicated. George Allen Mebane.
Passing of the Race Problem in the United States. Walter L. Hawley, Lawlessness verya Lawlessness among the Negroes. Dr. W. S. Scarborough.
A Plea from the South. Walter Guild.
Direct Legislation in America. Dr. Ellis P. Oberholtzer.
Prosperity Probed. Hiram Maine.
Transportation of the World's Wheat Crop. George Ethelbert Walsh.
On the Genesis, Aim, and Scope of the World's Unity League: Interview.
Elizabeth M. B. Harbert.

Argosy .- George Allen. 18, Dec. Letters from the North. Illustrated. Continued. Charles W. Wood. Assisi. Ella MacMahon. Versailles. Rosamond Chaplin.

Atlantic Monthly .- GAY AND BIRD. 18. Nov. Atlantic Monthly.—GAV AND BIRD. 18.

A Defence of American Parties. William Garrott Brown.
The Future of Russia. Edmund Noble.
Edward FitzGerald. Bradford Torrey.
The Struggle for Water in the West. William E. Smythe.
The Gentle Reader. Samuel McChord Crothers.
A Letter to John Stuart Mill. Winthrop More Daniels, Ill-Gotten Gifts to Colleges. Vida D. Scudder.
An Astronomer's Friendship. Prof. Simon Newcomb.
Reading for Boys and Girls, Everett T. Tomlinson.
Sir Robert Hart. H. C. Whittlessy.

Badminton Magazine,-Heinemann is. Dec. Advice on Fox-Hunting. Illustrated. Lord Willoughby de Broke.
Stray Sport on Active Service in South Africa. Illustrated. Capt. J. P. Law.
The Duke of Buckingham's Hunt and Its Successors. Illustrated.
Katharine Duncombe.
More about the Cr.cket Problem. Hon. and Rev. E. Lyttleton.
Egyptian Memories. Illustrated. C. Hill Wilson.
Capercalizis-Shooting in the Austrian Alps. Illustrated. Count D. Thurn.

Bankers' Magazine.-WATERLOW, 18. 6d. Dec.

Banking at the Close of the Nineteenth Century.
Banking Superannuation and Pension Funds.
The Position and Prospects of Home Railway Stocks as Investments.

Blackwood's Magazine, -BLACKWOOD. 28, 6d. Dec. Army Reorganisation.

Army Reorganisation.
With Plumer to Relief of Mafeking. By a Trooper.
At a Chinese Dinner-Party.
Christmas under Arms. Capt. N. Malcolm.
Mary Queen of Scots and the Casket Letters. Andrew Lang.
Helen Faucit (Lady Martin).
Musings without Method. Continued.
The Passing of a Nation. By "Linesman."
The Foreign Office.

Bookman,-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. Nov.

J. M. Barrie, Illustrated. William Wallace.
"Tommy and Grize!," Illustrated. A. E. W. Mason.
Archbishop Alexander. Illustrated. Bishop Chadwick.

Bookman.—(AMERICA.) DODD, MEAD AND CO., NEW YORK. 25 cents.
Nov.
The Future Literary Centre of the English Language. B. Matthews.
Bostonisms in American Educated Speech. S. D. McCormick.
Contrasts and Parallels in American Politics, 1800-1900. W. A. Dunning.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING Co., TORONTO. Canadian magazine, — ONTARIO FUBLISHING CO., TORONTO.
25 cents. Nov.
A Visit to a "Round-Up." Illustrated. John Innes.
The Story of Eight General Elections in Canada. A. H. U ColquhounCanadian Libraries. James Bain, Jr.
Chinese Carriers. Illustrated. H. C. Smart.
Wild-Fowl of Ontario. Illustrated. Continued. C. W. Nash.
On a Moose-Run. W. R. Wadsworth.
Government Ownersh:p of Railways. Continued. R. L. Richardson.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. Dec. In the Days of Coaching. Illustrated. W. Dexter, Concerning Cycle Saddles. Illustrated. Haydon Perry.

Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. is. Dec. Christmas in Old London. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.
The Prince of Wales's Horses. Illustrated. E. H. Cooper,
Ice-Boats and Ice-Boating. Illustrated. B. Wilson, Christmas at the Front. Illustrated.
Legislators and Their Garments; the Inky Clo.k. Iillustrated. T. P.

O'Connor.
Old Drury. Illustrated. M. C. Salaman. Cassier's Magazine. -33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. Nov.

A Russian Petroleum Pipe Line, carrying Oil from Baku to Batoum.
Illustrated. Ernest H. Foster.
Smoke Abatement. Illustrated. Wm. H. Bryan.
Electricity in the Printing Office. Illustrated. W. H. Tapley.
Continental Steam Engine Practice. Illustrated. W. D. Wansbrough, Richard Treyithick; the Pioneer of Higa-Pressure Steam. With Portrait.

Arthur Titley.

Charges for Electric Energy. Alton D. Adams.

French and German Machine Tools at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Joseph Horner.

Century Magazine. - MACMILLAN. 18. 4d. Dec. Century magazine,—MACMILLAN. 18.
Down the Rhine. Illustrated. A. Birrell.
East London Types. Illustrated. Sir Walter Besant.
What More than Wages? Illustrated. W. H. Tolman Paths of Hope for the Negro. J. Dowd.
With the Peking Relief Column. F. Palmer.
The Struggle on the Peking Wall. W. N. Pethick. W. H. Tolman.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER ROW. IS. Dec. Fine Feathers, W. C. Mackenzie, Botany Bay. W. H. S. Aubrey. Botany Bay. W. H. S. Aubrey.
Far-Seeing.
Some Books in My Library. C. E. S. Chambers.
Witty Retorts of Politicians. E. J. Moyla.
About Some of Our Latest Contributors.
The Queen in Her Counting, House. Henry W. Lucy.
Leart-Burials in Our Ancient Churches. Sarah Wilson.

Chau

Ship-Car G. I The Riv From A Day Montaig

Church Irene Pe Bishop F How to C

> Chinese i Russia's Max Mü The Exp Mr. John The Cruc The Soci Missiona A Philoso The Outl Genesis a

> Dr. Cona Of Some Legat

Charlotte
Coloni il S
The Road
Bampfyld
Brice C Thebes; I Successful The Galve Fishing w Early Infl What Con A Woman A Problem

Cri Milton : a Slavonic S The Diction James Mai Crit H stings's

Hutchison Dia Charles Du Tendencies C. L.

Friedrich ! E

Education An Ethnic The Privat Private Sch Newer Ide Training T Educ

Education : E The Loadi Snowd

Electric Tr Piece-Work The Applie Centralisati Oldhan Commercial The Genera Locomotive C. Rous

Electric Str Observation The Engine Chautauquan.—Chautauqua Press, Cleveland, Ohio. 20 cents.

Pioneer Women of Quebec. Illustrated. Mary Sifton Pepper.
Ship-Carrying Trade under American and Foreign Flags. Illustrated,
G. B. Waldron.
The Rivalry of Nations. Illustrated. Continued, E. A. Start.
From Alexandria to the First Cataract of the Nile. Illustrated. F. M.
Davenport.
Worksings of Frag. Weight in 188

Montaigne and Essay-Writing in France. F. M. Warren.

Church Missionary Intelligencer.—Church Missionary Society. 6d. Dec.

Irene Petrie and Kashmir. E. S. Bishop Peel in East Africa. How to promote Increased Interest in Foreign Missions. Rev. J. S. Pratt. Contemporary Review.-Columbus Co. 28. 6d. Dec.

Contemporary Review,—Columbus Co. 2s. 6d. D. Chinese Foreign Policy. John Ross.
Russia's Foreign Policy. A Russian Publicist.
Max Müller. Andrew Lang.
The Exploration of Crete. D. G. Hogarth.
Count Tolstoy; the Philosophy of a Saint. H. W. Massingham.
Mr. John Morley's "Cromwell." Samuel Gardiner.
The Crucifixion and the War in the Creation. W. W. Peyton.
The Social Future of England. William Clarke.
Missionaries and Governments. Louise C. Brown.
A Philosophy of Sport. H. Graves.
The Outlook in Austria; a Dream. S. Schidrowitz.
Genesis and Outlook of Religion. Goldwin Smith.

Cornhill Magazine. - SMITH, ELDER. 18. Dec. COTAILII Magazine.—SMITH, ELDER. 18. Dec.

Dr. Conan Doyle and the British Army. Lieut.-Col. F. N. Maude.

Of Some of the Causes Which lad to the Preservation of the Foreign Legations in Paking. Rev. Roland Allen.

Charlotte Brontë. George M. Smith.

Coloni Il Savants. Lady Brooms.

The Road to Knowledge a Hundred Years Ago. S. G. Tallentyre.

Bampfylde Moore Carew; an Amazing Vagabond. Arthur Montefore

Cosmopolitan.—Infernational News Co. 6d. Nov.
Thebes; Her Ruins and He: Memories. Illustrated. Dulany Hunter.
Successful Personalities sketched from Real Life. John Holms.
The Galveston Trag dy. Illustrated. John Fay.
Fishing with a Camera. Illustrated. John Fay.
Fishing with a Camera. Illustrated. Dr. R. W. Shufeldt.
Early Influences. Max O'Rell.
What Communities lose by the Competitive System. Jack London.
A Woman's Experience at Cape Nomer. Illustrated. Eleanor B. Caldwell.
A Problem in Army Transportation. Illustrated. Capt. A. W. Butt.
The Little Inns of France and England. Illustrated. E. C. Peixotto.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK. 20 Cents. Nov. Milton; a Critical Study. W. Raleigh.
Slavonic Silhouettes. With Portraits, Christian Brinton,
The Dictionary of National Biography. H. Ellis.
James Martinsau. J. W. Chadwick.

Critical Review.—WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 18. 6d. Nov. H. stings's "Dictionary of the Bible." Prof. W. H. Bennett. Hutchison Stirling's "What is Thought?" E. H. Blakeney.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. Nov. 1. Charles Dudley Warner, Tendencies of American Literature in the Closing Quarter of the Century. C. L. Moore. Nov. 16.

Friedrich Max Müller.

Educational Review .- J. M. DENT. 18. 8d. Nov. Educational Review.—J. M. DENT. 18, 8d. Nov. Education as World-Building, T. Davidson.
An Ethnic View of Higher Education. I. W. Howerth.
The Private Secondary School for Girls. Louise S. B. Saunders.
Private Schools for Boys. L. C. Hull.
Newer Ideas in Agricultural Education. L. H. Bailey.
Training Teachers in France, Lucy L. Salmon.
German Higher Schools. E. E. Brown.

Educational Times .- 3), FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. Dec. Education at the Paris Exhibition. Rev. J. O. Bevan.

Enginesting Magazine.—222, Strand. is. Nov. The Loading and Transport of Sea-Borne Coal. Illustrated. F. S. Snowdon. Electric Tramway Development in Italy. Illustrated. E. B'gnami. Piece-Work as an Agency in Machine-Shop Cost Reduction. M. Cokely. The Application of Water-Tube Boilers to Naval Service. Illustrated. B. H. Thwait: Centralisation of the Steam Condensing Plant. Illustrated. H. G. V. Oldham.

Onnam.
Commercial Organisation of the Machine Shop. H. Diemer.
The General Principles of Successful Mine Management. A. G. Charleton.
Locomotive Practice as displayed at the Paris Exposition.
Illustrated.
C. Rous Marten.

Engineering Times .- P. S. King. 6d. Nov. Electric Street Traction in England. With Diagram. J. C. Robinson. Observations on an Improved Glass Revealer. Illustrated. B. Donkin. The Engineer; the Master Spirit of the Age. C. Baillairge. The State of the Automobile Industry in Europe. Pumps: Their Construction and Management. Illustraced. Philip R. Björling. The Paris Exhibition. Machine-Driving by Separate Motors.

English Illustrated Magazine,-198, STRAND. 18. Dec. London's Horses. Illustrated. W. A. G.
Famous Christmas-Bozes; Eminent Men Whose Birthdays fall at Yule-Tide.
Illustrated. G. A. Wade.
Something about Dolls. Illustrated.
A Morning in Damascus. Illustrated.
What the Blind see. Illustrated.
Literary Forgers. Illustrated. E. Almack.
Nineteenth Century Duels. Illustrated. R. Machray.
Oscar II., King of Sweden and Norway. Illustrated. Miss Mary S.
Warren.

Etude, -T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA, 15 cents. Nov. Over-Training, Robert Braine. The Singer, Wm. Armstrong.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 15. Nov. Some Recent Editions of the Acts of the Apostles. Prof. W. M. Ramsay. The Calendar of the Synagogue. Prof. D. S. Margoliouth. The Terrors of the Sun and of the Moon. Canon Winterbotham. The Corinthian Philosophers; Animal Sacrifices; and Officials in the Corinthian Church, Prof. W. M. Ramsay. The Peril and the Comfort of Exposure. Rev. J. Moffatt. Two Important Glosses in the Codex Bezae. Prof. J. Rendel Harris.

Expository Times, -SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 6d. Dec. What have We gained in the Sinaitic Palimpsest? Mrs. Lewis

Feilden's Magazine.—Temple Chambers. is. Nov.

Mining in China. Illustrated. Alfred Edmonds, Mount Morgan, Queensland; the Greatest Gold Mine in the World.
Illustrated. H. F. Bulman.
The Modern Practice of Cyaniding. Illustrated. Capt. C. C. Longridge.
Gold-Mining Machinery. Illustrated. P. R. Björling.
The Past, Present, and Future of Electricity in Mining. Illustrated. S.
F. Walker.
The Westvalian Goldfolds.

F. Walker.
The Westralian Goldfields. Illustrated. Special Commissioner.
Economics of Coal-Mining. Illustrated. L. W. de Grave.
The Mines of the Transvaal. Illustrated. G. E. Russell.

Fireside. -7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. Dec. Holly and Ivy.
Time. Illustrated. John Timbs.
A Winter Day with Southey. G. L. Apperson.

Fortnightly Review .- CHAPMAN AND HALL. 28. 6d. Nov. Fortnightly Review.—CHAPMAN AND HALL. 2s. 6d. Nov. A Cabinet of Commonplace. Calchas, The Cyclist Soldier. H. G. Wells. The Future of the Liberal Party. Lord Rossbery's Chance. J. A. R. Marriott. The German Emperor. Ludwig Klausner-Dawoc. Society's Duty to the Tramp. William Harbutt Dawson. The Housing Question and the L.C.C. Charles Sheridan Jones. The Scottish University Crisis. William Wallace. Maeterlinck's "Bluebeard and Aryan." Count S. C. de Soissons. A Pl.a for Peace; an Anglo-Russian Alliance. Capt. J. W. Gambier. Imperial Federation; the Condition of Progress. Edward Salmon. From an Eighteenth-Century Escritoire. Ethel M. M. McKenna. The Autumn's Books. Stephen Gwynn.
The Sportsman's Library—Some Books of 1900. F. G. Affalo. "The Wedding Guest"; Drama. J. M. Barrie.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. Nov.

Why the Republicans should be endorsed. Charles Dick.
Reasons for Democratic Success. C. A. Towne.
Can There be a Good Trust? G. E. Roberts.
The Next Pan-American Conference. W. C. Fox.
Bread and Bread-Making at the Paris Exposition. H. W. Wiley.
Mounted Soldiers; Four Legs instead of Two. Maurice A. Low.
The United States and the Australasian Federation compared. Sir Robert Stont.

The United States and the Australasian Federation comparation of the Stout.

The Revival and Reaction in Iron. Archer Brown.

The English Intelligence Department. Major A. Griffiths.

The Taming of the Dragon (China). L. J. Davies.

Yesterday and To-day in Morocco. B. Meakin.

Chaucer. F. Greenslet.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly,—14t, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. 10 cents. Nov.

Election Day in the United States. Illustrated. L. J. Lang. On Strike! Illustrated. Earl W. Mayo. Hunting the Cave-Bird of Trinidad. Illustrated. W. T. Hornaday. By the Pagodas of China. Illustrated. R. E. Speer. The Immigrants. Illustrated. B. J. Hendrick.

Genealogical Magazine. - ELLIOT STOCK. 18. Dec. The Stoneleigh Peerage Case. Concluded. George Morley.
The Extinct Earldom of Carnarvon.
Aitken of Thornton. Continued. Marquis de Ruvigny and Raineval.

stments.

P. Law. strated.

Thurn.

25 cents. ıs.

nning-TO. houn_

on.

. T. P.

Nov. Batoum.

ugh. Portrait. ustrated.

ec.

Gentleman's Magazine. - CHATTO AND WINDUS. 18. Dec. Dialects. R. H. Bretherton.

Duncombe and Maynard Colchester; a Brace of Worthies. S. M. Crawley-Boevey.

West Pyrnean Funerals. A. R. Whiteway.
The Creeds of Tzarland. E. W. Lowry.
Snuff and Snuff-Takers. Emily Hill.
Weather "Causerie." W. All.ngham.

Geographical Journal.—Edward Stanford. 25. Nov. Journeys in Central Asia. With Map and Illustrations. Capt. H. H. P. Deasy.

An Orographic Map of Afghanistan and Baluchistan. With Map. Col. Sir T. H. Holdich.
A Journey through South-West Sechuen. With Map. E. Amundsen.
The Emerald Mines of Northern Ethai. With Maps and Illustrations.

D. A. MacAlister.

Geological Magazine, -Dulau. 18. 6d. Nov. Restoration of Stylonurus Lacoanus; a Giant Arthropod from the Upper Devonian, United States. Illustrated. Prof. E. E. Beecher. On Hyperodap.don Gordoni. Illustrated. Prof. R. Burchardt. A Summary of Our Present Knowledge of Extinct Primates from Madagascar, C. I. Forsyth Major.

Pleistocene Shells from the R. is. d Beach Deposits of the Red Sea. R.

Bullen Newton.

Girl's Own Paper. -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. The Queen's Horses and Donkeys, Illustrated. E. M. Jessop. Eccentric Flowers, Illustrated. Mrs. Eliza Brightwen.

Girl's Realm .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 18. Dec. GIP'S Réalm.—to, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 18. Dec.
Song-Writers Dear to Girls. Illustrated. Edith Young.
The Grey Coat Hospital. Illustrated. Chistina Gowans Whyte.
Medicine as a Career for Girls. Illustrated. Margaret Traill Christie.
St. Clara. Illustrated. Rev. S. Baring-Gould.
Puck, Pogg, and Pixit Pots; Interview with Miss Vulliamy. Illustrated.
Miss E. M. Symonds.
The Pageant of the Day in Picture Postcards, Illustrated. Margaret Meadows.

A Visit to Toyland at Christmas. Illustrated.

Good Words,-ISBISTER. 6d. Dec.

Good Words,—Isbister. 6d. Dec.

Reform in China. Prof. R. K. Douglas.

The Gypsies of Turky. Illustrated. Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett, Fruit-Growing at the Cape. A Colonist.
Monumental Time-Keepers. Illustrated. Rev. J. M. Bacon.

"Agony" Advertisements. G. Stanley Ellis.
Ship Salvage. Illustrated. F. J. Rose.
Rochester Cathedral. Illustrated. Canon Benham.

"Beer Soup"; the Story of an English Defeat. Major C. Fi.ld.

Great Thoughts,-28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. Dec. Alexander Smith. With Portrait. Rev. R. P. Downes, French and English: Interview with Miss Betham Edwards. With Portrait. Raymond Blathwayt. The British Working Man; a Talk with Mr. John Burns. With Portrait.

Raymond Blathwayt.

Raymond Blathwayt.

Harmsworth Magazine.—Harmsworth. 6d. Nov.

Liverpool's Hot-Pots. Illustrated. A. Birnage.
Famous Dressing-Rooms of Actors. Illustrated. R. de Cordova.
Some Favourite Haunts of Her Majesty. Illustrated. Lillian Tindall.
Railway-Carriages as Houses at Shoreham. Illustrated. H. L. Adam.
Sentiment to Order. Illustrated. P. Reynolds.
First Lines of Famous Books. Illustrated. W. Maclaren.
The Deutschland. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
London's Polar Regions. Illustrated. H. Paget.
How the Post Office New 1174 Miles Cable was laid from London to Birmingham. Illustrated. Alco Cochran.
A Christmas Dinner Farm. Illustrated. W. J. Win Je.
Gathe: ing the Timber Harvest. Illustrated. W. S. Harwood.
Salt Land. Illustrated. Mabel H. Robins.

Harper's Monthly Magazine. -45, Albemarle Street. 18.

Parents, Illustrated. E. S. Martin. Love Letters, Continued, Victor Hugo. Bernhardt and Coquelin. Illustrated. H. Fouquier. The Discovery of Ophir, Illustrated. Dr. Carl Peters.

Home Magazine.-NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK. 10 cents. Nov. Toying with Death at Sandy Hook. Illustrated. C. M. M'Govern, In the Woods with a Camera. Illustrated. E. H. Baynes. The Real Richard Croker. With Portri it. W. M. Clemens. The Mechanism of the Hurricane. With Charts. J. Montague.

Homiletic Review.—44, FLEET STREET. 18. 3d. Nov.
The Croydon Young Folks' Church Conference. Bishop J. H. Vincent.
The Christian Instinct. E. F. Burr.
The Keswick Feaching in Its Bearing on Effective Preaching, Dr. A. T. Pierson.
The Scant Service of Negative Criticism. Dr. J. K. Wilson.
The Church for the Times. Dr. E. H. Dewart.

Humanitarian-Duckworth. 6d. Dec. Professor Röntgen and the X Rays.

A Friend of England in France: Interview with Yves Guyot Savages and Criminals. Prof. Ferrero. Tolstoy's "Resurrection." Count de Soissons. Cheap Lodging Houses for Women. Andrew Merry. Are more Boys than Girls born? William E. A. Axon. The Life of a Hospital Nurse. Elizabeth French. The Growth of Phonography.

Ideal Review. -GAY AND BIRD. 18. 3d. Nov. The Teaching of Re-birth in India. Charles Johnston.
Vedant; the Final Goal of Knowledge. Kannoo Mal.
The Philosophy of Trust Legislation. H. N. Bullard.
The Scripture Habit. Rev. C. Ferguson.
Literature a Mystery and a Revelation. C. H. A. Bjerregaard.

Imperial and Colonial Magazine.—HURST AND BLACKETT. 19.

Efficiency and Empire. A. White,
The Century in Our Colonies. Sir C. W. Dilke,
The People of India. Sir G. C. M. Birdwood.
British South Africa; an Historical Survey, Illustrated. Prof. A. H Keane. The Earl of Hopetoun.

Keane.
The Earl of Hopetoun. With Portraits. Sir Andrew Clark:,
The Federal Family. Sir John A. Cockburn.
St. Helena; Our State Prison. Illustrated. Sir H. Vincent,
Military and Naval Administration; Corrigenda. A. M.
The Colonisation of Australia. E. A. Petherick.

Indian Review .- G. A. NATESAN, MADRAS. 108. per ann. Oct. The Date of the Maha' Cha' ratha War. Prof. M. Rangacharyar. Missionary Methods. A. P. Smith.
The Distress in India. Educated Ryot. Archaeology in Southern India. S. M. Natesa Sastri. India in English Poetry. R. S. Dadachanji.

International Magazine. -A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents.

From Mobile to New Orleans. Illustrated. Ellye Howell Glover. The Chinese Situation Forty Years Ago. F. W. Fitzpatrick. Raising Ostriches in Florida. Illustrated. D. A. Willey.

International Monthly .- MACMILLAN. 15. Nov. International Monthly.—MAGMILLAN. 1s. Nov.
Primitive Objects of Worship. Concluded. L. Marillier.
"Europe is no more." M. Debrit.
The Predominant Issue in the United States. W. G. Sumner.
The Pacific Coast; a Psychological Study of Influence. J. Royce.
Modern Sociology. F. H. Giddings.
Li Hung Chang; the Great Chiness Viceroy and Diplomat. J. W. Foster.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIN. 18.

The Kindergarten and the Catechism. Rev. F. Canon Ryan. Cardinal Mazarin. Rev. E. J. Cullen.
Sir Cahir O'Doherty's Rebellion. Continued. Bishop O'Doherty.
The Poems of Egan O'Rahilly. Rev. P. O'Leary.

Journal of Geology.-Luzac. 50 cents. Nov. International Co-operation in Geological Investigation. A. G. ikie. Proposed International Geological Institute, T. C. Chamberlin, The Composition of Kulaite. H. S. Washington. Succession and Relation of Lavas in the Great Basin Region, J. E. Spurr. The Glacier of Mt. Arapahoe, Colorado. W. T. Lee. The Shenandoah Limsstones and Martinsburg Shals. C. S. Prosser,

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution. - J. J. Keliher.

The Ladysmith Pigeon Post. Major E. A. Altham.
On the Relation of Public Secondary Schools to the Organisation of National Defence. Rev. E. Warre.

Journal of the United Service Institution of India.—Government Central Printing Office, Simla.—Oct.

The Great Boiler Question. P. Donaldson.
Notes on the More Obvious Lessons of the War in South Africa. Licut.—Col. G. H. Ovens.

Col. G. H. Uvens.
The Use of Light Railways in Indian Warfare, and the Organisation and Working of Railway Cops. Major W. J. K. Dobbin.
Tactical Studies from the Afghan War. Continued. Lieut.-Col. A. Keene, Wellesley's Campaign in the Deccan. Capt. R. G. Burton.

Ladies' Home Journal .- Curtis, Philadelphia. 10 cents. Dec. Two Women's Gif.s of Twenty-five Millions in California. Illustrated. E. N. Gale.

Law Magazine and Review .- 161, STRAND. 58. Nov. Law magazine and neview—io, Stass Lord Russell of Killowen. W. C. Gully. The Development of Patent Law. G. H. B. Kenrick. Civil Judicial Statistics, 48,98. The Reporter and the Law of Copyright. J. A. Strah Indian Judicial Admiristration. W. M. Wood. The Interpretation of Treaties. H. M. Adler.

Leisure Hour.-56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. Boston, Mass.; the Beacon of American Literature. Illustrated. D. Charlotte Brontë and Haworth. Illustrated. Evelyn B. Parry.

Library World.—4, Ave Maria Lane, 6d. Nov. The German Library System. T. Maw. Grievances of a Free Library Reader. H. J. O'Brien. Where do We get Our Librarians? J. D. Brown.

In th Rhyr Mada A Tr

Some Paris God The I

M Makir Hann A Wo

The 3

Union The S Weath

ocial How Mode Miss

The V Missic Proble The G Future A Cris The N French

Cambri Catholi The Ca

The Ro

A Poss Science Englan The Lo Field G A Comi Interna An Imp An Aca The Re The Mo

The Gr The Ha A Trip New Ca The Sto Animals

A New Some Pe Is Emer Governm America: A Comp Dod Her Maj Colonial

Radical Turther

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.—Lippincott, Philadelphia.

18. Nov.
The Chinese Language; China's Greatest Curiosity. Frederic Poole.
In the Footprints of Bryant. Dr. T. F. Wolfe.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. Dec. Rhyme. Frank Ritchie, Madame Geoffrin; a Woman of the Salons. S. G. Tallentyre, A Transport Cruise to the Cape in 1795. Mrs. O. Marshall.

Ludgate .- 123, FLEST STREET. 6d. December.

Some Friars of Old. Illustrated. Bishop Creighton.

Paris by Night. Illustrated. Bishop Creighton.

Paris by Night. Illustrated. A. de Burgh.

God Save The Queen; the Story of Our National Hymn. Illustrated.

A. W. Myers.

The L. S. D. of Christmas. With Diagrams. H. Macfarlane.

Messrs. Tuck and Sons; the Home of the Christmas Card; Interview.

Illustrated. C. H. Lewis.

15.

. H

ct.

nts.

oster.

Spurr.

ion of OVERN-Lieut.

on and

Keene.

Dec. strated.

d. D.

McClure's Magazine. -10, Norfolk Street, Strand. 10 cents.

McClure's Magazine,—10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 10 cear The First Flight of Count Zepp. In's Air-Ship. Illustrated. E. Wolf. Making a German Soldier. Illustrated. Ray Stannard Baker. The Life of the Master. Illustrated. Continued. Rev. John Watson. Hanna; a Character Sketch. With Portrait. W. A. White. A Woman's Diary of the Siege of Pekin. Katharine M. Lowry.

Macmillan's Magazine.-MACMILLAN. 18. Dec. The Missionary in China. F. T. Dickson.
Union and Annexation. Prof. Lodge.
The Sufferings of an Honorary Secretary.
Weathering an Earthquake. A. M. Bric..
Impressions of Klondike. Concluded. C. C. Osborne.
The Reservist in War. A Regimental Officer.

Medical Magazine,-62, King William Street. 18. Nov.

Social Misfits. Dr. G. H. Savage. How Diphtheria spreads. Dr. J. W. Carr, Modern Epidemics; Typhus and Typhoid. J. Foster Palmer.

Missionary Review of the World .- 44, FLEST STREET. 25 cents.

Nov.

The Wonderful Stery of Banza Manteke. Illustrated.
Mission Work among the Jews. Dr. A. T. Pierson.
Problems of Modern Medical Missions. Dr. E. W. G. Masterman.
The Greek Church of Russia. B. Meakin.
Future Missionary Policy in China. A. J. Brown.
A Crisis in the Nicaraguan Mission. Illustrated. Rev. P. de Schweinitz.
The Nevius Method of Mission Work. D. Z. Sheffield.
The Founding of Robert College. Illustrated. 22v. C. Hamlin.

Month,-Longmans, is, Nov. Tracts for the Million, Rev. G. Tyrrell, French Carmelite Martyrs and English Benedictine Nuns. Barbara de

French Carmente Martyrs and English Bene Courson. Cambridge Patristic Texts. Rev. J. Rickaby. Catholic Ways in the Tyrol. M. S. Dalton, The Case of Pierre de Rudder. C. Luttey. The Rosawy. Continued. Rev. H. Thurston.

Monthly Review .- JOHN MURRAY. 28. 6d. Dec.

A Possible Party. Science in Politics. Science in Politics,
England and Germany,
The Love Episode of William Pitt. Lord Rosebery, Field Guns, Galeatus,
A Coming North African Problem. H. M. Grey, International Ethics. L. Villari,
An Imperial Flag. W. Laird Clowes,
An Academy of the Dead,
William Archer,
The Religion of Rabelais, Miss E. Schel,
The Modern Mother, Mrs. Meynell.

Munsey's Magazine. - Horace Marshall. 6d. Nov. Munsey's Magazine, —Horace Marshall. 6d. Nov. The Great Exhibition of 1900. Illustrated, C. E. Russell. The Harness of Niagara. Illustrated, W. Fawcett. A Trip to Cape Nome. Illustrated. Henry G. De Mill. New Calisthenics for Children. Illustrated. Lillian Baynes Griffin. The Story of the Pistols. Illustrated. J. P. Bocock. Dramatic Art in England and America. Clement Scott. The Waterways of New York. Illustrated. M. Foster. Animals in Warfare, Illustrated. Lieut, W. Kelly.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 25. 6d. Dec. A New Fourth Party. Young England.

Some Personal Impressions of the Army. Capt. A. G. Boscawen.

The Military Education of Officers. T. Miller Maguire.

Church Parade in the Army. Major C. B. Mayne.

Is Emerson a Poet? Coulson Kernahan.

Government House. Arthur Gallon.

American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.

A Comparison of German and English School-Children. Miss Catherine Dodd.

Her Majesty's Judges. E. Colonial Governments as Money-Lenders. W. Pember Reeves. Greater Britain.

New Century Review.—434, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Radical Tactics at the General Election. H. C. Garrod. Further Statement of the Case against Vivisection. T. Pe kins.

Petronius. W. J. Bayliss.
The Companies Act, 1900. N. W. Sibley.
The Birmingham New Water Works. A. J. H. Crespi.
The Misrepresentation of the Working Classes in Parlament.
Walter White. John Sh rley.
The Lessons of the Election. A. E. J. Newman.
The Garrick Club. Continued. P. Fitzgerald.
School Board Religion. F. C. Arnold-Jarvis.
China; an Empire without Government.
Perception; a Study in Puilosophy. C. C. Dove.
Socialism in France. P. Denis.

New England Magazine.—5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 23 cents.
Nov.
The Study of Housekeeping in Boston. Hlustrated. Mary E. Trueblood.
Timothy Dwight; an Early Writer of New England Travels. L.
Hayward.
Last of the Ocean Slave Traders. G. S. Boutwell.
The Hornet's Sting and Wing. Illustrated. P. S. P. Connor.
Home of Sir Philip Sidney. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley.
Tutor Flynt; New England's Earliest Humorist. Illustrated. D. M.
Wilson.

Wilson.

Liberty through Sovereignty. J. Lee.
Toronto. Illustrated. J. L. Hughes.
Gen. John Sullivan and the Rebellion in New Hampshi.e. F. B.
Sanborn.

Nineteenth Century.-Sampson Low. 25. 6d. Dec.

Nineteenth Century,—Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. Dec.

Nineteenth Century,—Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. Dec.
Balfou ian Amelioration "in Ireland. Horace Plunkett.
Thomas Henry Huxley. Leslie Stephen.
Recent Science. Prince Kropotkin.
The Rôle of Women in Society.—In Eighteenth-Century France.—In Nineteenth-Century England. Hon. Lady Ponsonby.
The Defective Addition to Our Company Law. Judge Emden.
A Visit to the Boer Prisoners at St. Helena. Mrs. John Richard Green,
The Poet's End. Frederick Wedmore.
Present Day Progress in India. Protap Chunder Mozoomdar.
"The Sources of Islam." Sir William Muir.
Negligence in Recruiting. Capt. P. G. Elgood.
The Return of the Exile: a Retrospect. Sir Charles Roe.
The Newspapers. Sir Wemyss Roid.
The Usages of War in South Africa. John Macdonell.
Are We really a Nation of Amateurs! Sir Herbert Maxwell.
Lord Rosebery on the Dangers to British Trade. Henry Birchenough.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 28. 6d. Nov.

Asiatic Conditions and International Policies. Capt. A. T. Mahan.
The Third Life of Italy. G. d'Annunzio.
Present Status and Prospects of the Peace Movement. Baroness B. von Süttner.

In Terra Pass. G. Leveson Gower.
A Century of International Commerce. O. P. Austin.
The Industrial Revolution in Japan. Count Okuma.
China and the Western Nations. F. Crispi.
Chaucer. J. W. Hales.
New York and Its Historians. Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer.
From India to the Planet Mars. J. H. Hyslop.
Retrogression of the American Woman. Flora M. Thompson.
The Great Religions of the World; Mohammedanism. Oskar Mann.

Northern Counties Magazine, -ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. Dec. Steam and Speed (1800-1900). Brynsich. Unveiling of the Ruskin Memorial. Canon Rawnsley, The Contemplative Man in Norway. J. W. Pease,

The Contemplative Man in Norway. J. W. Pease,

Open Court,—Kegan Paul., 6d. Nov.

On Greek Religion and Mythology. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.

The Unshackling of the Spirit of Inquiry: the Conflict between Theology and Science. Illustrated. Concluded. Dr. E. Krausz.

The Eleusinian Mysteries. Continued. Rev. C. J. Wood.

The International Arbitration Alliance. Dr. Moncure D. Conway.

Christian Missions and European Politics in China. Prof. G. M. Fiamingo.

Chinese Education. Illustrated.

Overland Monthly, -- SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents, Oct. Pulque: the National Drink of Mexico. Illustrated. Clara S. Brown. Algiers. Illustrated. Elizabeth F. Risser. The Prehistoric Ruins of Casa Grands. Illustrated. Alice R. Crane. The Graves and Ghosts of Mont St. Michel. Illustrated.

Paidologist .- Cambray House, Cheltenham. 18, 6d. per ann. Nov. The Founders of Child-Study in England. Mrs. Muirhead.
Mrs. Meynell and Her Historic Account of Childhood, Prof. Foster Mrs. Meynell and rier Watson.
Châdren's Idaas in Denmark. J. Olsen.
Travelling Companions. Mabel Marsh.

Pall Mall Magazine .- 18, Charing Cross Road. 18. Dec. Royal Tapestry at Windsor. Illustrated. E. M. Jessop.
Guy Miege: a Seventeenth-Century Ollendorff. F. H. Skrine.
Wellington, New Zealand; a Capital of Greater Britain. Illustrated. T. L. Mills. The Field. Capt. A. G. Bagot.

Philosophical Review.-MACMILLAN. 38. Nov. The Early Idealism of Jonathan Edwards. Prof. H. N. Gardiner. Locke's Relation to Descartes. Prof. F. Thilly. Contiguity and Similarity. Dr. W. Fite. The Abstract Freedom of Kant. Dr. R. B. Perry.

Poet-Lore. - GAY AND BIRD. 65 cents. Sept. The Plastic Word. Anna Cox Stephens.
Elizabethan Women. G. Bradford, Jr.
Echegaray: Spanish Statesman, Dramatist, Poet. Fanny H. Gardiner, Browning's Theology. Rev. H. White.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. Commercial Education in Scotland. C. Brereton. How long should a Child sleep? J. Gunn.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychian Research.—Kegan Paul. 6s. Oct.
On the So-Called Divining Rod. Prof. W. F. Barrett.
Pseudo-Possession. F. W. H. Myers.

Psychological Review .- MACMILLAN. 38. Nov. The Fourth International Congress of Psychology, H. C. Warren, Mental Fatigue. Continus I. E. Thorndike.
An Attempted Experiment in Psychological Aesthetics. Mary W. An Ill ision of Length. C. E. Seashore and Mabel C. Williams. Mary W. Calkins.

Public Health .- 12), SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 15. Nov. On the Working of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act. Dr. W. Harris. The "bulation of Causes of Death. R. Dudfield. The U bridled Practice of Medical Quackery. H. Kenwood."

Pu'lle School Magazina,-131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. Nov. Malver College. Illustrated. P. G. Wodehouse. Public Schools and National Defence.

Quarterly Journal of Beonomies,—Machillan. 2 dols. per ann. Nov.

Recent Discussion of the Capital Concept. F. A. Fetter.
The Trusts; Facts established and Problems unsolved. J. W. Jenks.
Enterprise and Profit. F. B. Hawley.
The Capitalisation of Public-Service Corporations. W. Z. Ripley.

Quiver .- CASSELL. IS. Dec. Some Christmas Fairy Godmothers. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley. George MacDonald; a Child of the Kingdom. Illustrated. Coulson Kernahan.

Kernahan.
Christmas Customs and Superstitions. Illustrated. Rev. E. J. Hardy.
Christ the Teacher. Illustrated. Bishop Boyd Carpenter.
A Century's Work for God. Illustrated. Rev. C. Herbert.
The Great Social Festival. Illustrated. Dean Farrar.

Review of Reviews .- (AMERICA.) 13, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK. Review of Reviews.—(AMERICA.) 73, ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.
25 cents. Dec.
A Town and Country Club. Lillian W. Betts.
Marcus Daly; Empire-Builder. Illustrated. S. E. Moffett.
The Cuban Republic – Limited. Walter Wellman.
An Estimate of Max Müller (1823-1900). Illustrated.
The Old Age of New England Authors. Illustrated. H. Butterworth.
Making a Way out of the Slum. Illustrated. Jacob A. Riis.

Review of Reviews .- (Australasia). Queen Street, Melbourne.

New Zealand and an Island Federation. Sir Robert Stout.
New Zealand and Australian Federation. W. Macmillan.
An English View of Temparance Reform in New Zealand. A. Sherwell.
The Fighting of the Month in China and South Africa.
How a Great War fizzles out.

Royal Magazine. -C. A. PEARSON. 6d. Dec. A Pinch of Snuff. Illustrated. C. O'K. Donegan.
A Harvest of Ice. Illustrated. G. R. Ballance.
John Bull's Christmas Dinner. Illustrated. S. P. Bunn.
The Dwarfs of the Prince-Bishops. Illustrated. Herbert Vivian.
A Triumph of Training; Blind and Deaf-Mutes. Illustrated. A. J. A Triumph of Training; Bind and Dear-Bills.

Storey.
London's Legations from the Far East. Illustrated. Robert Machray.
The Wonders and Workers of Toyland. Illustrated. Mary Fermor.
In the Footsteps of Barnaby Rudge. Illustrated. F. Foulsham.
Discipline in the Navy. Illustrated. A. S. Hurd.

St. Nicholas.—Macmillan. is. Dec.
The Life-Savers' Ride of a Hundred M.les. Illustrated. Lieut. W. G.

School Board Gazette.-Bemrose. is. Nov. Advanced Education for the Working Classes, Higher Elementary Schools Abroad. The New Mancheste: Central Higher Grade School.

School World,-MACMILLAN. 6d. Dec. Some Impressions of Rational Methods. Harold Picton. The Supply of Pupil Teachers.
The Aims of Education. Sir Henry Craik.

Science Gossip.-tto, STRAND. 6d. Nov. Scenery of Llanberis Pass. Illustrated. F. E. Filer.
The Photography of Colour. Illustrated. E. Sanger Shepherd.
Notes on Spinning Animals. H. W. Kew.
Butterflies of the Palaearctic Region. Illustrated. Continued. Dr. H. C. Lang. Irish Plant-Names. J. H. Barbour.

Scottish Geographical Magazine.—Edward Stanford, 128. 6d.

The Siberian Railway. C. R. Beazley,
The Valley of the Joux (Jura), V. Dingelstedt.
The Commercial Resources of Tropical Africa. E. Heawood.

Scottish Review.—26, PATERNOSTER SQUARE: 48. Oct.
The Love Story of Drummond of Hawthornden, Louise Lorimer.
Daniel Defoe in Scotland. J. D. Cockburn.
The Coming War of American Dreams. William Wallace.
Table Talk: a Lost Art. O. Smeaton.
The Strath of Actaéron, and Its Homeric Ghosts. J. S. Stuart-Glennie.
The Folk-Loce of Icelandie Fishes. Olaf Davidsson.
Concerning Birds. S. E. Saville.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes. 18. Dec. The Training of Lions, T.gers, and other Great Cats. Illustrated. S. H. Adams. Adams.
Peac: Heroes of 1900. Illustrated. A. T. Story.
Sponges. Illustrated. F. Westbury.
The Building of the Deutschland. Illustrated. R. S. Beker.
A Hundred Years Ago. Illustrated. A. Whitman.
"English as She is wrote." Illustrated. Meta Henn.
Chinase Puzzles, Tricks, and Traps. Illustrated. James Scott.
Royal Notepaper. Illustrated. A. H. Broadwell.
Decorated Ost.ich Eggs. Illustrated. Laura B. Starr.

Sunday at Home. -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. Dec. Rev. John Wilson of the Tabernacle, Woolwich. Illustrated.
The Mystery of the Scarabs. Illustrated. John Ward.
Protestantism in Madagascar under the French Flag. Rev. W. E. Cou.......
American Missiona.ies an Turkey. Illustrated. Rev. G. F. Herrick.
Ou: Chinese Sisters. Illustrated. Lillie S. Parker.

Sunday Magazine,-Isbister. 6d. Dec. The Queen's Love for Music. F. J. Crowest. Rev. T. Richard; a Missionary Statesman in China. With Portrait. Rev. Rev. T. Kichard; a Missionary Statesman in China.

J. Johnston.

As to Surnames Violet H. Thorold.

John Pilkington Norris, Archdeacon of Bristol. With Portrait. F. D. How.

The Religious Element in the Poets. Concluded. Bishop Boyd Carpenter.

A Girl's Home under the Aurora. Illustrated. Rev. J. Beveridge.

Sunday Strand.-George Newnes. 6d. Dec. Christmas. Illustrated. George Clarke.
The Life of Jesus Christ. Illustrated. Concluded. Ian Maclaren.
The Mansion House and Its Funds; the World's Greatest Philanthropic Agency. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
The Amazulu. Illustrated. W. M. Douglas. John Bull's Christmas Beer. Illustrated. W. Greenwood.
Dr. Clifford. Illustrated. Dr. A. Black.

Temple Bar. - MACMILLAN. 18. Dec.

Mrs. Grote; a Radical Lady of the Last Generation. J. Fyvie. Blackhorn Winter. Rev. J. Bacon. Strafford's Friend—Lucy, Countess of Carlisle, G. Serrell. Dr. Donne. H. M. Sanders.

Temple Magazine. - Horace Marshall. 6d. Dec. Birmingham; the Toy Shop of the World. Illustrated. J. A. Hammerton and E. C. Middleton.

Mr. Thomas Atkins in War Time. Rev. E. J. Hardy.
The Pilgrim Father's First Christmas. Rev. E. E. Hale.

A Chat about Christmas C. side.

Theosophical Review. -3, LANGHAM PLACE. 18. Nov. Theosophy and Modern Science. W. C. Worsdell.
The General Sermon of Hermes the Thrice-Greatest. G. R. S. Mead, Modern Thought in the Light of the Vedânta. Ernest Horrwitz.
The Côle Dé or Culdees. Mrs. Hooper, Taiyumanavai; a Poet-Philosopher of Southern India, Mrs. Duncan.
Thought-Power; Its Control and Culture. Mrs. Annie Besant.
Magic Lyres or Problems of Consciousness. Miss Hardcastle.

Travel.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Nov. Flashlights on an African Cruise. Illustrated. H. Crowther.
Rumbles in Sicily. Illustrated. John Ward.
Roughing It in the Andss. W. Churchill.
Yalta and the Crima; the Russian Riviera. Illustrated. Henry Stead.
Alpine Climbing by Rail. Illustrated. Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond.

Universal Magazine .- 18, Cockspur Street. 6d. Dec. Street Scens in India. Illustrated. Traveller.
Pierre Loti. Illustrated. Clive Holland.
Beautiful New Zealand. Illustrated. F. d'A. C. de L'Isle.
Lord Alverstone; the Lord Chief Justice of England. Illustrated. H. B. J.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 2s. 6d. Dec.

Westminster Review.—F. Warne. 2s. od. Dec.
The Machinary of Democracy. A. E. Maddock.
A Plea for the Orange Free State. W. Sweetman.
The Reign of Force. Honora Twycross.
The Elections in Austria. G. P. Gooch.
Recollections about General Cluseret. Karl Blind.
Brain in relation to Education. N. C. Macnamara.
Tiele's "Gifford Lectures." H. G. Keene.
A French Critic on Secondary Education. H. Milborne.
Robert Burns as a Social Reformer. W. Diack.
The Courtesan on the French Stage. A. de Ternant.
A Scheme for the Industrial Development of Ireland. R. J. Ambrose.
Ireland. T. E. Naughten.

The Qu Terr Abyssini Goed Hoisting In and A Our Clin A Lady My New

The Wor Military

Alte un Paris Ex ohannes endon l Letters fi The Geri Archiv fine Ref Women a Ladustry Da

Eberbach Extraord The Pine

Wolf-Hu

The Box A. Oberl Deutsc The Coas Tubercul Henrik I Electricit

Henrik I Electricit Friedrich The Geri Deut

Count O The Vati Humanit England' The Tres Unpublis The Cult Charles 2 The Chir The Tele Deutsch

Trei'schl Higher E The Upa Robert R From th:

Gart Tragedie Benvenut The Pari

H. S. Ch Tne Ethi Bartholo

The Agr. H. S. Ch Fritz Lie

Wide World Magazine, George Newnes. 6d. Dec. Oueer Christmas Festivities in Mexico. Illustrated, Mrs. L. M.

H.

lev.

ow.

ter.

pic

ton

rn-

Terry,
Abyssinia; the Land of the "King of Kings." Illustrated. Victor Goedorp.
Hoisting the Flag in Niué. Illustrated. An Official.
In and About Pekin. Illustrated. J. Thomson.
Our Climbs in the Himalayas. Illustrated. Dr. and Mrs. Bullock Workman.

A Lady Mountaineer in the New Zealand Alps. Illustrated. Forrest Ross. My New Guinea Cruise. Illustrated. Cecil Vaughan.

Windsor Magazine.-WARD, LOCK. 18. Dec. The World's Figure-Skating Championship. Illustrated. George Wood. The London Hospital. Illustrated. F. A. McKenzie. Military Knights of Windsor. Illustrated. Miss F. Klickmann. The Haunts of Ghosts. Illustrated. A. W. Jarvis.
An Incident of African History. Illustrated. H. Rider Haggard.
Lonely Voyagers. Illustrated. F. A. Talbot.

Woman at Home.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. Dec. Women Who are serving the Empire, Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley, Lord Roberts in the Afghan War. Illustrated. An Officer. The Domestic Servant Question; Symposium.

Young Man.-Horace Marshall. 3d. Dec. Leaders of Thought and Action in Africa. With Portraits.

Young Woman,-Horace Marshall, 3d. Dec Some Popular Lady Composers. With Portraits.
R. Speaight; the Children's Photographer: Interview. Illustrated. L.
The Women Who make Christmas Cards. Illustrated.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Alte und Neue Welt .- BENZIGER AND Co., EINSIEDELN. 50 Pf. Nov. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. G. Baumberger Johannes Schrott. With Portrait. E. Schmitt. London Burial-Grounds. Illustrated. Dr. A. Heine. Letters from Rome. Continued. Illustrated. Eremos. The German Catholics at Bonn. With Portraits. E. Grunau.

Archly für Soziale Gesetzgebung und Statistik.—C. HEYMANN, BERLIN. 2 Mks. 50 Pf. Nos. 1-2.

The Reform of German Acc dent Insurance Legislation. Dr. E. Lange. Women and Work. Lily Braun.

Industry and Connerce in Germany. Prof. H. Rauchberg.

Daheim.-Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig. 20 Pf. Nov. 3. Eberbach. Illustrated.

Extraordinary Animals in South America. Prof. W. Marshall. The Pine Forests of Germany. Illustrated. M. Hesdörffer. Nov. 17.

Tea. Illustrated. P. Lindenberg.
Wolf-Hunting in East Prussia. F. Skowronnek.
The Boxers. Illustrated.

A. Oberländer. Illustrated. Prof. E. Heyck. The Eve of St. Bartholomew. T. H. Pantenius.

Deutscher Hausschatz .- F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 1. Deutschef Hausschatz, -F. POSTET, REGENSI
The Coast of Flanders, Illustrated. H. S. Rehm.
Tuberculosis, D. A. F.
Henrik Ibsen. With Portrait. A. Lignis.
Electricity. Dr. W. Rossmann.
Heft 2.

Henrik Ibsen. Concluded. A. Lignis.
Electricity. Concluded. Dr. W. Rossmann.
Friedrich Leopold Graf zu Stolberg. With Portrait. Dr. A. Kohut.
The New Bayarian Museum. Illustrated. A. Nistler.
The German Catholics at Bonn. Illustrated.

Deutsche Revue,—Dzutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
6 mks. per qr. Nov.
Count Otto von Bray-Steinburg; Posthumous Papers. Continued.
The Vatican and the Quirinal. Prof. G. M. Fiamingo.
The Napoleonic Question. H. Ulmann.
The Abolition of the Concordat. K. von Stremayr.
Humanity on the Sick-Bed. Dr. H. Eichhorst.
England's Uniovableness. Lord Newton.
The Trend of Dogmatism. H. Bassermann.
Unpublished Letters by Dr. K. A. A. von Larish. H. von Poschinger.
The Culture of the Arts. W. von Seidlitz.
Charles XV. of Swed:n and Norway. C. Schefer.
The Balloon and Pigeon Post during the Siege of Paris. Commander Gross.
The Chinese Peacemakers. M. von Brandt.
The Telescopic Planets. C. de Freycinet.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per qr. Nov.

Treitschke's Politics. F. Curtius.
Higher Education in America. Dr. E. Emerton.
The Diaries of Taeodo: von Bernhardi, 1867. Major-G:n. von Bernhardi.
The Upanishads and the Literatur: of Buddhism. H. Oldenberg.
The Paris Exhibition. A. Schricker.
Robert Radecke. C. Krebs. From the South and from the East. M. von Brandt.

Gartenlaubs .- Ernst Keil's Nachf., Leipzig. 50 Pf. Heft 12. Tragedies and Comedies of Superstition. Dr. D. Thum, Benvenuto Cellini. With Portrait. H. Bauer. The Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. J. C. Heer.

Gesellschaft.—J. C. C. Bruns, Minden. 75 Pf. Nov. 1.
H. S. Chamberlain on the Foundations of the 19th Century. H. C.
The Ethics of Darwinism. R. Steiner.
Bartholomaus Ritter von Carneri. With Portrait. Marie Stona.
Nov. 15.

The Agrarian Question. G. Maier.
H. S. Chamberlain on the Nineteenth Century. Continued. H. C. Fritz Lienhard. E. Buchner.

Grenzboten.-F. W. GRUNOW, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. Nov. 1. Imperial Chancello: and Prussian Prime Minister. The Post Office as a Public Labour Bureau. C. Dankwort.

Ethics and Politics.
Berlin Art Exhibition. Continued. A. Rosenberg.
The Presidential Election.

Nov. 22.

Child Labour.
National Spirit in England.
The Manning of German Merchant Ships. Concluded. Capt. E. Meier. Kunstgewerbeblatt.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEPZIC. 1 Mk. Nov.

The Darmstadt Artist-Colony. Illustrated. Monatsschrift für Stadt und Land.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. x Mk. 25 Pf. Nov.

Burial and Cremation. Continued. Dr. A. Freybe.
Travels in Greece. Pastor Hahn.
Wartburg, Weimar, Nürnberg. L. von Strauss und Torney.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. Nov.

Reminiscences of Holy Places. Max Verworn. Letters (1842-1884) by Franz Kugler, Bettina, Berthold Auerbach, F. Rückert, Frau Carl Gützkow, Heinrich von Stein. A. von Schorn.

Neue Zeit .- J. H. W. DIETZ, STUTTGART. 25 Pf. Nov. 3. The Coal Question. Continued. Otto Hué.
The Elections in England. Continued. J. Brockle.
Agriculture and Home Industries in the South Seas.
Nov. 10.

Agriculture and Move. 10.

Communal Dwellings. P. Hirsch.
The Coal Question. K. Kautsky.
Nov. 17.

The Three Years' Service of Mounted Troops. E. Däumig.
Legislation for the People in Switzerland. Dr. J. Hertz.
Communal Dwellings. Continued. P. Hirsch.
The Decrease of Tuberculosis in England. P. Stassof.
Nov. 24.

Class Struggle and Ethics, K. Kautsky. The Colliers' Strike in the United States. J. L. Franz.

Nord und Süd .- Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks. Nov.

Alfred, Count Waldersee, With Portrait, G. Zernin,
The World Powers and the World Languages, K. Walcker, Anna Auguste Rothe; a German Medium. E. Bohn.
Swahili Folk Tales. R. Petsch.
Dr. Clark. Karl Blind.

Socialistische Monatshefte.—LCTZOWSTR. 85A, BERLIN. 50 Pf.

It dien Social Democracy. C. Treves.

The International Congress and the Union of French Socialists. Dr. E. David. Paris and Mayence. E. Bernstein. Socialism in Sweden. H. Branting.

Stein der Weisen .- A. HARTLEBEN, VIENNA. 50 Pf. Heft 9. The Care of the Teeth. Dr. E. Sos.
Asbestos. Illustrated. V. Krakauer.
Fuels. Jünemann.
Two Caves in Hungary. Illustrated. Alföldi.

Comparative Method of Studying Languages.
Mode in Bicteriology. Illustrated. Dr. C. Schmidt.
The Austro-Hungaran Navy. Illustrated. S.
Mors Motors. Illustrated. Stern.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. to Mks. 80 Pf. per ann. Oct.

The Higher Education of Women. V. Cathrein, The Leaf of the Victoria Regia, J. Rompel, Linhoff in Münster, 1831-1839. O. Pfülf, F. W. Weber, W. Kreiten.

Ueber Land und Meer. - Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
1 Mk. Heft 4.

London Street Arabs, Illustrated. L. K. Illustrated. Flying-Machines and Balloons. Illustrated. Historic Monuments in Asia. Illustrated. Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. S. Epstein.

Welte Welt.—Union-Deutsche-Verlags-Gesellschaft, Stuttgart.
25 Pf. No. 11.

Pekin, Illustrated.

No. 12.
German Settlers in Santa Catharina, Brazil. Illustrated. R. Gernhard.

Die Zeit .- Günthergasse 1, Vienna IX./3. 50 Pf. Nov. 3.

Electoral Reform in Switzerland. Dr. J. Landmann. Max Müller. Prof. L. von Schroeder.

Nov. 10.

The Presidential Election. Dr. J. H. Senner. Jean Arthur Rimbaud. K. E. Schmidt. Nov. 17.

The Elections in England. E. Ba Russian Famine. Dr. B. Minzès. E. Bernstein. Russian Famine. Dr. B. Minzès. The Causes of Railway Accidents.

Nov. 24.

Electoral Politics. K.
Parliamentary Rule and the Party System in England. E. Bernstein.
The Prado Museum. R. Muther.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPSIC.
26 Mks. per ann. Nov.
Otto Wagner. Continued. Illustrated. L. Hevesi.
Rode and Notke. Illustrated. A. Goldschmidt.
The Bronze Statue, "The Thorn Extractor," on the Capitol, and Art Archeology. Illustrated. A. Aubert.

Zeitschrift der Internationalen Musikgesellschaft.—Вкегткогр UND HAERTEL, LEIPZIG. 10 Mks. per ann. Nov. The English Provincial Festivals, J. A. Fuller Maitland. Music at Paris during the Exhibition. M. Chassang. Leipzig Symphony Concerts, 1839–1900. D. Schultz.

Zukunft .- Maximilian Harden, Berlin. 50 Pf. Nov. 3. The Papal Jubilee. Armin Tille. The Museé-Moreau. B. Rüttenauer.

Nov. 10. Roy Devereux. G. Brandes. The German Law relating to Publishers. Dr. Hans Blum. Nov. 24.

Liberalism, K. Jentsch.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales de Géographie.-5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 4 fr. Nov. Maps at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. E. de Margerie and L.

Raveneau. Relations between the Geological Structure and the Hydrography of the Paris Basin. Continued. G. F. Dollfus. The Physical Geography of Central Tunis. With Map and Illustrations. L. Pervinquière.

Annales des Sciences Politiques.—108, Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. Nov.

England and Her Functions Abroad. E. Boutmy. The New Hebrides. P. Lavagne.
Compulsory Insurance in Switzerland and the Plébiscite of May 20.

H. Micheli.

The English Elections. P. Hamelle.
The French State and Insurance. G. Salaun.

Bibliothèque Universelle,-18, King William Street, Strand. 20s. per annum. Nov.

The Question of Militia in France. A. Veuglaire.
The Boers of South Af. ica. Concluded. J. Villarais, Russian Dramatic Music. Concluded. M. Delines,
South America. F. Macler.
Europe in China. E. Tallichet.

Correspondant.—31, Rue Saint-Guillaume, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. Nov. 10.

Liberty, G. de Lamarzelle.
Liberty, G. de Lamarzelle.
Civil, Ecclesiastical, and Monastic Dress. T. Créj
The Question of the Transvaal. H. de Cardonne.
The English Elections, M. de Nadaillac.
The Correspondence of St. Theresa. H. Joly.
Nov. 25. T. Crépon.

Brumaire. Continued. A. Vandal.

Montalembert and the Preliminaries of the Coup d'Etat of December 2. E. Lecanuet.

Women and Knowledge. E. Lany. Geography in Modern Education. Lavenu. The Oigin of the Old Catholics and the German Universities. A. Kannengieser.
Catinat. Continued. E. de Broglie.
The Paris Exhibition. L. Joubert.

Humanité Nouvelle .- 15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c.

On the Way to Reaction in France. Politikos. Autobiographical. P. Kropotkin. Free Love; Free Maternity. P. Robin.

Journal des Économistes,-14, RUE RICHELIEU, PARIS. 3 frs. 50 c. Nov.

The Economic Problem. G. d. Molinari.
Agriculture at the Paris Exhibition. L. Grandeau.

Ménestrel .-- 2 bis. RUE VIVIENNE, PARIS. 30 C. Nov Painters Music-Mad. R. Bouyer, Japanese Music, Julien Tiersot.

Mercure de France.-15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris.

Glory and the Idea of Immortality. R. de Gourmont. Gregoire d. Narek. A. Tchobanian. Senimentalism. P. Léautaud. Musician and Contemporare.

Monde Moderne.—5, Rue St. Benoit, Paris. 1 f. 50 c. Nov. Chopin. Illustrated. H. Buffenoir. Military Schools in Germany. Illustrated, P. de Pardiellan. Wet-Nurses. Léo Claretie.

The Date-Palm of Algeria. Illustrated. J. B. d'Attanoux. Retrospective French Art at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. C. de Neronde.

Plant-Distribution. Illustrated, V. Brandicourt. Tige:-Hunting on Elephants. Illustrated, B. H. Gausseron.

Nouvelle Revue,—18, King William Street, Strand.
55 frs. per annum. Nov. 1.
The South African War. Capt. Gilbert.
Mont Blanc. E. Picard.
Le Bas; the Conventional. E. Duplay.
Notes of a Journey—Port Scid, Obok, Zanzibar. G. de Raulin.
Nov. 15.

Mont Blanc, Continued, E. Picard. The Law and French Trades-Unionism, H. Dépassé. All about Duelling. E. André.
An American Presidential Election . M. Delines.
Quo Vadis. E. Lemaigre.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, BOULEVARD POISSONNIÈRE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. Oct. 31. he Grand Palais as the Paris Exhibition. Marie Letizia de Rute.

The Grand Palais as the Paris Exhibition. Marie Le The Human Being and the Unknown. Pierre Denis. The Neapolitan Theatre. H. Lyonnet. Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mdme. Rattazzi.

The Human Being and the Unknown, Continued, P. Denis. Urbain Rattazzi. Continued, Mdme. Rattazzi. Thomas Hardy. L. Pene-Heute.

Questions Diplomatiques et Coloniales,-16, Rue Cassette, Paris.

Austria-Hungary, Continued, W. Beaumont, European Agriculture in Madagascar. E. F. Gautier, Considerations on a War between France and England, Concluded, Foreign Countries at the Paris Exhibition. Concluded. Nov. 15.

Nov. 15.
The Real Conditions of Foreign Commerce. C. Guy,
Russian Colonisation in Siberia, P. Labbé,
Yellow Fever and Colonial Interests. Dr. G. Treille, Submarine Cables and the Report of Maurice Ordinaire. J. H. Franklin.
The American Elections. R. de Cain.

Réforme Sociale. -54, RUE DE SEINE, PARIS. 1 fr. Nov. 1. The Reform of the Laws relating to Professional Syndicates. H. Valleroux.
The Teaching of the Political and Social Sciences at Louvain University.
V. Brants.
The Mutual Relations of the Different Branches of Labour Insurance. M. Dellow

Nov. 16.

The Education of Universal Suffrage and the Government of the Country by the Country. J. Ferrand.

The Reform of Hereditary Succession and the Van Der Bruggen Law in Belgium. G. Legrand.

The Mutual Relations of the Different Branches of Labour Insurance.
Continued. M. Bellom.

Revue de l'Art.—28, RUE DU MONT-THABOR, PARIS. 7 frs. 50 c.

Nov.

The Foreign Schools of Painting at the Paris Exhibition.

G. Lafenestre.

The Engraving of Precious Stones. Continued. Illustrated.

Lithography, Engravings, Prints at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated

H. Beraldi.

H. Beraldi. Bronze Work at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. H. Harvard. Tapestry, &c., at the Paris Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated F. Calmettes.

Relig Life Some Lette Life

> Rev The The Augu Re

The Musi Coal The

The H A Cer The I Recol The I Re

Antho The I The I The I The I The I The I Holla Retro

Perfu The F Revi Coal is

The G Tunis Re

The S

The K Rev The M

Re

Annam Scener Rev

The Pl

An Inte Art and The Me Revue Blanche .- 23, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris. 1 fr.

Religious Illusion. Count L. Tolstoy. Life in China. Continued. Yan-Fou-Li. Some Conversations with Eckermann.

Art

KOPE

. de

RIS.

ded.

7.

H.

sity.

M.

y by w in ance, e.

ated.

ated

ated

The Emigration of the Doukhobors. W. Bienstock. Letter to the Doukhobor Emigrants. Count L. Tolstoy. Life in China. Continued. Yan-Fou-Li.

Revue Chrétienne.-ri, Avenue de L'Observatoire, Paris. 6 frs. per ann. Nov.

The Christian Lift: and Scientific Theology. A. Sabatier and E. Stapfer. The Christian Idea of Country. J. Messines.
Augustine, Bishop of Hippo. E. Robert.

Revue des Deux Mondes.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND. 62 frs. per annum. Nov. 1.

The Chinese Problem. P. Leroy. Beaulieu.
Musical Epochs—The Sonata. C. Bellaigue.
A Visit to the Congo Free Stats. Comte d'Ursel.
Coal and Iron. R. G. Lévy.
The Trocadero School. M. Talmeyr.
Nov. 15.
The Neutrality of Belgium; the Monarchy's Last Good Dead. Duc de

Broglie, Budgets, J. Roche. The late French Exhibition. Le Vicomte de Vogüé, Recollections of New Grenada. P. d'Espagnat. The Life of Pasteur. R. Doumic.

The Life of Pasteur. R. Doumic.

Revus Encyclopédique.—18, King William Street, Strand.
78, par qr. Nov. 3.

Paris University and Reform. Illustrated. C. V. Langlois.
Anthology on Education. Professors of the Paris University.
The New Sorbonne. Illustrated. G. Lejeal.
The Paris Faculty of Lite. ature. With Portraits. H. Froidevaux.
The Paris Faculty of Lie. Results of Science. Illustrated. R. Dongier.
The Paris Faculty of Law. Illustrated. M. Planiol.
The Paris Faculty of Medicine. Illustrated. M. Aguinet.
The Paris Faculty of Medicine. Illustrated. M. Aguinet.
The Paris Higher School of Pharmacy. Illustrated. M. Guéguen.
Nov. 10.

The Vedas of India. Illustrated. L. de Milloué.
Holland, 1897-1905. L. Bresson.
France and Tunis. Illustrated. G. Loth.
Nov. 17.

Retrospective French Art at the Paris Exhibition, Illustrated, J. Stein. Gabriel Vicaire. With Portrait. N. Quellien. Nov. 24.

Perfumes. Illustrated. J. Boyer. The Progress of Electricity. G. Dumont.

Revue Française de l'Étranger et des Colonies.—)2, RUE DE LA VICTOIRE, PARIS. 2 frs. Nov.

Coal in Yunnan. A. Leclère.
The Geographical Congress at Paris. Continued. J. Savigny.
The Peoples of the Classical East. Illustrated. C. R
Tunis at the Paris Exhibition. G. Vasco,

Revue Générale.—16, RUE TREURENBERG, BRUSSELS. 12 frs. per annum. Nov.

The History of Workmen's Dwellings. J. Buse.
The Contemporary Theatre in France. H. Bordeaux.
Relief Works in France. Concluded. L. Banneux.
The Scientific International Congress of Catholics at Munich. J. V. den The Catholic Congress at Bonn. Baron de Trannoz.

The Khaki Election in England. A, Neincx.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie.—16. Rue Soufflot, Paris.
18 frs. per annum. Oct.
The Moral Responsibility of Compensation for Accidents. E. Westermarck.
The Congress of the International Institute of Sociology. René Worms.
France, 1839-1900. M. Dufourmantelle.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles, -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.

Annam. P. Luguet.

Nov. 20.

Women in the Far East, Jean Hess.

Scenery and Decoration at the Theatre, H. Quittard and M. Lenoir.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. Nov. The Philosophy of Félix Ravaisson. E. Boutroux.

The Fundamental Propositions of Modern Science and Greek Philosophy. W. N. Kozlowsk. Deductive and Experimental Sciences. C. Riquier. The Problem of Perception. E. Chartier.

Revue du Monde Catholique. -75, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.

Authority in the Matter of Doctrine. J. Fevre.
Jean Louis Gouttes. Concluded. Louis Robert.
A Missionary in China. Continued. Dom Chamard.
The Military Manœuvres of 1900. J. d'Estoc.
Heredity. Concluded. C. Mondain.

The Siege of the Legations at Pekin. S. Pichon.
Authority and Doctrine. Continued. J. Fevre.
Councils of War between Generals and Representatives of the People.

B, de Ganges.

A Missionary in China. Concluded. J. d'Estoc.
Egyptian Mythology. Concluded. V. Ermoni.

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 13, Bedford Street, 65 frs. per annum.

In Exile. Vicomte de Rei et. In the Yunnan. A François. The Father of the French Queen. F. Boyé. Thackeray. M. J. Darmesteter. A Provençal Vendetta in the XVI. Century. Comte Remacle.

The Preliminaries of the Imperior. F. Masson. William McKinley. A. Vi.llate. The French Bishops and the Protestants, 16,8. J. Lemoine. Thackeray. Continued. M. J. Darmesteter. The Human Species. F. Le Dantec.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire. -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.

The Chinese Problem. Baron d'Estouru.lles de Constant.
Corn at the Paris Bourse de Commerce and Speculation in Grain. Prof. A.
Charliat.
Land Reform in France. G. Chastenet.
The English Budget. Concluded. V. Marcé.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Opéra, Paris. 1 fr. Nov. 1. Freemasonry in the Army. L. Jeandré.
A New International Work. Enrico Ferri.
The Registration and Measurement of Human Vitality. Illustrated. Dr.
H. Baraduc.

H. Baraduc.
Lawsuits ag.inst the Dead in Ancient France, G. Debor.
Georges Rochegrosses and Historical Painting. Concluded.
C. Mauclair.
The Debuts of Great Writers, etc. H. d'Almeras.
The Literary Movement in Belgium., Concluded. E. Gilbert.
The Theatre of Life. H. Bérenger.

The Proletariat of Legislators. P. Portier.
The Proletariat of Legislators. P. Portier.
The Proletariat of Legislators; the Evil and Its Remedies: Symposium.
Germany and an Armed Peace. J. de Bloch.
Modern Slavery. Count L. Tolstoy.
The Missionaries and the Boxers. Illustrated. Dr. A. Banzemont.
Incuner. of Life and Death on the Destiny of Literary Reputations.
P. Stapfer.
The Theatre and Life.

The Theatre and Life. Continued. H. Bérenger. Revue Socialiste. -27, Rue de Richelieu, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. Nov. The Socialist Congress at Mayence. G. Milhaud.
The Theory of Dominant Factors in History. C. Rappoport.
The Judicial Aspects of Socialism. Concluded. G. Sorel, Imperialism, Absolutism, Militarism. Paul Louis.

Revue Universitaire. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per ann. Nov.

History and Geography in 1900. P. Foncin. Associations of Old Lycée and College of Pupils. E. Petit.

Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles.—4. RUE DU FRONTISPICE, BRUSSELS. 1 fr. 50 c. Nov.

Alphonse Rivier. Medical Training. Dr. Rouffurt.

Université Catholique.—Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per ann. Nov.

Contemporary Supernatural Facts. Abbé Delfour.
The Peerage of the Restoration. Continued. J. Laurentie.
The Far East. F. Gairal.
The Book of Esther. Concluded. Baronne D. de Fontmagne.
How Great Writers Correct Themselves. Abbé T. De mont.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica,-VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. Nov. 3. Prayer for the Dead. An International Tribunal. Art and History at the French Exhibition.

The Monks of the East before the Council of Chalcedon.

Nov. 17.
De Jesu Christo Redemptore: Encyclical of Leo XIII. The Moral Cure for Italy.
The Stele in the Forum and its Inscriptions. Determinism and Liberty. Ecclesiastical Law according to Leo XIII.

Cosmos Catholicus.-VIA SANTA CHIARA ROME. Oct. 15. The Slav Language in the Liturgy. Continued.
The Abduction of Pius VII. Illustrated. G. Marcotti.
Scutari in Albania. Illustrated. P. McSwiney.

Nov. t.
The Hauran. Illustrated. Fr. H. Lammeus.
Recent Congresses in Rome. P. Mattei-Gentili.

Flegrea.-PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. 20 fr. per annum. Oct. 20.

Contemporary French Poetry. R. de Gourmont. Nov. 5.

Dante G. Rossetti. E. del Cerro. The Mystery of the Passion at Oberammergau. A. Compagna.

Nuova Antologia. - VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum. Nov. z.

The Dante Society at Ravenna. Prof. P. Villari. Giovanni Pascoli: Poet. With Portrait. Prof. V. Cian. Benvenuto Cellini. With Portrait. A. Venturi. The English Elections. E. Arbib.
The New Reign. M. Ferraris.

Charlotte Brontē. Prof. C. Segré. Railways to the Simplon, With Map. A. Ferrucci. Paris Bordone, Illustrated, P. Moimenti, Politics and Socialism. P. Bertolini.

Rassegna Nazionale.-VIA DELLA PACE 2, FLORENCE.

The Equilibrium on the Adriatic, C. Mangroni.
Testi and Leopardi. F. Bartoli.
Savonarola and the Reform of Women. G. Gnerghi.
Progress in Marconi Telegraphy. R. Ferrini.
Rosmini and the Present Social Question. C. Calzi.

Nov. 26.
Electric Traction on Italian Railways. P. Lanino.
Socialism and the Recent Election. G. P. A.
In Memory of Humbert I. Senator F. Lampertico.
Mr. Kruger's Policy. G. di Revel.

Riforma Sociale. - Turin. 12 fr. per ann. Nov. 15. Traditional Diplomacy. G. Novikov. Italians in England. Continued. G. Prato.

Rivista Internazionale. —Via Torre Argentina 76, Rome.
30 frs. per ann. Oct.
The Social Origin of Crime. Dr. R. Spina.
Liberty of Education. Prof. G. Piovani.
The Congress on Rural Banks held in Paris. The Editor.

is fil

pa

de

an ha an

to all for cou

WO are hav

the equ

and are whi

tube

the

publ

Tem

R.A.

soms duce by I

by (

20 in piece in t

Mac

20 in.

by Jo by I " The Joshu

be ser

post f

as th presen

of the in the

if any subscri 8s. 6d.

REVIE

post d

We

Rivista Italiana di Sociologia.-VIA NAZIONALE 200, ROME. Oct. Social Suggestion. L. Gumplowicz.
The Economic Theories of Macchiavelli, V. Tangorra.
Recent Studies in the Markist Philosophy. V. Giuffrida.

Rivista Musicale Italiana, —Fratelli Bocca, Turin. L 4. 50.

Thoughts on Modern Music. A. Costa.
Caron de Beaumarchais and Music. H. Kling.
The Master Musicians of the French Renaissance. Continued. O. Chilesotti.
Music in Italy in the Eighteenth Century. G. Roberti.
The Libretto of Carlo Goldoni and Others. E. Maddalena, Perosi's: "The Massacre of the Innocents." E. Adaïewsky. Perosi's "The Massacre of the Innocents." Enrico Bossi's "Song of Songs." L. Torchi.

Rivista Politica e Letteraria.—Via Marco Minghetti 3, Rome. Nov. 15.

From Rome to London. XXX.
Unsuspected Italian Interests in China. A. Caneva.
The Japanese on the International Struggle. A. Paternostro.
The Re-construction of the Roman Forum. The Editor.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Ciudad de Dios .- REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MADRID. 20 pesetas per annum. Nov. 5.

Moral and Religious Education. Marcelino Arnaiz.
Faith and the Medical Sciences. Z. M. Nuñez.
Reminiscences of a Prisoner in the Philippines. J. R. de Prada.

España Moderna. - Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum. Nov.

Chinese Pleasures. General Tcheng-Ki-Tong.
The Wars and Dominion of the Spaniards in the Low Countries. F.

The Law Courts and the Legal Profession. Prof. P. Dorado.

Revista Contemporanea .- CALLE DE PIZARRO 17, MADRID. 2 pesetas. Oct. 30. The Trans-Siberian Railway. Arturo Llopis.

Training the Sight for Rifle and Cannon Firing. P. A. Berenguer Ballester. The Mental Capacity of Great Men. A. G. Maceira.

Nov. 15.

England and The United States. J. Garcia Acuña. Common Sense. Antonio Frates. A Recollection of the First Carlist Civil War. "Curuous."

Revista Portugueza.—Rua Nova do Almada 74, Lisbon. 15 frs. per annum. No. 37.

The Province of Angola and the Congo Free State. H. C. Events in South Afr ca and Portuguese Colonial Policy. Tito de Carvalho. The Cultivation of the Palm-Tree. J. Henriques. The Expedition to Mataka. A. A. Terry.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Elseviér's Gelliustreerd Maandschrift,—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 1s. 8d. Nov. William Hamel, Dutch Artist. Illustrated. Edward B. Koster. The Golden Year of Dutch History. Illustrated. J. Eysten. Sketches at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. Eugene Bange.

De Gids .- Luzac. 3s. Nov. Some Thoughts on Spinoza. Prof. van der Wijck.
Pan-Islamism. Prof. van der Berg.
The Training of the People for National Defence. S. van Aken.
The Rulers of Mecklenburg in the 19th Century. Dr. Byvanck.

Vragen des Tijds.-Luzac. 15. 6d. Nov. The National School in Berlin, G. A. C. van Goor. The Increase of Cancer in Holland. Dr. Bruinsma.

Woord en Beeld.—Erven F. Bohn, Haarlem. 16s. per annum.

Nov.

The Tendency of Thought at the End of the 19th Century. Illustrated. J. K. Rensburg. Jos. M. Orelio, Operatic Singer. With Portrait. C. Dopper. East Indian Weapons. Illustrated. Louis Lacomble.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Finsk Tidskrift.-Helsingrors, Finland. Nos. 7-8. The Co-operative Movement in England. J. V. Björksten. The Latest Kalevala Researches. O. Grotenfelt.

Nordisk Tidskrift .- P. A. Norstedt and Sons, Stockholm. 10 kr. per annum. No. 6.

The Recently-Discovered Ancient Inscriptions in the Forum, Rome. Illustrated, P. Person.
Neutrality P oposals during the Crimean War. Fred-ik Baier.
The Study of Germanic Languages in the Swedish Universities. F. Holt-

Buddhist Religious Poetry. Karl Gjellerup. The Treatment of Consumption. Karl Petrén.

Tilskueren.-Ernst Bojesen, Comenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. Nov. The Development of the Nervous System. J. Lykke. The Constitution of China. N. Juel Hansen. The Danish Court in 1770. Continued. Aage Friis.

Kringsjaa .- Olaf Norli, Christiania. 2 kr. per quarter. Oct. 31. The Autumn Bird-Flight. Concluded. S. A. Rumsvig.
The Treasures of Dr. Sandvig of Lillehammer. With Portrait. Concluded. Chr. Brinchmann.

The American Presidential Election. With Portrait.

Nov. 15.
The Fall of the Leaf and Its Change of Colour. S. A. Ramsvig.

Ord och Bild.-KARL WAHLIN, STOCKHOLM. 12 kr. per annum.

Nils Forsberg's New Picture. Nathan Söderblom.
The "Clou" of the World's Fair. Nathan Söderblom.
Gustaf Upmark and the National Museum. Karl Wahlin.

The Danish People during the War of 1864. Karl Wahlin.
The Revival of the old Norwegian Art of Tapestry-Weaving. Ann Margeret
Holmgren. Anna Petersson-Norie. Carl G. Laurin.

NEW PICTURES ISSUED BY THE "REVIEW OF REVIEWS."

In answer to the requests of many of our readers, we have issued this month several very fine reproductions of beautiful paintings in a large size-sufficiently large to be effective and decorative when properly framed and hung in any apartment. We have five of these pictures ready, and others will follow from time to time. These collotypes are all most artistically reproduced for the REVIEW OF REVIEWS by a firm of art printers in this country whose reputation for such work is deservedly high, and we are perfectly sure that many who have expressed their delight with the Shilling Portfolios will be equally charmed with these larger and more effective pictures. There are five subjects ready, any one of which can be sent in a cardboard tube, post free to any address in the world, for half-a-crown. Those published include: "The Fighting Temeraire," by J. M. W. Turner, R.A., size 25 in. by 20 in.; "Blossoms," by Albert Moore (reproduced here in a smaller size), 28 in. by 12 in.; "A Summer Shower," by C. E. Perugini, size, 25 in. by 20 in. (reproduced as the frontispiece to this magazine); "Spring in the Austrian Tyrol," by J. MacWhirter, R.A., size, 25 in. by 20 in.; and "Britannia's Realm," by John Brett, A.R.A., size, 25 in. by 14 in. Then we have also "The Cherub Choir," by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which can also be sent to any address for 2s. 6d., post free.

frs.

lho.

ated.

. 31.

uded.

rgerat

We may remind our readers, as this is the last issue of the present volume—the last, indeed, of the century—of the offer made in the November issue, viz., that if any one will send us a special subscription of Ios. 6d., instead of 8s. 6d., for the supply of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS direct by post during the year 1901, we

28 in, by 12 in,]

Blossoms.

By Albert Moore,

shall send, not the magazine alone, but immediately on receipt of the remittance of 10s. 6d., the following pictures as a premium:—

The Fighting "Temeraire." By J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Size, 25 in. by 20 in.

Britannia's Realm. By John Brett, A.R.A. Size, 23 in. by 11 in. May Blossoms. By Albert Moore.

Size about 18 in. by 7 in.

The Cherub Choir. By Sir Joshua
Reynolds. Size, 16 in. by 134 in.

And there was a second suggestion, which is also repeated for the benefit of those who did not see the first announcement. It was this: -Any person who will take the trouble to enlist FIVE NEW ANNUAL SUBSCRIBERS to this magazine at 8s. 6d. each, and will send their full postal addresses together with a Post Office money order for Two GUINEAS, will thereupon receive by post, as a free gift, the following collection of ten pictures, which if purchased elsewhere would cost about a pound, while the magazine will be posted direct for one year to the five persons whose subscriptions have been so collected :-

The Fighting "Temeraire." By J. M. W. Turner, R.A. Size, 25 in. by 20 in. (See next

Britannia's Realm. By John Brett, A.R.A. Size, 23 in. by 11 in. Spring in the Austrian Tyrol. By J. MacWhirter, R.A. Size, 25 in. by 20 in.

May Blossoms. By Albert Moore. Size, 28 in. by 12 in.

A Summer Shower. By C. E. Perugini. Size, 25 in. by 20 in. The Cherub Choir. By Sir Joshua Reynolds. Size, 16 in. by 13½ in. The Golden Stairs. By Sir Edward Burne - Jones. Size, 19 in. by 9 in.

The Dresden Madonna. By Raphael, Size, 12 in. by 10 in.

Venice. By J. M. W. Turner, R.A.
Size, 14 in. by 8½ in.

The Princess of Wales. By Edward Hughes. Size, 15 in. by 10½ in.

All orders for subscriptions or pictures should be addressed to the Manager, REVIEW OF REVIEWS Office, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

The Fighting "Temeraire."

By J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.

14 in. by 84 in.

Venice.

By J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.

FOR OUR BAIRNS IN THE WORKHOUSES:

Their Christmas Presents.

I AM glad to report that the appeal which I made on behalf of the bairns in the workhouses has met with a gratifying response. It will be remembered that I asked my readers to help me to supply the children in our workhouses with a box of picture-books, and a collection of pictures to brighten the walls of their somewhat dreary living-rooms. I have received very encouraging letters on the subject from Earl Grey, Earl Durham, Lady Henry Somerset, the Countess of Warwick, Dr. Rutherfoord Harris, M.P., and others; and the first offers of help include the following promises to undertake county areas :-

ALL THE WORKHOUSES IN

LL THE WORKHOUSES IN
. Berkshire
. Northumberland
. Durham
. Herefordshire
. Warwickshire
. Essex
. North Staffordshire
. City & County of London
. Hertfordshire
. Wales

Besides these offers I have received the following subscriptions towards the general fund for carrying out the proposal :- W. T. Stead, £ 10 10s.; Abraham Hart, 10s. 6d.; A Scottish Working Woman, 10s.; J. H. Arbuckle, 10s.; J. Haddon, M.D., 10s.; Messrs. Hoskins and Co., 10s.; A. G. Howard, 10s.; A Soldier, Aldershot, 5s.; Sergt. F. McLoughlin, R.I.C., 1s.; Mrs. M. A. Jones, 10s.; Miss E. S. Wing, 10s.; Miss Rose Helsby, 10s.; Councillor Chas. Garcia, 5s.; Wm. Vernon, 10s.; Mrs. W. S. Bird, Austria, 10s.; E. Parry, 10s.

Many other readers have undertaken to supply the books and the pictures to workhouses in their own locality, and before this number is published I hope to have received many additional subscriptions. There is a difficulty in Ireland, owing to the religious differences which unfortunately divide that island. My "Books for the Bairns" are certainly unsectarian enough, but some of my Helpers assure me that they would never be allowed to enter their workhouses. I hope, however, that there will be no objection to the pictures. In Scotland there are fortunately next to no children in workhouses, as they are nearly all boarded out. Nevertheless, the opportunity of adding to the brightness of the lives of the unfortunate children' of the State is one which I hope will not be neglected in any part of Great Britain where. these little ones are to be found. The cost of the fifty little books and the fifty pictures for the walls is only 10s., and I shall be very glad to receive further subscriptions or promises from those who have not yet had their attention drawn to this matter. Further subscriptions should be addressed to the Editor, REVIEW OF REVIEWS, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

3143 38

55.; ies, ies, irs. oks and red in oris "my to ere ere he will ere fty haly ibad ipof. C.

XUM

